Though he would die a millionaire, Torrio's arrival in the U.S. was inauspicious. In fact, he appeared a bit ridiculous as he toddled down the gangplank of the ship that brought him to Ellis Island in New York Harbor. He wore a little girl's tattered dress, the only garment his impoverished mother could afford. Upon it was pinned a piece of paper, reading: "John Torrio." Torrio's hardworking mother, Maria Carlucci Torrio, immediately went to work in New York as a seamstress to support herself and her infant son.

Torrio was left alone in a crib much of the day with neighbors occasionally checking on him. His home was a single room of spartan furniture in the disease-ridden Lower East Side of New York. In 1886, Maria Torrio married Salvatore Caputo, the owner of a small grocery store on James Street. Caputo operated an illegal bar behind the grocery store and while a teenager, Johnny Torrio went to work as a swamper, cleaning the floors of the saloon.

Johnny Torrio, 1925, a cloth covering a gunshot wound he received in an attempt on his life by George "Bugs" Moran and others.

Although Torrio joined the James Street Gang at an early age, this was more a matter of self-protection than an actively sought role. To avoid being beaten up regularly by gang members, the diminutive Torrio became one of the gang. He avoided committing crimes with other gang members, preferring to perform his thefts and burglaries alone. He reasoned that in this way, he could never be turned in by other gang members seeking to avoid a conviction. Thus, no police arrests of Torrio were ever made during this time.

In 1904, using money accumulated from his various robberies and burglaries, Torrio, using the alias of J.T. McCarthy, opened a large saloon at James and Walker streets. He rented the upper floors of the building and the building next door where he installed about twenty prostitutes. This was Torrio's first bordello. He was to go on making money from prostitutes until his forced retirement from the rackets in 1925. To protect the saloon and brothel operations, Torrio hired a dozen of the toughest gunmen from the old James Street Gang. He expanded his rackets to include several gambling dens. As he prospered, Anna Jacobs, Torrio's loyal wife, who urged him to quit the rackets after witnessing her husband's near assassination.

Torrio also came to the attention of other established gangsters, chiefly Paul Kelly (Paolo Vaccarelli), then the most powerful gang lord in New York. Kelly persuaded Torrio to join him in his Manhattan rackets, and by 1905, Torrio was Kelly's top lieutenant in the Five Points Gang.

While Torrio looked after Kelly's brothels in Manhattan, he found time to act the part of Fagin by teaching youngsters the black arts of pickpocketing and burglary. These youthful thieves, some as young as ten, brought their stolen items to Torrio who fenced them, keeping the lion's share for himself. Several graduates of this gang, such as Frankie Yale and Al Capone (who became a Torrio-trained thief at the age of nine), later joined the adult Five Points Gang as labor sluggers assigned to break up picketing strikers.

By the time he reached his early twenties, Torrio was a wealthy man. He dressed in conservative three-piece suits, wore a derby and disdained anything garish. His ties were always black and the only bit of color in his daily ensemble was a blood red handkerchief poking from the breast pocket of his suit coat. In his attire, Torrio aped his boss, Paul Kelly. He also imitated Kelly's mannerisms. He spoke slowly and softly and forced himself to discard the stereotypical Italian habit of gesturing with the hands to emphasize what he said.

In 1908, a bloody gang war broke out between the factions headed by Kelly and Edward "Monk" Eastman. Political pressure to end this war came from the ruling powers at Tammany Hall. Rather than incur the enmity of political sachems, Torrio bowed out of the Kelly operations, retreating to Brooklyn, where he and Frankie Yale opened a large saloon called the Harvard Inn. This sawdust strewn saloon served as the headquarters of the Torrio-Yale gang which concentrated on Black Hand rackets, preying upon Italian immigrants in Brooklyn. Torrio also continued to expand his brothel operations so that by the end of 1908, he controlled two dozen brothels that realized about $5,000 a week in profits.

In 1909, Torrio received a letter from Chicago crime lord, James "Big Jim" Colosimo, asking him to come to the Windy City and become his right-hand man in charge of all brothel and gambling operations. Colosimo had married a Chicago brothel madam, Victoria Moresco, who was Torrio's aunt. The offer came at a propitious moment, in that Torrio's relationship with Kelly had soured and he was receiving considerable pressure from the police to kick back a larger share of the spoils from his Brooklyn whorehouse operations.

Selling his share in the Harvard Inn to Frankie Yale, Torrio packed his bags and took the next train to Chicago. At the time, Chicago was a wide-open city, its red light district, the Levee, operating around the clock. This area and points north and west were controlled by aldermen Michael "Hinky Dink" Kenna and John "Bathhouse John" Coughlin, who were Colosimo's front men, political protectors, and partners in crime. Kenna and Coughlin had grown rich receiving payoffs and kickbacks from the myriad brothels and gambling halls operated by Colosimo.

Colosimo had also grown enormously rich, but was being preyed upon by Black Handers who threatened to beat up his prostitutes and customers, as well as burn down his gambling dens and saloons unless they were given a large portion of Colosimo's weekly take. When Torrio arrived he was immediately given the chore of ridding Colosimo of these costly extortionists.

Torrio first took over Colosimo's flagship brothel, the Saratoga, acting as a male madam. Next, he collected the best of Colosimo's gunmen and went after the Black Handers. Torrio arranged a meeting with three of the top extortionists, telling them that he would personally give them the first installment of the $50,000-a-week extortion they were demanding. The boss Black Hander in Chicago at that time was James "Sunny Jim" Cosmano and it was Cosmano who had been behind the extortion of Colosimo. Cosmano sent his three top lieutenants to collect from Torrio at the appointed meeting which was to be held beneath the elevated train tracks near Grand Avenue.

Instead of delivering money, however, Torrio and his men pulled guns and shot the three Black Handers dead. Torrio then sent word to Cosmano that if Colosimo ever received another Black Hand demand from anybody, he, Torrio, would personally kill Cosmano. Cosmano quickly went into retirement. The triple killing performed by the New York gangster quickly established Torrio as a fierce, unyielding gangster, one who would protect Colosimo's rackets with bullets. Torrio's dark star rose over Chicago. Colosimo's crime empire embraced, for the most part, scores of brothels and gambling dens, and Torrio was made the manager of these nefarious enterprises. His job was to make sure that Colosimo bagmen collected the correct amount of money in kickbacks and percentages from each and every operation, including such prestigious brothels as the Everleigh Club, operated by the celebrated, sophisticated sisters, Ada and Minna Everleigh, who later retired to New York with millions.

Charles Dion "Deanie" O'Bannion, one-time choir boy and charismatic gang leader of Chicago's North Side, is shown with his wife on his wedding day.

By 1912, Torrio married Anna Jacobs, a Jewish woman, and leased an expensive apartment on Chicago's South Side. He also established his own headquarters at 2222 South Wabash, a dive he called The Four Deuces. This establishment was not far from Colosimo's Café, a famous nightclub and restaurant, which drew celebrities from around the world. Torrio's headquarters at the Four Deuces consisted of a cheap bar on the main floor and, two floors for gambling and a bordello on the fourth floor. The gang leader had a small office in the rear of the bar from, where he managed Colosimo's many rackets, as well as his legitimate operations.

For several years, Torrio faced little or no opposition from rival gangsters as he expanded Colosimo's brothel and gambling operations north and south in the city. In late 1918, Torrio learned that one of his own bodyguards had been paid to kill him. He personally murdered this thug and then sent for one of his New York proteges, the hulking Al Capone, his erstwhile sneak-thief student. Capone arrived in Chicago in 1919 and received orders to protect Johnny Torrio at all times. He slavishly followed Torrio about, wearing two guns beneath the coat of his cheap suit.

Al Capone in 1924, at the time he sent three killers to murder O'Bannion on Torrio's orders.

Capone had been anxious to flee New York. When he received Torrio's offer, he was suspected of murdering one of Torrio's Brooklyn prostitutes after a dispute concerning the money she made, and was also about to be charged in the murder of a rival gangster. Although he began as a $35-a-week bouncer in the Four Deuces, within a year Capone had become Torrio's top enforcer and manager of the Colosimo brothel empire. He was a shrewd, street-smart thug, who instantly saw the possibilities of a million-dollar racket through bootlegging when the Volstead Act went into effect on January 16, 1920. Prohibition offered enormous opportunities as Torrio also knew. But Big Jim Colosimo, who had grown fat and lazy with success, wanted nothing to do with this new racket. "Stick to the girls and the gambling," he told Torrio after his lieutenant urged him to throw his entire operation into bootlegging.

Torrio however realized that the smaller Chicago gangs would seize the Colosimo territory, which encompassed much of the Loop and the South Side, as their own bootlegging fiefdoms, if he did not act promptly. On May 11, 1920, Colosimo was contacted by Torrio, who told him that a liquor distributor was about to deliver a truckload of bonded whiskey to his cafe so that he would have plenty of stock for his customers during Prohibition. Colosimo thought Prohibition was only an "experiment" and would not last but a few months. With $50,000 in his pockets (and perhaps as much as $250,000 in his money belt) and wearing $50,000 in diamonds (on his cufflinks, rings, stickpin, and belt buckle), Colosimo went to his cafe to take delivery. The cafe was not open for business at that time and only a few employees were about and none in the foyer, where the crime boss waited for the liquor delivery.

Colosimo was looking out the small window of the front door when his killer crept up behind him. The killer placed a .38-caliber revolver to Colosimo's head, pulled the trigger and blew away part of his skull, instantly killing the crime lord, who crashed heavily to the floor. The killer, Capone by best reports, then rifled Colosimo's pockets, took his money belt and stripped him of some of his diamonds before fleeing through the front door. Though Torrio has always been depicted by crime historians as utterly loyal to his uncle, it is certain that he arranged to have Big Jim murdered and specifically by Capone, who was not known to Colosimo and had been imported from New York by Torrio for that purpose.

The interior of Schofield's flower shop on North State Street in which O'Bannion owned a controlling interest and where he conducted his underworld operations and subsequently died at the hands of Capone killers.

An artist's sketch recreating the "handshake murder" of O'Bannion; the tall man (center), who held O'Bannion's hand in a vise-like grip, was reportedly Frankie Yale, with gunmen Scalise and Anselmi flanking him.

Following Colosimo's death, Torrio took over Big Jim's empire and Capone became his right-hand man. Torrio carved up the city, taking the South Side for himself, allocating the North Side to Charles Dion O'Bannion and his powerful gang. Many mobs worked under Torrio's command. Ragen's Colts and Ralph Sheldon's gang on the South Side distributed Torrio beer at $45 a barrel to saloons. This beer was made by federally closed breweries that operated clandestinely for Torrio, the largest of which was the Stenson Brewery. A series of breweries across the state line in northern Indiana also provided brew for Torrio distributors. By the end of 1922, Torrio and Capone had built up a network of hundreds of small breweries which produced beer at a cost of $5 a barrel.

Many satellite gangs received Torrio's beer and homemade liquor, including Claude Maddox of the Circus Gang, the Marty Guifoyle gang and the Druggan-Lake mob known as the Valley Gang. But several truculent Chicago gangsters bristled at being told by Torrio in which territories they could operate. The first gang to rise against Torrio was the South Side O'Donnell mob led by Edward "Spike" O'Donnell. From 1923 to 1925, Torrio's gunmen, directed by Capone, battled the O'Donnells. Capone killers Frank "Sunny" Dunn; Walter Stevens, assisted by Frank McErlane of the Saltis-McErlane Gang; Jack "Machine Gun Jack" McGurn; Sam "Golf Bag" Hunt, who carried a shotgun in a golf bag; and William "Three-Fingered Jack" White blasted the O'Donnell gang to pieces, killing a dozen of their number before Spike O'Donnell quit the rackets.

Trouble was also stirring in Torrio's own ranks, or, at least, in the ranks of gangs, who had sworn loyalty to him, particularly the unruly Genna Brothers, who controlled the near West Side and Little Italy. In the heart of this unpoliced area, the Gennas, six brothers whose lethal guns spat out death at the slightest provocation, reigned supreme. The Gennas, Sicilian to the core, controlled the Unione Siciliane, a brotherhood linked to the rackets in the U.S. The Gennas also operated thousands of stills which produced a raw, rotgut alcohol that passed for liquor of all kinds, from whiskey to gin. None of it was comparable to bonded whiskey produced by legitimate distilleries, but the demand for liquor was so intense that whatever the Gennas produced, Torrio's distributors had no trouble selling to thousands of saloons and thirsty customers.

The Gennas constantly demanded additional territory for their own bootlegging racket, particularly the lucrative North Side, but Torrio knew that to grant this expansion into O'Bannion's territory would mean total gang warfare. Also, the West Side O'Donnell Brothers gang, unrelated to the South Side O'Donnells, informed Torrio that their territory was too confining, and they, too, demanded more space in which to peddle their booze. The worst of Torrio's problems came from the North Side and the unpredictable O'Bannion.

Although O'Bannion, who controlled several north side breweries, had a better supply of beer than any bootlegger in Chicago, his men regularly hijacked bonded Canadian whiskey being shipped to Torrio from the Purple Gang in Detroit. In 1923, O'Bannion expanded his bootlegging operations into Cicero, a western suburb, which Torrio and Capone had already selected as their new headquarters during the reign of reform mayor, William E. Dever. To assure an easy takeover of Cicero, Sheriff Peter Hoffman of Cook County, who was on Torrio's payroll, unleashed massive raids against the local gang operations in Cicero, gathering up hundreds of slot machines and closing down brothels and bookie parlors. The local gangs submitted to Torrio's rule immediately.

Meanwhile, Capone consistently urged Torrio to eliminate the pesky North Siders, especially O'Bannion and his top lieutenants, George "Bugs" Moran, Earl "Hymie" Weiss, and Vincent "The Schemer" Drucci. Torrio, however, prided himself on his diplomatic skills and, instead of instituting gang warfare, called meeting after meeting with O'Bannion and his men. At these meetings, the wily O'Bannion always promised to abide by earlier agreements in which he and his gang would remain within the provinces assigned to them. But after each of these conferences, O'Bannion would sneer at Torrio's edicts and order his men to continue encroaching upon Torrio-Capone territories.

O'Bannion challenged the Genna Brothers, labeling them "spaghetti benders." Angelo Genna went to Torrio and begged him to allow the Gennas to murder O'Bannion. Torrio told him to wait. O'Bannion then insulted Capone, calling him a "dago pimp" and had several of Capone's top gunmen killed. Capone insisted that O'Bannion be murdered, but Torrio said no, for that would lead to a bloody war. In May 1924, O'Bannion came to Torrio with a proposition. He, Torrio, and Capone had joint ownership in a huge gambling resort called The Ship. O'Bannion wanted to sell his interest in the operation to Torrio. Moreover, he offered to sell Torrio his ownership of the finest brewery on the North Side, Sieben's Mid-City Brewery.

"I'm gonna retire, Johnny," O'Bannion told Torrio. "The rackets are wearing me out. The Gennas are invading my territory and the bodies are piling up. I'm gonna buy some nice ranch land near Louis Alterie's spread in Colorado and live out a life of ease. No more guns, no more street fights. I want to unload The Ship and Sieben's."

New York gangster Frankie Yale (Uale), who was imported to Chicago by Torrio to kill O'Bannion.

Despite Capone's insistence that O'Bannion could not be trusted, Torrio agreed to the deal, reportedly delivering $500,000 in cash to the Irish gang leader a few days later. On May 19, 1924, Torrio arrived at Sieben's to inspect his new property. O'Bannion and his most devoted follower, Earl "Hymie" Weiss, were there to greet him and showed him through the sprawling brewery. Suddenly, they heard two loud buzzing noises. A foreman at the brewery later reported the following conversation between the gangsters:

"What's that?" Torrio asked.

O'Bannion turned to Weiss with a smile on his face. "How many you count, Hymie?"

"Two." Weiss had a wide grin on his long face.

"My count's the same." O'Bannion turned to Torrio and said with a wide smile: "You know something, J. T. When you have two, that's the cops."

In a second Torrio knew that he had been set up by O'Bannion. He reached for a telephone and then said to the party at the other end: "Mid-City. A pinch."

Within a few minutes the place was swarming with policemen. The raid was personally led by Morgan A. Collins, Mayor Dever's new chief of police. O'Bannion, Weiss, and Torrio were promptly arrested and taken to police headquarters. This was the first time O'Bannion and Weiss had been arrested for violating the Volstead Act, which meant a fine. Torrio, however, had been arrested in June 1923 for violating the Prohibition law, and a second arrest, as O'Bannion well knew, meant a prison term for Torrio.

A bond of $7,500 was set for each man. Ike Roderick appeared to post bond for Torrio, but the South Side mob boss refused to provide bond for O'Bannion and Weiss. He stormed out of the holding cell, listening to O'Bannion and Weiss laugh at his departure. The North Siders were bailed out a short time later by their own bondsman, William Skidmore.

Torrio seethed at being set up. Then Capone repeated a remark to Torrio supposedly passed by the gloating O'Bannion upon his release: "I clipped the pimp for $500,000 and then dumped him in the can." Torrio decided to act. He enlisted the aid of the Gennas, who provided two men O'Bannion did not know, Albert Anselmi and John Scalise, professional killers who dipped their bullets in garlic, believing that if the wounds they inflicted were not fatal the garlic would infect the victim and cause death. A third man, Frankie Yale, Torrio's old Brooklyn partner, was summoned from New York. These three gunmen visited O'Bannion's North State Street flower shop on November 10, 1924.

Mike Merlo, president of the Unione Siciliane, had recently died of natural causes and his funeral was to be a big event. All the Italian mobs ordered their floral wreaths from O'Bannion, including Torrio and Capone. Yale called O'Bannion a few hours before his visit to the shop to see when Torrio's wreath would be ready. O'Bannion told him at noon. Shortly before that time Yale, Anselmi, and Scalise arrived at the shop, and while Yale shook O'Bannion's hand and held it in a vise-like grip, Anselmi and Scalise shot the Irish gang leader to death. O'Bannion never got the chance to reach for one of the three guns he was carrying under his linen duster. This attack was known as the "Handshake Murder." The killers fled and were never brought to justice, although their identities were well known. A porter, who worked for the flower shop and who was in the back room, witnessed the entire shooting.

George "Bugs" Moran (center), shown at a court arraignment, sought revenge for O'Bannion's death by leading the murder attempt on Torrio's life on January 24, 1925.

Torrio had had his revenge, but at a cost he knew in advance he would have to pay. The O'Bannion killing touched off the bloodiest gang war in Chicago history. A short time later, Torrio received a $2,500 fine and a nine-month prison sentence as a result of the Mid-City raid. While his lawyers appealed, Torrio began to collect his bootleg millions, depositing enormous amounts of money in New York and European banks. On January 24, 1925, after returning from a Loop shopping trip, Torrio and his wife, Anna, stepped from their chauffeur-driven limousine in front of their South Shore apartment building. Torrio, loaded with packages, was following his wife into the building, when a black Cadillac containing four men pulled to the curb across the street.

Moran and Weiss, armed with automatics, leaped from the car and ran across the street firing at Torrio. He was hit four times, one bullet striking him in the chest, another in the neck. He fell to the pavement as his chauffeur, Robert Barton, pulled a gun and fired at the attackers. The other two men in the Cadillac, Drucci and Frank Gusenberg, began to fire at Barton with shotguns. Barton was struck in the leg with a load of buckshot and slipped down on the seat of the limousine.

Moran stood over the fallen Torrio. He leaned close to the gang leader, placing his automatic next to Torrio's head and shouted: "This is for Deanie O'Bannion, you dago bastard!" He pulled the trigger and nothing happened. The automatic was empty. Frantically, Moran started to load another clip into the weapon, but Drucci, behind the wheel of the Cadillac began to beep the horn wildly, the signal that police were arriving. Cursing his luck, Moran, accompanied by Weiss, ran back to the Cadillac, and jumped inside. The car roared away.

Torrio began crawling toward the entrance to the apartment house, leaving a long trail of blood behind him. His wife ran from the building, hysterically calling for help as she dragged her wounded husband inside the building's foyer. A police ambulance arrived a short time later and rushed the little gangster to Jackson Park Hospital. En route, Torrio, believing his attackers had dipped their bullets in garlic as did his own killers, screamed to hospital attendants: "Cauterize it! Cauterize it!"

After a lengthy operation, Torrio miraculously survived, although the bullet wound in his neck left a permanent scar. Torrio met the press some days later, a scarf drawn around his neck. "Sure, I know all four men," he told newspaper reporters. "I'll never tell their names."

On February 9, 1925, Torrio stood before federal Judge Adam Cliffe and was officially sentenced to serve nine months in the Waukegan County Jail, a site requested by Torrio's lawyers, who explained that Torrio's wounds would require a jail, where he could receive proper medical attention. The real reason for requesting the Waukegan jail was that the warden was friendly to Torrio's organization and that Capone's gunmen would be better able to protect the boss.

Torrio (center), 1936, under arrest for income tax evasion; he is flanked by federal agents who took him into custody in White Plains, New York.

The warden of Waukegan Jail, Sheriff Edwin Ahlstrom, fitted the windows of Torrio's cell with bullet-proof plating. Extra deputies guarded the cell and the corridors day and night. Stuffed chairs, throw rugs, and a large bed were placed in the largest cell in the jail. Torrio spent his nine months in considerable comfort, dining on catered meals in his cell and on home cooking from the Sheriff's home outside the jail. He spent long hours sitting on Ahlstrom's front porch.

Torrio had much to think about during this period. He could look back to his days in New York and how he had survived gang wars as a member of the James Street Gang and the Five Points Gang. He had survived the early gang wars of Chicago and even his execution at the hands of Moran and Weiss. Through his organizational abilities, he had established the largest and most lucrative bootlegging empire in the U.S., accumulating a personal fortune estimated to be $75 million. Torrio, always practical, came to the realization that the North Siders had marked him for death. They would stop at nothing to avenge their fallen leader, O'Bannion. Torrio had no stomach for such gang vendettas. He summoned Capone, who arrived in Waukegan with lawyers the next day.

The gang overlord startled his 25-year-old protege by telling him that he was quitting the rackets and turning over everything—the gambling dens, the hundreds of brothels and saloons, the bootlegging enterprises, the dozens of legitimate businesses he had insisted upon buying as fronts for the mob and sources of considerable revenues—to Capone. "I'm through," he told Capone. "It's all yours, Al. I'm going back to Italy...if I can get out of this city alive."

"I'll see to that," promised Capone, jubilant that he was now the supreme gang lord in Chicago and inheritor of a $100 million-a-year crime empire. Only the brutal Capone would embrace this opportunity that went hand-in-hand with a five-year bloodbath that claimed the lives of hundreds of gangsters and innocent people. He not only inherited Torrio's crime kingdom, but all the attending liabilities.

Upon his jail release, Torrio and his wife were escorted to safety by Capone in his armor-plated limousine, which took the retired gang lord to an Indiana train station and an eastbound train. A caravan of cars jammed with armed men accompanied the Torrios and Capone. Two dozen additional Capone gangsters patrolled the Gary, Indiana, depot, marching up and down on the platform with submachine guns cradled in their arms as the Torrios waited for their train. When the Twentieth Century Ltd. pulled into the station, Capone escorted Torrio and his wife to their stateroom, placing his best bodyguards in compartments on either side. "Nobody bothers the boss," Capone told his men. Then he turned to Torrio and embraced him, saying: "So long, Johnny Papa. You come back when you feel better."

"Me?" replied Torrio. "I'll never be back here again!" Torrio kept his word. Though little evidence supports the claim, some reports allege that the attack on Torrio by the North Side gangsters was arranged by the devious Capone himself in a scheme to rid himself of his boss, following the same formula that Torrio employed in ridding himself of Big Jim Colosimo. Torrio's movements in Chicago were always shrouded in secrecy, and on the day he was gunned down on the street, only Al Capone knew that Torrio would be taking a shopping trip into the Loop and when he would be returning home, details that Capone reportedly passed along through a third party to Weiss and Moran. Torrio's subsequent behavior in turning over a fabulously lucrative crime empire to the youthful Capone could only mean that he at least suspected his protege of arranging for his execution and to remain in Chicago would invite certain death at the hands of his ostensibly loyal lieutenant.

When arriving in New York, the Torrios immediately took a train to Florida, but Weiss' gunmen trailed them and they booked passage to Italy, sailing to Naples, where they rented a luxurious villa and lived for three years. Bored, Torrio longed for the U.S. and something to do. He and his wife sailed for New York, where they moved into a luxury apartment. The self-exiled gang leader made the city his permanent home.

Johnny Torrio in 1956, a year before his death at age seventy-five.

Torrio had another reason for leaving Italy in 1928. The country's dictator. Benito Mussolini, who had been waging war with the Mafia in Sicily, had publicly threatened Italian-American gangsters, who had returned to Italy, either to avoid prosecution for crimes in the U.S. or to establish new rackets in Italy. Mussolini had boldly stated that he intended to sweep Italy clean of such "vermin," and after his state police had collected all of these U.S. gangsters, he would have them placed in cages and paraded through the streets of Rome. This threat from Il Duce, more than anything else, caused Torrio to depart his native land and return to the U.S.

In New York, Torrio spent large amounts of money buying real estate, apartment and office buildings. He also formed a partnership with Charles "Lucky" Luciano, Abner "Longy" Zwillman, and Meyer Lansky establishing a liquor distribution system that stretched from New York to Florida. Torrio supervised warehousing of all liquor and maintenance of inventory. He saw that shipments were made on time, proper records were kept, and that all the bills were paid. This proved to be a multi-million dollar business that later served as a front.

Moreover, Torrio was accorded great respect by the eastern gangsters who formed the national crime cartel in the early 1930s, acting as an adviser to the board members of the crime syndicate begun by Luciano, Lansky, Joe Adonis, Frank Costello, Louis Buchalter, and others. Torrio was credited with organizing the procedures and policies that the national crime syndicate would later endorse and enforce. Torrio prospered in the real estate business and when Repeal went into effect, his liquor distribution operations became even more successful.

The authorities, however, had not overlooked Johnny Torrio. On April 22, 1936, he was arrested for income tax evasion. His bail was set at $100,000. Anna Torrio appeared hours later, and to the amazement of federal officials, delivered the bail in crisp $1,000 bills that were wrapped in a newspaper. Following a lengthy trial, conviction, and many appeals, Torrio finally paid $86,000 in back taxes and received a two-and-a-half year sentence, that he began serving in 1939 in the Leavenworth federal penitentiary.

Paroled on April 14, 1941, Torrio went into semi-retirement. He busied his days with long walks and he and his wife, childless, spent their time in their apartment, occasionally dining out. The former gang lord read newspapers and books most of the day and was seldom seen with other gangsters. Though gang wars in New York raged about him, Johnny Torrio remained aloof and remote. On April 16, 1957, Torrio entered a New York barbershop, as he had each day for years. A hot towel was placed about his bullet-scarred neck. He suddenly twitched in the chair and moaned, then slipped downward, the victim of a heart attack. He died six hours later in Cumberland Hospital, his wife at his side.

Thus passed Chicago's first modern gang lord and one of the architects of the national crime syndicate. His funeral, unlike many of his friends' and enemies' in Chicago, was unspectacular. Only a dozen or so people attended his funeral in Greenwood Cemetery. Even in death, Torrio's credo of silence was observed. His widow made no public announcement of Torrio's passing, and the press did not discover his death until three weeks after his burial. His death did not create headlines, even in the Chicago papers, where one veteran newsman wrote of him: "He could dish it out, but he couldn't take it."

SCARFACE RUNS CHICAGO/1920s-1930s

No other American gangster rose to the international reputation of Al Capone (Alphonse Caponi, 1899-1947; AKA: Scarface; Al Brown; Alfred Caponi; A. Costa), whose historical image is a curious blend of ruthless gangster and a distorted Horatio Alger hero who went from rags to riches to jail. Ruthless he was, hero never, not even to those with whom he robbed, racketeered, and murdered. Capone was a murderous thug without remorse. Street smart, clever, ingenious when it came to crime, Capone was also a near-illiterate who acquired countless millions and knew not where to spend a dime of it.

Al Capone, the most powerful gang lord in Chicago in the 1920s, controlling most judges and police officials and gleaning $50 million each year from his far-flung rackets.

Capone killed without compunction and at the whims of a mercurial and murderous temperament. He killed his enemies and his friends. He killed his employers and his own henchmen. He was responsible for, perhaps, as many as one thousand or more murders, certainly hundreds. Worse, for a decade the city of Chicago embraced this bragging, boasting, strutting killer, its slavish newspapers paying homage to him and quoting his every cretinous statement, its citizens—as least a goodly portion of the population—nodding tolerantly, if not approvingly, in his direction.

Joe Adonis, shown in 1937, almost twenty years after he weaned Capone on crime in the basement of his Adonis Club.

Scarface spent money lavishly on himself and those about him, projecting the image of generosity, of a philanthropist to the common man. Old-timers in Chicago still pay his bloody memory off-hand compliments about the so-called soup kitchens Capone established in Chicago during the Depression to feed the hungry, little realizing that the crime boss did this at the suggestion of attorneys attempting to improve his horrible reputation when he was being tried for income tax evasion. For decades after his death, this inhuman beast received perverse recognition from show business and film personalities who boasted of meeting Capone, of being ordered to perform for him at the Hawthorne Inn, his fortress-like headquarters in Cicero, or his Chicago bases, the Lexington and Metropole hotels, as if such performances were similar to a command performance before a czar or a president.

What was Capone? He was an ignorant strong-arm thug who oozed out of New York's worst mob, The Five Points gang, graduated to flesh-peddling and more strong-arm work in Chicago, and became a millionaire through bootlegging in the 1920s. He was also, in his early years, a whoremaster who slept with his own diseased employees so regularly that he contracted syphilis which later, in the form of paresis of the brain, turned him into a raving lunatic and killed him at age forty-eight.

Unlike his Italian peers, Capone was forever proud of the fact that he was born in the U.S., not Naples, Italy, as has been claimed, and whenever he was designated as an Italian immigrant, he would roar the correction: "I'm not Italian! I was born in Brooklyn." Capone's parents, Gabriel and Teresa Caponi, emigrated from Naples, Italy, in 1893, poor, speaking no English. His father plied the same trade he had in Italy; he was a barber. The Capone shop was at 69 Park Avenue, a few doors from his home, located in Brooklyn's poverty-stricken navy yard district called Williamsburg.

The Caponis (both parents naturalized in 1906) produced nine children, born in a seedy four-room flat: Vincenzo (renamed James), Ralph (later nicknamed Bottles), Salvatore (renamed Frank), Alphonse, Amadeo Ermino (renamed John, nicknamed Mimi), Umberto (renamed Albert John), Matthew Nicholas, Rose, and Mafalda. This large family was the norm for Italians of the day, who had resettled in America, naively trading, for the most part, the slums of southern Italy for the slums of New York, Chicago, New Orleans, and, to some degree, San Francisco. Alphonse Capone was born on January 17, 1899. His childhood was like any other in his world, one of littered streets, crowded with pushcarts and peddlers and laborers, one where the Italian immigrant was denied proper education (60 percent of Italian children born in the U.S. at that time grew up illiterate) and, because of the lack of hygiene and proper medical attention, one where newborn Italian babies died at an alarming rate, double that of all others in New York, from diarrhea, diphtheria, and respiratory diseases.

By the time he was eleven, Capone was a member of a juvenile gang, which was also part of the traditional environment of this wretched community. In that year, 1910, Italians made up eleven percent of the total foreign-born population, but only seven percent of all foreign-born professional criminals, according to one survey, were Italian. Yet, it was the tradition of the first American-born generation, to either accept the menial occupations with their miserable wages and hopeless futures or, in the worst social environments, improve oneself through first petty, then serious crime. The concept of America as a land of opportunity to the then down-trodden Italian-American was translated to mean a land, where the illegal was nothing more than a business adventure. Opportunity meant that one might quickly enrich oneself by ignoring laws meant for people, who could afford to obey them. Authority in the form of the police was equated with the authority of ancient, unjust, and socially distant European monarchs.

Capone's boyhood friend and fellow apprentice gangster in the Five Points Gang, Charles "Lucky" Luciano.

Johnny Torrio, who imported Capone from New York to be his enforcer in Chicago; Torrio would preside over the first U.S. crime cartel conference in Atlantic City in 1929, a meeting arranged by Capone.

Al Capone learned all this in basic terms while in his teens. He was influenced by older boys, who taught him the bloody techniques of knife fighting and the use of a revolver. One of these was Johnny Torrio, one of the tough, intelligent sub-bosses of the far-reaching Five Points gang, headed by crime czar Paul Kelly. Torrio, seventeen years older than Capone, ran myriad illegal operations out of his saloon on James Street; he was a streetsmart hoodlum who had small feet, delicate hands and facial features, and a small, chubby body. He never fought battles in the streets, but sent others to perform such bloody chores.

Torrio was a criminal mastermind who took over sections of Williamsburg block by block, store by store, organizing extortion through Black Hand techniques. Gambling and prostitution were his specialties. He also paid off police to ignore his rackets and, realizing the power of politics, funded political candidates for office, particularly those who would do his bidding in the future. This racketeer opened up an office at the corner of Fourth Avenue and Union Street, which he called The John Torrio Association, a front for his many rackets.

Capone passed Torrio's headquarters every day on his way to school, where he maintained good grades until he was upbraided for his increased truancy in the sixth grade. By then Capone was a large, beefy street brawler, and he found the public chastisement unbearable. He struck the female teacher, knocking her down. The principal rushed into the classroom and thrashed young Capone. He never returned to school, taking odd jobs as a pinsetter in a bowling alley and a clerk in a candy store. He became a pool shark, champion eight-ball shooter of the neighborhood. By then Capone was known by members of his street gang as an expert knife-fighter, and he participated in many bloody battles.

Chicago's corrupt Mayor William Hale Thompson, whose motto was "Chicago—a wide open city," and who protected the widespread rackets of Torrio and Capone.

The gang to which Capone first swore allegiance was the Bim Booms, which also counted as a member Charles Lucania, later known as Charles "Lucky" Luciano, who had briefly attended school with Capone and befriended him. Both boys later graduated to the Five Pointers, the gang headed by Paul Kelly and Johnny Torrio. This was the most powerful gang in New York (replacing the old Whyos at the turn of the century), exceeding 1,500 thugs, all adept at burglary, extortion, robbery, assault, murder. It was while working as a strong-arm enforcer for Torrio that Capone learned all the lethal tricks of his criminal trade. He would be forever grateful to Torrio, later stating: "I looked on Johnny like my adviser and father and the party who made it possible for me to get my start."

Torrio started Capone as a goon, who beat up loan-shark victims behind on their payments, then a pimp, beating up girls who were suspected of holding back part of their nightly take. He then got him a "posh" job as a bouncer in the Harvard Inn, a notorious dive Torrio owned in partnership with his Sicilian gangster friend, Frankie Yale. Capone was by then a vicious, tenacious fighter with fists and knives. He was also an expert marksman with a revolver or automatic. He practiced shooting beer bottles for years in the basement of the Adonis Social Club, run by future crime boss, Joe Adonis.

Capone was later promoted to bartender at the Club, and it was at this time that he acquired the livid scars that would disfigure the left side of his face for life and earn him the sobriquet he hated most: Scarface. Many stories were later told as to how Capone received these scars. He liked to lie to reporters later by claiming that he had received them in World War I, saying that he had been wounded by shrapnel while serving with the legendary "Lost Battalion" of the Seventy-seventh Division.

Another story has it that Capone, who now worked for Sicilians like Yale, wanted to have the special duck-tailed Sicilian-Mafia haircut then popular with thugs. He walked into a Sicilian barbershop one day, the tale goes, and asked for this type of haircut, but the barber, a devout Sicilian Mafioso, refused, knowing Capone was from Neapolitan parents. This caused Capone to go berserk, attacking the barber, who had been shaving a customer. The barber slashed out wildly at the 225-pound, five foot-ten-inch Capone, cutting him deeply on the left cheek and jaw. Another account, more believable, has Capone insulting the female companion of a Sicilian hoodlum in the Harvard Inn and the hoodlum carving Capone's face in retaliation.

Regardless of his scarred face, an Irish girl, Mae Coughlin, from a good family, was attracted to Capone, and when he proposed to her in 1918, she accepted. Capone and his bride were wed on December 18, 1918, the bride being twenty-one, Capone nineteen. A short time later, a son, Albert Francis Capone, nicknamed Sonny, was born to the couple. Capone continued at the Harvard Inn and later became a union slugger for Yale and Torrio, but his prospects for the future appeared dim after he was indicted for two murders. He was released when witnesses lost their memories and evidence disappeared.

By this time, Torrio had moved most of his operations to Chicago, where his uncle, James "Big Jim" Colosimo, was the crime boss of the Levee, the red light district. Torrio still maintained contact with his rackets in New York, but was gradually withdrawing control of these operations, which Joe Adonis, Lucky Luciano, and Ciro "The Artichoke King" Terranova took over.

Torrio had relocated to Chicago as early as 1909 at Colosimo's request, to help the crime boss subdue the Black Handers and rival gangsters plaguing Colosimo, as well as to put Big Jim's sprawling prostitution and gambling rackets in order. In 1919, Capone got into another fight and killed a man. Rather than wait to be indicted, Scarface called "Johnny Papa" Torrio, and received an invitation to join him in Chicago. Capone packed up his wife and child and took the next train West. (Another reliable report held that Torrio called Capone, asking him to become one of his Chicago enforcers, with the eventual purpose of having Capone kill Big Jim so that Torrio could take over Colosimo's underworld empire.)

Arriving in Chicago, Capone immediately installed his wife and child in a small South Side apartment, rented for him

Charles Dion O'Bannion, leader of the North Side gang, mortal enemy of Torrio and Capone, killed in his flower shop in the infamous "handshake murder" of 1924.

Earl "Hymie" Weiss, who took over the O'Bannion mob, tried to kill Capone in a machine gun attack on his Cicero headquarters, murdered by Capone killers in 1926.

George "Bugs" Moran, O'Bannion's loyal lieutenant, who took control of the North Side gang after the murder of Hymie Weiss and survived Chicago's gang wars.

Samuel J. "Nails" Morton, World War I hero and O'Bannion aide; he was kicked to death by a horse on May 13, 1923, after being thrown while riding on a bridle path.

Vincent "The Schemer" Drucci, deadly O'Bannion gunman, killed in 1927, while resisting arrest; Detective Danny Healy, who shot Drucci, was lauded as a hero.

"Three-Gun" Louis Alterie, Colorado cowboy and O'Bannion gang member; he shot the horse that killed his pal Morton and was murdered by Capone gunmen in 1935.

Edward "Spike" O'Donnell, who, with his three brothers, ran a bootlegging gang on the far South Side of Chicago in the early 1920s; he once boasted: "I can whip this bird Capone if he'll only come out into the open!" By the late 1920s, the South Side O'Donnell gang was no more, its gang members either killed or driven from the city, including Spike.

by one of Torrio's men. That same day, Capone reported to Torrio at his newly-established Four Deuces at 2222 South Wabash. This four-story brick building contained a saloon on the first floor with Torrio's office in the rear, the two areas separated by a sliding steel door. The second and third floors offered gambling rooms, and the fourth floor was a brothel. That night Torrio welcomed Capone and made him his bodyguard and chauffeur, at $100 a week.

There was nothing lofty about Capone's additional duties at the Four Deuces. He was a bartender on occasion and a bouncer. In the latter capacity, Capone used his hulking body and powerful upper body strength to evict drunks and troublemakers, often beating up customers so severely that they were hospitalized with broken arms and legs, skull fractures, and, on one occasion, blood poisoning after Capone bit into a man's arm, severing an artery with his teeth. He was repeatedly arrested for assault. but released without prosecution, thanks to Torrio's political and police connections.

Capone also worked as a shill for the Four Deuce's brothel, standing outside the place and hawking the fleshy wares available in the miserable cribs on the building's fourth floor. Crime writer Courtney Riley Cooper was later to state: "I saw him there a dozen times, coat collar turned up on winter nights, hands deep in his pockets as he fell in step with a passerby and mumbled: `Got some nice-looking girls inside.'" The ruthless, bestial Capone was also used by Torrio for more sinister purposes, like murder. Torrio had on his payroll hundreds of gangsters who ran far-flung rackets for the overall crime boss of the city, Big Jim Colosimo, and those who cheated on their weekly payments to the bosses, those who went into business for themselves, and those who worked for Colosimo-Torrio and secretly for rival gangs at the same time, were brought to the Four Deuces and punished, invariably by the savage Capone.

Capone and other goons would drag these men into the basement of the saloon and there question them while applying various tortures. When the victims had provided the information or confessions demanded, they were summarily murdered. Capone strangled at least a dozen of these disobedient racketeers to death with his hands, according to one account. The bodies were dragged through a small tunnel and brought up at the rear of the building through a trapdoor and then into an alley, where a waiting car sped away with the corpses, which were later dumped on lonely country roads.

The Chicago Capone entered was, in many respects, as volatile and cunning as he was, a political cesspool, where half the city council was on the take, and aldermen received heavy bribes to protect the many red light districts, particularly the Levee on the near South Side, Colosimo's domain, glutted with gambling dens, whorehouses, and seamy saloons. The machine politicians controlling this area, and in league with Colosimo for more than a decade, were John "Bathhouse John" Coughlin and Michael "Hinky Dink" Kenna.

These two aldermen received enormous payoffs to make sure the district went unmolested by police raids. And they, in turn, passed on staggering amounts of money to the then mayor of Chicago, William Hale Thompson, the most venal chief executive in the city's history. Thompson not only aided the gangsters and crooked aldermen, but encouraged the expansion of the vice districts, later adopting as his blatant campaign slogan: "Chicago—a wide open city!"

In the underworld at that time, Big Jim Colosimo's word was life and death law. He was a gregarious, large man, bedecked with glinting diamonds. He was flashy and ostentatious, ruling his kingdom from his lavish restaurant, Colosimo's Café, which was only a block from the Four Deuces. Colosimo had started as a pimp and then a manager of several bordellos. After forming an alliance with Kenna and Coughlin, he began to take over other bordellos, gambling dens, and then all the rackets in the Levee until he was the supreme crime overlord in Chicago. He was a flamboyant character, a lover of Italian opera, and he reveled in the opera stars, like Enrico Caruso, who dined in his restaurant. By 1909, Colosimo's empire had become so vast that he needed the organizational abilities of his nephew in New York, so he sent for Torrio.

By 1919, Torrio had ideas of becoming the supreme boss in Chicago and he sent for his most loyal assassin, Al Capone. The real reason Capone moved to Chicago was not to evade an arrest for murder in New York. He was protected there through his gang affiliations and would have, no doubt, been released, as he had been on two former occasions when charged with murder in New York. When Capone arrived in Chicago he was assigned menial jobs by Torrio as a smokescreen to disguise the real purpose of his presence—to murder Big Jim Colosimo.

Al Capone (right) in 1925, after taking control from the exiled Johnny Torrio; he—with the help of crooked Chicago politicians and corrupt police officials—would control almost all underworld operations within five years, becoming a dark icon to gullible citizens for generations to come, people who never witnessed the hundreds of murders Scarface decreed.

Colosimo was an old-fashioned gangster who contentedly counted his millions from the illegal rackets he controlled. Torrio, a long-range planner, immediately saw the millions to be made from the Volstead Act, which would become law in 1920, prohibiting the manufacture, distribution, and sale of liquor. Torrio had for some time pleaded with his uncle Colosimo to set up illegal stills, to buy breweries and run them clandestinely in the future, and to establish a distribution arm which would provide beer and liquor to the thousands of saloons in Chicago.

Colosimo's response was always a firm "no." He was not interested in developing this new racket, which he felt would "never amount to anything." He would leave bootlegging to the other gangs. He had enough: his lavish mansion at 3156 Vernon Avenue; his fabulous cafe; a new wife, singer Dale Winter, pretty and young, for whom he had divorced his first wife, an aging brothel operator; and his old gambling and whorehouse rackets were producing more money than he could spend. He had no intention of bringing his organization into a new and untried racket. His rejection of the Torrio proposal sealed his fate. Torrio marked Colosimo for death, and then ordered Capone to kill him on May 11, 1920.

Torrio called Colosimo in the early afternoon of that day to tell him to expect two truckloads of the best whiskey available, and that it was important for Colosimo to stock up on this now-precious commodity, which would be sorely needed for the cafe. The shipment would be delivered at 4 p.m., Torrio told Colosimo. He told Big Jim to be precise in taking the shipment at that time. Colosimo promised that he would be on hand at the cafe to take the delivery, and he arrived at the restaurant at about 3 p.m. He arrived by limousine, telling his chauffeur, Wolfson, to return to the mansion and to take his wife and her mother shopping. He strolled about the cafe, talking to employees before going to his office. A waiter noticed a dark-featured, heavyset stranger enter the vestibule of the cafe, which was closed, but then the stranger disappeared and the waiter thought that he had left, when he realized that the restaurant was not yet open.

Big Jim left his office about 4:25 p.m., walking the length of the cafe, through two large rooms, then went into the vestibule, an area closed off by glass doors. A moment later two shots were heard and Frank Camilla, Colosimo's private secretary, ran to the vestibule to find his employer face down on the tile floor, blood gushing from a bullet wound behind his ear. Big Jim was dead, his murderer having fled out the front door of the cafe. Camilla dashed to the sidewalk and saw no one suspicious in sight.

Camilla next called Colosimo's good friend, Chief of Police John J. Garrity, who arrived a short time later with Chief of Detectives Mooney and a bevy of plainclothes officers. When they rolled Big Jim over, they marveled at the diamond shirt studs and cufflinks blazing before them. The red rose in his lapel was crushed. Inside a coat pocket they found a .38-caliber pearl handled revolver, but not a dime in his pockets, even though Big Jim was reported to have carried with him that day more than $50,000 in cash, all big bills, to pay for the whiskey delivery. Colosimo's shirt had been pulled from his pants and it was obvious to investigators that the moneybelt Big Jim always wore was now missing and with it, perhaps, the $250,000 in cash he always carried.

Capone, by best reports, had killed Colosimo with one bullet, then fired a second bullet through the window behind the cashier's box in the vestibule. He had entered the vestibule and was seen by the waiter, but had hidden in the cloak room, and when Colosimo entered the vestibule to go to the street to check the whiskey delivery, he stepped up behind the gang boss and shot him in the head. He then took enough time to rifle the dead man's pockets and remove the considerable cash he carried, his payment for the murder, then dashed through the front door, hurriedly walked a block south to the Four Deuces, and went to the fourth floor, where he climbed into bed with one of Torrio's whores.

Jake "Greasy Thumb" Guzik, a onetime resort owner, who kept Capone's books; he remained loyal to the crime boss even after Scarface went insane.

Scarface and Torrio were quickly pulled into police headquarters for questioning, but both provided unshakable alibis. "Big Jim and me were like brothers," Torrio told police detectives, his eyes filling with tears. Capone shook his head sadly and said to officers: "Mr. Colosimo and me both loved opera. He was a grand guy." Both Torrio and Capone sent enormous floral wreaths to Colosimo's funeral, which was the first big gangster burial in Chicago, attended by hundreds of dignitaries, a lavish and gaudy display of mourning by thousands who followed the funeral cortege. Capone observed the old Italian custom of not shaving during the three days between Colosimo's death and funeral.

Immediately following Big Jim's interment, Torrio met with aldermen Coughlin and Kenna and announced that he would be running things. They agreed, and Capone was named Torrio's right-hand man, his chief lieutenant and underboss. Up to that time, Capone went by the alias Al Brown and had a seedy used furniture store as his business front. Suddenly, from bouncer, bartender, and whorehouse shill, Capone shot to a lofty position of underworld authority, the place next to Torrio's throne, a post that was also his reward for killing the truculent, traditional Colosimo. Capone would employ the same kind of cunning violence in getting rid of his mentor and sponsor, Johnny Torrio, four years later.

Politically, Torrio's position as Chicago's new underworld boss was secure. He was backed by greedy, wholly amoral aldermen and a criminally-bent mayor, Thompson. Beyond Chicago, the state of Illinois was governed by crooked Governor Len Small, who was indicted in 1921 for embezzling $600,000 while state treasurer. But, through the help of Chicago labor gangster Walter Stevens and extortionist Benjamin "Jew Ben" Newmark, Small was acquitted. Stevens and Newmark simply bribed and threatened the jurors at Small's trial. In return, Small granted pardons to all important gangsters convicted of any kind of crime, from bootlegging to murder.

Stevens was on the Torrio-Capone payroll, as were the whoremaster brothers, Jake and Harry Guzik, also friends of Small's. More than 1,000 felons, mostly mobsters working for Torrio and Capone, were pardoned by Small in his first three years in office. But not all the politicians in Chicago were in Torrio's pocket. Those aldermen who represented the North Side of Chicago, the most lucrative bootlegging territory, belonged firmly to Charles Dion "Deanie" O'Bannion, the undisputed boss of the area.

It was with O'Bannion and his fierce lieutenants that the Torrio-Capone gang would have the most trouble. The gang was large, powerful, and lethal. Its members were of Irish and Polish descent, and made a show of practicing the Catholic religion, going to church on Sunday and on the same night hijacking booze trucks, and slugging and killing rival gangsters. The leader, O'Bannion, had been a choir boy and an altar boy at Holy Name Cathedral on State Street, across from which sat Schofield's flower shop. O'Bannion, who loved flowers, had bought a half interest in the shop, which served as his front. O'Bannion loved flowers, and spent much of his time in this shop, creating floral arrangements for weddings and funerals. He wore three guns at all times, carried in specially made pockets in his pants. Earl "Hymie" Weiss, his fierce first lieutenant, was also a dedicated killer who went to church regularly, wore a gold cross around his neck, and carried a rosary in a vest pocket, close to the shoulder holster of his gun. George "Bugs" Moran; Vincent "The Schemer" Drucci; the savage brothers Frank and Pete Gusenberg; Louis "Two Gun" Alterie, also called "The Cowboy" because he owned a ranch in Colorado; Samuel J. "Nails" Morton, a Jewish gangster who had served with distinction in World War I, won medals and returned to Chicago to become one of the most successful and celebrated gangsters of the early 1920s; Willie Marks, Ted Newbury, and a host of other loyal gunmen made up this formidable gang, whose members considered Torrio and Capone lowlife vipers without hope of redemption.

Before Prohibition, the Italian gangsters had centered their activities on gambling and prostitution, but O'Bannion and his men would have nothing to do with bordellos. There were some independently operated brothels on the North Side, to be sure, but these were not controlled by the O'Bannionites. According to O'Bannion, Weiss, and the others, this particular criminal profession was "against the Holy Mother, the Church," and they considered Torrio and Capone, in the words of O'Bannion, "dago pimps, making their money from diseased women." Such insults reached the ears of Capone and jarred his pride, but Torrio, ever the diplomat, ignored these remarks and sought to settle differences between the gangs through non-violent agreements. He called a meeting in 1920, which was attended by almost all the top gang leaders in the city.

A fearsome lot attended that strange meeting. O'Bannion, Weiss, and Moran represented the North Side. From the West Side came the terrible Genna Brothers, six of them, all killers, Sicilians aligned with Torrio and Capone, and also from the West Side the O'Donnell brothers, Bernard, Myles and William, who was called "Klondike." The O'Donnells had thrown in their lot with Torrio. Terry Druggan and Frankie Lake, who controlled the Valley Gang on the Southwest Side, were fence straddlers, waiting to see who would emerge as the top crime boss. On the Northwest Side, Claude Maddox, head of the

The body of "Ragtime Joe" Howard lies on the floor of a Chicago speakeasy on May 8, 1924; Capone personally shot Howard to death in front of witnesses for assaulting his bookkeeper, Jake Guzik—the witnesses disappeared or had a loss of memory.

Circus Gang, and Marty Guifoyle, who led another gang in the same area, were Torrio vassals. Joseph "Pollack Joe" Saltis, who headed a large gang of bootleggers on the Southwest Side, was decidedly against Torrio and Capone and refused to attend Torrio's meeting, as did Edward "Spike" O'Donnell, who headed the large all Irish O'Donnell gang of the far South Side, this O'Donnell gang being unrelated to the West Side O'Donnells.

Torrio played mediator and pacifier to the arguing crime bosses during this conference and managed to get everyone to agree to stay in their territories and restrain their minions. "There are millions in booze, plenty for everyone," he told the gangster enclave. "All we gotta do is respect the other guy's territory and we'll make money." With that, Torrio produced a map and literally split up Chicago into sections, drawing lines on the map which gave the North Side to O'Bannion, the South Side to himself and Capone, and smaller territories to the other gangs. The two largest gangs, that of Torrio-Capone and O'Bannion, were to be separated by Madison Street. This was the "dividing line" and, other than social visits, no competing gangsters were to enter the other's territory.

At first this was an agreement all followed, but then, in 1922, Capone began encroachments. Though Torrio was well-known to government leaders and the public alike, Capone at this time was all but anonymous, known under his aliases Al Brown and A. Costa, names under which he had been booked for assault in the past when acting as a lowly bouncer for Torrio's Four Deuces. But in 1922, Capone came to the attention of the city's newsmen and the public under a variation of his own name. Scarface was drunk, racing his large roadster down Wabash Avenue at 60 m.p.h., his car filled with three heavily-armed bodyguards and four of his most sought-after prostitutes. Losing control of the roadster, Capone crashed his car into a taxicab. The driver, Fred Drause, holding his head, staggered from the cab and yelled at Capone: "You crazy son-of-a-bitch! You almost killed me! Are you crazy?"

Capone jumped from his car, pulled a gun, and put it to the head of the cabbie. Cursing the driver, Capone shouted: "Don't talk that way to me!"

"Wait a minute, fella, how come you're pulling a gun on me?" said Drause.

The hulking gangster was silent for a moment. He then produced a deputy sheriff's badge and announced: "I'm a law officer." Capone's associates, watching this charade and shocked by Capone's blatant impersonation and murderous temper, fled the scene, leaving the gang boss to face several policemen, who promptly arrived in a squad car. Drause was taken away to a hospital to have his head bandaged, while Scarface was arrested for assault and impersonating a police officer. He was booked under the name of "Alfred Caponi," but he was soon released when a police captain on Torrio's payroll received a phone call at home and rushed to the precinct station, where he ordered the gang chief set free. This was to happen again and again, with Capone's political connections assuring his freedom, no matter what kind of crime he committed, including murder.

State's Attorney William McSwiggin, who was killed by Capone when the crime boss leaned from the window of a speeding car and fired a submachine gun on the night of April 27, 1926.

By 1924, Capone, at age twenty-five, was a multi-millionaire. In 1920, Torrio had cemented his partnership with Capone by giving him 25 percent of all profits from prostitution and 50 percent from all bootlegging operations. In the first year of this arrangement, Capone made $25,000 a month from the brothels and ten times that amount from bootlegging. Yet he lived with his wife and child in a modest two-story brick building at 7244 South Prairie Avenue, a building which was guarded night and day by Capone gunmen sitting in cars on the street and in the alleyway.

Where Torrio minded business and then retreated in the evening to his home, Capone craved nightlife and prowled through his clubs, gambling dens, and bordellos. His estimated five thousand cribs and bordellos were overseen by whoremaster Jake "Greasy Thumb" Guzik, who had become Scarface's chief accountant and bookkeeper, a short, squat little man with a florid, flabby face. On the night of May 8, 1924, Guzik stopped at a saloon operated by Heinie Jacobs on South Wabash to talk business with some associates. As he was leaving the place, "Ragtime" Joe Howard, an aging gangster, barred Guzik's path.

The drunken Howard had been regaling Jacobs at the bar with stories of the old days in Chicago, when knives and guns were unnecessary. Howard had bragged that "brass knuckles to the jaw is good enough. Them wop beerboys fold up like old newspaper after one chop." Now he stood in front of Guzik, shouting to a nervous Jacobs: "This is one of them wop workers." He slapped Guzik in the face and then kicked him several times in the shins. Guzik merely let out a yelp and then meekly walked from the bar. Guzik was no gunman and he avoided violence at all costs. There were others to perform those chores. He nevertheless demanded the kind of respect reserved for those in the hierarchy of the Torrio-Capone mob, and the humiliation he had suffered at the hands of the old-fashioned thug, Howard, was intolerable. He went to Capone, who exploded and then rushed to Jacobs' saloon.

When Capone entered the bar, accompanied by several bodyguards, he walked up to Howard, who smiled affably and held out his hand, saying, "Hello, Al." Capone grabbed him by the lapel, pulling him close, snarling: "Why did you kick Jake around, Joe?"

Howard pushed Capone away, replying: "Aww, go back to your girls, you dago pimp!"

Capone drew an automatic, put it to Howard's temple and rapidly fired all six shots, which blew off the top of Joe Howard's head. Capone then turned and left the bar. Heinie Jacobs and two customers stood staring after him, and by the time police arrived were still shaking with fear. The two patrons, George Bilton and David Runelsbeck, both swore that Capone had killed Howard and said they would so testify in court. The story broke the next day, May 9, 1924, in the Chicago Tribune, which also ran a photo of Capone being booked for homicide, the first newspaper photo published of the gangster in Chicago, whose face the citizens of the city would see in their newspapers more often than that of the mayor or the president of the United States. Scarface would be the subject of countless newspaper stories dealing with highjackings, beatings, gang fights and murders. His would be the recognized world of the "cement overcoat," and "the one-way ride."

Though he knew he was wanted for the Howard killing, Capone hid for almost a month and then, on June 11, 1924, strolled into the Cottage Grove Avenue precinct station, saying: "I hear the police have been looking for me. What for?" Captain James McMahon put him under arrest and immediately took him to the Criminal Courts building, where he was grilled by William H. McSwiggin, an energetic assistant state's attorney.

Capone denied being in Jacobs' saloon on the night of Howard's death and told McSwiggin that he was a used furniture salesman and that he knew no gangsters. He was informed that, of the witnesses to the killing in the bar that night, Bilton had disappeared (frightened off by Capone killers), but

Five of Capone's deadliest gunmen during the 1920s (left to right as they appeared in a police lineup): William "Klondike" O'Donnell (no relationship to the South Side O'Donnell gang), William "Three-Fingered Jack" White; Murray "The Camel" Humphreys; Marcus Looney, and Charles Fischetti, who was Capone's cousin.

Runelsbeck and Jacobs were being held as accessories after the fact and that they would swear Capone killed Howard. Scarface sneered and shrugged. "Let them," he said, "I ain't got nothing to worry about. I wasn't even there."

When the official inquest was held, Jacobs and Runelsbeck were brought before the court, but both men, visibly shaking in fright as they nervously glanced about the court, were obviously terrified. Jacobs denied ever seeing the shooting, insisting that he went into the back room of his saloon before the shooting occurred. Runelsbeck said that he did not see the killer, that he ducked under a table at the first sound of gunfire. Capone sat smugly with his expensive attorneys, later to hear the coroner's verdict that "Joseph Howard was killed by one or more unknown white male persons."

Capone left the inquest smiling, returning to his bastion in Cicero, the Hawthorne Inn. By then Torrio and Capone had relocated their headquarters to Cicero to avoid harassment from Chicago's new reform mayor, William E. Dever. Capone, seeking to make a strong alliance with the Unione Siciliane (a trade union which was really a Sicilian brotherhood with strong ties to the Mafia), paid a nostalgic visit to New York in December 1925. He met with Frankie Yale, president of the New York branch of the Unione Siciliane. He also met with Joe Adonis and frequented the Adonis Social Club in south Brooklyn.

Here, on the night of December 26, 1925, Richard "Peg Leg" Lonergan and other members of his White Hand Gang picked a fight with Capone, not knowing who he was, and began insulting the almost all Italian clientele with words like "dagoes, wops, and ginzos," remarks that must have convinced Capone and his many bodyguards that Lonergan was either drunk or suicidal. When two Italian youths entered the saloon with Irish girls on their arms, Lonergan and two of his Irish friends chased the girls from the bar, shouting after them: "Come back with white men!" At 2 a.m., the lights in the Adonis Club went out and gunfire lit up the place. A short time later, police found Lonergan and two of his men dead on the floor. The killer was presumed to be Al Capone, but he had fled back to Chicago, or more specifically, Cicero, where he felt that he would be safe from lunatics, a notion soon to be disproved.

The takeover of Cicero, the sprawling blue-collar suburb west of Chicago, was accomplished with relative ease. Torrio and Capone simply ordered their satellites, the West Side O'Donnells, to instruct the local government there that they would be running their Chicago operations from the Hawthorne Inn, a popular Cicero hotel. Those rival gangsters and saloon owners who objected were quickly beaten into submission. Those who still proved truculent, like prizefighter-turned-bootlegger Eddie Tancl, were shot to death on Cicero streets.

State's Attorney McSwiggin was incensed at Capone's intimidation of witnesses in the Howard killing, and he resolved to convict the gangster and send him to prison.

McSwiggin began to conduct investigations into Capone's activities in Cicero, and even aligned himself with rival gangsters in order to gather evidence against Scarface, or so one story held. Two of these, Tom "Red" Duffy and James J. Doherty, along with the West Side O'Donnell Brothers, Bernard, Klondyke and Myles, had been boyhood friends of the 26-year-old McSwiggin, who had a strange and unpredictable relationship with these bootleggers. He had unsuccessfully prosecuted Doherty for the murder of Eddie Tancl, and then went on seeing Doherty socially. He also met with Capone on April 17, 1926, at the Hawthorne Inn, but the nature of the discussion between mob chief and state's attorney was never disclosed. To the public, McSwiggin appeared to be a relentless fighter for justice, but to insiders, questions were raised as to his chummy relationship with Capone, the man he was supposed to be prosecuting for innumerable crimes.

Capone (center, sitting) is surrounded by eight of his bodyguards at a gangster picnic in 1927; those wearing jackets on this hot day were carrying guns; the little girl is the daughter of one of Capone's relatives.

Scarface at Wrigley Field; Gabby Hartnett signs a ball for Capone's son, Sonny; the men in hats sitting behind Capone are his bodyguards, all heavily armed.

On the evening of April 27, 1926, as McSwiggin left a saloon on West Roosevelt Road in Cicero, a car shot down the street with a machine gunner hanging out the window and spraying the street, cutting down and killing McSwiggin, Doherty, and Duffy. All were dead before passersby reached them. A dozen persons on the street clearly saw the killer and identified him to police as Al Capone. Wild speculation about the killing was entertained by newsmen throughout Chicago, most concluding that Capone would never intentionally murder a cop, let alone a state's attorney. He had mistaken McSwiggin for a rival gangster he had personally sworn to murder, it was said, and that man was Earl "Hymie" Weiss.

This, of course, was mere conjecture, and bad guessing at that, since Weiss was the sworn gang enemy of the West Side O'Donnells, whose allegiance was to Capone. The witnesses to the McSwiggin murder vanished, lost their memories, or changed their minds when it came to identifying Capone as the killer. In the end, the gangster had the last lying word, telling a newsman: "Of course I didn't kill him. Why should I? I liked the kid. Only the day before he got killed he was up to my place and when he went home I gave him a bottle of Scotch for his old man. I paid McSwiggin and I paid him plenty, and I got what I was paying for." Scarface never specified what he was buying from the assistant state's attorney.

Capone's top henchman, Frank "The Enforcer" Nitti, who committed suicide in 1943, when facing income tax evasion charges.

Bodyguard Frank Rio saved Scarface's life by pushing him to the floor of the Hawthorn Hotel restaurant, riddled by Weiss' machine gunners on September 20, 1926.

McSwiggin's murder was never solved, which led to an oft-repeated phrase, "Who Killed McSwiggin?", a line now classic in Chicago underworld parlance and one historically equal to "Who Killed Cock Robin?" Authorities knew that Capone was the killer, for whatever reason, but there was no evidence to convict him. It was the same story with the murder of Charles Dion O'Bannion, the fierce leader of the North Side Gang. O'Bannion's death, too, has gone down in the annals of crime as a first, one known as "the handshake murder."

Following the establishment of Madison Street as the "dividing line" in 1920, the gangsters acknowledged this border for a few years before their greedy encroachments once again caused violent confrontations. The South Side O'Donnell gang was selected by Capone as the first rival bootleg gang to be eliminated. Edward "Spike" O'Donnell and his brothers were isolated on the far South Side of the city, and Capone simply ordered his top enforcers to kill off these pesky bootleggers. Capone gunners Frank McErlane, who had been an ally of Pollack Joe Saltis before enlisting in Capone's ranks, and Danny McFall, led contingents of Capone hoodlums into the O'Donnell fiefdom, using for the first time the weapon that would later be synonymous with bootlegging, the Thompson submachine gun, a deadly, wasp-like rapid-fire gun that could cut down and kill dozens of men at close range.

The weapon was so effective that only gangleader Spike O'Donnell remained to defy Capone, saying bitterly: "I can whip this bird Capone with my bare fists any time he wants to step out into the open and fight like a man." But Capone's techniques were the ambush, the knife and the bullet in the back, a fast-moving car loaded with gangsters, firing at helpless victims on sidewalks. Capone favored the latter approach; he had used a submachine gun on McSwiggin, firing the gun from a fast-moving car. In two or three bursts from the submachine gun's chambers, he had eliminated a man whom he believed was only pretending to be a corrupt official in order to gather evidence against him.

The submachine gun had been developed by Brigadier General John T. Thompson, chief of federal arsenals. Thompson intended this weapon for use in World War I, as a way of killing heavily entrenched enemy troops en masse. Thompson called this terrible weapon a "trench broom." The gun was completed in 1920, too late for military use, and tens of thousands stood idle in racks until sold off to commercial wholesalers to recoup government manufacturing losses. When Capone was first shown the weapon (reportedly by "Machine Gun" Jack McGurn), he marveled at its functions. At 500 yards it could penetrate a three-inch-thick pine board, and it fired 1,000 rounds of .45-caliber ammunition per minute. Capone, McGurn, McErlane, and others took the first shipment of Thompson submachine guns to a country retreat in 1923 and there practiced with it, firing at two-foot-thick trees and cutting them in half.

The government turned over the sale of the submachine gun to Auto Ordnance, a New York corporation, intending its open market sale to state and city police departments, but this plan met with little success. Police departments universally rejected the idea of arming its officers with such a deadly weapon, believing it to be hazardous to innocent bystanders. Capone had no such compunctions. He was the first to order several truckloads of these guns, equipping his 300 gunmen with them. (Capone's army of gunmen, enforcers and goon squads swelled to more than 1,000 by the end of the 1920s.) The Thompson submachine gun was used with such alacrity in Chicago that it was soon called the "Chicago typewriter," or a "Chicago piano." Other coinage, mostly from creative newsmen, labeled the weapon a "chopper," and a "tommy gun."Capone had no monopoly on the use of the submachine gun. Almost every important criminal gang purchased huge numbers of these weapons for the bootleg wars in New York, Chicago, Kansas City, St. Louis, and points South and West. But to O'Bannion, whose men were used to revolvers and shotguns, traditional gangster weapons by the turn of the 1920s, the submachine gun was a necessary tool that had to be used with prudence. His top killer, Hymie Weiss, however, became proficient with the gun and taught his men its intricacies with childish glee. Weiss would later use the submachine gun to devastating effect when raiding Capone's Cicero stronghold in 1926.

When Capone killed off and eliminated the South Side O'Donnell gang, close allies of O'Bannion's, the North Side gang leader called his lieutenants together to tell them that it was not Torrio, but Capone who was causing all the trouble, that Torrio was a gentleman who abided by agreements, but that Capone was nothing more than a mentally retarded goon with too much power and money, a gangster who would kill anyone in his way. O'Bannion pointed out that, despite the "dividing line" agreement, Capone had established, through vassals, dozens of whorehouses on the North Side, and that Capone's staunchest allies, the six terrible Genna Brothers, had been terrorizing and beating up North Side saloon owners to make them buy cheap home-made Genna liquor.

O'Bannion mourned for the dead members of the

Capone, 1926, in the office of CPD Captain John Stege, one of the few incorruptible cops; Scarface was being questioned about the murder of rival gangster Earl Weiss.

O'Donnell gang, all friends. "Those killings weren't Torrio's orders," he told Weiss, Moran, Drucci, Alterie and others. "They were all done by that dirty atheistic dago! Did you see poor Jerry O'Connor's face in the funeral home? It was all blown off. Nothing left to it. And Walt O'Donnell, too, and all those other lads. That Capone kills like a beast in the jungle!"

O'Bannion and Weiss later met Frank McErlane, one of Capone's top gunmen, as he was strolling along a North Side street, in O'Bannion territory. They stopped McErlane and reminded him of the "dividing line," and that he was north of Madison Street. McErlane smiled and said he was merely visiting a friend. Weiss then stepped close to McErlane, credited with first using the submachine gun in gang warfare, on the O'Donnell brothers. "We know it was you and some others who knocked off the O'Donnells, Frank," said Weiss. "You can tell Capone this for me. That if he ever pulls anything like that on us, I'm gonna get him, if I have to kill everybody in front of him to do it. You can tell him that, and if I see him, I'll tell him myself!" McErlane did report this conversation to his boss.

Gang leader "Polack Joe" Saltis, who aligned himself with Moran, then later switched sides to Capone; he bought a small town in Wisconsin, which was named Saltisville.

Capone, for once in his violent career, paused, and then ordered the insidious infiltration of bordello and bootleg operations into the North Side to cease, at least, for a short time. He realized that the powerful North Side gang was a potent force, a large, well-organized gang with political connections equal to Torrio's. O'Bannion was no common street thug. He controlled the 42nd and 43rd wards of the city and points north, the lucrative Near North Side with its exclusive shops and swanky restaurants, the booming Rush Street area, the Gold Coast and the upper-middle class neighborhoods spreading west and north from there.

O'Bannion's gang numbered in the dozens, mostly Irish and Polish-Americans, with a smattering of Italian gangsters like Drucci, church-going Catholics, but killers all, fiercely loyal to their leader, O'Bannion, who was himself considered by Police Chief Morgan Collins to be "Chicago's arch criminal who has killed or seen to the killing of at least twenty-five men." O'Bannion was also as crafty and devious as his gang rivals on the South Side. By 1923, O'Bannion and Torrio had several confrontations that caused O'Bannion to rethink his association with the South Side boss.

During the Cicero elections, O'Bannion had loaned Torrio dozens of his best terrorists to make sure that Torrio-Capone candidates won and thereby secured the town for the South Siders. Torrio had never compensated O'Bannion for the use of his men. Moreover, whenever they did business on a partnership basis, the gang bosses disagreed. On one occasion, O'Bannion's men hijacked a truckload of bonded whiskey worth $50,000. Two Chicago cops stopped the truck and demanded a payoff, holding the shipment for ransom, so to speak. O'Bannion's men called their boss for instructions and O'Bannion, in turn, called Torrio.

Their conversation was overheard on a police wiretap.

Five of the six "Terrible Gennas," Capone allies, are shown at a family dinner; the brothers (left to right) are Sam, "Bloody" Angelo, Peter, Antonio, and Jim (Mike "The Devil" Genna is not shown); Mike, Angelo and Tony Genna would all be killed in the gang wars.

"Those cops want $300," O'Bannion said, "and I can bump them off for half that much. To hell with them!" Torrio responded in his usual quiet manner: "Dion, we don't want no trouble. Give them the money. Take it out of my share, if you like, but give the cops the $300." O'Bannion paid the two policemen, but the payoff rankled him.

What made O'Bannion rage was the fact that the Genna Brothers, who provided the Torrio-Capone combine with most of its homemade liquor, were making serious inroads into O'Bannion's territory, selling their beer and liquor to North Side saloon owners under threat of death. O'Bannion's men had had several shootouts with the invading Gennas in 1923. The North Side gang leader concluded that Torrio had given Capone his approval to invade O'Bannion's territory and that their former agreements meant nothing. O'Bannion resolved to teach Torrio a lesson. O'Bannion called for a meeting with Torrio and Capone in May 1924, telling them that he planned to retire from the bootleg business, that he had "all the money in the world" and would be taking his wife out West to live on the sprawling ranch owned by his good friend Louis Alterie.

The lavish gangster funeral of Angelo Genna, following his murder at the hands of Weiss, Moran and Drucci on May 25, 1925; the tuxedo-wearing pallbearers are all Genna gangsters and all wore guns.

O'Bannion wanted to sell out his third interest in the lucrative Sieben's Mid-City Brewery on the North Side. This brewery had produced quality beer before Prohibition, and had been purchased by Torrio, Capone and O'Bannion as a partnership in 1920. The brewery operated at full capacity, while the police on O'Bannion's payroll looked the other way. In fact, officers were assigned to protect the plant from rival gangsters, who might think to raid the place.

Torrio agreed to buy out O'Bannion and gave him $500,000 in cash. A few days later, on May 19, 1924, at O'Bannion's insistence, Torrio drove to the North Side to inspect his new property. Capone was not in attendance, having gone into hiding after killing Joe Howard eleven days earlier. O'Bannion took Torrio on a tour of the large brewery, but they were interrupted by Chief Morgan Collins and dozens of policemen. Collins placed Torrio and O'Bannion under arrest, along with Hymie Weiss and Louis Alterie, who were also in attendance.

More then thirty brewery employees were arrested, including two of O'Bannion's bribed policemen, who had been guarding the place. Chief Collins ripped their badges from their chests on the spot. The prisoners were delivered to the Federal Building, where Collins stated that the bootleggers would be held until tried for violating the federal prohibition law. Torrio realized that he had been betrayed by O'Bannion, set up for an arrest. He had purchased a brewery that was now out of operation and, through his informants, was told while still behind bars that O'Bannion, the man in the next cell, had tipped Collins when to make the raid.

Torrio then took $12,500 from his pocket and paid bail for himself and six of his own men who had been caught in the raid. O'Bannion told him he did not have any cash on him and asked that Torrio provide his bail. The South Side gang chief gave him a withering look and said nothing, leaving the Federal Building in smoldering silence, resolved now to listen to his protege Capone and get rid of O'Bannion. Torrio gave the job to his top killer, Capone.

The occasion Capone selected as the best suited for the murder of O'Bannion was the death of Mike Merlo, president of the Chicago branch of the Unione Siciliane. Merlo, who had been an advocate of nonviolence, was well-liked by all the Chicago gangs, and when huge and expensive floral wreaths for his funeral were ordered by Torrio and Capone, O'Bannion received the business at his State Street flower shop, which he jointly owned with William Schofield. At noon on November 10, 1924, three swarthy men walked into the Capone gunman Frank McErlane, credited as the first gangster to use a submachine gun; he was also credited with murdering more than a dozen rival gangsters during the Chicago bootleg wars.

A laughing Capone is shown (center) with two women (neither of them his wife) at the race track, his bodyguards sitting in the next box (below).

On the same day that Capone was shown at the race track (previous page), this home, owned by a union leader who had refused to turn over control of his union to Scarface, was blown to pieces by Capone terrorist James "King of the Bombers" Belcastro.

The end of Frankie Yale on July 1, 1927; the New York gangster double-crossed Capone and was raked by machine gun bullets from a passing car, causing Yale's auto to crash into the front porch of a Brooklyn house, his riddled body spilling onto the pavement.

Gangster on ice: The body of Sam Malaga, bodyguard to Capone enemy John "Dingbat" Oberta, is shown floating in the half frozen Little Calumet River, south of Chicago, where he and Oberta were shot to death by Capone killer Frankie McErlane.

John "Dingbat" Oberta, who tried to battle Scarface over bootleg territories and was murdered for his efforts; he is shown with his new wife, widowed weeks later.

Chicago's Lexington Hotel became Capone's headquarters in 1929, patrolled by scores of bodyguards, many of these openly carrying submachine guns in the lobby.

Capone, by 1929, spent more and more time in Florida, relaxing at his multi-million-dollar Palm Island, Florida, estate.

The entrance to Capone's Florida estate, replete with ten servants and always guarded by a dozen heavily-armed gunmen working in three eight-hour shifts.

An aerial view of Scarface's Florida estate, walled on all sides; Capone bought the adjoining lots, which were stripped of trees so that his tower guards, who used searchlights at night, could spot any interlopers approaching the gangster's bastion.

Some of Capone's bodyguards arrive to replace the night shift at the crime czar's Florida estate.

The cigar-chomping Capone is shown fishing from the stern of his yacht, which was anchored off his Palm Island estate, in early 1929, at the time his murder squads were preparing the St. Valentine's Day Massacre.

Top Capone killer, "Machine Gun" Jack McGurn (Vincenzo DeMora), who planned the St. Valentine's Day Massacre.

shop and O'Bannion came out of the back room, where he had been clipping flower stems. His porter, William Crutchfield, went into the back room and heard O'Bannion say to the men: "Hello, boys, you want Merlo's flowers?"

"Yes," the tallest of the three said, and took O'Bannion's outstretched hand to shake it, but he held on with a vise-like grip, swinging the gangster sideways, then jerked him forward and pinioned his arms to prevent him from reaching for one of the three guns he had in his specially-built pockets. The other two men drew revolvers and fired almost point blank at O'Bannion. Six bullets were fired into him, two entering his chest, two through his larynx as he was falling, one through his right cheek and, after O'Bannion was on the floor, the man who had been holding him released his grip and pulled his own revolver, firing a coup de grace bullet into the gangster's head from such close range that powder burns scorched the skin. The three killers then dashed from the shop, raced across the street and jumped into a blue Jewett car, which sped north on State Street. O'Bannion was dead before he fell to the floor of his shop, landing in the middle of his own flowers, staining them red with his own blood, the victim of what was forever known as "the handshake murder."

Though his killers were never officially identified, the close descriptions of the three visitors by the porter, Crutchfield, fit those of Frankie Yale, the crime boss of Brooklyn, the man who held O'Bannion's hand, and Capone's two top killers, Albert Anselmi and John Scalise. Yale, a friend of Capone's from Scarface's days in the New York mobs, was brought in for the murder since O'Bannion did not know him. He also was not familiar with Scalise and Anselmi and was therefore not on guard when these three entered his shop.

When Earl "Hymie" Weiss heard that his boss had been killed, he exploded with rage. According to one newsman, "Hymie became a raving lunatic when he heard the news of Dion's murder. He took a solemn oath to kill Capone and Torrio and everyone else in the syndicate he could find." In a bizarre scene, Weiss, Moran, Drucci, and the rest of the North Side gangsters faced Torrio and Capone at O'Bannion's lavish funeral, both Scarface and Torrio sending huge floral wreaths, Capone's having a large, red ribbon reading: "From Al." Weiss glared at Capone during the brief ceremonies (and again Capone showed blue stubble on his florid face, not shaving as a sign of mourning).

Torrio knew that Weiss, now the boss of the North Siders, had marked him for death. He fled the city, traveling about the country with his wife, while Capone ran things, and then returned to plead guilty to violating the Volstead Act on January 23, 1925, a charge still standing from his arrest in connection with the Mid-City Brewery arrest the previous year. Torrio believed that the safest place for him would be in a federal prison.

Judge Adam Cliffe allowed Torrio five days to take care of his business before passing sentence, and the next day the crime boss took his wife shopping. The Torrios arrived in front of their apartment building at 7011 Clyde Avenue, where they occupied the third floor, and as Ann Torrio walked toward the entrance, a Cadillac touring car moved slowly next to the Torrio limousine and stopped. Torrio was just getting out of the limousine, driven by chauffeur-bodyguard, Robert Barton, when four men in the Cadillac, holding revolvers and shotguns, began blasting away at him.

The four gangsters were Weiss, Moran, Drucci, and Alterie. Weiss and Moran jumped from the Cadillac and ran toward Torrio, who turned toward them, packages in his arms. He was shot several times, falling to the ground; one bullet smashed his jaw, another went into his chest, another into his groin, another into his right arm. Meanwhile, Alterie and Drucci peppered Torrio's limousine with shotgun pellets, which dissolved the windows and blew off the headlights and fenders. Barton, the chauffeur-bodyguard, was struck in the legs and disabled.

Moran, who held two revolvers and had been firing them rapidly as he ran toward Torrio, leaned over the squirming, blood-spouting gang boss and put a revolver to Torrio's head to administer the same kind of coup de grace given his former boss, O'Bannion. He pulled the trigger and nothing happened. The chambers of his revolvers were empty. He started to reload, but Drucci, at the wheel of the Cadillac, gave two long blasts on the horn, the signal that police were coming, and Moran and Weiss ran back and leaped inside the Cadillac, which roared away.

When police officers arrived, they found Torrio on the sidewalk, moaning to them: "bullets...tipped with garlic." He was more concerned with garlic tipped bullets that might cause gangrene than with receiving a fatal wound. (The legend of garlic-tipped bullets began with Capone killers Anselmi and Scalise, who rubbed garlic on their bullets, believing that this would cause a lethal infection even if they failed to strike a vital organ, a mistaken belief.)

One report stated that Torrio had been set up, that his time schedule detailing his daily activities in the five days before he was to begin serving his nine-month prison sentence had been given to Hymie Weiss, and that the man who had delivered this schedule through an anonymous courier was none other than Al Capone. Scarface, the report pointed out, wanted the cautious nonviolent Torrio out of the way, so that he could deal with his gang enemies in a way he believed to be most effective—all-out warfare. He was also tired of taking orders from Torrio and coveted his underworld empire.

By some sort of miracle, Torrio survived. He refused to name his assailants. "Sure," he told newsmen from a bed in the Jackson Park Hospital, "I know all four men, but I will never tell their names." Moran was the only one of the four gunmen later identified by the doorman at Torrio's building, and he was indicted for attempted murder, but the case against him was later dropped when Torrio refused to cooperate with authorities. Capone arrived and stationed four armed guards on the third floor, close to Torrio's private room. Torrio told a weeping Capone that he had made a mistake about O'Bannion. He had never realized just how loyal O'Bannion's men were to their fallen chief and how they would undertake a war of vendetta against him.

On February 9, 1925, with bandages wrapped about his jaw, Torrio, surrounded by Capone's gunmen, went down a back fire escape and then to court, where Judge Cliffe fined him $5,000 and sentenced him to nine months in jail, a sentence which he gladly accepted. He was, for his own safety, Capone/Genna killers John Scalise and Albert Anselmi, who were part of the four-man execution squad that committed the St. Valentine's Day Massacre.

Fred Goetz, AKA: "Shotgun Ziegler," who was one of the two phony policemen "arresting" the seven members of the Moran gang; he, like Fred Burke, was not recognized by the hoodwinked victims in the garage. Goetz would be shot to death by four gunmen on a Cicero, Illinois, street on March 20, 1934.

Fred R. "Killer" Burke, the second phony cop; when he learned that bullets from his machinegun were matched to bodies in the St. Valentine's Day Massacre, he fled to Michigan, murdered a cop and received a life sentence, which was his lethal plan to save his life, knowing that Michigan had no death penalty.

sent to the Waukegan Jail, where his cell was specially equipped against assassins, bullet-proof glass put into his cell window and private guards placed before his cell door. He ate catered meals as he served out his time and received Capone, his lawyers and other business associates at all hours.

During this reflective period, Torrio came to the conclusion that it was time for him to retire from the rackets. He had made untold millions in five years of ruling a huge bootleg empire. But with the killing of O'Bannion, he realized that he now faced an organization seriously threatened, and, in most parts of Chicago, under constant attack by the North Siders and their vassal gangs. He was marked for death. It was time to leave Chicago, and he told Capone that he was turning everything over to him. "It's all yours, Al," he was heard to tell his protege. This involved thousands of speakeasies, brothels, breweries, and rackets of all sorts, that brought in an estimated $50 million a year in gross revenues.

Torrio took nothing in return except Capone's undying gratitude and, after serving his time in Waukegan, Johnny Torrio packed up his wife and belongings and resettled first in Italy, then in New York, traveling about the country as an elder statesman of crime, trying to interest gang leaders in organizing a national syndicate, an idea which Capone himself would put into reality in 1929, when calling the first national crime cartel meeting in Atlantic City, a gangster enclave over which Johnny Torrio would preside.

Capone inherited a crime empire that was exploding before his very eyes. He, like Torrio, was marked for death, and lived a furtive life, one where he and his family were guarded night and day. Capone, however, unlike Torrio, understood and accepted the street warfare being waged by Weiss and his men. Scarface surrounded himself with killers devoted to his safety and well-being, marksmen such as Louis "Little New York" Campagna, who slept outside the boss' hotel suite, when he was away from his southside home; Samuel McPherson "Golf Bag" Hunt, who earned his moniker after police found him carrying a shotgun in a golf bag in his car; William "Three Fingered Jack" White, a deadly marksman who had lost two fingers on his right hand in a boyhood accident; Phil D'Andrea, Capone's favorite bodyguard, deadly with a revolver; and "Machinegun Jack" McGurn (Vincenzo DeMora), the man who would later plan the end of the Weiss-Moran gang.

Scarface at first tried some crude diplomacy, contacting Weiss and promising him that the old Madison Street "dividing line" would be respected. Weiss' response was to tell Capone that he would make peace, but only if O'Bannion's killers, Anselmi and Scalise, were turned over to him. "What?" roared Scarface, "I wouldn't do that to a yellow dog!" He then slammed down the phone and told Louis Campagna: "Hymie's crazy. He's gotta go. Figure out something."

Weiss, however, was quickly planning to wipe out Capone's closest allies, the Gennas. Systematically, Weiss, Moran and others ran down Angelo, Mike, and Tony Genna, killing them and scattering their forces throughout 1925, taking over the Genna territories and moving southward, deep into Capone territory. They expanded into the Northwest Side, making an alliance with Pollack Joe Saltis, who invaded the Sheldon gang territory. Saltis and Frank "Lefty" Koncil shot John "Mitters" Foley to death, eradicating one of the top Sheldon gunman. Capone himself was unsuccessfully attacked on two occasions.

The second and most serious attempt by Moran, Weiss, Drucci, and others took place in early August 1926, when the North Siders trailed Capone's car from his Prairie Avenue home to the Four Deuces. When Capone alighted from the car, the North Siders opened fire with revolvers and shotguns, killing his driver, Tony Ross, but missing Capone, who literally dove through the front door of the Four Deuces, slugs slamming into the door behind him. On August 10, 1926, Capone's men struck back, a carload of Scarface's gunners catching Weiss and Drucci on Michigan Avenue as they walked toward the Standard Oil Building, where they were to have a meeting with 20th ward political boss, Morris Eller.

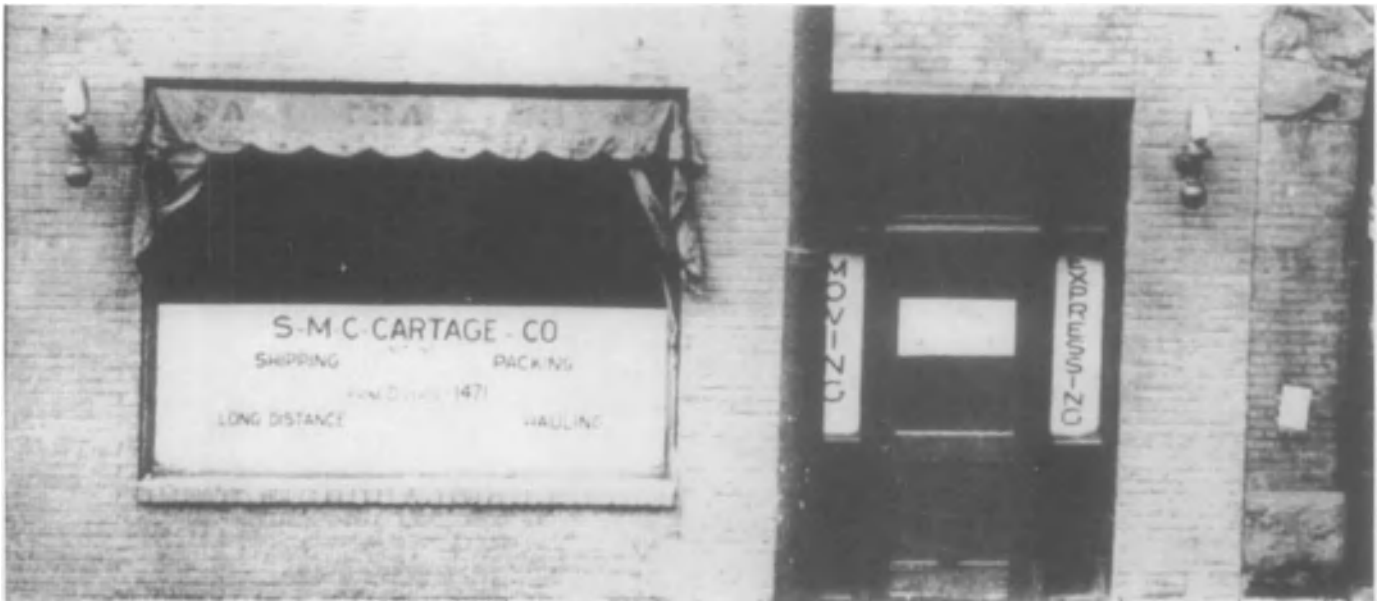
When Capone's men opened fire, the street was teeming with passersby, thousands of them, and people ran for cover at the first sound of gunfire, a sound with which Chicago was becoming all too familiar. Weiss and Drucci both pulled revolvers from their shoulder holsters, jumped behind a parked car and began returning fire. For several minutes, the most heavily trafficked street in the Midwest was turned into a scene out of the old Wild West, with gunmen firing at each other and through the crowds.

Miraculously, only one passerby, a clerk, was slightly wounded, nicked in the thigh. The Capone men had stopped their car and stood on the street, firing into buildings, heavy plate glass windows, in an effort to pick off the dodging Weiss and Drucci. Then a police car, its alarm gonging, sped toward the scene and the Caponites raced to their car and fled, leaving behind one gunman, Louis Barko, one of Capone's top killers.

Barko, along with Weiss and Drucci, were taken to a precinct station, but they told police that they did not know each other. Drucci, who had been carrying $13,500 in cash (a payoff to Eller, newsmen later speculated), claimed that the gunmen, who had fled were thieves: "It was a stickup, that's all. They were after my roll." Five days later, on August 15, 1926, Weiss and Moran were walking down Michigan Avenue when a carload of Capone gunmen opened fire on them, almost at the same spot where the previous gunfight had taken place. This time the North Siders chose not to shoot it out, but drew revolvers and fired as they ran into the Standard Oil Building. In New York, reading about these two shootings, crime boss Lucky Luciano, an advocate of assassination and murder, thought Capone excessive and told associates that Chicago was "a damned crazy place! Nobody's safe in the streets!"

This was made terrifyingly evident to Chicago residents and Capone himself on September 20, 1926, when the so-called "Bootleg Battle of the Marne" exploded into the wildest gunplay ever seen in modern gang warfare, occurring outside the Hawthorne Inn, Capone's Cicero headquarters. After being shot at twice, Weiss decided that it was time to track Scarface down in his lair and kill him, keeping his promise after O'Bannion's murder to kill anyone and everyone who got in his way.

Capone was having lunch that day in the rear of the Hawthorne Coffee Shop before going to the nearby Hawthorne



The entrance to Bugs Moran's Chicago headquarters on North Clark Street, the S-M-G Cartage Co.; the killers entered this front door on February 14, 1929, to line up seven members of the Moran gang against a brick wall of the back garage before shooting them all dead.

George "Bugs" Moran; he narrowly escaped the massacre.

Peter Gusenberg, Moran gunman, killed in the massacre.

Frank Gusenberg, Moran gunman, who was mortally wounded.

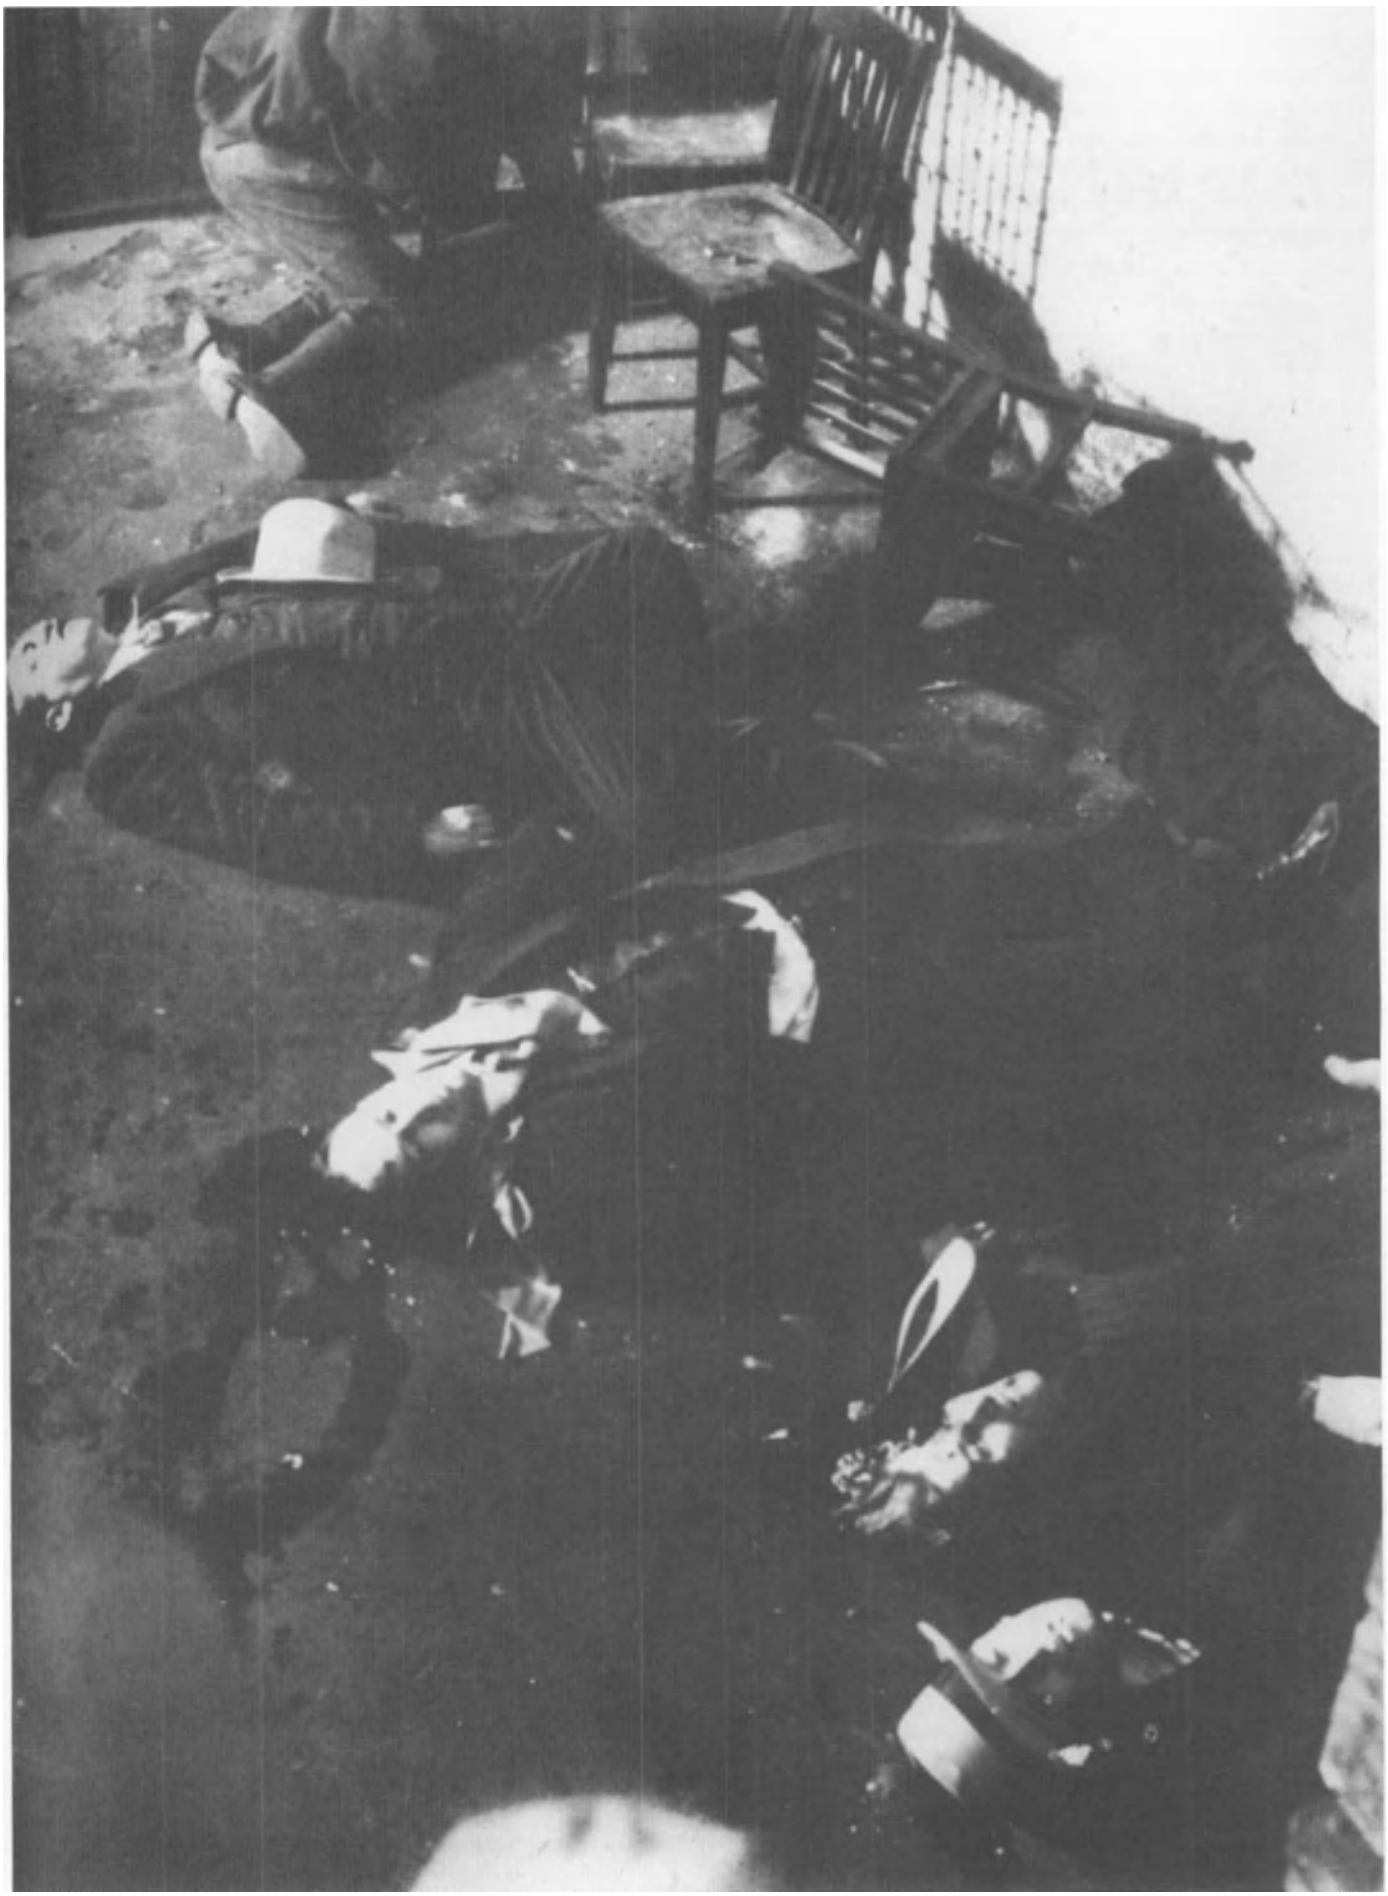
James Clark, Moran gunman, killed in the massacre.

Adam Heyer, Moran's accountant, killed in the massacre.

Al Weinshank, Moran's beer distributor, killed in the massacre.

John May, garage mechanic, killed in the massacre.

Dr. Rheinhardt Schwimmer, hanger-on, killed in the massacre.



Race Track for an idling afternoon. With him sat Frank Rio, one of his most dedicated bodyguards and a street-smart hoodlum who had survived many a gunfight. The coffee shop was crowded with lunchtime patrons and the place was noisy, but the ever-alert Rio heard the distant sound of a "chopper." The crowd in the restaurant fell silent, petrified, as a car went by, a man hanging from a window firing a submachine gun straight at the coffee shop's windows. But no windows were shattered and not a bullet mark etched into the building. Rio realized why. When Capone got up and began to walk toward the front of the shop, intending to step outside to investigate, the bodyguard ran up behind him and knocked him down, lying on top of him. "It's a decoy, boss, to draw you out."

Rio was right. The machine gunner in the first car had been firing blanks, intending to draw Capone and all his gunmen to the street so that they would be able to rake the lot of them, killing off the nucleus of the Capone mob. Ten cars, filled with Weiss' best men, at least fifty of them, all bristling with submachine guns, shotguns, rifles and revolvers, followed the advance car at a distance of a block, driving slowly and in single file past the hotel.

As the caravan reached the building, each car stopped and its occupants let loose a hellish and withering fusillade that blew away the windows of the coffee shop and most of the windows in the adjacent Hawthorne Inn. The gunners raked the building from left to right, then right to left, then up and down, to cover the three floors of the building. Louis Barko, the man who had tried to kill Weiss and Drucci earlier, was wounded in the shoulder as he was entering the lobby of the hotel when the first of the ten cars firing real bullets appeared.

Also shattered were the dozens of cars parked along the street in front of the Hawthorne Inn and its coffee shop. Inside one was Louisiana resident, Clyde Freeman, who had arrived in Cicero on vacation. Next to him sat his 5-year-old son and his wife. The family crouched inside the car when the invaders opened fire. Their car was riddled, a bullet going through Freeman's hat, one grazing his son's knee, and another ploughing into Mrs. Freeman's arm. The front window of the car was exploded by bullets and shards flew into Mrs. Freeman's right eye.

Finally, the last car in the murder caravan arrived before the shot-up hotel and Pete Gusenberg, one of the most daring of Weiss' gunmen, casually got out of the car carrying a submachine gun. He knelt before the entranceway and fired directly into the lobby, raking the place in about ten seconds with more than 100 .45-caliber bullets from the drum of the weapon, firing long bursts of fire that shattered chandeliers, tore apart furniture, and ripped into walls. With that, Gusenberg strolled to the car, got in, and, as a klaxon horn let out three blasts—a signal to leave—the caravan got under way and rolled down Twenty-second Street toward Chicago.

Scarface stood up moments later to survey the damage. More than 5,000 bullets had been fired by the invading gangsters. The coffee shop was a wreck, its tables, chairs, dishes, walls, and ceiling looking like a giant sieve. Incredibly, the dozens of lunch patrons escaped injury, all lying on the floor during the ten-minute attack. Capone's eyes darted about frantically, his lips twitched and his hands trembled. The visibly shaken crime czar now realized that open war had been declared against him. The Hawthorne Inn was a shambles, but fortunately there were no fatalities.

Capone made a show of paying for all the damage and even paying for more than $10,000 in hospital expenses and Opposite Page: St. Valentine's Day, February 14, 1929: Seven members of the Moran gang were found shot to pieces.

"Machine Gun" Jack McGurn is shown only days after the St. Valentine's Day Massacre with Louise Rolfe, the so-called "blonde alibi," who insisted that McGurn was in bed with her at the Stevens Hotel on the day the Moran gang was wiped out.

Revenge: The bodies of John Scalise, Joseph "Hop Toad" Guinta and Albert Anselmi, shown in the morgue; all three sought to kill Capone and take over his empire and all three were personally beaten to death by Scarface with a baseball bat on the night of May 7, 1929, after hosting a banquet in their "honor" at his Cicero fortress, the Hawthorn Inn. Scalise and Anselmi, who had murdered an estimated 50 to 100 persons, tipped their bullets in garlic, wrongly believing that this would assure the death of any victim only wounded in their attacks.

operations performed on Mrs. Freeman, which saved her eyesight. For the first time in his violence-strewn life, Al Capone was frightened. Earl "Hymie" Weiss had reached into the heart of Capone's stronghold, a place where he felt secure, and obliterated a half block of real estate in an attempt to murder him.

But where Weiss was a lethal gangster who preferred direct attacks, Capone was the master of the ambush, and this was how he planned to end the life of his chief antagonist. He consulted with his best executioners, who advised killing Weiss on his own ground, right next to his headquarters located in the second-story rooms above O'Bannion's flower shop, Schofield's, across from Holy Name Cathedral on State Street. Next to the flower shop was an apartment building at 740 North State Street, which was operated by Mrs. Anna Rotariu.

Early in October 1926, a young man named Oscar Langdon or Lundin, rented a room in this building, asking for a room that faced State Street. None were available until October 8, 1926, when a second-story room was vacated and Langdon took occupancy. On the same day, an attractive blonde, who gave her name as Mrs. Theodore Schultz, rented a second-floor room on the front of 1 Superior Street, at the southwest corner of State and Superior streets, just south of Schofield's. This room faced north, giving a clear view from a bay window of State Street and Holy Name Cathedral. Both Mrs. Schultz and Oscar Langdon vanished after occupying their rooms for one night, both re-

Revenge: The well-dressed corpse of "Machine Gun" Jack McGurn, found in a Chicago bowling alley on the night of February 14, 1936, seven years after McGurn masterminded the Moran gang massacre; McGurn's killers (thought to be Moran gunmen) had pressed a nickel into McGurn's dead hand to indicate that he was a "nickel and dimer." Into the other hand, McGurn's killers placed a comic Valentine reading: "You've lost your job/You've lost your dough/Your jewels and handsome houses/But things could be worse, you know/You haven't lost your trousers." placed in each of the rooms by two swarthy men thought to be Italians, according to the managers of both buildings.

A week later, on October 11, 1926, Hymie Weiss attended the trial of his friend Joe Saltis, who had been charged with the murder of John "Mitters" Foley. Weiss had promised Saltis his support if he eliminated Capone allies, and he was on hand to confer with Saltis' defense attorney, William W. O'Brien, a celebrated underworld lawyer, who had been shot in a Chicago saloon and then upheld the underworld code of silence by refusing to name his assailant. O'Brien had almost been disbarred after being accused of bribing two state's attorneys.

Weiss had in his pocket a list of veniremen in the Saltis trial, and it would be learned later that he had spread $100,000 in bribes to assure an acquittal for Saltis. Weiss left the courthouse with Sam Peller, his chauffeur-bodyguard; Paddy Murray, another bodyguard and one of Weiss' sub-bosses in charge of beer distribution; Benny Jacobs, a private legal investigator; and Saltis' lawyer, O'Brien. The five men drove up State Street, with Peller parking the Cadillac in front of Holy Name Cathedral at 4 p.m.

The five men began to cross the street to Schofield's shop and Weiss' headquarters. At that moment the two men in the second-story apartment next to the flower shop and two more men in the second-story room at 1 Superior threw up the shades covering the windows and began firing submachine guns and shotguns. The cross-fire was devastating, cutting down Weiss instantly, killing him with ten bullets. Murray was killed with fifteen bullets in him.

Moses Annenberg accompanied Capone to the first U.S. crime cartel meeting in May 1929, held in Atlantic City, New Jersey, to set up a national wire service to report racetrack results for country-wide bookies, a service that made the crime bosses and Annenberg untold millions.

Capone accountant Jack Zuta switched allegiance to Moran and was murdered on August 1, 1930; Zuta's name became synonymous with gangland execution and when Scarface learned that Joey Aiello had placed a $50,000 bounty on his life, Capone shouted: "Nobody's gonna Zuta me!"

The gunfire lasted only about thirty seconds but the fusillade was so intense that it blew away several words in the cornerstone of the Cathedral. When police arrived a few minutes later, the gunmen had fled the rooms in which they had waited for days to ambush Weiss. These killers were never identified, but they were reported by various sources to be Sam "Golf Bag" Hunt, William "Three-Fingered Jack" White, "Machine Gun" Jack McGurn, and Anthony "Joe Batters" Accardo, who later became head of the Chicago mob.

O'Brien, Peller, and Jacobs were all seriously wounded, but later recovered and, at first, it appeared that Scarface had eliminated his last serious gang rival in Chicago. Again, the underworld prepared for a lavish funeral and again there would be an enormous wreath with a red ribbon on it reading: "From Al." To the press, Capone lamented the passing of his dear old friend Weiss. "That was butchery," he clucked to newsmen, when talking about the attack on Weiss and the four other men. He sat amidst a large throng of reporters in his office suite at the Hawthorne Inn. Cigars and drinks were passed to the reporters.

As cigar smoke curled about him, Capone sadly told reporters how "Hymie was a good kid. He could have got out long ago and taken his and been alive today. When we were in business together in the old days I got to know him well and used to go to his room often for a friendly visit. Torrio and me made Weiss and O'Bannion. When they broke away and went into business for themselves, that was all right with us. We let 'em go and forgot about 'em. But they began to get nasty. We sent 'em word to stay in their own back yard. But they had the swell head and thought they were bigger than we were. Then O'Bannion got killed. Right after Torrio was shot and I knew who shot him.

"I had a talk with Weiss. `What do you want to do, get yourself killed before you're thirty?', I asked him...He could still have got along with me. But he wouldn't listen to me. Forty times I tried to arrange things so we would have peace and life would be worth living. Who wants to be tagged around night and day by guards? I don't for one. There was, and there is, plenty of business for us all and competition needn't be a matter of murder, anyway. But Weiss couldn't be told anything. I suppose you couldn't have told him a week ago that he'd be dead today."

Capone continued his rambling interview, obliquely sending a message to George "Bugs" Moran, who had assumed leadership of the North Side gang. "There are some reasonable fellows in his [Weiss'] outfit, and if they want peace, I am for it now, as I have always been. I'm sorry Hymie was killed, but I didn't have anything to do with it. I phoned the detective bureau that I'd come in if they wanted me, but they told me they didn't want me. I knew I'd be blamed for it. There's enough business for all of us without killing each other like animals in the street. I don't want to end up in the gutter punctured by machine gun slugs, so why should I kill Weiss?"

Chicago Tribune reporter Jake Lingle, who got rich by feeding Scarface information on police activities and impending raids against his rackets and who switched his allegiance to the Moran gang, which resulted in his murder on June 30, 1930, at the hands of a Capone assassin.

Chicago Police Commissioner William Russell, Lingle's close friend, who provided the crooked reporter with inside information that warned Capone of police raids and surveillance against Scarface's rackets; when this liaison was revealed following Lingle's murder, Russell's career ended.

To that last statement, Chief of Detectives William "Old Shoes" Schoemaker replied: "He knows why, and so does everyone else. He had them killed." But there was no way the police could arrest Capone. They had no evidence linking him to the Weiss killing. Capone's statements about his friend Weiss would make it appear that he had known the North Side gang leader for decades and that he was reflecting on "old days" that went back scores of years. He had known Hymie Weiss for six years. Weiss died at the age of twenty-eight.

Capone was then twenty-seven. He looked much older. High living had turned him into a lumbering, overweight gang boss of 220 pounds. His face was flabby and the fat rippled in rolls around his thick neck. Capone's hair was falling out so rapidly that he was almost bald. His conversation, lavished upon a press that had made him into an underworld icon, was identical to his appearance—expansive, flashy, overconfident. He was netting $5 million a year or more from his bootleg empire alone, and he was now the supreme power in Chicago.

Moran did read Capone's lengthy interview and concluded that a truce was necessary until he regrouped the North Side Gang. On October 21, 1926, he, Drucci, and other members of his gang met with Capone, Jake Guzik, Tony Lombardo, who was head of the Unione Siciliane, and others in a suite at the Hotel Sherman. Capone proposed that all grievances and feuds be ended and forgotten, and that the North Siders would continue to control the posh 42nd and 43rd wards. No one would encroach against another's territory, and all of Capone's old territory seized by Weiss would be returned. He would split up other territories for the smaller gangs. Moran agreed, and Capone later boasted to the press that he had had a conference with "all the boys" and had brought peace to Chicago. He was specifically asked about Bugs Moran and his men, and Capone replied: "They stay on the North Side and I stay in Cicero and if we meet on the street, we say `hello' and shake hands. Better, ain't it?"

Capone had more important things on his mind. His handpicked candidate, William Hale Thompson, who had been replaced by Mayor Dever, was again in the running for the mayoralty in the 1926 fall primary. Capone needed every goon in his ranks to fix the election, and this was one of the reasons he made peace with Moran. Capone planned to exterminate the North Siders later, when it was convenient. The primary in which Thompson was selected by the Republicans to run for the office of mayor went down in Chicago history as "the pineapple primary;" one permeated with bombs and grenades thrown into shops and homes of Thompson opponents. Voters were beaten up by Capone's goon squads, and some were even shot. When Frank Capone, Scarface's older brother, threatened some voting judges with a submachine gun, officers interrupted him and he was killed in the resulting gun battle.

Lingle's body lying on the pavement of the Illinois Central underpass; he was shot by a Capone "hitman" while going to a train that would take him to a racetrack, where he always made heavy bets.

A crowd numbering in the tens of thousands gather outside the church where funeral services were held for Lingle; the Chicago Tribune offered a reward for the capture of his killer before it learned that its slain reporter had been on Capone's payroll.

Thompson, with enormous funds provided by Capone, won the general election on the slogan of "a wide open city," an oblique statement that he would tolerate any kind of vice and corruption, a return of the good old days. When he was swept into office, Capone returned to the city, making his headquarters in the Metropole Hotel and later moving to the Lexington, just south of the Loop. From here, Capone reorganized his forces and began to spend millions in buying up legitimate businesses, first as fronts, then as paying concerns.

Like his mentor and sponsor Torrio, Capone, too, thought of early retirement, but first he thought to amass many more millions. He bought a lavish, large estate on Palm Island, Florida, and departed Chicago during its brutal winters to fish and swim in warm waters that lapped the white sands of his private beach. But all was not tranquil in Chicago. Moran had not for a moment trusted Capone when agreeing to the 1926 truce. Capone gunners consistently hunted down his men and killed them, and he fought back in the form of raids on Capone speakeasies and gambling joints and by hijacking Capone beer and liquor trucks.

After a series of killings, Moran joined with Joseph Aiello in trying to get rid of Capone, even bribing Capone's chef to put prussic acid in his soup. Then Moran-Aiello gangsters attempted to take over the Unione Siciliane, not only in Chicago, but in New York. Aiello gangsters trained to New York and, on July 2, 1928, shot Frankie Yale to death as he drove home, an Aiello vassal taking over the Unione Siciliane there. The Chicago Unione chief, Tony Lombardo, was shot to death on September 7, 1928, as he and two bodyguards, Joseph Lolordo and Tony Ferraro, were walking at the corner of Dearborn and Madison streets, the world's then-busiest corner. The killers, believed to be Moran gunmen, escaped in the dense crowds.

Lombardo's death was a great blow to Capone since Lombardo was not only a close ally, but a close friend. Another Capone friend, Pasquale Lolordo, assumed the command of the Unione Siciliane, but he, too, was murdered on January 2, 1929, by four men—Aiello, Moran, and the brothers, Frank and Pete Gusenberg, who met with Lolordo at his home. Mrs. Lolordo served the men whiskey and wine and left the parlor. A few minutes later she heard shots and ran into the parlor to see her husband lying on the floor, bleeding from a bullet wound in his head.

Mrs. Lolordo saw Joey Aiello going out the door, putting on his hat and tossing a revolver casually onto the floor. None of these men were arrested, and Capone vowed to get rid of his enemies once and for all. He summoned top killer, Frank "The Enforcer" Nitti, who had been waging war with the North Siders for two years, ordering Nitti to plan an operation which would eradicate the North Side gang, as well as Joseph Aiello, who had ultimately reached his goal, becoming president of the Unione Siciliane following Lolordo's murder.

Nitti and Machine Gun Jack McGurn planned to raid Moran's headquarters, the S-M-C Cartage Company at 2122 N. Clark Street. They picked St. Valentine's Day to deliver their message from Capone. Five men were chosen for the slaughter, three being Capone's top gunners: Jack McGurn, John Scalise, and Albert Anselmi. They would arrive in a car fixed up to look like a CPD detective car. Two more men, dressed as policemen, would enter the garage and line up Moran and his men. These two men had to be free-lance killers, who would not be recognized. They were Fred "Killer" Burke and Fred Goetz, also known as Shotgun Ziegler. Capone then went to Florida to lie on the sands and await word that his worst enemies had been killed.

On February 14, 1929, the fake detective car pulled up before the Moran headquarters and the two phony policemen—Burke and GoetzBwalked inside and lined up seven men they found inside the garage, pretending to arrest them. The seven were the deadly Gusenberg brothers, Pete and Frank; Adam Heyer (alias John Snyder), Moran's accountant; gunman James Clark; John May, a garage mechanic and getaway driver; Albert Weinshank, Moran's brother-in-law and beer distributor; and Dr. Rheinhardt H. Schwimmer, who had no real connection with the gang other than the fact that he enjoyed playing cards with its members. He was strangely attracted to gangsters, a fascination that would bring about his death.

Capone lookouts had watched all seven men enter the garage from windows in a rooming house across the street. When they spotted Weinshank they mistook him for Moran and made the call to McGurn that the boss of the North Side gang was inside the garage. Moran, however, was late getting to the garage that day. He and two bodyguards, Willie Marks and Ted Newbury, saw the detective car outside the garage and slipped into a coffee shop until the police raid was over, never thinking for a moment that Capone's killers were busy slaughtering their fellow gang members. Once the phony cops, Burke and Goetz, had lined up the seven men in the garage facing a brick wall, they motioned for Scalise and Anselmi to enter the rear of the garage. Both killers stepped inside and drew submachine guns from beneath their long coats.

Burke and Goetz put away their police revolvers and each also produced a submachine gun and a shotgun. Then all four Capone gunmen let loose a savage burst of gunfire that ripped through the bodies of the unsuspecting Moran gang members, cutting them in half and sending them to the floor. The killers continued to spray the bodies back and forth until their traumatized, quivering forms were still. Only the sound of a German shepherd, chained to a truck axle, could be heard as the animal began to howl. Putting the submachine guns beneath their coats, Scalise and Anselmi, dressed in civilian clothes, were marched at gunpoint to the detective car outside, as if they had been arrested by the uniformed officers. The four men got into the car and, McGurn, at the wheel, roared southward down Clark Street. The killers were never completely identified, except for Burke, who fled to Michigan where he was later tried for another murder and imprisoned for life.

Neighbors heard the dog howling inside the garage and went inside to discover the horror before them—seven men slaughtered, their bodies riddled with dozens of bullets, two of them with their heads blown away, their brains spilling onto the floor, these wounds administered by Goetz with his shotgun, the inevitable coup de grace. But one man, Frank Gusenberg, still lived. Wounded many times, he was rushed to a nearby hospital, but despite pleas from friends and police, he refused to identify the killers, most likely because he did not know them. He died a short time later.

Newsmen later found George "Bugs" Moran hiding out in a hospital, his bed flanked by bodyguards Marks and Newbury. He was asked about the men in the garage, his men. He denied even knowing the victims. "I didn't know those guys," he said. Who could have done such a heinous deed, he was asked. "Only Capone kills like that!" he blurted, a remark widely printed.

When Capone was confronted with this statement by newsmen in Florida, he laughed and said: "They don't call that guy `Bugs' for nothin'." He then added: "Only Moran kills like that," in a feeble effort to shift the blame for the mass murder onto his arch enemy, but no one could believe that Moran would have his own gang members shot to pieces. The mass killing, forever after known as The St. Valentine's Day Massacre, caused an enormous public uproar and authorities were pressured into cleaning the mobsters out of Chicago.

President Herbert Hoover was constantly asking his top law enforcement officials in Washington: "Have you gotten rid of that fellow Capone yet?" Federal authorities began a night-and-day campaign to put Capone behind bars, but this was no easy task. He always had a strong alibi for every killing placed at his door. When Joseph Aiello left a friend's home at 15 North Kolmar Avenue on the night of October 23, 1930, he was cut in half by bullets from machine guns set up inside two nearby apartment buildings, the same method used by Capone killers in slaying Hymie Weiss.

Following Aiello's death, all substantial gang resistence to Capone ceased. He was the supreme gang lord of Chicago, but his days were numbered. The federal government was closing in on his operations as its agents probed his elaborate business ventures, confiscating books and ledgers and studying his income. Meanwhile, even his most trusted aides planned to eliminate him. Before the murder of Joseph Aiello, Frank Rio came to Capone and told him that Anselmi and Scalise, in collusion with Joseph "Hop Toad" Guinta, the new Unione Sicilione president, had planned to murder him and were in league with Aiello.

Capone summoned all three men to the banquet room of the Hawthorne Inn where he gave a party in their honor. At the end of a sumptuous dinner and many speeches, Capone stepped up behind the three gunmen and denounced them as traitors. He then wielded a metal bat above their heads, bringing this down repeatedly on their skulls, killing them. The bodies were then dragged to a back room, stripped and mutilated before being taken by car to a lonely road where they were dumped into a ditch outside the city limits.

While the federal government concentrated its forces in preparing a case against Capone, Scarface made plans to enhance his underworld profits. In May 1929, Capone, accompanied by Jake Guzik, Frank Nitti, and Moses Annenberg, went to Atlantic City where Capone held the first national crime cartel conference with all the important crime bosses of the East Coast, including Charles "Lucky" Luciano, Joe Adonis, Frank Costello and Albert Anastasia, men who would go Contract killer Leo Vincent Brothers (left), known in the underworld as "Buster," is shown during his murder trial; he was convicted of slaying Lingle and given a prison sentence of only fourteen years.

Following the Lingle killing, Chicago police officers began conducting around-the-clock surveillance on Capone; police cars were permanently parked outside of Capone's Chicago home at 7244 Prairie Avenue; Scarface was seldom there.

Chicago brothel owner Mike "de Pike" Heitler, who turned informer, describing Scarface's involvement in the Lingle murder; he was murdered on April 30, 1931.

Treasury Agent Frank Wilson assembled evidence that convicted Capone of tax evasion.

Judge James H. Wilkerson presided at Capone's trial.

Flanked by his attorneys, Capone was confident at this tax evasion trial that he would be acquitted, knowing that several jurors had been bribed.

A glum-faced Capone leaves the court building, following his conviction; Judge Wilkerson had switched the bribed jury for another.

Capone is shown playing cards with a federal marshal on board a train taking him to the federal penitentiary in Atlanta, Georgia, December 17, 1932; he would be released in late 1939, by then afflicted with paresis of the brain and judged insane.

Capone's wife, Mae, hiding her face when visiting the crime boss at Alcatraz; she was strip-searched by female guards.

on to develop the crime syndicate as the most powerful organization in America next to the federal government. Presiding at this conference was Capone's old mentor, Johnny Torrio.

The purpose of the Atlantic City gathering was to introduce Moses Annenberg to the other crime bosses and to have them place his wire service into their nation-wide bookmaking operations so that the crime cartel would control all racing results in the U.S., a plan that would make Annenberg and the crime bosses untold millions. Later that month, Capone, hearing that Moran had placed a $50,000 reward on his head, arranged to have himself arrested, along with his ever-loyal bodyguard, Frank Rio, as they emerged from a movie theater in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on May 17, 1929. Both were carrying weapons and admitted that they were breaking the law.

They confessed their guilt and both men were convicted of carrying concealed weapons, each sentenced to serve a year in prison by Judge John E. Walsh. Capone and Rio were sent to Philadelphia's Holmsburg County Prison. Both men were later transferred to the Eastern Penitentiary after news about Capone's easy life at Holmsburg was publicized. Capone and Rio were released on March 17, 1930, with two months taken off their sentences for good behavior. Capone's willingness to go to jail was obvious; he felt it was the only place where he would be safe from Moran gunmen.

By the time he returned to Chicago, Scarface soon realized that he was now a pariah with his political supporters. High level politicians and police officials, long on his payroll, shunned him. His closest associate with the press, Jake Lingle, street reporter for the Chicago Tribune, whose connections with Police Chief William Russell, formed the conduit of high level information Capone needed, deserted him for the Moran gang, and Capone had him killed by Leo Vincent Brothers as he was going to the racetrack on June 30, 1930. Brothers, through Capone's connections and a jury that was later reported to be bribed, received a fourteen-year term and served only eight years. Then one of Capone's most trusted business associates, Edward J. O'Hare, secretly defected, providing IRS investigators with vital information needed in preparing its case against the crime czar.

Meanwhile, President Hoover plagued Secretary of Treasury Andrew Mellon daily with the same nagging question: "Have you got that fellow Capone, yet? Remember, I want that man Capone in jail." The man who got Capone was a mild-mannered tax investigator, Elmer L. Irey, chief of the IRS's Enforcement Branch. Irey and his investigators spent three years compiling evidence against Ralph Capone, Al's brother. He failed to pay about $4,000 on $70,000 declared income for the years 1922-25 and Irey managed to bring a successful case against him. Stunned, Ralph Capone was convicted of income tax evasion, fined $10,000, and sent to prison for three years. Next, Irey went after a bigger fish, Scarface himself. Edward J. O'Hare was one of the key men in providing information to Irey's agents, chiefly to Secret Service agent

Frank J. Wilson. "On the inside of the [Capone] gang," Wilson later said, "I had one of the best undercover men I have ever known: Eddie O'Hare."

O'Hare was unlike any of Capone's other associates. He was cultured, well-read, a gentleman devoted to his son Butch, who would later become a World War II pilot and national hero. O'Hare had started as a gentleman bootlegger in St. Louis and then moved to Chicago, where he became a lawyer and then one of Capone's business agents, overseeing Scarface's dog and horse racing tracks, a lucrative job that made O'Hare a millionaire. (He later became president of Sportsman's Park.) He informed IRS agents where they could seize books that would reflect Capone's income and this evidence was finally obtained, along with other voluminous ledgers and documents dealing with Capone's myriad rackets and businesses.

By 1931, Irey and his agents had established Capone's income for 1924 to be in excess of $120,000 and that taxes for this amount, about $32,000, had never been paid. For the years of 1925-29, Capone, it was proven, had earned more than $1 million and had paid no taxes on this income either. As Irey and everyone else knew, this $1 million was but a tiny fraction of what Capone had actually taken in, but it was income they could prove on paper. In fact, Capone had never paid any kind of income tax. This was his undoing. When he realized that he might share the same fate as his brother, Capone offered the federal government $400,000 to drop its case against him. This offer was rejected.

Capone's bloody revenge: Edward J. O'Hare, the man who provided the evidence to federal prosecutors that sent Capone to prison, is shown shot to death in his car on November 8, 1939, only eleven days before Capone was released from prison.

He was tried before federal Judge James H. Wilkerson, a jurist who could not be intimidated or bought. The jury was another matter. O'Hare informed Irey's agents that Phil D'Andrea had obtained a list of all the jury members in the case and these were to be bribed or, if they did not find Scarface innocent, killed. Wilkerson was given this list. He first had bailiffs pull D'Andrea from his seat in the spectator's gallery and searched. A weapon was found on him and he was sent to prison for six months for carrying a concealed weapon. Then, distrusting his jury, Wilkinson had the jury in the Capone case switched completely with a jury hearing another case only a few minutes before Capone's trial began.

In short order, Capone was convicted of tax evasion and Judge Wilkinson gave him the maximum sentence, a fine of $50,000, an order to pay court costs of $30,000 and eleven years in jail. Moreover, all his assets and that of his wife's were seized by the government. Much of these holdings, however, were in the names of others and dummy corporations, such as Capone's Florida estate, so they remained within the family.

Capone was stunned by the sentence and, for the first time in years, had only a few mumbling words for the press as he was hustled to jail by U.S. marshals. Judge Wilkinson had denied any form of bail while Capone's lawyers filed their expected appeals. As he was being led from the courtroom, newspaper photographers began taking pictures of the defeated crime boss. Capone sneered and then said: "Get enough boys, you won't be seeing me for a long time." He had limply accepted his fate. Capone was sent to the federal penitentiary in Atlanta, but he was treated with such deference there, creating his own fiefdom, that he was transferred in 1934 to Alcatraz as part of the first group of Public Enemies to be sent to the forlorn Rock.

At Alcatraz, Capone proved to be a cooperative prisoner, although he was attacked a few times by younger men trying to make a reputation for themselves or by members of the old Chicago mobs he had once fought against. On February 5, 1938, Capone entered the prison mess hall and wandered about like a man half conscious. Spittle drooled from his lips, and he seemed not to know where he was. He was taken to the prison hospital and tests revealed that he was in the advanced stages of syphilis and paresis of the brain had begun to turn his mind into jelly. This deadly venereal infection had been contracted almost two decades ago when Capone visited the diseased harlots who worked in his own infested brothels.

Capone (right) with a bodyguard in 1941, in Florida, his mind already gone; the ruthless Scarface would die on January 25, 1947.

Partly paralyzed, Capone was released from Alcatraz on January 6, 1939, and removed to the Federal Correctional Institution at Terminal Island outside of Los Angeles. He was later taken to the medical center at Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, where he was adjudged insane and released to the care of his family on November 19, 1939. Eleven days earlier, unknown gunmen in Chicago sought out Edward J. O'Hare, the man who had secretly provided the IRS with information that helped send Capone to prison, and shot him to death as he was driving back from Sportsman's Park.

Capone was taken to his Florida resort and here, for almost a decade, Scarface sat idly about, barking orders to bodyguards, who largely ignored or placated him. His mind kept drifting back to his Chicago days, and he often woke in the middle of the night screaming that rival gangsters were outside his bedroom door, coming to kill him. His empire continued to flourish under the direction of Frank Nitti, then Paul "the Waiter" Ricca, then Anthony Accardo, then others. Members of the old mob, however, continued to visit Capone up to the time of his death, pretending that he was still in charge of Chicago operations, giving him fake, often ludicrous reports on his rackets and the millions they were producing on his behalf.

This chore usually fell to Jake "Greasy Thumb" Guzik, who was in semi-retirement, but he played out the charade almost every month. After one such visit to Florida, newsmen cornered Guzik upon his return to Chicago and asked him about the state of Capone's health. "Al?" replied the laconic Guzik. "He's as nutty as a fruitcake."

On January 25, 1947, Capone, who was suffering from pneumonia, underwent a massive brain hemorrhage and died. In the words of one of his gang members at the deathbed: "Al's brain just exploded." His body was removed from the Palm Island estate and sent back to the scene of his underworld triumphs and disasters, Chicago. The city of Chicago would keep Scarface in special memory, particularly by naive generations to come. Those who were unfamiliar with his mass murders and ruthless racketeering looked briefly upon his huge and tarnished image and construed him to be some sort of subculture folk hero. In 1989, an amateur historian idiotically proposed to the National Park Service that Capone's home at 7244 S. Prairie Avenue be designated an historic landmark, complete with a bronze plaque announcing it to be the former residence of one of America's most notorious gangsters.

This proposal was seriously entertained by federal officials until a storm of protest erupted in the Chicago newspapers and, especially, from Italian-American groups registering complaints that such a move would honor and glorify a contemptible murderer. Such a move, said a spokesman for the Sons of Italy, "would assist in the stereotyping and defamation of all Italian-Americans." This sentiment was echoed by the Joint Civic Committee of Italian-Americans. The request seeking landmark status for the Capone home was withdrawn.

Immediately upon arrival in Chicago by train, the corpse of the dead crime czar was met by armed guards, who escorted it to Mount Olivet Cemetery. Even in death, Capone commanded gunmen to protect him against unseen enemies, in this case ghouls. At Mount Olivet, the family held a quiet, unpublicized ceremony but, fearing graverobbers would abduct the corpse, the Capone family later had the body reburied in a secret plot in Mount Carmel Cemetery. Mae Capone was later offered $50,000 by a publisher for the story of her life with Scarface, but she rejected the offer, saying: "The public has one idea of my husband. I have another. I will treasure my memory and I will always love him."

George "Bugs" Moran had no love for Al Capone, and said so with his dying gasp. Following the destruction of his gang in the St. Valentine's Day Massacre, Moran fell on bad times. He lost control of the North Side and was reduced to committing robberies. He was convicted of bank robbery and sent to Leavenworth, where he died of lung cancer in February 1957, ten years after Scarface passed from the earth. From his deathbed, Moran weakly whispered to a prison hospital attendant: "Well, I outlasted that murdering rat, Capone. He went to hell ten years ago."

A Catholic priest gave Moran the Last Rites. Following Moran's burial outside the walls of Leavenworth in a $35 pine box, carried by six convicts and attended by no mourners, the priest wrote Judge John H. Lyle, who had known Moran and Capone, telling Lyle: "I'm sure that God in His mercy was very kind to him in his judgment." There was, however, no assurance, that George "Bugs" Moran, would not meet with the same eternal, terrible fate Moran envisioned for his mortal enemy, Capone.

"JOE THE BOSS"/1910s-1920s

Like Big Jim Colosimo of Chicago, Joseph "Joe the Boss" Masseria (Giuseppe Masseria; 1879-1931; AKA: Joe the Boss; Don Joe) was an old-fashioned crime czar, a traditional Mafia don, who exercised enormous power for more than a decade in New York. He was the absolute underworld boss of the Lower East Side and head of the Mafia in New York from 1920 to 1931. Born in Sicily, Masseria immigrated to the U.S. in 1903, fleeing a murder charge in Palermo, where he had been a Mafia enforcer. Short and stocky (Joe the Boss stood only five feet, two inches high), Masseria went to work as an enforcer for the Morello Gang of the Lower East Side of New York. This all-Sicilian gang specialized in Black Hand extortion rackets and its top members, Ignazio Saietta (Lupo the Wolf) and Ciro Terranova (The Artichoke King), were the most vicious killers in New York.

For ten years Masseria worked his way up through the ranks of this gang until, in 1913, he decided to take over its leadership. Terranova, by then, had branched out into other rackets, cornering the importation and sale of artichokes in New York and becoming the "Artichoke King." Saietta had been sent to prison, and the rest of the leaders of the Morello gang, including Joe and Nick Morello, had either been killed or were behind bars. Masseria personally led attacks on the headquarters of the Morello gang, shooting Charles Lamonti to death. He shot and killed several others, until every gangster in the Lower East Side had sworn allegiance to him. By 1920, Masseria was the supreme boss of this district, controlling all illegal rackets.

"Joe the Boss" Masseria, an old-fashioned Mafia don who dominated the New York underworld through the late 1920s; executed by four gunmen on April 15, 1931.

Peter "The Clutching Hand" Morello attempted to retake the Morello empire in 1922, enlisting several top killers to eradicate Masseria and his men. One of these contract killers was Umberto Valenti, who had reportedly murdered twenty or more men in Mafia-related killings. Valenti went after Masseria alone, finding the ganglord walking on a street with two bodyguards. Valenti emptied his two revolvers at the trio, killing the bodyguards.

Masseria fled down the street and dashed into a millinery shop. Valenti reloaded his two revolvers and calmly walked into the shop. There he fired more than ten shots at Masseria, who kept dodging and weaving between the counters. Not one of Valenti's bullets hit the gang boss and the would-be killer finally fled at the sound of a police gong from a detective car. Masseria was known thereafter as the "man who dodges bullets."

NYPD photos of Ignazio Saietta, also known as Lupo the Wolf, a murderous Black Hander who extorted money from his fellow Italians in the Lower East Side; he was credited with murdering more than 100 persons, burying many of these victims in his own secreted cemetery behind a livery stable.

Masseria controlled all bootlegging operations in the Lower East Side and he made millions. He hired more and more men to run and protect his rackets, including such Brooklyn gunmen as Charles "Lucky" Luciano and Joe Adonis, two up-and-coming gangsters. It was to these two men that Masseria assigned the murder of Umberto Valenti. Luciano and Adonis notified Valenti that Masseria wanted to meet with him to sign a truce. Valenti kept the rendezvous, appearing in a restaurant on East 12th Street with three heavily armed goons. Luciano and Adonis got up from a table and opened fire on the four men, shooting down the three bodyuards. Valenti ran outside and hopped on the running board of a passing auto, firing at Luciano and Adonis, who had run into the street after him. They traded several shots and Valenti was fatally struck. He toppled from the moving car and crashed dead into the gutter.

Most of the young New York gangsters, who were later to form the national crime syndicate in the early 1930s joined the powerful Masseria, including Frank Costello, Albert Anastasia, Vito Genovese, Carlo Gambino, and Thomas "Three-Finger Brown" Lucchese. These men worked under the direction of Luciano, who was Masseria's top lieutenant. Masseria was a tough man to work for, these men discovered. He hated Jews and ordered Luciano to stop affiliating himself with Jewish gangs headed by Louis Buchalter, Meyer Lansky and Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel of the Bug and Meyer Mob, a directive Luciano ignored.

Costello (Francesco Castiglia, 1891-1973), who served as Masseria's pay-off man with New York politicians and police, also received regular tongue-lashings from Masseria for his large bribes. Masseria did not believe in sharing the profits from his illegal operations, only occasional pay-offs. All seemed secure in the world of Masseria until the late 1920s, when Salvatore Maranzano, a Sicilian Mafia chieftain, arrived from Palermo, financed by Sicilian Mafia chief Don Vito Casio Ferro. It was Maranzano's goal to eliminate Masseria, take over his empire, and expand operations to include all of New York. Maranzano announced to his growing army of thugs that he, not Masseria, would be the "boss of bosses" in New York. To that end he ordered his thugs to kill, not Masseria, but Luciano, the tough young enforcer for Joe the Boss.

On October 17, 1929, Luciano was abducted by Maranzano's gunmen. He was beaten and slashed about the neck and face, then thrown out of a moving car on Hylan Boulevard in Staten Island and left for dead. He survived, requiring fifty-five stitches to his face. From a hospital bed, Luciano refused to tell police anything, except that he would "take care of those guys in my own way." But others in the Masseria organization were not as loyal to the boss, including Masseria's long-time ally, Gaetano Reina (1889-1930), who decided to join forces with Maranzano. When Masseria learned of this treachery, he ordered Reina killed, sending his fat killer, Joseph Pinzolo, to do the job. Pinzolo followed Reina to the Bronx on February 26, 1930, where Reina visited a friend. When Reina left the house of his friend, Pinzolo merely walked up to him with a shotgun and blew off the top of his head. Pinzolo was rewarded for this murder by being given Reina's rackets by Masseria.

Ciro Terranova, known as "The Artichoke King"; his rackets were taken over by Joe Masseria.

Reina's men, however, rebelled against their new boss; these men, Lucchese, Domi-nick "The Gap" Petrilli, and Tom Gagliano, went to Luciano and urged him to get rid of Masseria. Luciano, Adonis, Costello, and others had been meeting regularly by this time to plan the elimination of both Maranzano and Masseria, so that they could take over all the Italian and Sicilian rackets in New York. Luciano told Lucchese to first eliminate the fat gunman, Pinzolo.

Lucchese asked Pinzolo to a meeting at the Brokaw Building on Broadway. When Pinzolo walked into the offices of the California Dry Fruit Importers, a Mafia front, he was met by Lucchese's top killer, Bobby Doyle, whose real name was Girolamo Santucci, a former prizefighter turned mob killer. Doyle leveled a shotgun at Pinzolo, the same kind of weapon Pinzolo had used on Reina, and killed him with a double barrel blast.

Gagliano took over the Reina gang and secretly met with Maranzano, promising him that the Reina gangsters would fight on his side in what later became known as the Castellammarese War. These men helped to kill Peter Morello, who had made peace with Masseria years earlier and had become Masseria's top executioner. Maranzano gunmen, including Joe Valachi, Joseph Profaci, Nick Capuzi, and Doyle, waited for weeks near the apartment of another Masseria lieutenant, Steve Ferrigno, for the appearance of Masseria. When Masseria failed to arrive, on November 5, 1930, the Maranzano men saw Ferrigno and Al Mineo emerge from Ferrigno's apartment. They raced forward, firing shotguns, killing both Ferrigno and Mineo. The Mafia war went on for months. Then, in Spring 1931, Luciano made his move, asking to meet Maranzano.

Maranzano arrived at the rendezvous surrounded by a dozen killers. Luciano proposed to kill Masseria himself, but only if Maranzano allowed him to take over Masseria's rackets and work as an underboss to Maranzano and if Maranzano would take no vengeance upon any of Masseria's men. Maranzano agreed to this proposition and Luciano then planned to kill his boss. He knew that invading Masseria's stronghold on Second Avenue was futile. It was a veritable fortress with dozens of armed men on each floor and in the halls of this office building. Luciano decided to lure Masseria to his favorite restaurant, the Nuova Villa Tammaro in Coney Island. The owner of the restaurant, Gerado Scarpato, was an old friend of Masseria's and Masseria would be unguarded in such a friendly atmosphere.

The body of New York gang boss Joe Morello, murdered by Masseria when Joe the Boss seized the rackets in the Lower East Side.

Mafia boss of bosses Salvatore Maranzano, who launched a war against Masseria and was himself murdered in 1931.

Both men arrived at the restaurant on the afternoon of April 15, 1931. Scarpato, told of Masseria's arrival by Luciano, had prepared a feast for the gluttonous Masseria. Joe the Boss was served antipasto, linguine with white clam sauce, lobster, and pastries stuffed with rich cream. He gorged himself, swilling down a bottle of chianti as he ate. Luciano ate sparingly, eyeing his boss. As the restaurant emptied of the afternoon crowd, Luciano ordered a pot of coffee and a deck of cards. Both men began to play pinochle. Then Luciano excused himself, going to the men's room.

Except for a few employees, the restaurant was deserted. Only Masseria sat in the middle of the dining room, drinking coffee. Four men then entered the restaurant—Vito Genovese, Albert Anastasia, Joe Adonis, and one of Luciano's close non-Italian friends, Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel, top killer for Meyer Lansky's Bug and Meyer Mob. The car in which these murderers arrived sat outside the restaurant with Ciro Terranova (1889-1938) behind the wheel. (Terranova was known as "The Artichoke King," in that he had a virtual monopoly on the distribution of artichokes in New York, a delicacy dear to Italians.) This murder squad was made up of members from separate gangs, an international murder squad, so to speak, which Luciano had devised to show Maranzano that all factions had contributed to the death of Masseria in order to keep the peace.

The four men walked wordlessly to Masseria's table, ringing him as he blinked at them, puzzled. They all produced revolvers and began shooting at Masseria, who, this time, dodged no bullets. Six shots proved to be fatal and the squat little gangland boss fell forward, his head crashing onto the table, its white linen cloth turning crimson. Anastasia then walked behind Masseria and fired a shot into the back of his head, the coup de grace. The four killers then walked outside, got into their car, and drove back to Manhattan.

Luciano left the men's room and walked into the dining area to see his boss dead. He called the police and when officers arrived Luciano explained that he had been in the washroom at the time Masseria was shot. "As soon as I finished drying my hands, I hurried out and walked back to see what it was all about," he told detectives. Luciano told unbelieving officers he had no idea who would want to kill his employer. Masseria's murder was listed as unsolved. Luciano would next eliminate Maranzano and then begin to organize the powerful national crime cartel that would be known as the syndicate.

LUCKY TAKES OVER/1930s-1950s

By arranging for the murder of his employer, Joe the Boss, Luciano's underworld status soared. He quickly began to consolidate his forces, nurturing the wild ambition of taking over all the rackets in New York. To achieve this challenging end, the shrewd Luciano would judiciously select from his peers the most ruthless young gangsters in the city, those who shared his dream of a crime syndicate that would not only embrace New York, but the entire country. No New York gangster in the 20th Century was more sinister, crafty, or powerful than the secretive Charles "Lucky" Luciano (Salvatore Lucania; 1897-1962; AKA: Lucky; Charlie Lucky; Charles Ross; Charles Lane; "Three-Twelve").

Among those selected by Luciano to share national underworld power with him—particularly those who would never challenge his position as the "chairman" of the syndicate—was Meyer Lansky, a brilliant criminal with a gift for business and finance; Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, who had taken control of New York's trade unions and, with Joe Adonis and Albert Anastasia, would establish the syndicate's own police force, Murder, Inc.; and Frank Costello, who, with Lansky would organize nationwide gambling, their controlling tentacles reaching into offshore islands like Cuba. Costello would also be the syndicate's liaison and payoff man to hundreds of high-level politicians, judges and police officials protecting the syndicate's myriad operations.

Charles "Lucky" Luciano, who became head of the newly-formed crime syndicate in 1931-32; his drooping right eye was caused by a near-death gangster attack in 1929.

Police photo of Luciano, taken in 1936, five years after he and others established the U.S. national crime syndicate.

The architect of the syndicate, a malignant, far-reaching underworld force that continues to flourish to this day, had inauspicious beginnings. Luciano was born Salvatore Lucania on November 24, 1897, the third child and second son of Antonio and Rosalie (Capporelli) Lucania, in the Sicilian village of Lercara Friddi, near the city of Palermo. In 1906, the family immigrated to the U.S., resettling in the Lower East Side of New York below Fourteenth Street. It was here in this sprawling, teeming district that Luciano grew up, mixing with the Italian-Sicilian gangs and learning how to steal from pushcarts and stores before he was in his teens.

In 1907, a few months after his arrival, Luciano was arrested for shoplifting. He was arrested for theft many times after that up to 1915. In that year, Luciano was arrested for peddling narcotics and was sentenced to a year in prison. At that time, Luciano was a messenger for a member of the Five Points Gang known only as Cherry Nose. He later claimed that he had been given a package by Cherry Nose and told to deliver it to a man in a Bowery saloon. Here he was stopped by an off-duty policeman and the package was inspected. It contained heroin. At his brief trial, Luciano was offered a deal by the prosecuting attorney. If he would identify other members of the dope ring, he would be released. He refused and served his time. For maintaining the Mafia code of omerta (silence), he was made a full-fledged member of the powerful Five Points Gang, when he was released.

Luciano would later change his name from Lucania to Luciano to avoid embarrassing his family, when his name appeared in the newspapers connected with various crimes. As a member of the Five Points Gang, bossed by the "refined" Paul Kelly, Luciano was given an icepick, bat, and gun and came under the direction of Johnny Torrio, who soon left for Chicago to run the rackets overlorded by his uncle, "Big Jim" Colosimo. While Luciano served in the ranks of the Five Points Gang, he met and befriended young thugs like Frankie Yale, Al Capone, and Ciro Terranova. All of these ruthless killers would later rise to prominence in the gangs of the 1920s, Capone becoming the crime czar of Chicago, an unthinkable concept to Luciano at that time since he thought Capone was nothing more than a hulking killer with little intelligence.

The new Five Pointer, proved himself in dozens of gang battles with the rival Monk Eastman gang. He was charged with killing a number of Eastman gunmen, but Luciano always managed to go free for lack of evidence. He spent most of his spare time gambling, his favorite hobby. Whenever he was arrested, Luciano usually gave his profession as "gambler." On other occasions, the gangster said he was a fruit peddler, chauffeur, or salesman. He was usually a winner at cards and craps, so much so that his fellow goons took to calling him "Lucky," a nickname that became permanent. At least, this was one story. Another tale insisted that Luciano acquired this nickname after miraculously surviving a knife attack that almost took his life.

With the considerable money he earned from gambling and through his Five Points activities, Luciano was able to establish his own gang and a new racket by 1920. He extorted regular payments from bordellos by offering them protection from himself and his goons, of course. At first brothel owners refused to pay Luciano's men and the police, but Luciano's strong-arm squads, led by David "Little Davy" Bertillo and Jimmy Frederico, broke up the whorehouses and bruised the madams and their girls. The bordello owners began to pay. Within five years, Luciano was the top mobster in the prostitution racket, controlling vice in Manhattan. Any whoremaster, who refused to pay tribute to Luciano was murdered. This was the fate of Pete Harris who told Luciano's thugs to "go to hell and take that greasy pimp boss of yours with you." Harris was found stabbed to death a few nights later, his body punctured by more than a hundred icepick wounds.

Joe Adonis, Luciano's close associate and fellow board member of the crime syndicate.

Frank Costello, Luciano aide and crime syndicate board member, shown in 1936 NYPD photos.

In the mid-1920s, Luciano actually took over the bordellos himself, one after another, until he controlled the nightly activities of more than 5,000 prostitutes. He offered showgirls only as escorts at varying rates, from $20 to $75 for a night on the town. Attractive call girls were available for all-night assignations for $100. Luciano also offered girls for as cheap as $2 for a half hour's sexual service. He became a millionaire before 1930.

Moving into the Barbizon Plaza, Luciano took a suite of rooms under the name of Charles Lane. He ordered dozens of tailor-made double-breasted suits to drape his five-foot, eight-inch frame. He bought jewelry for his favorite women and gold watches and belt buckles for himself. He later moved to a lavish suite of rooms at the Waldorf-Astoria, where he called himself Charles Ross.

By 1927, Luciano's income was in excess of $1 million a year after expenses but, unlike Al Capone (who later went to prison for income tax evasion), Luciano was careful to file tax returns each year. His stated income never varied from year to year. Each year he claimed to have made $22,500 on wagers and he paid taxes on this amount. Prior to this time, Luciano aligned himself with a labor racket gang headed by Jacob "Little Augie" Orgen. Through this gang he met such up-and-coming gangsters as Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, Jack "Legs" Diamond, and Waxey Gordon and also renewed his acquaintance with Meyer Lansky.

Years earlier, when Luciano was pimping low-class whores on the Lower East Side, he had found one of his girls in a deserted building giving her services for free to a young hoodlum, Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel. He attacked the whore and began beating up Siegel. He was interrupted by a feisty little laborer, who hit him with a monkey wrench. This was a youthful Meyer Lansky, who later teamed up with Siegel to form the Bug and Meyer Mob. It was to Lansky that Luciano first outlined his great plans to some day establish a national crime cartel, an organization that would control all the gangs in all the cities and eliminate constant gang battles. Everyone would benefit, Luciano told Lansky, from the lowliest gunmen or "soldiers," as Luciano termed them, to the directors of the board. Lansky, Frank Costello, Luciano's closest boyhood friend, Joe Adonis, and Buchalter supported this idea. But first, Luciano pointed out, the wild, uncontrollable gangsters like Jack "Legs" Diamond, and Dutch Schultz had to be eliminated.

Jacob "Little Augie" Orgen, who briefly aligned himself with Luciano in taking control of New York unions; he was murdered on October 15, 1927.

At that time, Luciano went to work for Joe "The Boss" Masseria, an old-fashioned Mafia boss, who still practiced the ancient Black Hand racket, although he, like the rest of the crime bosses of New York, had grown enormously wealthy through bootlegging during Prohibition. Masseria appointed Luciano as his top lieutenant in the late 1920s, and he supervised bootlegging, narcotics smuggling, and gambling operations for Joe the Boss.

On October 17, 1929, Luciano was inspecting a load of heroin that had been smuggled off a boat anchored in the Hudson River docks when four men dragged him off a wharf and threw him into a car. The thugs drove slowly through Brooklyn while four men hit Luciano repeatedly with their fists, reducing his face to a bloody pulp. His mouth was then taped and he was thrown to the floor. A goon reached down with a sharp knife and cut his cheeks and throat, barely missing the jugular vein. Another gangster drove an icepick several times into Luciano's back until his expensive suit was rented with holes seeping blood. The car drove to Huguenot Beach on Staten Island, where Luciano was dumped and left for dead. Somehow he survived. A beat cop found him and rushed him to a hospital, where detectives grilled him, asking him to name his assailants. Luciano said he would deal with his attackers without police help.

Luciano explained his kidnaping and attack (without mentioning the heroin shipment), but said he could not identify those who had tried to kill him. "Look, I'm pals with everybody," he stated through a crooked grin. "Nobody's after me. Everybody likes me." In a 1953 interview, Luciano stated that the beating and near-murder was done by policemen, but one report stated that the gangsters who almost killed Luciano were members of the Jack "Legs" Diamond gang. Diamond, who had worked with Luciano in the early 1920s, tried to take over Luciano's prostitution racket and was killed by two unknown gangsters on December 18, 1931, shot to pieces while he was sleeping off a drunk in a cheap Albany, New York, boarding house.

Jack "Legs" Diamond (Moran, 1897-1931), one-time Luciano associate and later mortal enemy.

The Diamond killing was attributed to thugs working for Dutch Schultz. The Dutchman had been warring with Diamond, but some later insisted that Luciano's own men had sought out Diamond to avenge the attack on Luci-ano three years earlier. The truth was that Luciano was attacked by gangsters working for Salvatore Maranzano, who was then warring with Luciano's employer, Joe the Boss Masseria, in what exploded into what was called the Castellammarese War the following year.

In 1930-31, the Castellammarese war broke out in New York in full scale, promoted by Sicilian gang boss Maranzano, who insisted that he be recognized as the Boss of Bosses. Masseria refused to become a vassal to Maranzano and he and Maranzano launched their gangs against each other in a bloody war that took dozens of lives. Luciano was then aligned with Masseria, but he realized that the slaughter had to come to an end before he could put his plan in motion to unify the gangs under his banner of a national crime cartel. He met secretly with Maranzano and agreed to kill Masseria, if Maranzano would call off the war. Maranzano agreed but, as Luciano knew he would, marked the dangerous Luciano for death after he eliminated his own crime boss.

On April 15, 1931, Luciano invited Masseria to his favorite restaurant in Coney Island. After a rich meal and while the restaurant was emptying out, Luciano suggested they play cards. After an hour of card-playing, making sure that the place was empty of customers, Luciano excused himself and went to the washroom. While he waited inside the men's room, four killers, Albert Anastasia, Vito Genovese, Joe Adonis, and Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel, entered the restaurant and shot the startled Masseria to death as he sat at the table. Only hours later Luciano was making peace with Maranzano, but he knew this tough old Mafia boss would not rest until he also killed Luciano and his top aides. Luciano struck first, sending a troop of his own killers to Maranzano's Manhattan offices, where the so-called Boss of Bosses was stabbed and shot to death on September 10, 1931. This killing ended the Castellammarese War.

Luciano then busied himself with consolidating the

New York's upscale Waldorf-Astoria, between 49 and 50th Streets, where Luciano occupied a suite of rooms; he made millions by overlording national prostitution

forces of both Maranzano and Masseria, along with the non-Italian gangs in New York. He quickly divided up the rackets. Buchalter was given control of the garment industry and many unions. Lansky was made overlord of gambling. Luciano, of course, held on to prostitution. Others, such as Dutch Schultz, were allowed to hold on to their bootlegging territories, but when Schultz, in 1935, against the dictates of the syndicate, decided to murder District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey, who was probing into the Dutchman's affairs, Luciano, Lansky, Buchalter, Costello, and other board members of the syndicate voted to have Schultz murdered. The Dutchman was shot to death along with several of his henchmen in a New Jersey restaurant, purged by a crime organization that would no longer tolerate independent gangsters who jeopardized their syndicate operations.

Gay Orlova, one of Luciano's women.

Luciano (second from right) on trial for prostitution in 1936; a number of his disgruntled prostitutes testified against him, describing how he controlled bordellos in many major cities.

Humphrey Bogart is a prosecutor and Bette Davis a fallen "hostess" in the 1937 film Marked Woman, a movie based upon Luciano's rackets.

By the time Dutch Schultz was killed, Luciano had emerged as the Boss of Bosses, the top syndicate leader in the U.S., wielding more power than any man before him. He lived like a prince at the Waldorf, bought a string of racehorses, and traveled about in chauffeur-driven limousines. There was always a steady stream of women visiting Luciano's Waldorf suite, and these included singer-dancer Gay Orlova (Luciano called her "Gay All Over"), call girl Nancy Presser, and a worn-out prostitute named Cokey Flo, whose real name was Florence Brown. He paid these women hundreds of dollars for their visits and then sent them back to work at the bordellos he owned and operated. Luciano enjoyed New York's night life, visiting the Cotton Club, the Villanova on Sixth Avenue, Dave's Blue Room on Seventh, the Paradise, and the Hollywood off Broadway. He was treated like royalty and his every whim was indulged.

Though police and federal agents knew that Luciano was the top crime boss in New York, they could not prove his involvement in the many rackets he controlled. He seldom left his suite at the Waldorf, where he was visited many times by Albert Anastasia, who operated Murder, Inc., the syndicate's enforcement arm; Buchalter, who directed the garment industry rackets and bossed Anastasia and his troop of professional killers; and Meyer Lansky, who had become the syndicate's banker, cleverly washing millions from its illegal rackets through foreign banks and overseeing national gambling operations with Frank Costello.

Joseph "Socks" Lanza controlled New York's waterfront, preventing sabotage during World War II, a deal that brought about Luciano's prison release.

Luciano (center) is shown under arrest in Havana in 1947; he was deported back to Italy, having secretly smuggled himself into Cuba for a top level crime syndicate meeting, where he clashed with Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel.

Siegel defied Luciano and was marked for murder.

Whenever Luciano wanted to send a message to anyone in his far-flung operations, he strolled from his suite, careful not to use phones he rightly believed were tapped, and walked to a nearby drugstore at Forty-Ninth and Seventh streets, where he spoke briefly to owner Moe Ducore, who, in turn, passed along Luciano's orders. When Luciano felt compelled to use his Waldorf phone, he used an elaborate code system in relaying his directives, identifying himself as simply "Three-Twelve," numbers that corresponded to the letters in the alphabet that were his initials.

Following the murder of Dutch Schultz on October 23, 1935, District Attorney Dewey turned his full attention to Luciano. He probed the vice king's rackets and caused Luciano to flee to Hot Springs, Arkansas. As the hunt went on for the crime boss, Dewey told the press that Lucky Luciano was "Public Enemy Number One in New York and the man who succeeded Al Capone in the West." Police brought in Nancy Presser, Florence Brown, and other women, who knew about Luciano's prostitution empire. They were an embittered lot, having paid off the "King of the Pimps" for almost a decade. They began to talk, providing enough evidence for a grand jury to indict Luciano on ninety counts of extortion and direction of harlotry. After a tough legal fight, Dewey was able to extradite Luciano from Arkansas and place him on trial. All of Luciano's millions could not prevent his conviction. He was sent to Clinton Prison at Dannemora to serve from thirty to fifty years.

Luciano was the first of the board of directors of the syndicate to fall. Buchalter would be next, going to the electric chair for murder in 1944. By that time Luciano had applied twice for parole—in 1938 and again in 1942—his appeals denied on both occasions. Then the huge luxury liner Normandie blew up at a Hudson pier in 1942 as it was being refitted as a troop ship. Officers for the U.S. Navy Intelligence worked furiously to increase waterfront security. They went to Joseph "Socks" Lanza, Mafia union boss of the waterfront, but he refused to cooperate. He mentioned Luciano's name, simply stating: "See Lucky." The Navy men then visited Luciano in prison, where he was overlording his rackets from his prison cell.

Luciano told them that he would "send out the word" to Lanza to prevent sabotage on the waterfront and stabilize conditions there. He reportedly did, and the following year, Navy officers went back to Clinton Prison to visit Luciano once more, asking him to contact the Mafia dons of Sicily and ask them to cooperate with the impending Allied invasion of that island, or so the story goes. Luciano, in turn, sent word to Mafia don Calogero Vizzini in Palermo, asking him to help U.S. and British forces once they had invaded Sicily. According to later reports, Vizzini's men guided Allied forces through mountain passes and across dangerous rivers, as well as informing intelligence agents on the locations of enemy troops and fortified positions.

As part of a so-called deal between Luciano and the U.S. military, the syndicate boss was to be released in exchange for this cooperation during World War II. Luciano was released from prison by the New York State Prison Parole Board in 1945. He was set free, but only on the condition that he accept

The exiled Luciano dancing with an unknown woman at a party in Rome in 1949; he was still in control of the U.S. crime syndicate.

Homebody Luciano, shown with his mistress, Igea Lissoni and dog, relaxing in his home in Naples, Italy on November 27, 1954.

January 26, 1962: The body of Lucky Luciano—known as "King of the Pimps," is removed from the Naples Airport, where he died of a heart attack, while greeting a film producer who hoped to make a film about him. A federal agent commented at the time: "He was nothing but a murderous whoremaster."

deportation to Italy. Luciano boarded the Liberty Ship Laura Keane on February 10, 1946, and sailed to Naples. Frank Costello and Meyer Lansky saw him off at the dock, promising that his interests in the U.S. would be protected and he would go on receiving his enormous share of the profits from the crime syndicate he had created a decade earlier. Upon his arrival in Italy, Luciano moved to Rome, where he occupied a posh suite in the regal Quirinale Hotel. Here he was entertained by a bevy of beautiful women and was waited on hand and foot by private servants. It was alleged that Luciano had secreted millions in Italy before the war and he now spent this money freely in his forced retirement.

Exile rankled Luciano, and he soon slipped out of Italy, flying to Havana, Cuba, in February 1947. There he met with Lansky, Siegel, Costello, and many other high-ranking syndicate leaders, who all came to pay him homage. Havana was a safe city, where Lansky controlled all the gambling casinos, splitting the profits with the corrupt Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista. Luciano's meeting with Bugsy Siegel was a stormy one. Luciano told Siegel that the new casino Siegel had constructed in Las Vegas had cost him and his partners too much money and he wanted to know when he and his associates would be repaid. Siegel, always emotional and mercurial, told Luciano that he would be paid when Siegel was "damned good and ready" to pay him. Luciano and Siegel began shouting at each other and Siegel marched out of Luciano's swanky Havana hotel suite. Despite the pleas of Siegel's mentor, Meyer Lansky, "Bugsy" was murdered on Luciano's orders a few months later.

A reporter from Havana's daily newspaper Tiempo de Cuba noticed the stream of gangsters going to Luciano's suite and broke the story that the crime czar was in Cuba, despite U.S. orders that he was never again to appear in the western hemisphere. Washington officials soon pressured Batista into forcing Luciano back to Italy. The irate and insulted gangster was hustled aboard a steamer, Bakir, and sailed slowly away, traveling to Brazil and Venezuela. Both these South American countries refused Luciano entry visas and he was ordered back to Italy. He returned to Italy to be told by government officials that he had embarrassed Italy by flying illegally to Cuba. The government was also alarmed over the fact that Luciano had already set up a crime syndicate in Rome. He was barred from that city for life and ordered to remain in Naples.

Luciano remained in Naples, a retired prince of crime. He spent his days reading newspapers and going for long walks, then dining in the city's best restaurants. In the late 1950s and early 1960s, he took to giving interviews to curious newsmen. He even threatened to write his memoirs. He even thought he might marry his devoted mistress, Igea Lissoni, who was often photographed with the once-powerful Mafia boss. He remained in considerable power in the U.S., however, through the auspices of Costello and Lansky, despite the efforts of Vito Genovese to usurp Luciano's long-distance authority in the early 1960s.

There was little for the gang boss to do. He helped new syndicate bosses establish a drug smuggling network that stretched into Lebanon and he talked about an epic movie that would be made of his life, a life he now looked back upon as noble and heroic, when it was truly little more than six decades filled with unspeakable murders, torture, and vile racketeering. Luciano began corresponding with a Hollywood film producer to discuss the possibilities of making a movie about his life.

On January 26, 1962, Luciano went to Capodichino Airport in Naples to greet the film producer, who had flown from the U.S. to confer with him. Lucky Luciano stepped from his limousine and began walking across the runway toward the producer, his arm outstretched for a handshake, a wide smile on his puffy face. His features were suddenly twisted in a painful expression. Luciano grabbed his shirtfront and he then fell to the paved runway, dead of a heart attack.

DUTCH SCHULTZ GOES "ON THE SPOT"/ 1935

At the time Luciano was assembling the gang leaders of New York for his crime syndicate in the early 1930s, he apprehensively appointed a volatile and wholly unpredictable gang leader named Dutch Schultz to his board of directors. The cool-headed and usually reserved Luciano had deep concerns about Schultz from the beginning, knowing that of all the leading members of the new crime cartel, Schultz would be the most unmanageable. He was not a German, as his criminal nickname suggested, but a stubborn-headed Jewish gangster, who possessed just as much cunning and guile as Luciano and his Sicilian cohorts. He was also an impulsive killer, who murdered anyone challenging his authority or encroached upon his widespread rackets.

Luciano had difficulty with Schultz right from the beginning and the problems between them increased until Luciano, Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, Meyer Lansky, Frank Costello and other syndicate board members decided that Schultz threatened the very existence of their infant cartel. In one of the strangest maneuvers ever exercised by members of organized crime in America, the board members voted to have Schultz killed in order to save the life of a man dedicated to their destruction.

This murder-marked man was, indeed, one of their own, brought up in the same crime-ridden streets that had nurtured them all, and who had slugged and killed his way to power, as had his fellow syndicate board members. Unlike his peers, however, Dutch Schultz gave only lip service instead of loyalty to the new crime syndicate and put himself above the authority of the syndicate's board, defying its edicts and sealing his early death at age thirty-two.

Born Arthur Flegenheimer (or Fleggenheimer) on August 6, 1902, to Emma and Herman Flegenheimer, Dutch Schultz (1902-1935) grew up in the Bronx and attended public school through the fourth grade and then dropped out. He joined the Bergen Gang of pickpockets and store thieves and was soon looting the pockets of the unsuspecting and the counters of small shops. Schultz's father deserted the family when Schultz was fourteen. His mother, doting and kindly, took in washing to keep her son in good clothes and pocket money. She lectured him about returning to school, and even had the local principal visit him. The principal, Dr. J. F. Condon, could not persuade him to leave the streets. Condon, ironically, became a player in one of the greatest crimes of the century, serving as a go-between in the sensational Lindbergh kidnaping of 1932.

Millionaire bootlegger Dutch Schultz (center), a stubborn gangster who vowed to kill New York District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey.

Schultz was a hopeless case. Instead of picking up his school books, he began carrying a set of burglar's tools, and he briefly worked as a printer to establish a cover for his illegal activities. For three years, Schultz committed many holdups and burglaries. The blue-eyed, five-foot-nine-inch Schultz, at age seventeen, was arrested for burglary in 1919. Convicted, he was sent to prison for fifteen months. He served the full time and emerged an even tougher hoodlum, one who had acquired a bloodlust and an ambition that would lead him into many gang wars, a personal fortune of millions of dollars, and a premature, bullet-ridden death.

A few months after his release from prison, Schultz purchased a sprawling Bronx saloon with the loot of several recent robberies. He announced that he was to be called Dutch Schultz, the name of a once-feared gangster who had led the Frog Hollow Gang in the Bronx before the turn of the century. Schultz began to put together a gang of some of the toughest criminals in the Bronx, including Joey Rao, George and Abe "Bo" Weinberg, Julie Martin, Abe Landau, and Lulu Rosencranz. At the beginning of Prohibition, Schultz quickly realized that a fortune awaited those who peddled beer and liquor. He opened several more saloons and supplied them with hijacked whiskey, smuggled liquor from Canada and Europe, and his homemade brew, which was considered to be the worst needle beer in the Bronx.

A homebody, Schultz married a quiet, unassuming woman. His wife, Frances Flegenheimer, proved to be a tolerant spouse, who never interfered with her husband's illegal and lethal business. As Schultz's bootleg empire spread throughout the Bronx and into Manhattan, many rival gang members were eliminated by Schultz gunmen, including the Shapiro Brothers and the Amberg Brothers. During the late 1920s, Schultz branched out into other rackets, especially after he discovered that the numbers racket, also called policy, was reaping millions in Harlem and elsewhere. Schultz and his men approached Stephanie St. Clair, the queen of numbers in Harlem, and told her that she had to either turn over her operations to them, or be killed. St. Clair capitulated, causing all the other Harlem policy kings to fall into the Schultz camp.

By 1930, Schultz was reaping millions from his vast bootlegging activities and the Harlem numbers game. Everyone played every day, spending nickels and dimes on the chance that their number might come up. Next Schultz went into the slot machine business with Frank Costello and Joey Rao. The Schultz gang, by then numbering in the scores, distributed slot machines throughout New York City, and more millions poured into the Schultz coffers. To protect his sprawling underworld kingdom, Schultz hired top gunmen like Jack "Legs" Diamond (1897-1931) and Vincent Coll. Diamond had a gang of his own and a large slice of the best Manhattan territory for his bootlegging operations, but he and his men worked in liaison with Schultz. Coll and a group of younger hoodlums began as errand boys and soon were delivering Schultz beer and liquor to hundreds of speakeasies.

Schultz (left) with his slavish criminal defense attorney, Julius Richard "Dixie" Davis, who reportedly helped the Dutchman organize his vast underworld empire.

Stephanie St. Clair, the numbers queen of Harlem; Schultz killed her runners, stole her million-dollar racket, and gave her a small share to maintain operations.

By 1930, Schultz began to have serious trouble with Diamond. Schultz's beer trucks began to disappear with alarming regularity, and Schultz learned that Diamond, who had quit some time earlier, was behind the hijackings. A gang war erupted, and several members of the Schultz and Diamond gangs were taken for the traditional one-way rides, their bodies dumped throughout Manhattan and the Bronx. The war finally ended with Diamond's demise.

Diamond, the wiry gang leader, had been shot so many times that the press had dubbed him "the Clay Pigeon of the Underworld." After surviving many attempts on his life, Diamond's luck ran out on December 18, 1931. Diamond had recently been acquitted of a kidnaping charge and had celebrated most of the evening with his wife and relatives, and later, his showgirl mistress, Marion "Kiki" Roberts. He arrived drunk at his Albany, New York, rooming house and collapsed into bed. Abe "Bo" Weinberg and Julie Martin reportedly trailed Diamond that night and followed him to his room. The two Schultz gunmen kicked open the door to Diamond's bedroom and fired fourteen shots, killing him. When the press caught up with Schultz to ask him about the demise of his long-standing enemy, the gang lord barked: "Diamond was just another punk with his hands in my pockets." (Another report insisted that Diamond had been killed on orders of Lucky Luciano and by Luciano's own men, in retaliation for a knife attack by Diamond thugs that almost took Luciano's life three years earlier.)

Schultz boasted over the years that he paid his men well and cut them in on many of his rackets. He could therefore not abide any of their stealing from him. His position was emphasized by his lickspittle lawyer, Julius Richard "Dixie" Davis, who once stated: "You can insult Arthur's girl, spit in his face, push him around and he'll laugh. But don't steal a dollar from his accounts. If you do, you're dead."

In 1931, Vincent Coll, his brother, Peter Coll, and others, attempted to do just that. They began beating up speakeasy owners, who bought Schultz beer and liquor, and Coll ordered them to take his own booze and beer. Coll invaded Schultz's numbers rackets and then boasted that he intended to take over Schultz's entire $20 million-a-year empire. Though hopelessly outnumbered, Coll and his gang of about ten men began killing Schultz's top lieutenants. While trying to machine-gun Joey Rao to death on a crowded Manhattan street on June 28, 1931, Coll and others fired hundreds of rounds at the fleeing Schultz gunman. They wounded several passersby and killed a child, 5-year-old Michael Vengalli, a senseless slaying that earned Coll the sobriquet "Mad Dog."

In June 1931, Schultz, accompanied by his bodyguard, Danny Iamascia, spotted two figures lurking in the shadows of Trusted Schultz gunman Abe "Bo" Weinberg, who betrayed his boss and was killed by the Dutchman.

Trusted Schultz gunman Jules Martin, who also betrayed Schultz and was shot to death by the Dutchman.

an alley as he walked along a Manhattan street. Schultz thought the men were the Coll Brothers, and he and Iamascia drew their guns and began firing at the two men, who also drew guns and returned the fire. The men in the alley proved to be two NYPD detectives, Steve DiRosa and Julius Salke, who had been tailing the booze baron. Iamascia fell mortally wounded. Schultz, realizing that he was alone and that his adversaries were advancing upon him, threw away his gun and raced down the street. DiRosa ran after him, tackling him in an alley.

When DiRosa identified himself to Schultz as a police detective, the gang leader yanked $18,600 from his pocket and offered it to DiRosa to let him go free. "Here, take it all!" Schultz told him.

DiRosa exploded: "You miserable bum! I'll shove that dough down your throat!" He knocked Schultz to the pavement and leaped on him. When Detective Sergeant Salke rushed up, he found DiRosa attempting to jam the wad of money into Schultz's mouth. Schultz was later booked for attempted murder, resisting arrest, and carrying a concealed weapon, but the reliable Dixie Davis soon had him released on bail and through one of the dozens of judges on Schultz's payroll, he was later released.

The cause of Schultz's apprehensions, Vincent "Mad Dog" Coll, for whom he mistook Detective DiRosa, continued to plague Schultz. So Schultz devised a clever murder plan to rid himself of "the Mick," as Schultz often called Coll. In 1932, one of Schultz's men trailed Coll for weeks and discovered that Coll made most of his business calls from a phone booth inside a drugstore on West Twenty-Third Street. Coll was busy blackmailing and extorting Owney "The Killer" Madden, kidnaping Big Frenchy DeMange, Madden's partner, and dealing on the drugstore phone for the ransom money.

During one of these kidnaping calls, Schultz's man spotted Coll in the phone booth and immediately called Abe "Bo" and George Weinberg. The two gunmen brothers, accompanied by two other men, drove up to the drugstore and parked at the curb. The Weinberg brothers entered the drugstore. As George herded the clerk behind the counter and two patrons into a back room, Abe pulled a submachine gun from beneath his long coat and opened up on the phone booth, sending ribbons of fire through it. Dozens of steel-jacketed .45-caliber bullets smashed the glass door and riddled Coll, who crumpled dead inside the booth.

Bootlegger Jack "Legs" Diamond (center), under arrest in 1929, became a Schultz rival and was reportedly murdered in 1931 by the Dutchman's gunmen.

No sooner had Schultz eliminated this last rival than he was faced with income tax evasion. The state of New York claimed he owed millions in back taxes. Dixie Davis, Schultz's lawyer, managed to get a change of venue to a small town in upstate New York. Next, Schultz hired a public relations firm that made a great show of giving large donations from Schultz to local charities. Frances joined her husband, and the two played the part of the happily married couple, attending small town dances, bingo parties, and currying the favor of local authorities. Within a week, Schultz was known in town as a "nice guy."

One admirer asked Schultz why he was wearing such cheap suits, a man of his wealth. Why did he not wear tailor-made pin-stripe suits and silk shirts. "Such displays are vulgar," Schultz said, pretending to be the down-home type. "Personally I think only queers wear silk shirts....I never bought one in my life. A guy's a sucker to spend $15 or $20 on a shirt. Hell, a guy can get a good one for two bucks." The gullible rural jury that sat in judgment of Schultz pronounced him not guilty of tax evasion, and he quickly returned to his rackets.

By then there were fewer rackets left in his control. Charles "Lucky" Luciano and Vito Genovese, who had long coveted Vincent "Mad Dog" Coll, who first worked for Schultz, then became his gang rival.

British-born bootlegger Owen "Owney" Madden, paid $50,000 for the safe return of his aide, DeMange.

Big Frenchy DeMange, lieutenant of gang leader Owney Madden, who was kidnapped by Coll and held for ransom.

"Mad Dog" Coll (right) celebrated his payoff from Madden for the DeMange kidnapping by posing on a Coney Island set with members of his gang (left to right), Arthur Palumbo, brother Peter Coll and gun moll Lottie Kreisberger.

Schultz's numbers rackets among other enterprises, had moved in while he was battling against a conviction in upstate New York, and seized many of his operations. Schultz Lieutenant Abe "Bo" Weinberg had been a willing pawn in the hands of Luciano, helping the Italians to take over a good portion of the Schultz empire. Weinberg had been apprehensive over this takeover. "What if Schultz comes back?" he had reportedly asked Luciano.

"That loudmouth is never coming back," Luciano told Weinberg, but Schultz, to everyone's surprise, was soon back in Manhattan bragging about his acquittal and how he had hoodwinked a small town jury. When he discovered that Luciano and Genovese had siphoned off a large section of his numbers racket, he ordered his most trusted aide exterminated. Abe "Bo" Weinberg was stabbed to death, his body thrown in a river.

Rather than go to war with the powerful forces of Luciano and Genovese, Schultz relocated his headquarters from the Bronx to Newark, New Jersey. He began to rebuild his rackets and beef up his underworld legions. By this time, the national crime syndicate had been born, with Luciano, Genovese, Costello, Meyer Lansky, Albert Anastasia, Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, and others controlling nationwide rackets. Schultz was too powerful a figure to ignore, even in decline, so he was made a member of the board of directors. He was argumentative and truculent, ignoring the common good of the syndicate in favor of his own rackets.

By 1935, Schultz's underworld operations were being scrutinized by New York District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey, who, with the backing of New York's colorful mayor, Fiorello LaGuardia, systematically destroyed Schultz's slot machine empire. These machines were gathered up by the hundreds by raiding police squads, then dumped onto barges docked in the East River, where, in a great show of civic responsibility, they were smashed with sledgehammers. Mayor LaGuardia himself took great pleasure in being photographed, while swinging a sledgehammer at these machines. So devastating was Dewey's attack on Schultz's slot machine operations that Schultz's partners, Frank Costello and Phillip "Dandy Phil" Kastel, moved their entire organization to Louisiana, shipping thousands of slot machines from New York to New Orleans, where the corrupt dictator of the state, Huey Long, shared with them the enormous spoils produced by the "one-armed bandits."

The destruction of his slot-machine empire enraged Schultz, who began making plans to murder Dewey. He brought the matter before the crime syndicate board. Elder statesman Johnny Torrio told Schultz that his plan was insane. "You

Coll shakes hands with his famous criminal attorney, Samuel Leibowitz (1893-1978, who later became a judge), after being acquitted of killing a little boy, while attempting to gun down a rival gangster.

Police carry the body of "Mad Dog" Coll from a New York drugstore; the gangster was shot to pieces by Schultz gunmen while inside a phone booth in 1932.

Schultz (right) shakes hands with his attorney after being acquitted of income tax evasion in Malone, New York; the Dutchman played the common man during his trial, going to church and donating to local charities.

Lulu Rosencrantz, Schultz gunman, who would be killed with his boss in 1935.

Abe Landau, Schultz gunman; he, too, would die with Schultz in 1935.

can't go around bumping off big shots like him, Schultz," Torrio said.

"It will bring down the heat on all of us," Luciano added. Luciano, however, had thought seriously about doing the same thing. Dewey had been probing Luciano's far flung prostitution operations and was building a case against him that would later result in a conviction and a long prison term. But at the time, Luciano preferred a subtler approach. Joe Adonis, who had taken over many of Schultz's rackets in the Bronx, told Schultz the syndicate would not approve of his killing Dewey. One by one the board members lined up with Torrio, Luciano, and Adonis. Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, who controlled the powerful trade unions and whose status on the board was that of co-chairman with Luciano, explicitly told Schultz to "forget that crazy idea. Bumping Dewey would be like setting fire to everything we have."

Mrs. Arthur Flegenheimer, who told the press that her homebody husband, Schultz, was "a good man, who never hurt anyone."

Schultz exploded, reportedly shouting at these powerful underworld bosses: "You guys stole my rackets and now you're feeding me to the law! Dewey's gotta go! He's my nemesis! He's gotta go! I'm hitting him myself and in forty-eight hours!" With that Dutch Schultz stormed out of the meeting.

The syndicate board was stunned. Their edict had been ignored, and their authority had been challenged by the maverick Schultz. Albert Anastasia, the newly appointed head of Murder, Inc., was quickly consulted. Murder, Inc., was the enforcement arm of the syndicate, its job being to liquidate any unruly member, who went against syndicate decisions. The board voted to kill Schultz, to preserve its rackets and avoid a law-and-order crusade that would see the infant syndicate's destruction, which would undoubtedly occur if Dewey were killed. Here was one of the great ironies in the history of American organized crime, that its leaders voted to save the life of one of its sworn enemies and take the life of one of its own crime czars. Anastasia promised the board that Schultz would be dead that night, October 23, 1935.

That evening Dutch Schultz and three of his minions gathered in the back room of the Palace Chophouse in Newark, New Jersey. Schultz outlined his plans for killing Dewey to Otto "Abbadabba" Berman, his accountant, a wizard with figures, which explained his unusual sobriquet. Berman was opposed to the murder of Dewey, but Schultz brushed aside his objections. His two top gunmen, Abe Landau and Lulu Rosencranz, listened avidly to their boss' plan to ambush Dewey outside his home. While Schultz was going over the murder plans, a car drove up to the curb outside the chophouse. Inside sat Emmanuel "Mendy" Weiss, Charles "The Bug" Workman, and a man later identified only as Piggy. Because Piggy was not known to Schultz, Weiss and Workman sent him into the restaurant-saloon to see if the Dutchman was present. He returned to the street within a few minutes, saying: "He's in there and he's got some men with him."

Brothel owner Polly Adler; Schultz was one of her customers, reading the books of Scott Fitzgerald and Ernest Hemingway in her library.

Crusading New York District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey (right), with Assistant Prosecutor Murray Gurfein, arrive at the County Court House in 1935 to press more charges against Schultz; he would later go after Luciano and Murder, Inc.

Workman, a cold-blooded member of the New Jersey branch of Murder, Inc., turned to Weiss and Piggy and said: "You guys wait here. I'll hit those guys alone." He sauntered into the Chophouse. The bar was deserted, and Workman pulled out two .38-caliber revolvers. He waved the terrified bartender into a side room, then stopped before the men's room. Workman pushed open the door and saw a heavyset man he did not recognize washing his hands, but he took no chances. Workman shot the startled man twice, then wheeled around and raced to the rear of the saloon, firing both revolvers, hitting Landau, Berman, and Rosencranz several times.

Workman, looking over the fallen gangsters, realized that Schultz was not among them. He returned to the washroom to see the man inside slumped to the floor, apparently dead. The Bug rifled his pockets, taking thousands of dollars in cash, and fled the restaurant. Once on the street, Workman saw that both Piggy and Weiss had fled. He began running and did not arrive at his New York hideout until hours later. Weiss later claimed that Piggy had panicked as he sat behind the wheel of the getaway car and had simply driven off. He then went inside and saw the three dying men in the rear of the restaurant and left, not knowing that Workman was inside the washroom, stealing Schultz's bankroll.

Workman later complained to syndicate board members that his fellow killers had deserted him, and he demanded that they be punished. Weiss was exonerated in that he had checked on Workman and then left and, had Workman not stopped to take Schultz's money, he could have left with Weiss. Piggy was another matter. The minor hoodlum was found a week later and taken to a remote spot in Brownsville, where he was tortured, shot, and his body set afire for betraying the mob. His killers were Murder, Inc. slayers Abe "Kid Twist" Reles, Harry "Pittsburgh Phil" Strauss, and Harry "Happy" Maione.

Some of Schultz's gunmen and policy runners are shown in a paddy wagon, headed for Dewey's office; raids like this enraged the Dutchman, who vowed to kill Dewey, in defiance of the syndicate board members, who then ordered Schultz and his gang massacred.

But thorough as Workman was purported to be, none of his victims died immediately. The mortally wounded Rosencranz, Landau, and Berman, along with Schultz, were rushed to the Newark City Hospital, where they died within hours, one after another. Schultz lingered the longest, raving incoherently with bullets in his back and side. More than 500 cubic centimeters of blood were given to him in massive, useless transfusions. Police officers kept a vigil at his bedside, trying to learn the name of the killer, who had so boldly invaded the Palace Chophouse. Police stenographer F. J. Long wrote down every senseless word Schultz uttered, a fascinating litany of paranoia, power, and fear.

"George, don't make no full moves," raved Schultz. "What have you done with him? Oh mama, mama, mama. Oh, stop it, stop it; oh, oh, oh. Sure, sure mama. Now listen, Phil" [perhaps referring to Dandy Phil Kastel, Schultz's slot machine partner], "fun is fun. Ah, please, papa. What happened to the sixteen? Oh, oh, he done it, please. John, please, oh, did you buy the hotel? You promised a million, sure. Get out! Sure, I wished I knew. Please, make it quick, fast, and furious. Please, fast and furious. Please help me get out. I am getting my wind back, thank God. Please, please, oh please. You will have to please tell him, you got no case. You get ahead with the dot-dash system. Didn't I speak that time last night? Whose number is that in your pocketbook, Phil, 13780. Who was it? Oh, please, please reserve decision! Police, police, Henry and Frankie. Oh, oh, dog biscuits and when he is happy he doesn't get snappy ... please, please. Henry and Frankie, you didn't meet him, you didn't even meet me. The glove will fit what I say..."

The interior of the Palace Chop House in Newark, New Jersey, shown a short time after Schultz and gang members were killed on the night of October 23, 1935.

At this point Police Sergeant L. Conlon tried to interrogate Schultz in an effort to pinpoint the identity of his killer. "Who shot you?" Conlon asked the crime czar several times.

"The boss himself," replied Schultz.

"He did?"

"Yeah, I dunno."

"What did he shoot you for?"

"I showed him boss. Did you hear me meet him? An appointment. Appeal stuck. All right, mother."

"Was it the boss that shot you?"

"Who shot me? No one."

"We will help you."

"Will you get me up? Okay, I won't be such a big creep. Oh, mama, I can't go through with it. Oh, please, and then he clips me. C'mon, cut that out! We don't owe a nickel. Hold it, instead hold it against him. I am a pretty good pretzler. Winnifred. Department of Justice. I even get it from the department. Sir, please stop. Say, listen last night!"

"Don't holler," Conlon told the dying gangster.

"I don't want to holler."

"What did they shoot you for?"

"I don't know, sir. Honestly, I don't. I don't even know who was with me, honestly. I went to the toilet. I was in the toilet and when I reach the boy came at me."

"The big fellow gave it to you."

"Yes, he gave it to me."

"Do you know who the big fellow was?"

"No." Schultz then slipped back into delirium. "If we wanted to break the ring...I will be checked and double checked and please pull for me. Will you pull? How many good ones and how many bad ones? Please, I had nothing with him. He was a cowboy in one of the seven days a week fight. No business. No hangouts. No friends. Nothing. Just what you pick up and what you need. I don't know who shot me. Don't put anyone near this check...In the olden days they waited and waited. Please give me shot...It is from the factory...I don't want harmony. I want harmony...

"No, no. There are only ten of us. There are ten million fighting somewhere of you, so get your onions up and we will throw up the truce flag...Police are here...Communistic strike...baloney honestly, this is a habit I get. Sometimes I give it and sometimes I don't. Oh, I am still in. That settles it. Are you sure? Please let me get in and eat. Let him harness himself to you and then bother you.

Opposite Page: Dead in the Palace Chop House: The body of Schultz gunman Lulu Rosencrantz.

The bodies of Schultz aides, Otto "Abbadabba" Berman and (foreground) Abe Landau, shown in the morgue after the shooting at the Chop House.

"Please don't ask me to go there. I don't want to. I still don't want him in the path. It is no use to stage a riot. The sidewalk was in trouble and the bears were in trouble, and I broke it up. Please put me in that room. Please keep him in control. My gilt-edged stuff and those dirty rats have turned in. Please, mother, don't tear, don't rip! That is something that shouldn't be spoken about. Please get me up, my friends. Please look out. The shooting is a bit wild and that kind of shooting saved a man's life!

"No payrolls, no walls, no coupons. That would be entirely out. Pardon me, I forgot. I forgot that I am plaintiff and not defendant. Look out, look out for him, please! He owes me money; he owes everyone money. Why can't he just pull out and give me control? Please, mother, you pick up now. You know me. No, don't scare me. My friends and I think I do a better job. Police are looking for you all over. Be instrumental in letting us know. They are Englishmen" [here Schultz may have been referring to New York gangster Owney "The Killer" Madden, who was born in England]. "They are a type and I don't know who is best, they or us. Oh, sir, get the doll a roofing. You can play jacks and girls do that with a soft ball and do tricks with it. It takes all events into consideration. No! No! And it is no! A boy has never wept nor dashed a thousand kim. [This particular evocative and alliterative remark would fascinate criminologists for generations to come.] Did you hear me?"

Conlon was persistent: "Who shot you?"

"I don't know," Schultz said, coming out of the stupor for a few moments.

"The doctor wants you to lie quiet."

"That is what I want to do."

"How many shots were fired?"

"I don't know."

"How many?"

"Two thousand. Come on, get some money in that treasury! Come on, please, get it. I can't tell you to. That is not what you have in the book. Oh, please, warden. What am I going to do for the money? Please put me up on my feet at once! You are a hard-boiled man. Did you hear me? I would hear it, the Circuit Court would hear it and the Supreme Court might hear it. If that ain't the payroll. Please crack down on the Chinaman's [Charles "Chink" Sherman, a Schultz gang rival] friends and Hitler's commander. I am sore and I am going up and I am going to give you honey, if I can. Mother is the best bet and don't let Satan draw you too fast."

A fatally-wounded Dutch Schultz, a leaking bullet hole in his left side, looks over the damage from the shooting at the Palace Chop House, shot by his killer while in the men's room.

Schultz, shown in that last few minutes of life, raved about his underworld career, mixing threats and pleadings, his fascinating monolog recorded by a police stenographer.

Conlon doggedly probed Schultz's stupor in an attempt to get the identity of his killer, asking once again: "What did the big fellow shoot you for?"

"Him? John?" [A possible reference to Johnny Torrio]. "Over a million, five million dollars."

"You want to get well, don't you?" Conlon asked the gangster.

"Yes."

"Then lie quiet."

"Yes, I will lie quiet."

"John shot you and we will take care of John," Conlon said, trying to draw out the killer's name.

"That is what caused the trouble. Look out! If you do this, you can go and jump right here in the lake. I know who they are. They are French people" [a possible reference to Big Frenchy DeMange, Owney Madden's partner]. "All right, look out, look out! My memory is gone. A work relief. Police. Who gets it? I don't know and I don't want to know, but look out! It can be traced. He changed for the worse. Please look out. My fortunes have changed and come back and went back since that. I was desperate. I am wobbly. You ain't got nothing on him but we got it on his helper."

"Control yourself," Conlon told him.

"But I am dying," Schultz said, staring into the policeman's eyes.

"No, you are not," Conlon lied.

"Come on, mama. All right, dear. You have to get in."

Schultz's wife entered the room and sat next to her dying husband. He barely recognized her, saying: "Then pull me out. I am half crazy. They dyed my shoes. Give me something. I am so sick. Give me water, the only thing that I want. Open this up and break it so that I can touch you."

"This is Frances, Arthur," Schultz's wife said.

He did not recognize her. "Dannie [Iamascia], please let me get into the car!"

Frances left the hospital room weeping. She was told that her husband would most likely die at any time. Schultz sank deeper into his trauma, babbling as if to keep himself alive with the sound of his own voice, which tumbled forth distorted memory and images, fusing incoherent recollections.

"Who shot you?" Conlon started all over again.

"I don't know. I didn't even get a look. I don't know who could have done it. Anybody. Kindly take my shoes off."

"They are off."

"No, there's a handcuff on them. The baron says these things. I know what I am doing here with my collection of papers. It isn't worth a nickel to two guys like you or me, but to a collector it is worth a fortune. It is priceless. I am going to turn it over to...Turn your back to me please. Henry, I am so sick now. The police are getting many complaints. Look out! I want that G-Note. Look out for Jimmy Valentine for he is an old pal of mine. [Jimmy Valentine was the famous fictional safecracker created by author O. Henry.] Come on, come on, Jim. Okay, okay, I am all through. Can't do another thing.

"Look out, mama. Look out for her. You can't beat him.

The methodical killer, Charles "The Bug" Workman (right), is taken to prison to serve a life term for the Palace Chop House killings; he was paroled twenty years later.

Police, mama, Helen, mother, please, take me out. I will settle the indictment. Shut up! You got a big mouth! Please help me up, Henry. Max, come over here! French-Canadian bean soup. I want to pay. Let them leave me alone!"

These were the last words of Dutch Schultz. He lay in a coma for two more hours, and, at 8:40 p.m., he died. His killer, Charles "The Bug" Workman, was later convicted of his murder and was sent to the New Jersey State Prison to serve a life term. He was paroled some twenty years later. Only hours after the Dutchman died, Luciano and other board members of the syndicate divided and took over Schultz's lucrative rackets in the Bronx. The Dutchman's intended victim, Thomas E. Dewey, was later told the story of how the crime cartel bosses had Schultz killed in order to save his life. "Nonsense," replied Dewey. "They killed him in order to take over his territories in New York, which is exactly what happened."

JUDGE LOUIS GOES TO THE CHAIR/1944

The syndicate crime board member, who "officially" ordered Dutch Schultz killed was the diminutive, hawk-nosed Louis "Lepke" Buchalter. Lepke co-chaired the crime cartel with Luciano and was called "Judge Louis" since he, more than any other syndicate board member, decreed death sentences.

Louis "Lepke" Buchalter controlled national unions, headed Murder, Inc., and was the only syndicate board director to be executed.

Lepke's marble-mouthed lieutenant, Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro (1900-1947) enforced Buchalter's rackets.

Labor racketeer Benjamin "Dopey Benny" Fein (in 1918) recruited Buchalter and was ousted by Lepke.

Millionaire bootlegger Waxey Gordon (Irving Wexler, 1888-1952), a Lepke associate, who died in Alcatraz.

Gangster Nathan "Kid Dropper" Kaplan, murdered on August 28, 1923, a killing engineered by Lepke.

Lepke was a creature of the New York streets, who began his criminal career, as did Schultz and Luciano, by stealing goods from pushcarts, his first arrest for this petty crime taking place in 1912. The 15-year-old boy collared by a beat cop was Louis Buchalter (Louis Bookhouse; 1897-1944; AKA: Lepke; Judge Louis), and he would become one of the most dreaded figures in American underworld history, establishing a farflung criminal organization that eventually reached into Europe and the Orient.

The illegal rackets under his control would yield more than $50 million each year, and he personally ordered dozens of men murdered—anyone who got in the way of his rackets through the syndicate's enforcement arm, Murder, Inc., controlled by Lepke's loyal henchman, Albert Anastasia. Like his peers, who came to sit with him on the board of the national crime cartel Charles "Lucky" Luciano, Meyer Lansky, Frank Costello, and Joe Adonis, Lepke began as a lowly sneak thief, so poor that at the time of his first arrest, policemen noted, that he was wearing stolen shoes, both for the left foot.

In 1914, Lepke met another youthful thief with the torso of an ape, an apprentice thug like himself, but one who could easily be controlled by the bantamweight Lepke. He was Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro. Both of them were stealing from the same pushcart when they accidentally ran in the same direction. From that point on, Shapiro was Lepke's strong arm. (Shapiro's odd name stemmed from his marblemouthed articulation; when ordering other sneak thieves out of the Lepke-Shapiro territory, he would snarl "get out of here," but the words tumbled together to sound like "gurrah.")

Under Lepke's guidance, Shapiro terrorized the pushcart peddlers, hundreds of them, in their area of the lower East Side of New York, forcing them to pay weekly protection (against Shapiro and Lepke, of course). Another thug, Jacob "Little Augie" Orgen, one-time bodyguard to early day New York gangster Benjamin "Dopey Benny" Fein, heard of the Lepke-Shapiro combine and recruited them for his gang of labor sluggers, which was then taking over the garment industry. While Lepke kept expanding the pushcart-protection racket, he and Shapiro went to work for Orgen, organizing strike-breaking mobs that broke up union meetings and strikes.

Orgen's gang was a polyglot assortment of Italian, Jewish, and Irish mobsters that included Lucky Luciano, Waxey Gordon, Jack "Legs" Diamond, and his brother Eddie. Orgen worked for the company owners by breaking strikes, but then decided it was more profitable to take over the unions themselves. He and his men terrorized union leaders and, through innumerable beatings and murders, took over one local after another by having gang members named as heads of the unions through rigged elections. From this vantage point, Orgen easily extorted enormous amounts of money from employers under the threat of strikes.

Orgen's gang battled others for the lucrative control of the garment unions, particularly the gang headed by Nathan "Kid Dropper" Kaplan (or Caplin), who was killed on August 28, 1923 by one of Orgen's men, Louis Kushner or Kerzner (also known as Louis Cohen, 1904-1939), after twenty-three known gangsters had been killed in the Orgen-Kaplan gang war. Kushner was sent to prison for the Kaplan killing and was paroled in 1937. Since he knew that Lepke and others had had a hand in the Kaplan murder, his silence was assured when Lepke had Kushner shot to death on a Manhattan street in 1939. Twelve years earlier, however, in 1927, Lepke had risen so high in the union and protection rackets that he decided to get rid of Orgen.

On the night of October 15, 1927, Lepke, Shapiro, and Hyman "Little Hymie" or "Curly" Holtz (a brutal thug who had once worked for Orgen, but who had defected to the cunning Lepke), drove along Delancey and Norfolk streets, the location of Orgen's domain and where Orgen had his headquarters. They spotted Orgen and his then-top bodyguard, Jack "Legs" Diamond. They fired pistols and machine guns from their fast-moving roadster, cutting Little Augie in half and severely wounding Diamond. (Diamond would recover and go on to briefly become a top racketeer and bootlegger in New York, wounded so many times in gangster gun battles that he would later be dubbed by the press as "the clay pigeon of the underworld.") Diamond, once recovered, made his peace with Lepke and looked for greener pastures. Lepke was now unchallenged in the union rackets and he quickly consolidated his forces for an all-out takeover of the entire garment industry.

Impressionable Louis Kushner (AKA: Louis Cohen; shown center) held be NYPD Captain Cornelius W. Willemse (left) only minutes after shooting Kaplan to death on Lepke's orders. Kushner was sentenced to twenty years, but released a few years later and was murdered on January 28, 1939, on orders from Lepke.

Lepke knew that the small cutter's union of only 1,900 workers was the pivotal labor force that controlled all garment work. Without the cutters no men's suits could be made and this affected more than 50,000 other garment workers. He strong-armed his way into control of this union and then dictated terms to the rest of the unions and the industry. Before long he was czar of this huge U.S. industry, controlling garment unions across the country. Many of the millions that rolled into Lepke's coffers went out to pay off police, judges, and officials, who looked the other way when Lepke's goons went into action. Lepke's direct payroll was enormous; he supported thousands of lowly runners, thugs, and killers. Mobsters by the scores worked under his bloody banner, the most notable being Shapiro, by then a chief lieutenant, Danny Fields, Paul Berger, Mendy Weiss, and Curly Holtz. His men infiltrated the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union, which boasted 400,000 members, and through this organization, dozens of unions in the U.S. fell under Lepke's domination. He next took over control of the Motion Picture Operators Union, and then the trucking unions (which had not yet become the Teamsters).

Kill-crazy Albert Anastasia (in 1929), Lepke's chief enforcer, organized a troop of killers called "Murder, Inc."

To keep his own forces in line, and also to chastise an occasional union leader who resisted his dictates, Lepke, through Brooklyn killer and mob man, Albert Anastasia, organized several strong-arm squads consisting of more than 250 enforcers in New York alone, and double that number throughout the country. These men had but one job, other than the petty rackets that kept them preoccupied. They were to drop all other activities when getting a "contract" (murder assignment) on a "hit," (victim, or a killing). Most effective of these killing squads was Murder, Inc. in Brownsville, a seedy, crime-ridden district of Brooklyn. Here, from the late 1920s, Lepke's murder legions struck out at rival gangsters, disobedient henchmen, and ordinary citizens who had incurred the syndicate's displeasure. No accurate count of the murders committed by Murder, Inc. survives, but the figures certainly reached into the hundreds, perhaps thousands.

Some of the more celebrated victims included Danny Fields, Lepke's contact man with the unions. Fields, who began drinking and talking to the wrong people, was shot to death at Lepke's orders. Curly Holtz, who was in charge of Lepke's newly developed drug-smuggling operations, was also Gossip columnist Walter Winchell (right), with Mayor James J. Walker (who successfully defended Louis Kushner in the 1923 Kid Dropper killing); Winchell arranged to deliver Lepke to FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover in 1939.

A 1939 FBI photo of Lepke Buchalter after he surrendered to J. Edgar Hoover; he attempted to disguise himself with a mustache while he was in hiding.

murdered on orders from the boss for withholding huge shipments of heroin and morphine, which he and Yasha Katzenburg had smuggled into the U.S. from China. (One shipment alone, brought in personally by Holtz, amounted to more than $10 million in street value.) Holtz was stabbed to death and his body, coated with cement, was dumped into the East River.

Lepke was an enigma even to his friends and associates, and these became limited in number as he rose higher in the crime cartel. He early on befriended Lucky Luciano, as did Lepke's friend, Meyer Lansky, knowing that Luciano was the key to keeping the Italian-Sicilian crime bosses from invading his union domain. It was Luciano, Adonis, Costello, and other Italian-Sicilian mob bosses that Lepke aligned himself with in 1931-1932 to form the national crime syndicate, a one-for-all organization that shared power, political protection, and, to some degree, profits from their incredibly lucrative rackets.

When Salvatore Maranzano, one of the last of the old-fashioned Sicilian gangsters, attempted to become the "boss of bosses" in New York, he first tried to take over the money-bloated union rackets from Lepke. Lepke went to Luciano, asking him for his support and telling him that if he fell, Luciano would be next, correctly assuming that Maranzano would respect no gangster, not even those of his own nationality. It was in Luciano's best interests to have Maranzano killed, which is exactly what happened. In return, Lepke gave Luciano huge payments from his rackets and the support of his army of gunmen. He also shared some of the pie with Luciano through the Italian's henchmen, Johnny Dio (John Dioguardi), Jimmy Doyle (James Plumeri), and Dick Terry (Dominick Didato), by allowing these hoodlums to head up the women's garments unions.

Lepke functioned as co-chairman of the board with Luciano for the national crime syndicate, and his word was invariably law. He was known as Judge Louis, and it was he who insisted that Dutch Schultz, who had junior status with the board, be killed when Schultz told board members that Lepke laughing during his murder trial, convinced that jurors were bribed and never believing he would be convicted.

New York district attorney Thomas E. Dewey, who had been energetically prosecuting Schultz and his rackets, had to be killed.

Rather than allow Schultz to create enormous police pressure, which would harm all the New York racketeers by killing the crusading Dewey, Lepke decreed that Schultz himself was to die. The murder of the Brooklyn and New Jersey crime boss in a Newark restaurant in 1935 was not the work of a single mob, but the execution of syndicate hit men. Not until many years later did Dewey learn that he owed his life to a man whom he would later help send to the electric chair.

Though it was Lepke's lifelong ambition to keep a low profile and let other flashier gangsters hog the limelight and the subsequent police attention, he and Shapiro came under investigation in 1933 and were indicted for labor racketeering and violating anti-trust laws. Both were fined $1,000 and given a year in jail by federal Judge John Knox, who thought this but "a slap on the wrist."

Martin T. Manton, a U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge who later proved to be corrupt and on the syndicate payroll, allowed both gangsters bail and reversed the decisions against them. Manton had obligingly done the same for the notorious bootlegger "Big Bill" Dwyer and Frank Costello, who was later known as the "Prime Minister of the Syndicate." Police pressure against Lepke increased, and, by 1937, his life was made miserable by constant police surveillance. His phone lines were tapped and police spies were placed in his offices. He was forced to meet in washrooms of restaurants and on subway platforms with his lieutenants, hurrying his orders in whispers, then furtively moving on whenever he saw someone he suspected of being a detective.

Lepke went into deep hiding, first living in a hideout prepared for him by Anastasia, an apartment above the Oriental Palace, a sleazy Brooklyn dance hall, then moving to Flatbush to an apartment once occupied by Fatty Walsh, a bootlegger, who had worked for Legs Diamond. The apartment had specially built secret rooms, panels leading to hidden corridors and other places where the crime czar could hide himself in case of a police raid. Ironically, Lepke used Mrs. Dorothy Walsh as a cover when secretly living here, the widow never realizing that she was playing host to the very man who had, years earlier, ordered her husband murdered.

Lepke smiling to newsmen before the verdict; he was convicted.

From this hideout, Lepke sent out scores of murder contracts on those whom he thought might cooperate with police and reveal his widespread operations, as well as the murders he had decreed in the past ten years. He still considered himself to be the top mobster in the country, if not the world. When he heard that Thomas "Three-Finger Brown" Lucchese, a Luciano ally, coveted his garment rackets, Lepke went into a tirade, telling Anastasia and Abe "Kid Twist" Reles, his top Murder, Inc. enforcer: "Nobody moved in on me when I was on the outside and nobody is gonna do it just because I am on the lam. You tell Lucky and Brown that the clothing thing is mine! There is no argument." With the looming threat of Murder, Inc., dominated by Jewish gangsters, Luciano and Lucchese had second thoughts and quickly backed away from seizing the Buchalter garment rackets.

This was but a small delay, however, since the Italian gangsters would use their usual guile and invention in getting what they wanted. Lucchese and other Italian gangsters let it be known that certain Brownsville gangsters would have plenty to say about Lepke and his operations. Several of these thugs were picked up and questioned, small-time crooks informing on others, who held more important positions in the Murder, Inc. framework, until one of its leaders, Abe "Kid Twist" Reles, began to talk nonstop about Lepke, Anastasia, and other crime kingpins. Through Reles, authorities learned of on old labor slammer, Max Rubin, who had important information on Lepke. Rubin later testified that Lepke, Emanuel "Mendy" Weiss (1906-1944), and Louis Capone (1896-1944; no relationship to Al Capone) had murdered one Joseph Rosen.

Lepke had, by that time, thought to outsmart prosecutors by surrendering to the FBI through newspaper columnist Walter Winchell on August 24, 1939. He drew a fourteen-year sentence on narcotics violations and was sent to Leavenworth, anticipating parole in a few years. In this way, Lepke reasoned, he could not be tried locally in New York for murdering Rosen and others. Lepke's surrender was influenced by Albert Anastasia, his top Murder, Inc. enforcer, who told him that the syndicate had "fixed" certain federal authorities. He would draw a minimum federal sentence, then be paroled, and avoid New York prosecution on more serious crimes.

This was really the plan that Lucchese and others had devised in order to finally get rid of Lepke and seize his enormous crime empire. He, of course, would be betrayed and eventually be turned over to New York authorities. Lepke, after taking Anastasia's suggestion, chose Walter Winchell to surrender to, having read Winchell's daily column in which the gadfly and gossip-monger regularly wrote to the crime czar, asking that he contact him and turn himself into authorities. Lepke, in dramatic fashion, contacted Winchell and told him that he would meet him on a Manhattan street, which he did.

Guarded by a submachine gun carrying agent, a glum Louis "Lepke" Buchalter returns from the courtroom on July 20, 1943, after hearing his death sentence; he was executed in Sing's electric chair the following year, the only director on the board of the crime syndicate to meet such punishment.

Winchell got into a cab with the gangster and drove to another location, where an FBI car was waiting. Winchell and Lepke got into this car. In the back seat sat FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover. Winchell was one of Hoover's friends (both of them partied in New York's Stork Club, owned by Sherman Billingsley, who was himself suspected of having murdered a man) and took great pride in serving Hoover in this fashion, as well as getting one of the biggest scoops of the decade. "Mr. Hoover," Winchell said when he and the crime czar got into the car, "meet Lepke."

In 1940, Lepke was brought from federal custody and tried in New York for the Rosen murder. He, Weiss, and Louis Capone were convicted and sentenced to death. While fighting desperately to save his life through a barrage of appeals filed by his lawyers, Lepke, even from his cell, ran his criminal empire and ordered the deaths of those who had betrayed him. Reles was pushed out of a window of the hotel in which he was being guarded in Coney Island in 1942. Moey "Dimples" Wolinsky was shot to death in a Manhattan restaurant in 1943, because he had arranged for Lepke's 1939 surrender to Winchell and Hoover. Lepke's execution date, as well as that of Weiss and Capone, was repeatedly delayed and reset. But finally, on March 4, 1944, Lepke and the two henchmen walked to Sing Sing's electric chair.

The crime czar refused to believe to the last minute that he was actually going to pay with his life for the countless crimes he had committed. He kept telling Weiss and Capone that "the fix is in, you'll see." He had important information to give to authorities, Lepke told the warden at one point when the end was near, but after he was interviewed, officials learned nothing new about the crime syndicate. Thomas E. Dewey, then governor of New York, refused to grant another stay of execution. On the night of his death, Lepke ordered roast chicken and shoestring potatoes as his last meal. Ever loyal, Weiss and Capone both ordered the same meal. The trio went to the chair as blue ribbon witnesses watched to see if any would crack at the end and reveal the dark secrets they knew.

Capone entered the chamber first, at a little after 11 p.m. He said nothing as he stoically sat down in the electric chair. He was pronounced dead three minutes later. Weiss came next, asking to make a statement. He said: "All I want to say is I'm innocent. I'm here on a framed-up case. Give my love to my family and everything." With that he sat down and the current was switched on. Mendy Weiss, chief bodyguard and killer for Lepke, died inside of two minutes.

The crime boss was saved for last. Lepke ignored the newsmen present and marched quickly to the chair, then turned and almost threw himself into it, a look of contempt on his face. He said nothing. Only the muscles of his face twitched slightly as the electrodes were placed on his head. Sing Sing's warden, William E. Snyder, raised his arm and dropped it without ceremony. More than 2,200 volts of electricity shot through the small body of Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, killing him within two minutes.

Newsmen noted how saliva drooled from Lepke's lips in death, how his skin turned blue and how his 165-pound body twitched and bucked under the jolt of current and then sagged into death. One reporter ended his account with the words: "It is not a pretty sight." Thus died one of the most ruthless mass killers of the twentieth century, the only member of the national crime syndicate to ever be executed, paying with his life for the countless crimes he had personally committed or ordered to be committed. Only days after Lepke's death, Thomas "Three-Finger Brown" Lucchese took over the garment industry rackets.

LANSKY, THE SYNDICATE'S BANKER/ 1930s-1970s

Among the founders of the national crime syndicate, the most enduring was the enigmatic Meyer Lansky. Luciano and Adonis were deported, Dutch Schultz murdered and Buchalter executed. Lansky, however, outlasted and outlived his grim peers, working with their successors to become the cartel's banker, financially supervising in his old age a criminal empire that produced billions. Like his peers, his beginning was humble, in fact, miserable.

Born in Grodno, Poland, on July 2 or 4, 1902, Meyer Lansky (Maier Suchowljansky; 1902-1983; AKA: Morris Lieberman; Meyer Lamansky; Little Meyer; Meyer the Bug; Charlie the Bug; Meyer the Lug) immigrated to the U.S. with his family, settling in the Lower East Side of New York. One of three children, Lansky (the family name being difficult to pronounce was changed early on) attended P.S. 34 and proved to be a bright, witty, and imaginative student, earning high grades. He graduated from eighth grade with honors and became an apprentice tool and die maker.

Little Meyer Lansky (he would never be taller than five feet five or weigh more than 145 pounds) grew up without a blemish on his record, a surprising feat, since his neighborhood was a spawning area for gangsters and thugs. Gangs were everywhere, but somehow Lansky managed to remain a law-abiding citizen, thanks to his hard-working parents, Max and Yetta Lansky.

Meyer Lansky in 1930; he had long earlier befriended Luciano and had made plans with him to establish the national crime syndicate.

An FBI photo taken of Lansky in 1935; he was by then organizing international gambling for the crime cartel.

All this changed on October 24, 1918. Lansky, carrying his metal toolbox, was en route home from work when he heard a woman screaming in a deserted tenement building. He ran inside and discovered a tall, attractive woman, naked, and a dark-haired 14-year-old boy, also naked. A young man with thick black hair was kicking the woman and cursing her. He was her pimp, and he screamed that he would "rip up" her face if she ever took on another non-paying customer. The teenager, incensed at this conduct, slipped on his pants and drew a penknife. He dashed forward and tried to cut the dark-haired young man who hit him repeatedly and threw him to the floor.

Lansky, astounded at the scene, took a monkey wrench from his toolbox and rushed up to the young man. He slammed the wrench against the pimp's head, knocking him to the floor. Just then several police officers rushed into the building and subdued the lot of them. Lansky was charged with felonious assault, when appearing before Judge McAdoo, but was discharged, when the pimp refused to press charges.

As Lansky walked from the court, the pimp introduced himself as Salvatore Lucania. He would later be known as Charles "Lucky" Luciano. The youth whom Lansky had defended was Benjamin Siegel, later known as "Bugsy" Siegel. These three would become close friends over the years and would be at the core of the newly established national crime cartel called the syndicate.

Charles "Lucky" Luciano befriended Lansky and made him the syndicate's banker .

From the moment Lansky intervened to help Siegel, the boy attached himself to Little Meyer. The two became inseparable. Lansky, who had always been fascinated by crap games, suddenly decided to abandon honest pursuits, believing big money could only be gotten through gambling. He and Siegel established a floating crap game, which soon proved so successful that Jacob "Little Augie" Orgen took the pair into his labor racketeering gang. He financed their games and gave them protection from other gangsters, who might raid and rob the crap games. For this protection, Lansky and Siegel gave Orgen 35 percent of their profits.

After about a year of operating several floating crap games, Lansky told Siegel that he would not pay tribute to Orgen in the future. He had hired his own gang of thugs to protect the crap games at a cost considerably less than what they had been paying Orgen. Lansky's goon squad, which was later dubbed the Bug and Meyer Mob, after Bugsy Siegel and Meyer Lansky, was headed up by a hulking thug named Phil "Little Farvel" Kovolick, who was also known as "The Stick" since he often carried a large, nail-studded club.

On August 14, 1920, several goons raided one of the Lansky-Siegel crap games and were confronted by Kovolick and several others. The invading gangsters were badly beaten, some so severely that they were carried to a nearby hospital for treatment. Lansky was present at this brawl, but took no part in the fighting. He was nevertheless arrested and fined $2 for disorderly conduct.

When Lansky was leaving court, he was stopped by a swarthy, well-dressed young man, the very Lucky Luciano he had beaned with a monkey wrench two years earlier. Luciano invited Lansky to an all-night conference held in Joe's Italian Kitchen in Brooklyn, the headquarters of one of Luciano's racketeering partners, Joe Adonis. Lansky, Luciano, and Adonis talked of Luciano's idea about a "combination," one where certain smart young racketeers pooled their interests and contributed money to organize the rackets in New York and eventually the U.S.

He had watched Lansky operate in the last few years, Luciano said, and he had come to admire the way he had organized the floating crap games and the nerve he had shown in defying the "old guys and Mustache Petes" in refusing to turn over his winnings from the crap games. Luciano told Lansky that when they began to establish the "combination" he wanted Meyer Lansky to sit on the board of directors with him, Adonis, and others. Of course, Lansky's large gang of enforcers would be expected to help in establishing the crime cartel.

Meyer Lansky not only accepted this idea but immediately embellished on it, explaining that he and Luciano thought alike. Lansky then outlined his ideas of where the profits from the "combination" should go: into more rackets chiefly gambling and into legitimate enterprises, which would pay salaries to board members and others in the cartel and thus explain the large incomes all expected to make.

Lansky's boyhood friend and fellow gangster, Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel.

Luciano cautioned that the wild bootleggers, who had begun to take over that racket in New York, independent gangsters like Vannie Higgins, Jack "Legs" Diamond, Larry Fay, Big Bill Dwyer; older labor racketeers like Nathan "Kid Dropper" Kaplan and Jacob "Little Augie" Orgen; and the ancient Mafia chiefs like Joe "The Boss" Masseria and the Morello Brothers would all destroy each other in their various gang wars. They would wait and organize and then eliminate all those who had not exterminated each other. This was Luciano's plan and Lansky nodded agreement. The two men quickly became friends as well as partners in crime.

To cement that friendship, Luciano gave the Bug and Meyer Mob considerable business in the early 1920s. He purchased dozens of cars stolen by Lansky's men, who through Lansky's technical know-how, changed the appearance and serial numbers of these cars. Bugsy Siegel and his crew stole the cars, Lansky and his mechanics altered the cars, and these were then sold to unsuspecting citizens or used by gangsters working for Luciano, Adonis, and Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, another man chosen to sit on the future board of directors of the national crime syndicate. Lansky also recruited a new type of gangster, one he hired out as a professional killer to other gangs, as one might hire a maid or a chauffeur.

Lansky offered other gangs the services of these killers so that gang members would not be suspected of killing their rivals, business partners, or those marked for death merely because they had somehow offended a gang boss. This was the start of what later became known as Murder, Inc., a group of ruthless killers, who murdered by contract and were paid considerable sums to kill perfect strangers. Aiding Lansky in establishing this troop of professional killers were Lepke Buchalter, who later became director of Murder, Inc., after Lansky became the international director of syndicate gambling, and Albert Anastasia, Luciano's personal enforcer.

By 1923, Lansky and Siegel had also begun massive raids into fur warehouses. But Siegel discovered that one of their men, John Barrett, withheld a large shipment of furs stolen by him and others under Siegel's command. Lansky summoned Barrett to a tribunal headed by Lepke Buchalter, by then Lansky's close associate. Since Buchalter headed another gang, Lansky reasoned, any judgment handed down would appear to be impartial. Buchalter grilled Barrett, who admitted holding out several expensive furs from a recently stolen shipment. Then Barrett pointed at little Meyer Lansky, who sat silent in a chair, his hands clasped, his head down, his eyes closed, appearing to meditate the matter. "It ain't fair," Barrett carped. "We take all the risks and he gets all the gravy." Bugsy Siegel, always Lansky's champion, snorted: "Bull!"

Abner "Longy" Zwillman, long-time Lansky associate and crime boss of New Jersey; he had hosted the 1929 crime conference in Atlantic City, called by Al Capone and Luciano.

Buchalter told Barrett to wait in another room until his case was decided. Once the gangster was out of earshot, Buchalter and Lansky agreed that Barrett had committed a major offense in gangland procedure. It was not just a matter of a few furs, but mutiny against a gang boss, and this could not be tolerated. Both men voted to kill Barrett. The rebellious Barrett was then ordered to get into a car. Siegel got behind the wheel. Lansky, his brother Jake (who had joined Meyer in his enterprises), and Sam "Red" Levine also got into the back seat with Barrett. Siegel drove to a remote spot and stopped. Levine was about to shoot Barrett, but Lansky stopped him, whispering that if he killed Barrett in the car the blood would stain the seats. Lansky then turned to Barrett and shouted: "Get out!"

Barrett leaped from the car and sprinted down the dark, deserted street. Siegel raced after him in the car and when it came abreast of the racing gangster, Levine leaned out a window and pumped several bullets into Barrett. Police arrived a few minutes later to find the gangster still alive. He was rushed to a hospital, where he agreed to sign a complaint charging Lansky, Siegel, and Levine with attempted murder. Barrett knew this would mean his eventual death at the hands of the gang. A few days before he was scheduled to be released from the hospital, Barrett was visited by an old friend, Daniel Francis Ahearn. These two had grown up together and Danny Ahearn was one of Barrett's best friends.

Ahearn had brought Barrett one of his favorite dishes, a plate of fresh chiboni. Barrett asked Ahearn where he had gotten the food, and his friend told him that he had just picked it up at Joe's Italian Kitchen. Barrett nervously told Ahearn that he was still weak and did not have much of an appetite. Ahearn left the chiboni and Barrett told him he would eat it later. After Ahearn left the hospital, Barrett had the food examined and it was discovered to be coated with strychnine. "That's the hand of the Italian, Lansky's friend," Barrett told a police detective. "That's Luciano's way. They kill sneaky, those guys, but to use Danny Ahearn, my best friend to deliver that stuff!"

Barrett was a marked man and knew it. He could either run and know that the gang would pursue him anywhere or he could go back to Lansky and try to make amends. He opted for the latter course. Barrett arrived at Lansky's headquarters, bringing the stolen furs he had withheld. He offered these to Lansky and apologized openly before the gang. He then tore up the copy of his complaint in front of Lansky, saying that he would never say another word about being shot by the gang. Siegel, however, already had his gun out and was prepared to kill Barrett on the spot. Lansky stopped him, saying: "No, Ben, Barrett has learned his lesson. From now on, he is going to be one of our most dependable men." With that, Barrett was taken back into the gang and all was forgotten.

Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista invited Lansky to open gambling spas in Havana.

Frank Costello aided Lansky in placing slot machines in Louisiana in the 1930s.

The relationship Lansky had with Bugsy Siegel was close, but volatile. Siegel was a hothead, always ready to go for his gun and kill anyone who disagreed with him. Lansky was like an older brother to Siegel, but Siegel often quarreled with the diminutive boss of the gang. On one occasion in 1928, Siegel began shouting at Lansky. Danny Ahearn, the man who had delivered the poisoned food to his friend Barrett at Lansky's direction, felt he would ingratiate himself with the boss by teaching Siegel a lesson. He stepped between Siegel and Lansky and slapped Siegel's face for shouting at Meyer the Boss. Both Lansky and Siegel fell silent and left the room together without a word. Ahearn had seriously misjudged this Damon and Pythias of crime. They might argue violently with each other, but they were emotionally inseparable. If one was endangered, the other ran to his rescue. To insult one was to insult both.

Walking along a deserted street the following night, Ahearn heard a car pull up behind him and screech to a halt at the curb. Jake Lansky was at the wheel and in the back seat sat Barrett, the man he had tried to poison. In the front passenger seat sat Bugsy Siegel who smiled, and then leveled a revolver at him. He fired twice, the bullets striking Ahearn in the face and arm. Ahearn fell to the pavement as the car raced off. Police found the wounded gangster and took him to a hospital. He told detectives that Meyer Lansky had tried to kill him. Ahearn withdrew this statement a short time later after receiving a few phone calls at his hospital bed from unknown persons. Ahearn's good friend Peter Bender, however, boasted that Meyer Lansky would be dead within a week, avenging the horrible wounding of his friend Ahearn. Bender disappeared the next day and was never seen again.

Lansky would tolerate no threats or insubordination; he was also a shrewd businessman, he liked to say in that he allowed his most loyal associates and underlings above-average shares in the profits of his many rackets, from stolen goods to gambling. Though Siegel was his lieutenant, Lansky promoted him to equal status. This was a common practice of the Jewish gangsters of that day. Louis Lepke Buchalter did the same thing, elevating his ever-loyal second-in-command, Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro, to gang boss status, even though Shapiro was little more than a hulking illiterate. Lansky also shared the wealth with other gangs, who supported his operations, which endeared him to Luciano.

When Luciano told Lansky in 1931 that his boss, "Joe the Boss" Masseria, had to be killed to stop the on-going Italian gang battles of the Castellammarese War and to appease rival gangster Salvatore Maranzano, Lansky agreed to loan Bugsy Siegel to Luciano as a member of the murder squad that shot Masseria to death. This demonstrated the cooperation of the gangs that was to be the hallmark of the new crime syndicate.

Dandy Phil Kastel supervised the slot machine operations in Louisiana.

The crime cartel had already set up inter-city relationships between the gangs, beginning with the national crime convention in Atlantic City, New Jersey, in 1929. At that time, dozens of infamous gangsters attended the Atlantic City conference, including Al Capone, representing Chicago; Charles "King" Solomon from Boston; Abner "Longy" Zwillman from New Jersey; Johnny Lazia from Kansas City; and Frank Costello, Joe Adonis, and Meyer Lansky from New York.

It was Lansky who would organize and define the hierarchy of the syndicate and the various levels of authority beneath it, establishing the syndicate representatives of each city and, most importantly, for its survival and continued expansion, set up the syndicate's international banking system, one which buried millions within hidden trusts and bank accounts and used world banks to launder the millions in cash from syndicate operations in the U.S.

Lansky took the U.S. syndicate into international operations in 1936 by going to Cuba, where he cemented relationships with Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista. In return for the exclusive gambling franchise in Havana, Batista received a large share of the profits from the many posh casinos built and operated by Lansky and his representatives, such as Joseph "Doc" Stacher. (Lansky was the role model for Mario Puzo's character Hyman Roth in the crime novel, The Godfather, which wrongly depicts the syndicate move to Cuba in the late 1940s, when, in fact, the move was made a decade earlier; well-written as is this work, it does not deal with the syndicate, but emphasizes the five Mafia families in New York as being all powerful, when, again in fact, they were and are subserviant to the syndicate.)

In the late 1930s, Lansky sent his protege, Siegel, to the West Coast to organize syndicate rackets, chiefly to expand gambling enterprises. Lansky in particular backed Siegel in his development of casino gambling in Las Vegas, Nevada, in the mid-1940s. Lansky also moved in the early 1930s into New Orleans with Frank Costello and Philip "Dandy Phil" Kastel, with the blessing of Huey Long, political dictator of Corrupt Louisiana political boss Huey Pierce Long allowed Lansky to install thousands of slot machines throughout his state in a phony charity operation and received enormous payoffs. Long would be assassinated in 1935 (see Assassination).

Louisiana. Through the Pelican Novelty Co., thousands of slot machines were distributed to corner cigar stores, pharmacies, restaurants, and nightclubs, all legally operating under a plan Lansky had worked out with Long, wherein certain proceeds from the slot machines would go to charity. In 1934 alone, more than $800,000 was produced from slots in New Orleans. Charities received $600 of this money to qualify the slots for their charter.

Long, Lansky, Costello, and Kastel split the rest, after the syndicate share was banked by Lansky. The loyalty Lansky consistently showed to the syndicate was the reason he outlasted all other board directors. He also played the lickspittle to Italian members of the syndicate. When Louis "Russian Louie" Strauss was caught skimming money from a syndicate-operated Las Vegas casino and was summarily murdered and his body hidden, Lansky said to Chicago mobster Marshall Caifano and California Mafia don Jack I. Dragna: "That's the last time a Jew will cheat a Sicilian in this town."

Lansky was always ready to serve the Italian-Sicilian board members of the syndicate, and for this reason became the one man that Lucky Luciano trusted in the end. Luciano was sent to prison to serve a long sentence for running a national vice and prostitution ring in 1938. In World War II, Lansky arranged for Luciano to cooperate with the U.S. Navy in providing security along the docks of New York.

Lansky also persuaded Luciano, in 1942-43, when Luciano was still in prison, to provide the Navy with Sicilian contacts, who later helped in the Allied invasion of that island, a deal which assured Luciano parole in 1946 on the proviso that Luciano be deported back to his native Naples, Italy. Throughout Luciano's imprisonment, Lansky and Costello looked after Luciano's vast underworld interests, regularly banking Luciano's share of the profits. When Luciano was deported in 1946, Lansky was one of the few syndicate bosses, who boldly saw him off at dockside.

That same year, Lansky's closest friend (or so he later claimed), Bugsy Siegel, began to come apart at the financial seams in Las Vegas. He had invested syndicate millions in the creation of his lavish dream casino, the Flamingo Hotel. But Las Vegas was then an infant gambling center and the profits were not up to syndicate expectations. Moreover, when pressured to produce profits he could not guarantee in his start-up casino, Siegel responded by telling Mafia dons in the East that they should "go to hell!"

The Mafia faction of the syndicate appealed to Lansky, pointing out to him that Siegel was his man and that if he did not "straighten him out" Siegel would be eliminated. Lansky reportedly called Siegel and asked him to cooperate with the Sicilian investors in the Flamingo, but Siegel proved truculent. Siegel was executed in the Beverly Hills, California, home of his mistress, Virginia Hill, on June 20, 1947. The laconic Lansky remarked: "I had no choice."

Lansky in 1970, when federal agents began to make his life miserable through constant arrests and tax evasion charges, but the crafty syndicate banker (who had secreted billions in foreign banks) evaded imprisonment.

The Mafia faction of the syndicate returned loyalty to Lansky, even when it came to Italians or Sicilians, who attempted to muscle into Lansky's gambling domains. By the mid-1950s, Lansky and his chief enforcer and associate, Vincent "Jimmy Blue Eyes" Alo, had established a vast gambling realm in Florida, one that returned millions to their coffers each year, with, of course, the proper syndicate cut being paid. Though several Italian factions fought to gain control of the Lansky operations, Lansky was left in the end to control this lucrative and illegal empire.

In the early 1960s, Lansky organized gambling operations in Bolivia and Venezuela, sending hundreds of trained casino operators to open new gambling dens in the South American countries. Millions more rolled in. Lansky's operations spread to Hong Kong and Haiti. The little syndicate chief traveled to the Far East and often visited France and Italy, spending time in Naples with the deposed Luciano, who continued to have his U.S. interests represented by Lansky right up to his death in 1962.

Lansky was not immune from prosecution, however, and his worst fears were realized when he learned that federal agents were about to charge him with income tax evasion. In 1970, he fled to Israel, where he took up residence in the posh Dan Hotel in Tel Aviv. Pressure from the U.S. forced the Israeli government to cancel Lansky's visa, despite the fact that Lansky offered the Israeli government $1 million if he were allowed to stay in the country.

Desperately seeking asylum, the crime czar then fled to Switzerland, Brazil, Argentina, Paraguay, Bolivia, Peru and Panama, offering the same amount of money (and more as investments in local businesses) to these governments if they allowed him sanctuary. All refused, undoubtedly bowing to pressure from U.S. officials. Finally, Lansky returned to the U.S. to face tax evasion charges. He managed to avoid conviction, however, and it was later claimed that his influence reached to the highest levels of government to keep him out of prison. Lansky, never a flashy gangster, continued to live in a small home in Miami, Florida, with his second wife Thelma (Schwartz), whom he called Teddy. (Lansky divorced his first wife Anna; their union produced three children.)

There were attempts in the early 1980s to deport Lansky back to his birthplace in Poland, but the shrewd little gang chief pointed out that he had become a naturalized American citizen in 1928. The far-flung gambling empire of Meyer Lansky expanded and increased over the years. When his close friend Abner "Longy" Zwillman committed suicide, Lansky and others took over Zwillman's Las Vegas interests. It was reported that Lansky had important "pieces" of the Flamingo, the Stardust, the Sands, the Fremont, and the Desert Inn in Las Vegas. He was careful to pay enough taxes so as not to be charged with income tax evasion in his later years.

Lansky did not enjoy the last decade of his life. He was often in ill-health. In 1973, he underwent open heart surgery and survived, but it left him weak and inactive. Later that year, he went to trial for income tax evasion, but the government failed to prove its case and Lansky once more escaped prison. In the last few years of his life, Lansky acquired rare books and extended his collection of hand-made bow ties. He and his wife (Teddy died in 1997) strolled about Miami, and at such times Lansky could be seen with a solid brass and oak walking stick, given to him by Luciano. The couple bought a high-rise condominium at the Imperial House, in Miami Beach. Lansky then developed ulcers, which caused him continual pain until his death on January 15, 1983 of cancer at Mount Sinai Hospital in Miami Beach, Florida. He was eighty-one.

Little Meyer Lansky had outlived all of those sinister creatures with whom he had joined forces to form the national syndicate. He had lived to see his monstrous creation become the second most powerful force in America after the federal government and he himself once boasted: "We're bigger than U.S. Steel." (A quote repeated in Puzo's memorable novel.) Lansky's estate was estimated to be more than $400 million at the time of his death, but this great fortune was never located or identified and it is assumed that latter-day syndicate chieftains appropriated the money.

Other tales insist that Lansky had squirreled away ten times that amount on behalf of the syndicate, but had so carefully hidden these funds in unnumbered Swiss bank accounts that the syndicate bosses and even the bankers in this country could not identify the actual owner and the "Lansky billions" are still at large. To the frugal Meyer Lansky such vast amounts of money represented nothing more or less than sums scrolled on hidden ledgers. He seldom spent more than $25 for a dinner and a waiter who received more than a $1 tip from Meyer Lansky was the exception. He was not a man to spend money foolishly.

"WE ONLY KILL EACH OTHER"/1930s-1940s

Lansky's protege, Bugsy Siegel, however, spent money—millions of it—like a drunk on a Homeric bender. The lethal problem was that the money Siegel squandered was not his own, but belonged to syndicate bosses, who, when not repaid and insulted by Siegel in the bargain for having made their investment, ordered his bloody death. Where the shrewd Meyer Lansky was reserved and even contemplative before launching any criminal action, his closest friend, Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel (1906-47; AKA: Harry Rosen) was impetuous and mercurial. Siegel had a murderous temperament and it took little to provoke him to violence. He arrogantly reveled in the image of being a dangerous man. He enjoyed striking fear in others and he loved the evil power he wielded over his minions.

A 1925 NYPD photo of Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel, who was then co-leader (with Lansky) of the Bug and Meyer Mob.

Though he could be affable and pleasing to those from whom he sought favor, he could also turn psychopathic killer in a split second. Bugsy Siegel murdered with a smile on his handsome face.

The Brooklyn-born Sie-gel was one of five children from hard-working but poor Jewish parents. (He had one brother, Maurice, and three sisters, Ethel, Esther, and Bessie.) He attended public school, but quit at an early age to join a street gang on Lafayette Street in New York's teeming Lower East Side. Siegel developed an athletic body, while running through the streets, fleeing from police, after committing one petty theft after another. The blue-eyed, black-haired Siegel was followed everywhere by a diminutive hoodlum, Moe Sedway (Morris Sedwitz), and the pair, in their early teens, soon developed a protection racket.

A 1933 NYPD lineup of New York gangsters arrested in a raid in the Franconia Hotel, where a crime conference was taking place (left to right): Joseph Rosen (AKA: Doc Harris, later murdered on Lepke's orders); Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel; Harry Teitlebaum; Louis "Lepke" Buchalter; Harry Greenberg (AKA: Big Greenie, later murdered by Siegel); Louis Kravitz; Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro; Philip "Little Farvel" Kovolick; and Hyman "Curly" Holtz.

The body of New York crime boss Joe Amberg (foreground) and the corpse of Amberg's chauffeur, Mannie Kessler, are shown in a garage on the night of September 30, 1935, killed by Siegel and members of Murder, Inc.

Meyer Lansky in 1937, when he sent Siegel to run the rackets in California.

Siegel would stop at a pushcart and fondle some of the seller's cheap merchandise, telling him: "Gimme a dollar."

When the pushcart vender invariably refused payment, Siegel would snarl: "No? Okay, gimme $5!"

The pushcart vender would become enraged, telling the boys to leave him alone. At this point, Siegel would order Sedway: "Okay, pour the stuff on his junk!" Sedway would then splash kerosene from a small container he was carrying onto the merchant's goods and Siegel would light a match, setting the pushcart afire. The two hoodlums would then race from the scene. After several fires of this kind, pushcart merchants on Lafayette Street succumbed to paying Siegel protection money rather than see their carts go up in flames. While still a teenager, Siegel met and befriended Meyer Lansky, who had a penchant for organizing floating crap games and other gambling activities. The pair formed the Bug & Meyer Mob, concentrating on establishing and operating gambling dens and stealing expensive cars, which they remodeled in their own garages and then resold.

Siegel at this time also acted as a for-hire killer. Lansky, head of the gang, loaned him out to other gang bosses whenever an important killing among mob members was called for. In 1926, however, Siegel was arrested and jailed for rape. Lansky's lawyers managed to have Siegel acquitted. The victim was told by Lansky goons that unless she suddenly lost her memory, her face would be scarred forever with acid. In April of that year, Siegel was arrested in Philadelphia for carrying a concealed weapon, but this charge was dismissed. At the time, according to one report, Siegel had been en route to perform a mob murder.

The Bug & Meyer Mob joined the forces of Charles "Lucky" Luciano in the 1920s, supplying Luciano's men with stolen cars and branching out in Manhattan with new gambling operations and bookmaking establishments. During the Castelammarese War of 1930-1931, when the underworld factions of Salvatore Maranzano and Joe "The Boss" Masseria were battling for control of the New York Mafia, Siegel, with Joe Adonis, Albert Anastasia, and Vito Genovese, shot and killed Masseria on April 15, 1931, in s Coney Island restaurant, while Luciano, who worked for Masseria, hid in the men's room. This was a planned execution created Bugsy Siegel at the time he arrived in California, embracing the Hollywood lifestyle.

California Mafia boss Jack I. Dragna (1891-1957); his gambling rackets were taken over by Siegel.

Bugsy Siegel with his film star friend George Raft, who introduced the gangster to his Hollywood friends; Raft patterned his acting style after New York gangster Joe Adonis.

Countess Dorothy di Frasso, with film stars Clark Gable and Richard Barthelmess; she fell in love with Siegel, introducing him to Hollywood hierarchy, financing a Siegel treasure hunt to Cocos Island and planning with Siegel the assassination of Italian dictator Benito Mussolini.

Film actress Wendy Barrie, one of Siegel's many Hollywood steady dates.

Film starlet Marie "The Body" McDonald, one of Siegel's Hollywood paramours at the time the gangster thought he might become a film actor and financed his own screen test.

by Luciano to appease Maranzano, enhance his own mob standing, and bring the gang war to an end.

The Masseria murder, committed by four mob bosses, established Siegel as a preeminent gangster in New York. He went on, under Lansky's supervision, to work with Murder, Inc., a troop of Jewish gangsters who served as killers-for-hire and who enforced the newly-born crime syndicate's edicts. Murder, Inc. flourished for more than a decade, under the direction of Louis "Lepke" Buchalter and Albert Anastasia. Siegel, a charming, handsome man who easily ingratiated himself with politicians and important social contacts, was used as a sort of ambassador of the syndicate during the early 1930s, being sent to Philadelphia and Miami to coordinate syndicate takeovers of local mobs and rackets. Those who opposed this arrangement were either killed by Siegel or his troop of Murder, Inc. killers, particularly Siegel's one-time bodyguard, Abe "Kid Twist" Reles.

During this period, Siegel was arrested on minor charges, once in 1932 in Miami, where he was fined $100 for gambling and released, and in the same year in Philadelphia, where he was fined for illegally transporting liquor. At the time, Siegel was accompanying a convoy of trucks carrying bonded whiskey smuggled from Canada and destined for the warehouses of syndicate members in Philadelphia. Siegel was also involved with a half dozen murders of rival gangsters in the war between New York bootleggers Waxey Gordon and Charles "Chink" Sherman.

One of Gordon's top killers, Francis Anthony Fabrizzo, lowered a bomb down the chimney of the Bug and Meyer Mob headquarters on Grand Street in Manhattan in 1934. The resulting explosion injured Siegel and others. After recovering from his wounds, Siegel tracked down Fabrizzo in southwest Brooklyn and shot him to death. The Bug and Meyer Mob then briefly became aligned with the forces of Dutch Schultz. Siegel, Reles, and others shot and killed Brooklyn loan sharks and rival gangsters, Joseph "Joey" Amberg and Louis "Pretty" Amberg.

When Luciano siphoned off Schultz's rackets with the help of Abe "Bo" Weinberg, Schultz's top lieutenant, Siegel personally took vengeance on behalf of Schultz by driving Weinberg to Brooklyn one night in 1935 and clubbing him over the head before stabbing him repeatedly in the stomach and killing him. (Siegel stabbed Weinberg in this fashion so that the stomach would not inflate and bring Weinberg's body to the surface after it was dumped into the East River.) This

The tempestuous Virginia Hill, the mob girl who banked millions for the crime syndicate, fell in love with Siegel and deserted him when she learned that he was to be murdered.

Siegel in 1940, when he began to develop large scale drug smuggling from Mexico.

gruesome murder was particularly ironic because Weinberg had been a boyhood friend of Siegel's in Hell's Kitchen, and Siegel had told Weinberg to turn over some of Schultz's rackets to Luciano while Schultz was being tried for income tax evasion in upstate New York, a trial in which the gang bosses expected the Dutchman to be convicted. When Schultz was acquitted, the Weinberg murder was Luciano's way of apologizing to Schultz for prematurely stealing his rackets, or so one report stated.

By 1937, Siegel was a much-wanted man, a price put on his head by several rival gangsters for various underworld killings he had committed. The national crime cartel, chiefly his mentor, Lansky, decided that Siegel should move west, allowing him to flee the vengeance of other mobsters, and more importantly, to develop syndicate rackets in southern California.

Jack I. Dragna and his brothers controlled most of the gambling operations in that area, and upon Siegel's arrival in Los Angeles, a national wire service was established, hooked up to all of Dragna's gambling dens and bookie parlors. A large portion of the proceeds were funneled back east to syndicate coffers controlled by Lansky, the cartel's banker.

Siegel spent more than $500,000 of syndicate money setting up the national wire service, which was operated by Moses Annenberg, for the mob. But the investment reaped enormous profits. The syndicate, in return for this service, took more than $8 million each year from all West Coast gambling operations. Siegel cut a dashing, handsome figure in the Hollywood scene. He rented a mansion owned by opera singer Lawrence Tibbett and moved his wife Esther (Krakower) and two daughters, Millicent and Barbara, to the Coast, although Siegel was anything but a faithful husband.

He had many affairs and lady friends in Hollywood, including Ketti Gallian, the French ingenue, and, later actresses Wendy Barrie and Marie "The Body" McDonald. One of Siegel's boyhood chums, George Raft, who had once been a bootlegger working for Waxey Gordon and for Siegel in New York before going to Hollywood to become a star in gangster films (and who based his movie persona on the slick appearance and traits of New York crime boss Joe Adonis), introduced Siegel to Hollywood high society.

Through Raft, Siegel met the social lioness of the era, Countess Dorothy Dendice Taylor di Frasso, who fell madly in love with the rugged gangster. The countess, in turn, intro-

Frankie Carbo helped Siegel murder Harry Greenberg in 1939.

Allie Tannenbaum testified against Siegel in the Greenberg murder.

Siegel with attorney Byron Hanna (left) and (shaking hands with) criminal lawyer Jerry Giesler, following his acquittal on charges of murdering Harry Greenberg.

The Flamingo Hotel and Casino in Las Vegas, Nevada, Siegel's fantastic dream and fatal fiasco.

Virginia Hill's mansion at 810 N. Linden Drive, Beverly Hills, where Siegel was murdered, reportedly by Frankie Carbo.

The end of Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel, shot to death, a bullet blowing out his left eye, on the night of June 20, 1947.

duced Siegel to movie stars Clark Gable, Jean Harlow, Gary Cooper, Norma Shearer, and dozens of others. Siegel also met movie moguls Jack Warner (who was terrified of him), Harry Cohn, and Louis B. Mayer. Siegel later used these movie mogul contacts to extort millions from studios. Through his mobster stooges, Willie Bioff and George Browne, he threatened to close theaters nationwide by calling their syndicate-controlled projectionist union to strike, unless their payoff demands were met.

Then Siegel met a green-eyed, auburn-haired beauty, Virginia Hill, who had run away from her impoverished Alabama home to Chicago as a teenager and who had become a syndicate courier, carrying huge amounts of money from one collection point to another, and even flying regularly to Europe to make staggering deposits in foreign banks where syndicate millions were secreted. The pair developed a deep but tempestuous love affair and aided each other in various rackets. Virginia Hill traveled to Mexico to establish Siegel's first important contacts with hard drug traffickers, and by 1940, Siegel was smuggling millions of dollars worth of heroin and opium into the U.S. from Mexico. The drugs were then distributed throughout the country by syndicate peddlers.

Hill was also a notorious blackmailer, who gleaned considerable payoffs from Hollywood stars and magnates to keep their private vices secret. The mob woman lived as richly and extravagantly as did Siegel, buying a mansion in Beverly Hills and entertaining the cream of Hollywood society. Siegel referred to his volatile paramour as "the bait," to his "shark." He had many love affairs, but he always returned to Hill, the only woman ever to dominate his emotions.

Siegel's lifestyle in Hollywood was grandiose. He spent $5,000 an evening entertaining stars and local politicians and twice that much each day betting at Santa Anita racetrack, where his long shot wagers always seemed to pay off. Or, at least, on his income tax forms he reported himself as a "sportsman," claiming to earn his living from legitimate gambling. Though he had trysts with many women, Siegel oddly held onto his family, which he kept separate from his affairs. He maintained his residence with his wife and daughters, but was often away, living with Virginia Hill or staying with other women. His sexual appetite was reportedly ravenous.

Siegel, for all his show of being an independent sportsman, remained a tool of the syndicate. Meyer Lansky informed Siegel that Harry "Big Greenie" Greenberg, a one-time Murder, Inc. member, had fled to the West Coast and was about to turn police informer. In a terse phone call, Lansky ordered Siegel to "take care of this guy." A few nights later, on November 22, 1939, Siegel, accompanied by Frankie Carbo, Whitey Krakower, and Allie Tannenbaum, trapped and killed Greenberg on a Los Angeles street. Krakower returned to the East Coast where he, too, had decided to turn informer, according to later reports by Lansky. Siegel flew to New York and hunted Krakower down on a Brooklyn street, shooting him to death on July 31, 1940.

Siegel was later tried for the Greenberg killing, but was ably defended by Hollywood lawyer Jerry Giesler and was acquitted. At the time of his trial, newspapers publicized the gangster as "Bugsy" Siegel, which infuriated him more than the murder indictment. He hated the name "Bugsy," a nickname from his youth, based upon his bursts of lunatic rage and his recklessness in killing gang rivals. Though he admonished all who used the moniker, the name Bugsy clung to Siegel beyond the grave.

Moe Sedway, Siegel's boyhood friend, took over the Flamingo on the night of Bugsy's murder, knowing in advance from Meyer Lansky that Siegel would be killed.

By the mid-1940s, Siegel began to develop an idea for a grand gambling casino in the small desert town of Las Vegas, Nevada. Using $1 million of his own funds and about $5 million of syndicate money advanced by Luciano and Lansky, Siegel began construction of the first super gambling casino and hotel, the lavish Flamingo Hotel ("Flamingo" was Siegel's pet name for Virginia Hill). Siegel commuted between Las Vegas and Los Angeles throughout 1946-1947 while the construction of his dream casino ensued.

More and more Siegel left the day-to-day chores of running syndicate gambling and narcotics operations to his brainless aides, like gun-happy Mickey Cohen. He installed his old friend, Moe Sedway, as manager of the hotel and began spending time in Hollywood watching his friend, George Raft, make movies. Once, while visiting Raft on a movie set, where the star was working, Siegel snorted that he, Benjamin Siegel, could act just as well as Raft before the cameras. In fact, acting had been a lifetime secret ambition of the gangster's. He believed that he could become a movie star if given the right opportunity, but no producer ever stepped forth to offer him a contract.

Virginia Hill (born September 26, 1916), shown with her husband Hans and son Peter in Switzerland, where she lived in exile; she was reportedly haunted by the nightmare of Siegel's murder and, at the age of forty-nine, committed suicide by swallowing twenty-eight sleeping pills while lying on a snowbank in March 1966.

As Siegel's investment money began to run low, he hurried contractor Del Webb, telling him to finish as soon as possible. Siegel was beginning to feel pressure from Luciano for a return on syndicate money. Webb, on many occasions, overheard Siegel barking orders to have this person "fixed" or that person "taken care of." Noticing the contractor's apprehension one day, Siegel gave Webb his boyish, toothy grin and stated: "Don't worry, Del. We only kill each other," a line that summed up the gangster credo of the U.S.

The opening of the Flamingo did not go well. Most of the Hollywood celebrities Siegel invited to the premiere opening failed to appear, although George Raft and some minor stars were on hand. The public was curious, but failed to appear in the droves Siegel had predicted. He told his eastern syndicate mob bosses that promotion and publicity were needed to establish the reputation of the new gambling center of the U.S. This news angered syndicate bosses in the east, particularly Luciano, who had been deported to his native Italy following World War II, and who had secretly flown to Havana, Cuba, in mid-1947 to confer with his U.S. syndicate associates.

Luciano reportedly phoned Siegel from this meeting and demanded that he immediately return the $5 million syndicate loan with substantial interest. Siegel, who no longer thought of himself as a vassal to the eastern bosses, but a crime czar in his own right, and an equal to the powerful Luciano, told Luciano to "go to hell!" and that he would pay the loans off in his "own good time." He hung up on Luciano, who then met with Meyer Lansky, Siegel's mentor, telling Lansky that "Ben must be hit and there will be no arguments."

Lansky called Lou Rothkopf, a syndicate chief in Cleveland, and told Rothkopf to contact Mickey Cohen and order Cohen to "stay next to Ben night and day" to guard him against the assassins he knew Luciano would send. Lansky also, according to another account, called Siegel and begged him to make peace with Luciano and try to pay off a portion of the syndicate loans. Siegel ignored the plea.

On the night of June 20, 1947, Siegel went to the Beverly Hills home of Virginia Hill with an associate, Allen Smiley. As the two sat in the elegant living room of the mansion, a Luciano killer aimed a 30.30 rifle through the front window of the mansion and sent three bullets into the handsome head of 41-

A gangster out of a job: Mickey Cohen (1913-76), who was Siegel's top lieutenant, was ousted by the crime syndicate; he vainly bragged that he would track down and kill Bugsy's murderer.

year-old Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel, blowing away his left eye, and killing him instantly.

At the time Virginia Hill was conveniently away on a European trip. She did not attend Siegel's funeral, nor did any of his other Hollywood friends, including George Raft, who was suddenly bedridden with an asthma attack. Siegel was buried in an elegant marbled vault reportedly paid for by Meyer Lansky. Siegel's dream of a posh gambling city, Las Vegas, rising out of the desert, became a reality within a decade.

"THE MAD HATTER"/1930s-1950s

The gory 1947 murder of the flamboyant Bugsy Siegel was undoubtedly performed by killers under the direction of Albert Anastasia (Umberto Anastasio; c.1903-1957; AKA: The Mad Hatter; Lord High Executioner; Big Al). It was Anastasia who supervised the syndicate hit squads that had been salvaged and revamped from the ruins of the old Murder, Inc. troops once led by Meyer Lansky and Bugsy Siegel, then Louis "Lepke" Buchalter. When Buchalter was sent to the electric chair in 1944, Anastasia became the head of the syndicate's enforcing arm, a grim post that he relished.

One of the most ruthless killers of American organized crime, Anastasia was the mob's top exterminator. He personally murdered at least fifty or more persons and was responsible, as head of Murder, Inc., the syndicate's execution squad located in Brooklyn, New York, for the killing of hundreds, perhaps thousands of victims for four decades. He was of middle height and carried extra weight that was mostly muscle since he worked out regularly. His hands were enormous and anyone hit with his fists invariably reported broken bones. His face was fleshy. His large, bulbous nose boomed over thin lips and Anastasia's eyes, were usually narrowed to a suspicious squint, darting about wildly when he became excited and this was usually before he ordered someone murdered.

Anastasia was born in Tropea, Italy, on February 26, 1903 (or 1902, records vary; some reports have his birthplace in Calabria). In 1917, shortly before the U.S. entry into World War I, Anastasia and his eight brothers immigrated from Italy to the United States, the 14-year-old Albert slipping onto a Brooklyn dock in the dead of night, without shoes, and hiding with a relative until he could find work.

A strapping boy, Anastasia was given a job on the docks and was a longshoreman by age sixteen, working alongside his brother Anthony. Anastasia was also active in a brutal Brooklyn gang, which preyed on women, robbing and raping them. Early on he decided to change his name from Anastasio to Anastasia to avoid bringing shame upon his family and being identified with them when he was mentioned in newspapers as a gangster, or so the story goes. But his brother Tony kept the original family name and went on to become one of the leading racketeers controlling the Brooklyn docks twenty years later, working under the direction of his bully-boy brother Albert.

Anastasia quickly came under the wing of Brooklyn gang boss, Joe Adonis, and it was through Adonis and his fabulous bootleg wealth that Anastasia was able to set up his own fledgling gang of bootleggers and killers at the dawn of Prohibition. By this time, Anastasia had been credited with killing at least five men in gangland wars over bootleg territories in Brooklyn. He made a mistake, however, when he boldly murdered a fellow longshoreman, one Joe Torino, in 1920, in a dispute over the right to unload ships with precious cargoes.

There were several witnesses to this killing, when the powerful Anastasia stabbed and strangled his victim. He was convicted and sentenced to death. Anastasia lingered on death row in Sing Sing for eighteen months, but he won a new trial, when the witnesses reversed their statements. After the witnesses suddenly vanished, the killer was released. Of course, Anastasia's gang members saw to it that the witnesses disappeared.

Albert Anastasia cherished the life-and-death power he wielded as head of Murder, Inc.

Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, Anastasia's boss, until executed in 1944; Anastasia then took over Murder, Inc.

Abe "Kid Twist" Reles, one of Anastasia's most ruthless executioners; he would later inform on Murder, Inc.

District Attorney William O'Dwyer and assistant Burton B. Turkus, who smashed Murder, Inc. and exposed the grisly operations of the U.S. crime syndicate in 1940, although FBI chief J. Edgar Hoover denied the existence of this organization for the next thirty years.

Upon his release, Anastasia became Adonis' right-hand enforcer, threatening and beating up saloon keepers reluctant to peddle Adonis beer and liquor, extorting money from local shopkeepers for protection, and organizing the longshoremen into unions, which came early under gangster control. In addition, Anastasia and Meyer Lansky put together a group of killers in the late 1920s. These utterly ruthless thugs formed the gang which later became known as Murder, Inc. Anastasia or, most probably the inventive Lansky, invented a whole new vocabulary for these killers so that when they spoke in public or over the phone references to their murders would be misunderstood.

A "contract" was an agreement to murder someone, the victim was a "hit," and members of the killer group belonged to "the troop." Anastasia's killers were the most cold-blooded executioners in the grim annals of American crime. They included Harry "Pittsburgh Phil" Strauss, Harry "Happy" Maione, Abe "Kid Twist" Reles, Frank "The Dasher" Abbandando, Seymour "Blue Jaw" Magoon, Martin "Bugsy" Goldstein, and Allie Tannenbaum. These men were recruited early in their careers as apprentice bootleggers and strong-arm thugs who had small gangs that were later absorbed into the Adonis combine.

Though Anastasia's top bosses in years to come—Adonis, Luciano, Lucchese, ManganoBwere either Sicilian or, like himself, Italian, Anastasia paid his allegiance to Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, the shrewd Jewish gangster who, with Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro, had taken over the garment workers' unions and who supervised Anastasia's stranglehold on the stevedore unions. Buchalter was also one of the architects for Murder, Inc.

Anastasia was also enamored of other Jewish gangsters, Meyer Lansky and his sleek strong-arm lieutenant, Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel. The Jewish killers in Murder, Inc., Strauss, Tannenbaum, and others were recommended by Lepke, who was Anastasia's nominal boss when it came to the overall operations of the group. Anastasia's loyalty and dedication to Lepke, later caused the Sicilian-Italian faction of the syndicate to consider Anastasia a maverick and untrustworthy as a member of their inner circle.

Anastasia was a key member of the national crime cartel from its inception. He was present at the historic 1929 Atlantic City convention of mobsters, who came from all over the United States. Anastasia was also involved in the deadly Castellammarese War in New York between the gangland factions of Joe "The Boss" Masseria and Salvatore Maranzano. Though he fought with the Masseria side, Anastasia was one of the four gangsters, who killed Joe the Boss in Coney Island in 1931, and it was he that administered the coup de grace to Masseria, while his fellow murderers, Bugsy Siegel, Vito Genovese, and Joe Adonis stood by admiringly, the killing performed at Luciano's orders. This display of cold-blooded willingness to murder established, for Anastasia, a fearsome reputation among his own peers, one which implanted respect and apprehension among them.

There was no one Anastasia feared on either side of the law. When Dutch Schultz went before the syndicate board in 1935 and insisted that New York District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey be murdered because of the pressure he was exerting on the Dutchman's illegal enterprises, Anastasia listened intently. He then staked out Dewey's Fifth Avenue apartment for four days, posing as a loving father, walking up and down the block with a small child he borrowed for the job, either pushing the child in a baby carriage or having the small boy peddle next to him on a tricycle, according to varying reports. Anastasia later reported to the syndicate leaders that Dewey was poorly guarded and that he could be murdered "without too much trouble."

It never occurred to the killer that murdering Dewey would bring down incredible heat upon the newly born syndicate. Anastasia approached the idea as merely another job and he had satisfied himself that it could be accomplished. His limited vision proved to be the very reason why he was always held in disdain by the hierarchy of the national crime cartel. Yet he was essential to the syndicate as its chief enforcer and because he wielded such dangerous power through his control of Murder, Inc., he held syndicate boss status throughout his life. Schultz's plan to kill Dewey did not materialize, however; he himself was murdered on orders of Luciano, Lepke Buchalter, the nominal chairmen of the syndicate board.

Anastasia's devotion to Lepke was almost childlike. He thought Buchalter was an intellectual genius, the cleverest man on the syndicate board, and he took it upon himself to protect the diminutive Lepke at all costs. When both New York and federal officers were searching for Buchalter in the late 1930s, it was Anastasia who provided him with a hidden sanctuary through his Murder, Inc. associates. But it was also Anastasia, who convinced Lepke to turn himself into authorities, telling Buchalter that a deal had been made, where Lepke would serve time in a federal prison and not be turned over to New York to face a murder charge and possible electrocution in Sing Sing, which is exactly what happened to Buchalter in 1944.

It was later claimed that Anastasia had been told by other syndicate leaders, chiefly Luciano, who at the time was in prison, that the prolonged search for Lepke had caused too much police heat on syndicate operations and that Buchalter should be persuaded, by a man he would trust, to turn himself in. That man, of course, was Anastasia, who, some believe, knew that once Buchalter was in federal custody he would be turned over to New York authorities and eventually go to the electric chair, a fate decreed by Luciano who resented Lepke's authority and feared his power through Anastasia.

In 1940, when Brooklyn District Attorney Burton B. Turkus suddenly found several members of Murder, Inc. willing to turn state's evidence, Anastasia, too, went into hiding. Reles and others implicated him in several murders and named him as their boss in their murder-for-profit organization. Albert Tannenbaum stated to Turkus that Anastasia ran afoul of a crusading longshoreman named Peter Pant, who had begun a campaign to clean up the Brooklyn waterfront in 1939, and an enraged Anastasia personally garroted and buried the labor leader in quicklime.

Tannenbaum instructed Turkus where to find the body, which was dug up in Lyndhurst, New Jersey. Tannenbaum's statements were supported by Kid Twist. Reles, however, never lived long enough to testify in court against Anastasia. On November 12, 1941, Reles was pushed to his death from a six-story hotel room (Room 623) window of the Half Moon Hotel in Coney Island, even though he was being "guarded" at that time by a number of New York policemen assigned to Murder, Inc. killer Frank "The Dasher" Abbandando (Abbundando; 1910-42), executed at Sing.

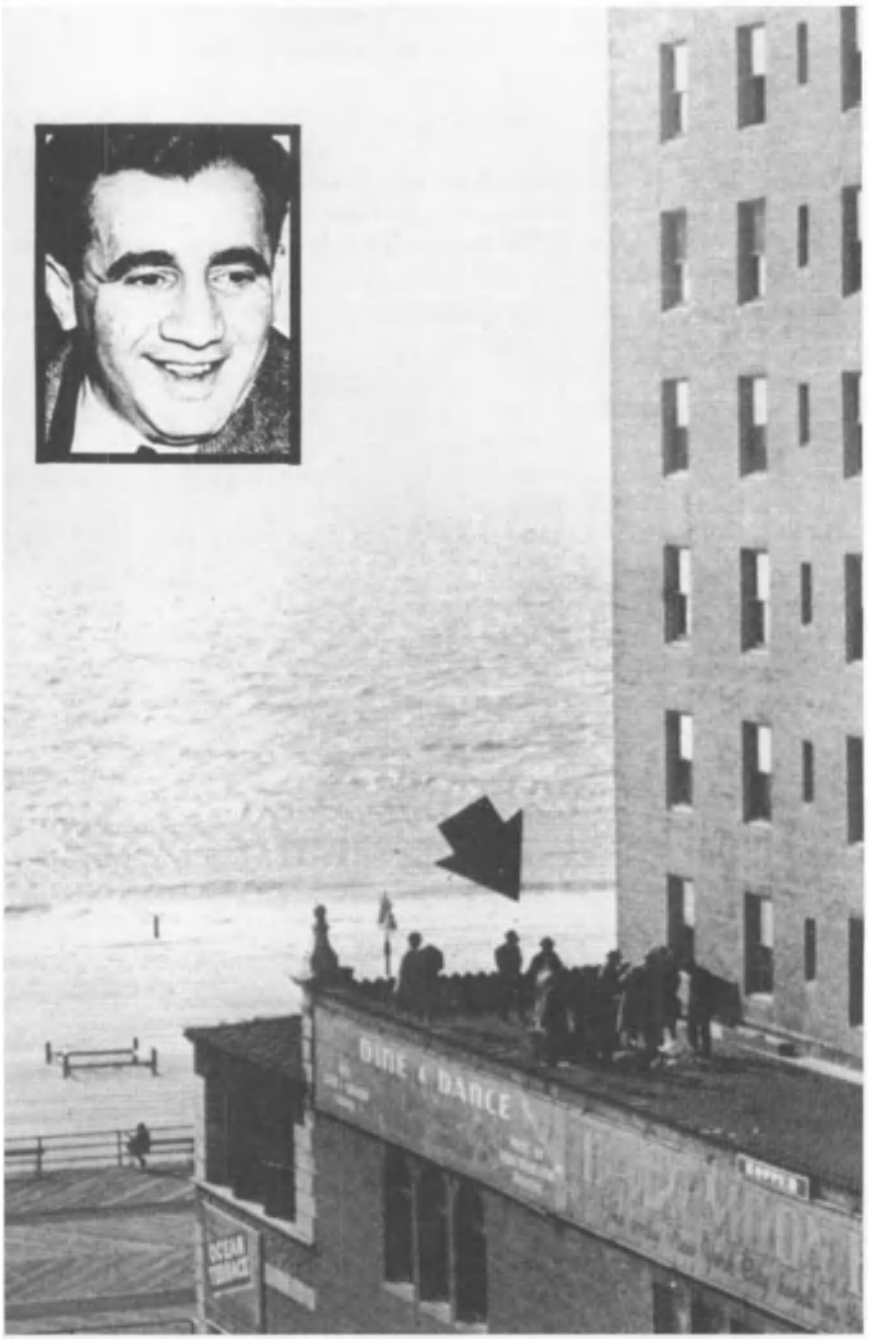
Murder, Inc. killer Harry "Happy" Maione, executed in Sing's electric chair in 1942.

Murder Inc.'s top contract killer, Harry "Pittsburgh Phil" Strauss (1908-41), executed at Sing.

Maione (left) and Abbandando (right) at their murder trial, May 8, 1940, glaring at Abe "Kid Twist" Reles, then testifying against them and detailing their gruesome murders.

Pittsburgh Phil Strauss is shown in a Brooklyn, New York jail cell, awaiting his murder trial, August 7, 1940.

Murder Inc. killer Seymour "Blue Jaw" Magoon.



Revenge: November 12, 1941: Detectives (arrow) stand upon a lower roof of Coney Island's Half Moon Hotel, around the body of Murder, Inc. informer Abe "Kid Twist" Reles (inset), who either jumped or was pushed from his hotel room while supposedly being guarded by a half dozen NYPD cops.

protect the informer. At this time, Albert Anastasia went into even deeper hiding, finding a place where no police official would ever think to look for him, the U.S. Army.

The arch killer enlisted in the army in 1942 both to avoid Turkus' investigators as well as to sidestep any future move to have him deported to his native Italy. Though his criminal record and gangster background was well known, Anastasia was nevertheless accepted by the army and he was attached to the Eighty-Eighth Division at Camp Forrest, Tennessee, where he rose to the rank of sergeant. Because of his army service, Anastasia was allowed to become a naturalized citizen in 1943, thus making sure he could never be sent out of the country. Contrary to gangland myth that Albert Anastasia was sent overseas, where he saw action and became a hero under gunfire, the syndicate boss remained in the United States throughout the duration of the war.

Though his unit went overseas, Anastasia reportedly bribed some minor officials and was allowed to remain behind at Town Gap, Pennsylvania, where he supervised a small army transportation center. Following the war, Anastasia paraded about Brooklyn in his uniform, sporting medals he had purchased in a pawnshop and hinting darkly of the many heroic deeds he had performed on the battlefield. Nothing could be further from the truth. He was, as in civilian life, a coward who was terrified of facing an armed, alert enemy. The myth that Anastasia was a war hero was perpetuated by his henchmen, and even his enemies in the Mafia-syndicate, such as Vito Genovese, came to believe the fabricated war stories.

Arnold Schuster turned in bank robber Willie "The Actor" Sutton, and was murdered on orders of Anastasia after seeing Schuster interviewed on TV.

To create a legitimate front for his dock racketeering, Anastasia had his brother Tony hire him as a foreman in the late 1940s. He made an occasional appearance along the Brooklyn docks to grunt a few orders and then returned to supervising his lucrative gambling, narcotics, and prostitution rackets, which Anastasia had extended into New Jersey, where he would eventually relocate. Much of the crime empire Anastasia ruled, as one of the five Mafia family members in New York, was inherited from Luciano. The broad territories in Manhattan and Brooklyn that Luciano had once overlorded, fell under the authority of Philip and Vincent Mangano after Luciano was deported to Italy in 1946. Frank Costello (1891-1973) was the underboss of this Mafia family, a position Vito Genovese had held in the early 1930s, until he fled to Sicily in 1934 to avoid a murder charge.

Genovese returned to the United States following World War II and schemed to recover his former position, but he had to contend with Anastasia, who looked with a covetous eye on the Mangano domain. First, Anastasia ordered Philip Mangano murdered on April 19, 1951, and when Vincent Mangano disappeared later in that year, Anastasia took over. (He is credited with having abducted Mangano, who was tortured for information about his operations and murdered once he talked.) This was not done without Luciano's approval.

Although Luciano had been deported to his native Italy after World War II, he was still the top member of the American syndicate, ruling from his Italian exile. When Luciano secretly left Italy in 1949 and visited Cuba, a steady stream of American gangsters flew to Havana to pay homage to the boss of bosses. Anastasia appeared and held a secret conference with Luciano, and it was at this time, federal agents believe, that Luciano gave his approval for the elimination of Vincent Mangano. Anastasia would never have eradicated a Mafia family boss without the blessing of the boss of bosses.

As a Mafia don, however, Anastasia displayed an erratic, explosive nature and found it impossible to check his mercurial, murderous temperament. When watching a TV news show

The body of Arnold Schuster, March 8, 1952; Schuster was killed for doing what he thought to be his civic duty by identifying a wanted criminal; he was murdered on a public street at Anastasia's specific order as a warning to others thinking to identify underworld members.

His head bandaged and blood staining his $500 suit, Frank Costello is shown on May 14, 1957, after narrowly missing his own assassination, which had been ordered by Anastasia.

Anastasia (left), shown with his lawyer, only weeks before his murder was scheduled by the retaliating Costello and other syndicate-Mafia leaders, especially Vito Genovese.

Left: Vincent "The Chin" Gigante, who fired the bullet that only grazed the head of crime boss Frank Costello; Gigante, a Greenwich Village thug, later became head one of New York's Mafia families.

one day in 1952, Anastasia saw Arnold Schuster, an amateur sleuth, who had identified the much-wanted bank robber Willie "The Actor" Sutton on a New York subway and informed police, which had led to Sutton' s arrest. While Schuster was being interviewed, Anastasia leaped from his chair and shouted to his goons, "I can't stand squealers! Hit that guy!"

Schuster was murdered, according to the orders of the Mad Hatter, on March 8, 1952. When news of this mob murder reached the ears of Vito Genovese, the calculating Mafia don began to spread the word that Anastasia was unstable, a thug murderer. who did not deserve the high rank he had achieved in the syndicate. Genovese also wooed the loyalties of Carlo Gambino, who served as Anastasia's underboss and Gambino, in turn, persuaded his good friend Joseph Profaci, a Mafia family boss, to oppose Anastasia at every turn, siding with Genovese.

Standing between these factions, however, was Frank Costello, the so-called Prime Minister of Organized Crime. Costello, along with Meyer Lansky, was the financial guardian of Luciano's old rackets and an avowed enemy of the scheming Don Vitone. Genovese spread the word that Anastasia had attempted to bully his way into controlling some of the lucrative gambling casinos in Cuba, which were controlled by Meyer Lansky and Frank Costello and who were in league with the then military dictator of the island, Fulgencio Batista. The Mad Hatter had been rebuffed and was now plotting against his former ally, Costello, claimed Genovese.

Albert Anastasia's body on the floor of the barbershop in New York's Park Sheraton Hotel, October 25, 1957; his death was decreed by syndicate leader Vito Genovese and reportedly carried out by a "hit team" from the Carlo Gambino crime family.

When on the night of May 14, 1957, Costello was entering his swank Manhattan apartment building when a lumbering, fat young hoodlum, later identified as Vincent "The Chin" Gigante, stood outside the building and shouted at the gang chief from some thirty yards distant: "This is for you, Frank!" With that he fired a single shot and then fled. The bullet only grazed Costello's head and the Prime Minister survived. Gigante was identified by the doorman of the apartment building, but was later tried and acquitted, when Costello refused to identify him as his would-be killer. The word through Mafia enclaves had it that this had been the work of Anastasia; that he had hired Gigante, a Greenwich Village thug, paying him $500 to murder Costello, but that Gigante had botched the job.

Costello himself believed this tale and agreed with Genovese and other Mafia dons that the Mad Hatter had to be eliminated. It was Genovese, of course, who had hired Gigante, instructing him to purposely miss Costello so that the gang chief could legitimately seek and get his vengeance against Anastasia. That vengeance was reaped shortly after 10:15 a.m. on October 25, 1957, when Anastasia walked into the barbershop of New York's Park Sheraton Hotel. He waved at the shop owner, Arthur Grasso, as he sat down in the deep leather of chair four.

Joe Bocchino, who had been cropping Anastasia's short, curly hair for years, covered him with the candy striped barber's cloth and began to clip at the gang boss' hair, while a manicurist sat next to the chair and worked on the Mad Hatter's fingernails. Jimmy, the shoeshine boy, began to slap brown polish on the gangster's wing-tipped shoes. Two short, squat men wearing fedoras and aviator sun glasses then entered the shop and pulled .38-caliber revolvers, waving the shop people away from chair four. As they scattered in fright, both men began to blast at the seated figure.

Anastasia had been dozing in the chair, his eyes closed. They popped open just before the first shot was fired. The gang boss raised his left hand as if to shield his head from the bullet which tore through the palm. Two more bullets smashed his left wrist and entered his hip. Anastasia let out a roar and struggled to get out of the chair, reaching, some reports later said, for a gun that he no longer wore. Bullets crashed into the barber's shelf in front of the chair, splintering bottles of hair tonic. Another bullet struck Anastasia in the back as he stood upright for a moment, the barber's cloth still clinging to him.

Anastasia sank to the floor, and one of the gunmen calmly walked up to the prone figure and fired a bullet into the back of his head, a coup de grace identical to the shot Anastasia had fired into the head of Joe "The Boss" Masseria in 1931. Their gruesome task completed, the two gunmen raced for the door and vanished. They were never apprehended, but gangland consensus had it that the murder had been carried out by Larry and Joe Gallo, who had received a "contract" from Don Vitone Genovese. Another report stated that the hit was ordered by Genovese, but that Mafia don Carlo Gambino sanctioned the murder and it was Gambino who directed fellow Mafia don Joe Profaci to provide his top killers, the Gallo brothers, to execute Anastasia.

Carmine Persico, Jr., later a Colombo underboss, bragged that he killed Anastasia. Another tale—and these are endless in the police precinct houses and bars of New York—insists that an assassination team organized by Joseph "Joe the Blonde" Biondo, a Gambino underboss, killed Anastasia, the actual shootist being Stephen Grammauta, alias Stevie Coogan, then a 40-year-old drug pusher for the mob, who was convicted and sent to prison for heroin trafficking in 1955 and who, incredibly, emerged in his eighties as a Gambino capo in the 1990s, according to FBI reports. Accompanying Grammauta into the barbershop to execute Anastasia, this story reports, were two other middle-aged men from Biondo's crew, 57-year-old Stephen Armone and 53-year-old Arnold "Witty" Wittenberg, also drug pushers.

There was no typical mobster funeral for Albert Anastasia, with massive floral wreaths and a long motorcade of limousines packed with black-suited gangsters. The ceremony was simple and was attended by his family members, including his union-mobster brother, Anthony "Tough Tony" Anastasio (1906-1963), who controlled the Brooklyn waterfront from the 1940s and was vice president of the International Longshoremen's Association. Mafia dons feared that Anastasio might launch reprisals for the murder of his brother, but he prudently declined to pursue any vendettas. Anastasio died of a heart attack on March 1, 1963. Anastasia's wife, Elsa, who married the arch killer in 1937 at age nineteen after moving from Canada to New York, refused to believe any of the terrible stories about her wealthy husband. She insisted that he was a good family man, who worked hard to support his family and maintain their lavish home in Fort Lee, New Jersey.

Mrs. Anastasia claimed that her dutiful husband never drank, only smoked cigarettes and that he was usually home by 9 p.m. He often took the children to see movies, she said, and liked to take the family to visit the homes of friends. "I never heard him say a bad word in front of me or the children," Anastasia's body is removed from the Park Sheraton; his wife later complained that even though her husband made church donations, Catholic prelates refused to consecrate his burial ground.

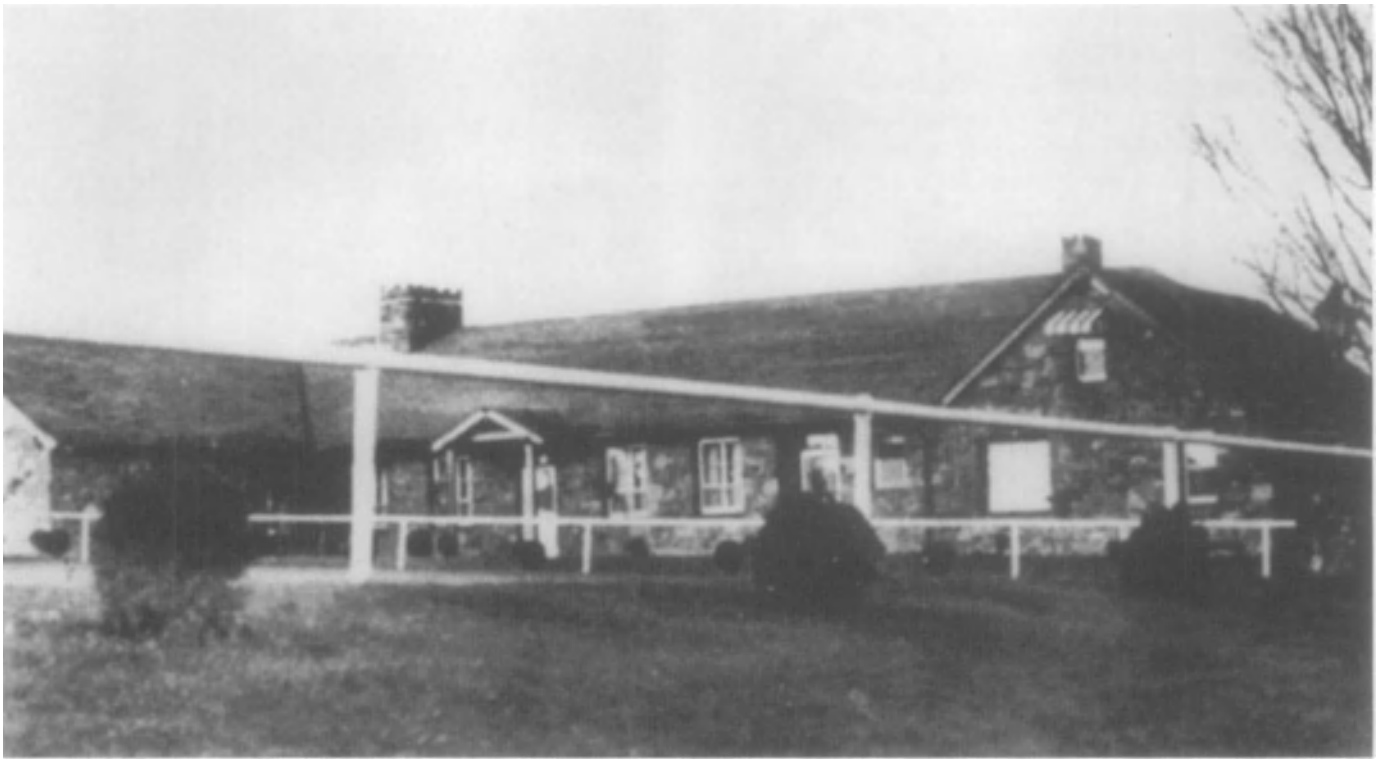
Elsa Anastasia told one writer. "He never spoke roughly. He used to go to church with me every Sunday. He gave generously to the church. Now he's not even buried in consecrated ground." The Anastasia family sold its U.S. holdings and changed the family name, moving to Canada. The same day Anastasia collapsed into the cuttings of his own hair, Vito Genovese took over the old Luciano Mafia family, through underboss Carlo Gambino, ordering Frank Costello to go into permanent retirement.

THE RUN-FOR-COVER CRIME CONFERENCE/1957

Three weeks after the slaying of Mafia-syndicate kingpin Albert Anastasia, about sixty of the top syndicate leaders from around the U.S. met at the country estate of Joseph M. Barbara near Apalachin, New York. This conference was chiefly called by Vito Genovese, the man who had arranged for Anastasia's death. Barbara, the president of the Canada Dry Bottling Company of Endicott, New York, was born in Castellammare, Sicily, in 1905. He had migrated to the U.S. in 1921 and had been active in the rackets from the mid-1920s. (Unlike some of his rather careless contemporaries, Barbara had had the presence of mind to become a citizen in 1927, thus preventing his deportation back to Sicily in the future.)

Barbara had been a suspect in murder cases in 1932 and 1933 but he was never officially charged. Barbara's only conviction occurred in 1944, when he was convicted of possessing 300,000 pounds of illegal sugar. He had been under surveillance for a number of years, especially after New York State Police had observed several syndicate members visiting



The sprawling estate of Joseph Barbara in Apalachin, New York, where sixty-five top-level Mafia-syndicate leaders met on November 14, 1957, all of them scampering down roads and through woods when police arrived.

Barbara in 1956, the same year in which Barbara held meetings with Joseph Bonanno, John Bonventre, and Frank Garofolo in Binghamton, New York.

When state police learned that Barbara was making reservations for several men in the Apalachin area, two state policemen, Police Sergeant Edgar D. Croswell and Trooper Vincent Vasisko, accompanied by two federal agents of the Alcohol-Tobacco Tax Unit, decided to investigate. These officers drove onto the Barbara estate on November 14, 1957. As soon as the officers were spotted by the mob men in Barbara's large house, they broke for open ground, wildly attempting to escape what they thought would be a mass arrest.

Some of the men ran to cars parked nearby and roared off down several roads leading from the rural estate. Others, dressed in expensively tailored suits, men in their sixties and seventies, ran shakily, wobbly-legged, through the fields and into the woods, tearing their clothes with the underbrush as they ran. Roadblocks were set up and many of the men were stopped in their cars or picked up as they wandered, panting, out of the woods. All of the "conventioneers" (Barbara announced that the meeting was a small Canada Dry convention) carried thick wads of cash, some as much as $10,000, but no wallets, although each driver of every limousine produced a driver's license which they all carried in their shirt pockets.

When the identities of those in attendance were made public, the roster was a shocking who's who of the New York Mafia-syndicate. Barbara's brief guests included Vito Genovese, Carlo Gambino, Joseph Bonanno, Joseph Profaci, Joseph Magliocco, Gerardo (Jerry) Catena, Natale Joseph Evola, Michele Miranda, Carmine Lombardozzi, John Ormento, Joseph Riccobono, Paul Castellano, Alfred Rava.

Some of those present had traveled considerable distances and represented far flung fiefdoms of the syndicate. These included Santo Trafficante, Jr., then running a casino for the mob in Havana, Cuba, and later the crime boss of Florida; Gabriel Mannarino from Pennsylvania; Frank DiSimone, head of the Los Angeles Mafia; James Civello, boss of the Dallas syndicate; James Colletti, Colorado crime boss; Frank Zito, boss of southern Illinois; John Scalish, Cleveland's Mafia overlord; Joseph Ida, crime czar of Philadelphia.

Chicago had been represented by Sam Giancana, but Momo had managed to elude police in the woodlands and somehow escape the dragnet, according to one reliable report. The panic exhibited by these men during the impromptu raid caused Cosa Nostra informant Joseph Valachi to sneeringly remark, "If soldiers [low-level mobsters] got arrested in a meet like that, you can imagine what the bosses would have done. There they are, running through the woods like rabbits, throwing away money so they won't be caught with a lot of cash, and some of them throwing away guns. So who are they kidding when they say we got to respect them?"

Though none of those notorious crime bosses were charged after they had been discovered fleeing the Barbara estate, their names were made public and headlines across the country shouted speculations of the summit meeting of the Mafia. The reasons for the meeting, according to Joe Valachi and others, had to do with the pecking order of the national syndicate, chiefly the restructuring of the five New York families. Carlo Gambino, who had been the underboss to the murdered Albert Anastasia, was to be officially recognized as the head of the Anastasia family.

Gambino (who reportedly was the role model of Vito Corleone in Puzo's Mafia novel, The Godfather) had conspired with his lieutenant, Joseph (Joe Bandy) Biondo to have Joseph Barbara, who hosted the ill-fated crime conference.

Mafia don Vito Genovese ran through woods to escape the police.

Brooklyn Mafia don Joseph Profaci, caught in the police dragnet.

Joseph Magliocco (1898-1963), Profaci underboss, caught by police.

Joseph "Joe Bananas" Bonanno made a running escape into the trees.

Chicago Mafia don Sam "Momo" Giancana, who also ran from police.

Michael (Michele) Miranda arrives at a New York courtroom to answer questions about the Apalachin meeting; he claimed it was a "social" gathering.

Anastasia killed, one account stated, responding to pressure from Vito Genovese who wanted Anastasia out of the way so that he could exercise supreme gang rule in New York. Furthermore, the enclave members were present to anoint Genovese himself as a Mafia family head and absolve him of planning Anastasia's killing, which concerned no one in Apalachin anyway since all present feared or hated the kill-crazy Anastasia.

Anthony Anastasio, the slain Anastasia's brother (the difference in spelling had been intentional by Anastasia, to protect his family's good name, he once claimed), angered over the killing, informed Justice Department officials that the bosses had met in Apalachin to establish a hit list of disobedient soldiers, as well as a discussion on whether or not to murder several federal narcotics agents who had been making life difficult for the syndicate. Though a vote was never taken before the state police interrupted the procedures it was felt by most of the older Mafia leaders, the majority present in Barbara's home, that drug trafficking was ruining the structure of the long-established crime cartel and bringing federal and local police heat down upon other lucrative rackets that would have been otherwise left alone. Many of the older dons thought to actually outlaw drug traffic and to put out a standing order that anyone in the syndicate peddling drugs would be killed. This report, however, is more in keeping with the mythical Mafia as portrayed in the film The Godfather than the money-lusting, conscienceless group that met in Apalachin.

The Apalachin enclave did achieve one dramatic effect. The U.S. public became acutely aware of organized crime, and the impetus of the event caused many governmental committees to be established, which probed into crime cartel activities. American citizens, who had thought that gangsters had disappeared with Prohibition or into Warner Brother mobster films, realized that organized crime was bigger and deadlier than ever. The publicized identities of those involved illustrated and endorsed the 1950-1951 crime hearings conducted by Senator Estes Kefauver, investigations that sought to prove that every major American city was linked to another through a criminal organization that was almost as well financed as the federal government.

THE ENDURING BOSS/1940s-1980s

Among those panting gangsters fleeing the disrupted Apalachin Conference was a hawk-nosed, squinty-eyed Chicago gangster named Sam "Momo" Giancana. His presence at the syndicate enclave was as the representative of Chicago's ruling boss, Tony Accardo, who had been running the rackets in the Windy City for more than a decade. Accardo was a product of the old Al Capone regime, having begun his criminal career in the Roaring Twenties as an enforcer for Scarface. Unlike the flamboyant and erratic Giancana, Accardo shunned the limelight. Also unlike Giancana, this quiet-speaking crime boss tried to avoid syndicate murders. He was once quoted as saying: "Every time there is a killing, there is big-time publicity. Then we have our worst enemy in the ring, the press. That's a fight we can't win."

Anthony "Joe Batters" Accardo in 1927, when he was a Capone enforcer.

Anthony Joseph Accardo (1906-1992; AKA: Batters; Big Tuna; Joe Batters; Joe Batty) began his criminal career as a ruthless gunman for Scarface Capone as early as 1922 at the age of sixteen. By the 1950s, he was co-chairman of the board (with Paul "The Waiter" Ricca) of the Chicago Mafia-syndicate. He exercised supreme authority even after he was in semi-retirement in Palm Springs, California in the late 1980s. Son of a Sicilian shoemaker, Accardo was born in Chicago on March 28, 1906.

At left, Paul "The Waiter" Ricca (Felice de Lucia, 1897-1972) took control of the Chicago "Outfit," following the 1943 suicide of Frank Nitti; he is shown fisting with glee on June 10, 1957, upon his acquittal of income tax evasion charges.

At the age of fifteen Accardo received his first police citation, a traffic violation. The following year he was a runner and errand boy for the Torrio-Capone gang, working alongside another young ambitious gangster named Felice De Lucia, who was later known as Paul "The Waiter" Ricca. Both Accardo and Ricca would, at the death of Frank "The Enforcer" Nitti in 1943, run the Chicago mob together with Ricca as the undisputed boss of bosses, until Ricca's semi-retirement in the mid-1950s.

During the mid-1920s, Accardo earned his fierce sobriquet, Joe Batters, because of his ability to wield a baseball bat on those who displeased his bosses, mostly loan-shark victims, who failed to make their weekly payments, and truculent bar owners, who did not sell enough of the Torrio-Capone brew during Prohibition. He was also known to use a pistol and machine gun with expert effect.

Accardo in the late 1940s, when he was the underboss to Paul "The Waiter" Ricca.

Accardo was regularly arrested during the 1920s for serious offenses and, throughout his career in organized crime, he ran up a string of twenty-seven arrests for carrying concealed weapons, gambling, extortion, kidnapping, and murder. Witnesses to the various mob murders committed by Accardo, according to police reports, disappeared before the gunman could be prosecuted. By the late 1920s, Accardo had been loaned out to Claude Maddox, who ran the Circus Gang of bootleggers and labor terrorists, a satellite of the Capone gang.

Accardo had become so well known in underworld circles as a loyal and fearless gunman that Capone selected him as one of his personal bodyguards, and he worked under the direction of Frank Nitti and, sometimes, Machine Gun Jack McGurn. It was Accardo's job, as a front-line bodyguard, to stop anyone from invading Capone's headquarters, the Lexington Hotel.

Throughout 1928, Accardo was observed by detectives as he sat in the lobby of this hotel with a machine gun in his lap. No policeman thought to walk up to the gangster and arrest him for displaying such lethal rapid-fire weapons, but Capone, at the time, owned most of Chicago's judges and police. When Capone decided to eliminate the gang led by George "Bugs" Moran on Chicago's north side in 1929, he employed Claude Maddox and Accardo to help set up the St. Valentine's Day Massacre.

The car used by the killers, later disguised as a CPD detective squad car, was rented by a man who gave his name as James Morton and police later speculated that this man had been Accardo. The car was kept in a garage rented by another man who gave an address which was later proved to be owned by Maddox. Though some reports claim that Accardo was one of the machine gun killers at the Massacre, the evidence proves otherwise, although he undoubtedly helped McGurn to plan the killing of Moran's seven men.

As Capone began to settle old scores at the close of the 1920s, he used Accardo more and more as his special enforcer. He was listed as a prime suspect in the murders of Joseph Aiello, Jack Zuta, and Michael "Mike de Pike" Heitler. In 1931, the Chicago Crime Commission named Accardo as one of the top twenty-eight public enemies in the city. When Capone went to prison for income tax evasion, his empire in Chicago was run by his lieutenants: Frank "The Enforcer" Nitti, Jake Guzik, and the Fischetti brothers.

Operating under the orders of these mob leaders was a bevy of enforcers that included Accardo, Ricca, and a young psychopathic killer named Sam "Momo" Giancana. They solidified their own positions by overseeing Capone's many rackets. Accardo concentrated on gambling, supervising Capone-established clubs, but adding more gaming operations which remained in his exclusive, rapidly expanding domain, mostly in Chicago's twenty-eighth ward.

Utilizing Capone's ideas of investing illegal money into legitimate enterprises, Accardo, who had amassed a sizable amount of money from his gambling enterprises, put capital into many honest businesses. He invested in trucking firms, hotels, coal and lumber companies, restaurants, travel agencies, and currency exchanges. As the old guard of the Capone Gang died or went into retirement, the fortunes of Accardo improved, along with that of his friend Ricca.

When Frank Nitti committed suicide in 1943 rather than face a long prison term for tax evasion, Ricca, though in federal prison at the time, assumed leadership of the Chicago Mafia-syndicate. Accardo never shared power with Ricca, as some reports have it. Ricca was always senior in authority to Accardo until the time of Ricca's death in 1972. Accardo always deferred to "The Waiter" on all important decisions, even though Accardo was the nominal boss of Chicago from the mid-1950s.

Chicago gang boss Accardo in 1965, then dubbed "Big Tuna" by a newspaper wag after the don landed a marlin in Florida.

While Paul Ricca was finishing a prison term for tax evasion, Accardo made several trips to Leavenworth to get his marching orders from the boss. On one occasion, in 1945, as revealed by U.S. Senator Estes Kefauver, Accardo accompanied Ricca's tax lawyer, Eugene Bernstein, on a trip to the federal penitentiary. Accardo, using Bernstein as a cover, signed the prison visitor register as Joseph Bulger, a Chicago attorney and one-time president of the Italo-American National Union (Unione Siciliane). Using this alias, Accardo met with Ricca to take orders on mob operations, as well as to make arrangements in paying off the tax debts of Ricca and Louis "Little New York" Campagna, another aging Capone lieutenant, in order to facilitate the release of these two gangsters.

Following Ricca's release, Accardo was rewarded for his loyalty and obedience by being given the Chicago gambling operations, which included all gambling in northern Indiana. In addition to controlling dozens of gambling dens and parlors, Accardo operated a few luxurious dens outright in the 1950s such as a sprawling den on north Clark Street, which Accardo owned with Mel Clark.

The gambling den was a full-fledged wire service operation with direct wires to all of the nation's racetracks giving instant results. Accardo soon ordered Clark to depart for greener pastures, which he did without argument, being replaced by Bernard Korshak, brother of underworld attorney Sidney Korshak. This operation alone, according to one estimate, netted Accardo about $25,000 each day or $7.5 million a year.

By 1950, Accardo was virtual master of all gambling in Chicago, except for the enormous policy racket controlled by Big Jim Martin, who operated in tandem with George D. Kells, alderman of the Twenty-eighth Ward. These men had for years operated a sprawling gambling operation, paying a percentage of the take to the syndicate.

Ricca suddenly decided that the mob should have all the profits and ordered Kells and Martin to go to work for the syndicate as paid employees. Both men balked at the idea and Accardo was ordered by Ricca to get rid of the pair. Accardo, in turn, called in John "Jackie the Lackie" Cerone, one of his most trusted hitmen.

Cerone, on November 15, 1950, went after Big Jim Martin with a shotgun, wounding him. The gunman later complained that the ammunition he had been forced to use in his haste was "old stuff" or he would have certainly accomplished his assignment and killed Martin. The shooting was nevertheless effective. Martin immediately sold everything he had in Chicago and relocated in Los Angeles.

Alderman Kells did not wait for a visit from Cerone. He packed his wife and belongings and drove off to Florida, telling local newsmen that he had to seek warmer climes because his wife was ill. The Ricca-Accardo domain was now unbroken to the city limits in all directions from the lake. Their minions controlled more than 10,000 gambling outlets, chiefly for policy, in newstands, bars, and cigar stores, adding many more millions to the syndicate coffers each year.

The power Ricca and Accardo wielded in the early 1950s was certainly equal to that of Capone in the 1920s. Chicago's fearless Judge John H. Lyle, one of the few magistrates the mob never bought, recalled the deep influence Accardo exercised in Chicago's city government: "Reading a newspaper story in 1951, I felt tempted to glance at the dateline to make sure the calendar had not been turned back to the Prohibition days. Accardo had been picked up for questioning. A lower court judge made a night trip to police headquarters and ordered the gang leader freed after permitting him to sign his own bond ... In court the next day, the judge discharged him. Despite criticism by the Chicago Crime Commission and the Chicago Bar Association, the Democratic organization reslated the judge and as 1960 began he was still on the bench."

As Accardo grew richer, his tastes and ambitions expanded. He no longer wished to live in a confining hotel suite or apartment. He longed for the respectability of the suburbs. One of his old associates, the brainy Murray "The Camel" Humphreys, a devout apartment dweller, told Accardo that "smart money doesn't go to the suburbs. You and your family will stick out like a sore thumb and the feds will always know exactly where you are. Bad idea, Tony."

Sam "Momo" Giancana briefly took control of the Chicago Outfit, but a flamboyant lifestyle brought about his 1975 murder; he is shown under arrest, his right hand manacled to a chair.

Gus Alex, one of Accardo's most loyal underbosses, shown on July 31, 1958, testifying before a the U.S. Senate Rackets Committee; he took the fifth amendment thirty-eight times, refusing to remove the sun glasses because "the light in here hurts my eyes."

Chicago hit man, Felix "Milwaukee Phil" Alderisio, reportedly killed two dozen people on orders from Outfit bosses.

Accardo wanted what most successful American men then desired, a spacious home in a crime-free suburb with verdant lawns and tall trees. He insisted upon it, and what Accardo insisted upon, he got. The gang boss began shopping about, but his inquiries through operatives met with rebuffs from certain real estate agencies when they learned that the notorious Accardo was the real client. Finally, Accardo managed to buy a sprawling estate in River Forest, which he purchased for $150,000 cash and loaded the place with expensive furniture and decorations.

One of Accardo's most treasured possessions was a $10,000 black onyx bathtub in which he could luxuriate as he organized his daily syndicate operations, a stogie in one hand and a pen and pencil in the other, as he scribbled his ciphered orders on a little writing board overhanging the tub. The crime boss added a twenty-room Miami, Florida, mansion to his possessions in 1960, a structure estimated at that time to be worth more than $300,000.

Again, the mob boss spent lavishly on furniture and decorations and, again, his bathrooms were splendors to behold. One visitor to the Miami mansion later expressed surprise to see that the sink in one bathroom was supported by four legs of solid gold. The River Forest home was sold in 1978 for about $480,000, indicating that Accardo was also a shrewd real estate investor, having made more than $300,000 on his original purchase. At that time, new pressure from the FBI was added; in one raid on Accardo's River Forest home, agents discovered $275,000 in cash. Such embarrassing discoveries caused the crime boss to leave the suburb and take up almost permanent residence in his Palm Springs estate.

Accardo millions continued to roll in and the Chicago syndicate had no peers, supported completely by the reigning politicians, particularly the clout-conscious members of the Kelly-Nash political machine. Chicago was a wide-open town for gambling and prostitution, this being an age when drug use was at a minimum and usually confined to the black ghettos, considered at that time by syndicate bosses as a "dirty and dangerous business." Then Accardo fell afoul of the same people who had imprisoned his mentor, Al Capone.

IRS agents began to probe deeply into his fabulous income and he was indicted for tax evasion. In 1960 he was convicted and sentenced to six years in prison and fined $15,000. The conviction, however, was later overturned by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals sitting in Chicago, because of so-called "prejudicial" newspaper publicity that had occurred during Accardo's trial. He was a free man and could go on to boast that he had never spent a night in jail, even though Accardo came close to imprisonment, when he had been cited for contempt in the Kefauver Hearings in 1950-51. Accardo was brought before the McClellan Committee investigating U.S. rackets (1957-1963) and in his appearance at one hearing he took the Fifth Amendment 172 times.

Accardo's most serious internal problems evolved out of his tax evasion charges. He began to glean too much publicity for the syndicate at the time, which made Ricca nervous. The Waiter decided that Tony Accardo should step, not down but out, of the limelight in 1956, decreeing that a better day-to-day boss of the syndicate would be Sam "Momo" Giancana, a loudmouthed, tough gunman, who had ruthlessly killed his way to prominence and who had for some years been Ricca's secret, personal enforcer, eliminating those Ricca chose to kill without conferring with Accardo.

It remains unclear exactly how Giancana took over control of the syndicate from Accardo during this confusing period of time, as confusing for the mob as it was for the federal agents who doggedly kept surveillance on Accardo's River Forest home. One story held that Ricca called Accardo and shocked his longtime friend by stating he should step aside for Giancana until the tax evasion charges were settled. Accardo refused. He reportedly told Ricca that he had no intentions of giving up his power. The next night, some time in 1956, Giancana, with Ricca's knowledge and approval, appeared at Accardo's home and fired six bullets from his .45-caliber pistol through the door, then calmly walked to his car and drove away, clearly a message that the next time, the bullets would be inside of Accardo, instead of his front door.

Giancana took over and Accardo stepped aside, concentrating on his tax problems. But Momo Giancana proved to be a serious error in judgment for Paul "The Waiter" Ricca. Giancana was a flashy braggart, who loved to be seen in public with celebrities such as his mistress, Phyllis McGuire, of the singing McGuire Sisters. He snarled threats and brags to newsmen and loved to read about himself as the kingpin of Chicago crime.

Giancana was the archetypal gangster in the shiny sharkskin suit, dark sunglasses and snap-brim hat (although Momo had the persistent bad taste to wear white socks). Tony Accardo must have secretly relished Ricca's mistake in picking Giancana as the front man as he whiled away his time, awaiting appeals to his tax conviction by traveling about the country, buying up real estate in California, Arizona, Florida, Nevada, and South America.

Lunch with the boys, 1976; Chicago crime boss (1) Tony Accardo, sits in a Chicago restaurant with his underbosses: (2) Joseph Amato; (3) Joseph "Little Caesar" DiVarco; (4) James Torello; (5) Joseph Lombardo; (6) John "Jackie the Lackey" Cerone; (7) Alfred Pilotto; (8) Vincent Solano; (9) Dominic Di Bella; (10) Joseph Aiuppa (identified in inset above by numbered silhouettes).

On one occasion, while fishing in the Florida Keys, Accardo returned in his chartered boat with a huge marlin, next to which he proudly posed at dockside. Chicago newsman Ray Brennan, who had been sent to the Keys to do a story on the idling Accardo, took a photo of Accardo and the marlin and promptly dubbed the exiled crime boss "Big Tuna" Accardo. The name clung to Accardo as it does to this day, absurd as it was, and certainly less apt than Joe Batters. Neither sobriquet was uttered to Accardo's face, even in jest.

Giancana, as the shrewd Ricca had planned, served Accardo well. Federal authorities began to pay more attention to him than Accardo, which was Ricca's scheme from the start. Accardo continued to make all the top-level decisions while, Giancana took the heat. When Accardo's tax conviction was overturned in 1960, he went on playing "dead" as the top don of Chicago, but systematically continued to pull the strings, especially after Ricca "officially" retired in 1968. Ricca would die of natural causes in 1972, leaving Accardo in complete control, although Giancana was the line boss of all Chicago operations.

Federal agents began, by the early 1970s, to follow Giancana everywhere. They parked night and day outside of his home and followed the crime boss wherever he went by car, plane, or rail, down the block or across the country. They photographed him incessantly and bugged restaurants where he met with other gangsters such as Felix "Milwaukee Phil" Alderisio, one of his top enforcers.

The constant surveillance drove the normally hotheaded Giancana into frenzied tirades. To escape his dogged pursuers, Giancana began to travel to both coasts, then to Mexico. He could not, however, escape. Finally, after another trip to Mexico, Giancana returned to Chicago, weary of the constant federal pressure. He acted as if he were still in charge of the syndicate, but his power had waned and most of his trusted aides had been systematically eliminated by Accardo allies. Giancana was a liability to the mob and was murdered in his own home on June 19, 1975, while he was frying sausages for a late-night snack. His killer was never found.

The Chicago mob was then briefly run by Sam "Teets" Battaglia, with enforcer Felix "Milwaukee Phil" Alderisio as his second-in-command. Jackie Cerone then briefly held control and was replaced by aging Joseph Aiuppa. Then Accardo resumed total control of the Chicago syndicate with Joey Aiuppa as his strong second-in-command. (It is safe to assume that Accardo had really been in control of the mob all along and that Giancana and others posed in that capacity to shield Accardo, while appearing to be in charge of the Chicago rackets.)

Other "young turk" mobsters moved up through the ranks during the late 1970s and into the 1980s. There were many aspirants to mob leadership, including the ambitious Tony Spilotro, who was suspected of having killed Giancana to qualify for boss status, but Accardo picked his successor carefully. This proved to be Joseph Ferriola, who died of natural causes on March 11, 1989

By 1989, Big Tuna Accardo had reportedly retired to his estate in Palm Springs, California, leaving in charge Sam Anthony Carlisi, a wily, low-profile mobster, who took charge of all daily syndicate operations. Gus Alex, a longtime Accardo associate, also in semi-retirement at age seventy-three, acted as Carlisi's senior adviser. Second-in-command was John DiFronzo. Aiuppa and Cerone, both exercised from their prison cells considerable influence over operations in the western suburbs of Chicago.

Yet, Accardo was still consulted long distance on all urgent mob matters, remaining chairman of the board. His word was still law in the Chicago underworld, which worked with, but has never been controlled by the national syndicate headed by the five traditional Mafia families in New York. Accardo died of natural causes on May 27, 1992. Carlisi and DiFronzo went to prison in 1993 on separate convictions and Joseph Lombardo took control of the Chicago outfit in 1994, remaining in that post even after DiFronzo was released from prison the following year. According to reliable sources, Lombardo, remained in power through 1999 but was replaced by his cousin, Joseph Andriacci in 2002.

These latter-day Chicago crime bosses learned much from Accardo, who was best remembered by FBI agents as a Chicago crime boss dedicated to avoiding publicity and one who sought to settle problems without bloodshed (although he sanctioned many murders, when other options were not available). Accardo had little regard for the showy crime bosses of the East Coast, particularly such strutting mob dons as John Gotti. Accardo once remarked to an FBI agent: "We're gentlemen here in Chicago. They're savages in New York."

DON VITONE TAKES OVER/1930s-1950s

One of those "savages in New York," to whom Tony Accardo referred was a brutal, insidious crime boss, who never hesitated to murder an opponent or anyone he suspected (and these were in the hundreds) of interference with his scheme to dominate the national crime syndicate.

Vito Genovese (1897-1969; AKA: Don Vitone) proved time and again that he would betray his friends, assassinate business associates, and outwit, for the most part, his most cunning underworld rivals in his murderous climb to become the boss of bosses. He began inauspiciously enough, born of poor parents in Risigliano, Italy, near Naples on November 21, 1897.

Genovese immigrated to the U.S., arriving on May 23, 1913, on board the S.S. Taormina. He first lived in the Italian section of New York City's Lower East Side and immediately fell in with several gangs. Genovese preyed on small store owners and pushcart peddlers, selling them protection (against himself, of course), stealing, and extorting. In 1917, he met a thief who was as cunning and crafty as himself, Charles "Lucky" Luciano.

Luciano was seemingly smarter than Genovese, or Genovese let Luciano think so. He became Luciano's lieutenant and together both young men took up armed robbery and burglary. While going to meet Luciano one day in 1917, before committing a planned armed robbery, Genovese was stopped by a suspicious patrolman who frisked him and found

Charles "Lucky" Luciano, flanked by two detectives, is shown entering a court building where, on June 18, 1936, he was sentenced to thirty to fifty years in prison on charges of compulsory prostitution; his position as head of the crime syndicate was taken over by several board members, including Vito Genovese.

Genovese thought to take over the crime syndicate, but fled the U.S. in 1937, after it was learned that he had ordered the murder of Ferdinand "The Shadow" Boccia.

Mrs. Anna Genovese; her first husband was reportedly murdered on orders from Vito Genovese, who then had the killers themselves murdered to eliminate witnesses.

a loaded revolver in his coat. He was arrested and given sixty days in the workhouse for carrying a concealed weapon. Genovese blamed Luciano for this first of arrests, believing either that Luciano had informed on him so that he himself could avoid an impending arrest for fencing stolen goods, or because Luciano did nothing to get Genovese out of the workhouse, even though he had earlier promised his lieutenant to get him a lawyer and pay all fines if he should get into trouble.

At the time, Luciano visited Genovese in the workhouse and pleaded poverty. Genovese served every day of his sentence. Upon his release, however, Genovese went back to work for Luciano. He was arrested in 1918, again for carrying a concealed weapon. This time he paid a $250 fine. He and Luciano were by then thriving with their small-time rackets, as lieutenants of gang boss Jacob "Little Augie" Orgen. At first, Luciano and Genovese, along with Joe Adonis, Albert Anastasia, and others, concentrated on establishing a number of cheap brothels in Brooklyn and later Manhattan. Luciano and Genovese were active in bootlegging during the Prohibition era, but they found flesh peddling and, by the early 1920s, narcotics, were more lucrative. Dope peddling at that time was frowned upon even by the mob bosses. It was considered "unclean," and it was associated almost exclusively with the black underworld.

As Luciano and Genovese branched out, they found more important gangsters controlling large territories in Manhattan, the most lucrative area for rackets. These included bootleggers Big Bill Dwyer, Owney Madden, Larry Fay, Jack "Legs" Diamond, Dutch Schultz, and Nathan "Kid Dropper" Kaplan. Overseeing most of these gangs as the crime overlord of the early 1920s was the millionaire gambler and rackets czar, Arnold Rothstein. It was Rothstein who was interested in expanding the narcotics racket in New York and thus financed the smuggling of drugs into New York through Little Augie Orgen. In turn, Orgen handed over the drug traffic to his lieutenants, Luciano and Genovese. Meanwhile, the Italian crime bosses of the day, Joseph "Joe the Boss" Masseria, and Salvatore Maranzano, continued their old-fashioned rackets.

Michael "Trigger Mike" Coppola (AKA: Michael Russo, 1900-66), at left, took over Genovese's rackets in 1937; Coppola is shown with his wife Doris and her father, both of whom he murdered after Doris Coppola accidentally overheard his plan to kill a New York politician.

Luciano and Genovese became the chief suppliers of heroin in New York, becoming wealthy, but still operating under the commands of Orgen and Rothstein. In 1925, however, they switched their allegiance and major association to Masseria, expanding Masseria's bootlegging operations. By then Luciano and Genovese had allied themselves with many non-Italian gangs and gangsters, particularly the Bug & Meyer Mob, headed by the shrewd Meyer Lansky, a friend of Luciano's since boyhood, and Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel, Lansky's quick-witted protege and enforcer. Other non-Italian gangsters such as Louis "Lepke" Buchalter and his dim-witted lieutenant, Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro, became Luciano-Genovese allies.

Though he was nominally their boss, Masseria meant little to Luciano and Genovese. He was, in their terminology, an old-fashioned "Mustache Pete," a crime boss who archaically clung to ancient rackets such as Black Handing. He nevertheless commanded the loyalty of most Italian gangsters in New York. Genovese, at this time, used Masseria's Old World connections to establish a front for his rackets, a trading company which imported olive oil and other food products from Italy

Vito Genovese, shown in 1945, after being extradited from Italy to face a murder charge in the 1934 killing of Ferdinand Boccia. Genovese flourished in Italy during World War II by informing on black marketeers to fascist and then later U.S. officials, taking over the black markets in Italy himself and making millions and Sicily. This company was used as a front to smuggle hard drugs into the U.S. from the Middle East. Luciano and, in particular, Genovese, kept low profiles in this era. Genovese was a family man. He had married for the first time in 1924, but his wife died in 1929.

Witness for the state: Ernest "The Hawk" Rupolo (left, wearing eyepatch) is shown with District Attorney Julius Helfand in 1946, when he told a court that Genovese ordered him and others to murder Ferdinand Boccia in 1934; Rupolo was murdered on Genovese's orders, his mutilated body fished out of Jamaica Bay on August 27, 1964.

Genovese married again in 1932, wedding Anna Petillo Vernotico, a union that produced a daughter, Nancy, and a son, Philip. (He would divorce Anna in 1950.) Genovese spotted the attractive Anna at a social gathering in early 1932. She was married at the time to Gerard Vernotico. Two weeks after Genovese met Anna, her husband was found murdered on March 16, 1932, strangled to death atop a Manhattan building. Next to Vernotico's body was that of Antonio Lonzo, who had also been shot to death. Lonzo had accidentally come upon the killers of Vernotico, while they were strangling their victim to death and he was eliminated as a witness. The killers, identified years later by Joseph Valachi, were Peter Mione and Michael Barrese. Both were killed on Genovese's orders, so that no witnesses could ever link him with the murders.

Unlike most of his peers, Genovese was not a nightclubbing gangster. He went home to his family at night and stayed there, planning his future in the rackets each night for long hours before going to bed. He kept a revolver beneath his pillow, one under the bed and another in the pocket of a coat that always hung on a nearby chair. His apartment, and later all the houses he occupied, were rigged with special alarm systems so that Genovese would know instantly if anyone had entered the premises. On several occasions, these home-made alarm systems, a series of bells, tin cans hooked to ropes, chimes stretched across windows, went off and Genovese would leap from his bed, grabbing his revolvers, ready to fight to the death.

Opposite Page: The body of New Jersey crime boss Willie Moretti, murdered in Joe's Restaurant, Cliffside, New Jersey, October 4, 1951; he was the first of many bosses Genovese ordered killed in his attempt to take over the crime syndicate.

During the 1920s, Genovese used his weapons often, being arrested a dozen times for assault, robbery, and murder. He reportedly killed at least six men between 1920 and 1930. In 1930, as the Depression deepened over the land, the Mafia went to war with itself in what was later described as the Castellammarese War. This internecine Mafia battle came about when the ambitious Mafia chief Salvatore Maranzano (1868-1931), who was from Castellammare, Sicily, decided that only Mafia members from that area, chiefly himself, were entitled to run the rackets in New York.

Maranzano declared war on his arch rival, Joe the Boss Masseria. The Mafia at that time was an organization of Italians and Sicilians, although the Mafia had originally been an exclusive Sicilian criminal organization. By the mid-1920s, the Camorra, the Italian counterpart of the Mafia, had lost its influence and its forces, especially in the U.S., and had joined the Mafia in one large, but rather disjointed organization. Maranzano, who was a fundamentalist to the core, intended to purge the Mafia of all non-Sicilians.

Albert Anastasia, chief of the syndicate's dreaded Murder, Inc., the man Vito Genovese feared most and ordered killed on October 25, 1957; with Anastasia dead, Don Vitone seized many rackets from the other Mafia families in New York.

Maranzano's gunmen clashed with Masseria's thugs throughout 1930-1931. Dozens of gangsters were shot and stabbed to death in this ruthless war, where no quarter was given. Luciano realized that such a war was futile and only slowed down the development of his dream, a crime cartel that would actually run all the rackets in the U.S. Without Masseria's approval, Luciano went to Maranzano, suing for peace. The old man insisted that there would be no peace, until Masseria was dead. Luciano then decided that he would rid himself of both Masseria and Maranzano. Once the "Mustache Petes" were killed off, his national crime syndicate could become a reality. Luciano promised Maranzano that Joe Masseria would come to a quick end. He ordered his trustworthy Vito Genovese to lead a select "international" group of killers, Italians and non-Italians, who would execute Masseria.

On the night of April 15, 1931, Luciano dined with his boss Masseria at Scarpato's Restaurant in Coney Island, a stronghold of Masseria. Luciano got up after finishing his meal and went to the washroom. Masseria was left at the table alone in a restaurant that was suddenly and strangely empty of other customers. Into Scarpato's marched Genovese, two revolvers in his suit pockets. Following him were Joe Adonis, Albert Anastasia, and Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel. The four gangsters calmly walked up to Masseria and emptied their guns into him. Masseria fell forward on the table dead. The killers walked from the restaurant without interference. Police later found Luciano waiting for them. He explained that he was in the washroom at the time of the killing.

Maranzano was initially delighted at this murder. He called off the war and declared himself boss of bosses. Maranzano did not trust Luciano and Genovese, however. He told one of his men, Joseph Valachi, who was later to become the most celebrated informer of the Mafia-Cosa Nostra: "I can't get along with those two guys. We got to get rid of them before we can control anything." Maranzano did not act fast enough. Thomas "Three-Finger Brown" Lucchese, an on-and-off ally of both Maranzano and Luciano, warned Luciano and Genovese of Maranzano's plan to eliminate them. Luciano and Genovese put together their own "hit" squad, sending four men dressed as policemen to Maranzano's Manhattan offices on September 10, 1931. (This use of fake policemen had worked well two years earlier, when Al Capone's killers gained entrance to a Chicago garage to line up seven men of the George "Bugs" Moran gang and machine gun them to death in what was later known as the St. Valentine's Day Massacre.)

The fake cops invading Maranzano's officesBreal estate offices located in the Eagle Building on Park Avenue—were Red Levine, a member of the Bug & Meyer Mob, Bugsy Siegel, Albert Anastasia, and Lucchese, who proved his loyalty to the new regime by helping kill his former boss, Maranzano. Lucchese would be rewarded by being given the leadership of one of New York's five Mafia families, a position he would retain for decades. When the four bogus cops arrived in the offices, they were met by Maranzano's bodyguard, Girolama "Bobby Doyle" Santucci, who ordered them to leave.

Maranzano, however, always seeking cooperation with the police, emerged from his inner office to affably greet the invaders, who suddenly trained their guns on him. Levine then put his gun away and produced a long knife, advancing on the Boss of Bosses. In a fierce struggle, while the three other assassins stood by laughing, Levine stabbed Maranzano six times, before Maranzano fell to the floor. The killers were about to leave their victim, thinking him dead, but Siegel noticed Maranzano's head move. Anastasia said: "What do you know about that? The bastard is still alive." All four killers then leveled their revolvers at the prone Maranzano and fired a dozen bullets into his quivering body.

The notorious informer Joseph Valachi (testifying before the Senate committee investigating organized crime in the U.S.), who revealed the secrets of "La Cosa Nostra," and, among others, detailed the widespread crimes of Vito Genovese that sent the most powerful Mafia leader in America to prison.

With Maranzano out of the way, Luciano and Genovese moved to establish the national crime syndicate. Genovese did not agree with Luciano's plans to include non-Italians on the board. He was particularly opposed to Lansky and Buchalter. He also disliked the idea of Anastasia, Adonis, and gambler and political fixer, Frank Costello, sitting on the board. But Luciano had his way.

Meanwhile, Genovese and his rackets flourished. He earned from between $200,000 and $500,000 each year while working under the direction of Luciano. While Luciano directly supervised his prostitution empire, which was being expanded from coast to coast, Genovese concentrated on drug smuggling and peddling. One of Genovese's side rackets was fleecing wealthy Italian businessmen in his crooked card games. In September 1934, Genovese took $160,000 from a rich Italian in the back room of a small restaurant owned by one of his henchmen, Ferdinand "The Shadow" Boccia. When Boccia learned of the staggering amount Genovese won in a game that Boccia had helped rig, he demanded $35,000 of the take. Genovese squinted his eyes in subtle shock at his lieutenant's blatant demand and said that he would consider cutting in Boccia on his spoils.

His answer came on September 9, 1934 in the form of five killers: Peter Defeo, George Smurra, Gus Frasca, Mike Mirandi, and Ernest "The Hawk" Rupolo who shot Boccia to death. Willie Gallo, a member of Mirandi's troop, learned of the Boccia killing and Genovese ordered Gallo murdered. The chore fell to Rupolo, who was a friend of Gallo's. He and Gallo attended a movie a few nights later. When they emerged Rupolo pulled a gun and put it to his friend's head, pulling the trigger. Nothing happened.

Gallo turned in surprise and said: "What the hell is this?"

"A joke," said Rupolo. He fumbled about with the weapon, taking out the bullets. Then he held it up to the incredulous Gallo, saying: "Look, the gun isn't loaded." When the pair returned to Gallo's apartment, Rupolo went to the washroom and examined the gun. He oiled the firing pin, reloaded the weapon, then walked into the parlor where he fired a bullet into Gallo. Rupolo's aim, however, was bad and the intended murder victim lived to identify his assailant. Rupolo was sent to prison for twenty years. After brooding about his imprisonment and the fact that Genovese had not lived up to his word in getting adequate legal assistance for him, Rupolo, accompanied by another prisoner, Peter LaTempa, went to prison officials and began talking about Genovese and his involvement in the Boccia murder.

New York's racket-busting district attorney, Thomas E. Dewey, who, with his assistant, Burton B. Turkus, would later be responsible for exposing Murder, Inc. and the existence of the national crime cartel, began looking into the Boccia killing. Genovese did not wait to be arrested. He fled the country, returning to Naples, where he had long ago purchased a comfortable villa. Genovese had prepared for just such an emergency. He had taken many trips to Italy over the years, carrying huge amounts of money, which he secreted in Italian and Swiss banks under aliases. When he departed the U.S. in 1937, Genovese had more than $2 million waiting to keep him in royal comfort. He left the U.S. with several expensive cars shipped ahead of him, and a retinue of servants.

Once in Italy, however, Genovese became active in the Mafia-Camorra and was soon heading up Italy's drug traffic operations. He ingratiated himself to Italian dictator Benito Mussolini through Mussolini's foreign minister and son-in-law, Count Galeazzo Ciano and became Ciano's personal drug supplier, providing Ciano with cocaine and heroin. Though Mussolini had publicly declared war on the Mafia and his secret police energetically battled this crime federation in Italy and Sicily, Mussolini allowed Genovese to operate freely in Naples, knowing full well he was a Mafia chieftain.

Ciano vouched for Genovese, who contributed large amounts of money to Mussolini's personal bank accounts. He also contributed $250,000 to establish a majestic monument to Mussolini at fascist headquarters in Nola, Italy. Meanwhile, Genovese established a distribution system of drugs that trailed from the Middle East, through Italy and Sicily and then to the U.S. where his minions and those of Luciano began to expand drug trafficking in the U.S.

Genovese was reported killed during World War II, apparently bombed to death by Allied planes, while dining on the veranda of his villa. Yet, when U.S. forces occupied Naples, Genovese came forward, offering his services as an interpreter. He did more than that. Genovese informed upon every black marketeer in Naples. After these people were arrested and imprisoned, Genovese was honored by the military. He smiled, accepted the accolades and then took over the black market operations of those he had betrayed. Genovese was later exposed by a sleuthing CID agent, Orange Dickey, who identified Genovese as a wanted felon in the U.S., the same Genovese who had fled in 1937 to avoid being charged with the murder of Ferdinand Boccia.

Dickey personally arrested Genovese and escorted him back to New York, where the arch killer was to stand trial for the Boccia murder. The two men testifying against him, Peter La Tempa and Ernest "The Hawk" Rupolo, however, were to be eliminated. From a jail cell, Genovese ordered the death of La Tempa, who was in a Brooklyn jail in protective custody. La Tempa suffered from gallstones and took pain pills regularly. He was given several tablets on January 15, 1945, and, after taking a few, fell to the floor of his cell, writhing in pain. He died a short time later of massive poisoning. Just who gave La Tempa the poisoned pills was never determined, but authorities were convinced that Genovese was behind the murder. This left only Rupolo to testify against Genovese and, as Genovese well knew, this would not be enough to convict the killer. Under New York law, the corroboration of a second witness was required for conviction. A jury was forced to acquit Genovese.

Judge Samuel Leibowitz, once a brilliant criminal trial lawyer, had Genovese brought before him on June 11, 1946, and said to the smug gang chief: "I cannot speak for the jury, but I believe if there were even a shred of corroborating evidence you would have been condemned to the electric chair. By devious means, among which were the terrorizing of witnesses, kidnaping them, yes, even murdering those who would give evidence against you, you have thwarted justice time and again." Leibowitz then dismissed Genovese who turned silently away from the bench, a smug smile playing about his lips.

Days later, Genovese met with his old lieutenants from the 1930s, Mike Mirandi and Anthony Strollo, alias Tony Bender. He ordered them to build up the narcotics rackets throughout New York and told them that "bit by bit" he would take over the city. Luciano by then had been deported to Italy and no longer exercised direct control of the crime cartel he had helped to create. Genovese was welcomed back to the syndicate board, but he knew he had enemies there and he systematically eliminated his opposition.

Genovese caused the execution of New Jersey Mafia boss, Willie Moretti in 1951, the murder of Costello ally Steven Franse in 1953, and that of the fierce Albert Anastasia in 1957. He then had one of his minions attempt to kill Frank Costello, who was aligned with Meyer Lansky. Genovese wanted Lansky's lucrative gambling rackets in Havana, Cuba, but these operations were protected by Costello. On May 2, 1957, a Genovese goon, Vincent "The Chin" Gigante, fired several shots at Costello, wounding him in the head. Costello retired a short time later.

In 1957, it was Genovese who called the notorious Apalachin Meeting where more than 100 top Mafia-syndicate leaders met to acknowledge him as the boss of bosses, as well as to streamline the syndicate's rackets. The meeting was interrupted by the arrival of local police, causing the gangsters, Genovese included, to run like frightened children across meadows and through thick woods. For several years, Genovese dominated the five Mafia families in New York. Yet, in 1959, this most powerful of Mafia leaders was exposed by several of his own men, including the notorious informer, Joseph Valachi.

The government built a strong drug trafficking case against him and Genovese was convicted and sent to the federal penitentiary in Atlanta to serve fifteen years. Genovese still wielded vast power and he used it to settle old scores. In 1964, while a prisoner in Atlanta, the vengeance-seeking Genovese sent his gunmen to kill Ernest "The Hawk" Rupolo. The informer was unearthed and tortured, before he was killed and his body dumped into New York's Jamaica Bay.

Genovese also ordered the death of Joe Valachi, but Valachi outlived the man he sent to prison. Vito Genovese died in the Springfield (Illinois) Prison hospital of a heart attack on February 14, 1969. Only relatives and a few lower echelon mobsters attended his funeral services. None of the bosses of the national crime syndicate made appearances. When Chicago boss Tony Accardo was asked why he had not attended Genovese's funeral, he replied: "That guy? Hell, I didn't even send a card."

COLOMBO GOES PUBLIC/1960s

In the year Vito Genovese was convicted and sent to prison, an ambitious New York Mafia family boss, Joseph Bonanno (1908-2002), thought to take Don Vitone's place as New York's boss of bosses. He was assisted in this daunting enterprise by a bright-minded underworld entrepreneur, Joseph Colombo, Sr. (1923-1978), who later thought to strengthen his position in the New York Mafia by publicly unifying the Italian community under his own banner, a move that earned him the disdain of his fellow dons and brought about his near assassination. Colombo began his criminal career as a lowly thief, until absorbed into the Mafia family run by Joseph Bonanno, known as Joe Bananas.

Vito Genovese, his hands manacled, exits a federal courthouse in New York on February 11, 1960, en route to prison to serve a fifteen-year term on a narcotics conspiracy conviction; he would die of a heart attack in the prison hospital on February 14, 1969.

Joseph "Joe Bananas" Bonanno, who headed one of New York's Mafia families and who ordered most of his fellow Mafia dons murdered in 1963.

When Joe Bananas decided to take over all the Mafia families in the early 1960s, he called his underboss, Joseph Magli-occo, giving him one day in late fall of 1963 a devastating "hit" list of the top Mafia-syndicate leaders. Magliocco, in turn, called Colombo, his top enforcer, telling him that he must murder Thomas "Three-Finger Brown" Lucchese (c.1900-1967), Mafia don of New York and New Jersey; Carlo Gambino (1902-1976), Mafia don of Brooklyn; Steven Magaddino (1891-1974), Mafia chief of Buffalo, New York, who was, ironically, Bonanno's cousin; Frank DiSimone, Mafia head of Southern California, and several others. Colombo took one look at this murder list and realized that such an assignment would mean his own death. Magliocco's willingness to obey Bonanno's order and assign Colombo to this task perhaps meant little to him since he was on death's doorstep and knew it, having had several heart attacks; he would die of a heart attack on December 28, 1963.

The self-serving Colombo, however, immediately went to those designated to be killed and informed them of Joe Bananas' insane plan.

On October 21, 1964, Bonanno was himself kidnaped, along with his lawyer, William P. Maloney. The kidnapper was none other than one of his own bodyguards, Mike Zaffarano, and some others, or so the story goes. He was held for nineteen months before being released from the custody of his cousin, Steve Magaddino, or so that story goes, on his promise to retire from the rackets.

Still another report insists that Bonanno faked his own kidnaping in order to steer clear of the Mafia reprisals after he had attempted to have most of the syndicate leaders killed. Both Joe and Bill Bonanno later publicly stated that Magliocco and not his boss Joe Bananas, had decided to "hit" many of the top Mafia family leaders on his own and that this idea was fostered by Magliocco's inflated self-estimation of his position in the syndicate. This worthless claim was laid at the grave of Magliocco, who was by then dead and buried, defenseless from the beyond.

One-time "boss of bosses" Carlo Gambino (right) is shown under arrest, accompanied by a federal agent in 1970; he was at the top of Bonanno's "hit" list. Gambino had, from the early 1930s diligently acquired deep protection for his rackets by routinely paying off politicians, judges and high-ranking police officials.

Joseph Profaci, who headed a powerful Mafia family, was also marked for murder by Bonanno; Profaci had "adopted" Joseph Colombo, the man designated to arrange the deaths of the dons decreed by Bonanno and who, instead, informed Profaci about his murder assignment, assuring for himself a future high post in the Mafia.

Joseph Bonanno, Sr., and son, Joseph, Jr., going to a federal building in Tucson, Arizona in 1969, where Joe Bananas was about to be indicted by a grand jury; the elder Bonanno was reportedly "kidnapped" in 1964, and held hostage by a fellow don for nineteen months, until he promised to call off his war and retire.

Bonanno, nevertheless, agreed to self-exile, traveling to Haiti and spending almost a year in that clammy nation, but when Mafia leaders ordered his son, Salvatore "Bill" Bonanno, killed (he survived), Joe Bananas launched the Banana War in New York. Colombo appeared to fight on the side of Joe Bananas, but really served as an informant to the other Mafia dons, so that their forces outgunned the Bonanno faction. For his betrayal, Colombo was later named head of the Joseph Profaci Mafia family in New York. Joseph Colombo was not a brilliant crime boss. Like his father, Anthony "Nino" Colombo (1897-1939), he was always a two-bit hoodlum, despite the lofty underworld status he gained. Joe Colombo had, at age sixteen, identified the murdered body of his father on February 6, 1939, after NYPD officers found Anthony Colombo strangled to death, along with his mistress, Christina Oliveri, their corpses found in Colombo's old-model Pontiac.

Anthony Colombo, alias Tony Durante, had been born in Brazil of Italian parents and had immigrated to the U.S. at an early age and throughout the 1920s and 1930s, he lived through robbery and extortion, loaning out his services to any New York mob seeking strong-arm enforcers. The only thing he taught his son, Joseph, was how to steal and survive in Joseph Colombo, Sr., established the Italian-American Civil Rights League, designed to dictate elections.

Joseph Colombo, Sr. (sitting) and his son, Anthony, in the offices of the Italian-American Civil Rights League, an organization structured after the old brotherhood, Unions Siciliane, headed by Frankie Yale in the 1920s.

Jerome Johnson, the hit man hired by Crazy Joe Gallo to murder Joseph Colombo on June 28, 1971.

streetfights by deftly using a stiletto knife. A womanizer, Anthony Colombo chose the wrong woman, Oliveri, for his mistress, as she was the wife of a Mafia member in the family of Joseph Profaci. His death, along with that of his mistress (also strangled), was committed by syndicate hitmen.

Colombo's wife Catherine did not mourn the passing of her errant husband. When police arrived to inform her of her spouse's murder, she said: "I always had trouble with the bum about women. He went out and I went to the movies. That's the last I saw of him. I figured he had been picked up by you guys when he didn't come home." Her son, present at that time, said nothing. Joseph Colombo showed no remorse over his father's death. Years later, his only known remark about his hoodlum father, made to a relative at a family gathering, was: "He shamed himself and my mother. He was no good."

Apparently, the teenage Colombo made similar remarks at the time of his father's death to a member of the Profaci family and upon hearing this, the powerful Mafia don, Joe Profaci (1897-1962), ordered that the destitute young Colombo be "brought under our wings." He was groomed and trained for all manner of criminal pursuits inside the ranks of the Profaci family, which later joined with the Bonanno family, Profaci and Bonanno having been friends since childhood.

Though many times a murderer, Profaci was a devout Catholic, who gave generously to Catholic charities, and even sent funds to the little church in the village of Villabati, outside of Palermo, Sicily, where he was born on October 2, 1897, immigrating from that locale in 1922 to the U.S., along with Gaetano Mangano and his son Vincent, who would later become a New York crime boss. Profaci's charities prompted several misguided Catholic priests to petition Pope Pius XII to grant Profaci knighthood. His petition to become a knight of the Vatican, however, was refused by the Pope, after Pius XII received a letter from Brooklyn district attorney Miles McDonald, in which Profaci's long criminal career was detailed.

It was Profaci's reverential attitude toward motherhood that moved him to shield and nurture the young Joe Colombo, who, like himself, was devoted to his mother and had openly decried his father's adulterous lifestyle. Colombo was also a regular churchgoer, as was Profaci, and, as he attained status in the Profaci Mafia family, he was often seen with other Profaci bodyguards to accompany the Profaci family to church on Sundays, sitting a few pews behind the don and his family, with a loaded gun in his pocket. Colombo was an obedient enforcer and his outgoing personality ingratiated him to Profaci, who continually promoted Colombo to higher status, until he became an underboss to Magliocco, Profaci's brother-in-law.

With the passing of Profaci on June 6, 1962 of cancer (he lingered at the South Side Hospital in Long Island, New York, where Joe Colombo made dutiful visits, flowers in hand), the death of Magliocco in 1963, and the banishment of Joe Bonnano in 1964, Colombo was named the head of the Profaci/Bonanno Mafia family, a position decreed by the then most powerful Mafia don in New York, Carlo Gambino (1902-1976). Colombo, however, was an inept crime boss, incurring anger and resentment from his scores of gunmen and racket operators, cutting their salaries and taking from them the profits of petty rackets that had been heretofore their own. When he refused to allow the Gallo brothers a larger share of the take from the rackets they managed for him, Colombo was faced with a full-scale war that cost the lives of many of his men.

Joseph Colombo, bleeding from a head wound from Johnson's near fatal bullet; he would remain in a coma until his death in 1978.

In the late 1960s, Colombo again made a serious error in stepping into the limelight by creating an organization he called the Italian-American Civil Rights League. This association was supposedly organized to promote Italian heritage and to combat the image that all Italians or Sicilians were members of organized crime. In effect, Colombo thought to create a smokescreen, wherein his organization would be become so powerful that it would act as a shield to his Mafia-syndicate operations.

It was by then ridiculous, thought the other Mafia dons, to attempt to convince the authorities and the public that the Mafia did not exist, which is essentially what Colombo attempted to do. Against the wishes of Mafia leaders, Colombo called for a giant rally in Columbus Circle on June 29, 1970, one that was sponsored by the Italian-American Civil Rights League. Surprisingly, this event was an enormous success, with more than 50,000 persons attending. Politicians suddenly became aware of Colombo' s organization and many, including Governor Nelson Rockefeller, became honorary members of the group.

Colombo's ambition was to re-establish the kind of fraternal organization that had been typified by the Unione Siciliane, which had been prominent in the U.S. from 1900 through the 1920s, a brotherhood that actually fronted for widespread criminal activities and was controlled by gang leaders in many major U.S. cities. To attack the gang leaders was to attack the Unione Siciliane, which was then a powerful political organization.

Colombo sought to neutralize the authority of the police and politicians combating organized crime by establishing a brotherhood that could eventually dictate elections. He seemed well on his way to achieving this end, but his own tightwad tendencies brought his group and himself to ruin. The Gallo brothers, who had revolted inside Colombo' s Mafia family because Colombo would not share the spoils, intended to murder Colombo at the next Italian-American Civil Rights League rally.

Joey Gallo, better known as Crazy Joe, planned to gun Colombo down at this second Unity Day ceremony, but he knew full well that Colombo's guards would identify him the moment he arrived. (It was later contended that powerful Mafia don Carlo Gambino, who had propelled Colombo into Mafia boss status, actually ordered Gallo to murder Colombo "for endangering this thing of ours," and that other family godfathers agreed, sanctioning the murder.) Gallo had important contacts with leaders of black organized crime in Harlem, and he borrowed one of their professional killers who was assigned to murder Colombo.

In the crowds assembled on June 28, 1971, was Jerome A. Johnson, a black assassin. Johnson wore a newspaper photographer's badge and was allowed to get close to Colombo as he was haranguing the crowd. Johnson was only a few feet from the Mafia boss when he pulled out a pistol and fired three shots which struck Colombo, one bullet entering his head. Before Johnson could flee, Colombo' s bodyguards shot him to death. Colombo was rushed to a hospital where he survived, but suffered permanent brain damage. He lived for another seven years, but he remained in a permanent coma, dying on May 22, 1978.

THE MAVERICK GALLO BROTHERS/ 1960s-1970s

In the 1970s, New York columnist Jimmy Breslin lampooned the Gallo-Profaci war, which had claimed the lives of a number of high-ranking Mafiosi, by publishing a highly satirical book: The Gang That Couldn't Shoot Straight. Later made into a movie and premiering in New York, the film did not amuse "Crazy" Joe Gallo. Nor did it amuse his hulking bodyguard Peter "Pete the Greek" Diapoulas, who panned the film, saying: "The whole thing was funny. The Profaci war was just a bunch of laughs. Well, Breslin should have spent one night with us and found out what it would feel like if some Profaci clipped him in the ass."

Joseph "Crazy Joe" Gallo (left) and brother Larry Gallo (right), shown on October 10, 1961, en route to jail after being convicted of carrying deadly weapons.

Joseph Gallo with his new bride, Shina Gallo, shown only a few weeks before Crazy Joe was shot to death.

Crazy Joe Gallo befriended actor Jerry Orbach, who in the film played the fictional Kid Sally Palumbo, a character patterned after the Brooklyn Mafia leader. Orbach discovered to his great surprise that Gallo was a cultured man, who enjoyed conversing about the great writers of the 20th Century such as Ernest Hemingway, Franz Kafka, and Albert Camus. Gallo's rivals in the New York underworld, however, viewed him in different terms.

The Gallo Brothers, Joseph "Crazy" Joe" (1929-1972), Albert "Kid Blast" (dates unknown), and Lawrence (1927-1968), were soldiers in the Brooklyn family of Joseph Profaci. In 1957, Carlo Gambino reportedly assigned Profaci the task of assassinating Albert Anastasia. Profaci in turn, selected the three Gallo brothers to carry out the hit. On the morning of October 25, 1957, Anastasia was relaxing in the barbershop of the Park Sheraton Hotel, with a hot towel draped over his face. Two gunmen burst into the shop, aimed their guns at the crime boss, and fired. Anastasia fell to the floor, hit with five bullets. Following his death, the truculent Joe Gallo demanded a fair share of the Brooklyn action for his family. He was not content with just running his vending machine rackets. There were bigger fish to fry.

A shooting war was declared by Crazy Joe when Profaci, an olive oil distributor by his own admission, refused to accommodate the "Young Turk" faction. With such syndicate musclemen as Joseph Musumeci and Frank "Punchy" Iliano backing him, Joe Gallo shot it out in the streets of Brooklyn with Profaci gangsters in a war that was to last more than a decade. After Profaci died of natural causes in 1962, Joseph Colombo, Sr. assumed control of the family. When he refused to allow the brothers autonomy in Brooklyn, the war was renewed. On June 28, 1971, Colombo was severely wounded during Italian Unity Day festivities in Columbus Circle. Available evidence suggested that Joey Gallo had hired Jerome A. Johnson, a black hit man, to do the job.

A NYPD photo of Humberto's Clam House in New York City's "Little Italy," where Crazy Joe Gallo was murdered on April 7, 1972, the area roped off while investigators tried to identify Gallo's killers.

While serving a sentence for extortion in the 1960s, Joe had cultivated the friendship of a number of black criminals. He understood the changing urban environment and realized that sooner or later the Mafia would be forced into a position of relinquishing control of inner-city drug trafficking and loansharking. Gallo became good friends with Leroy "Nicky" Barnes, whom he personally groomed to take over the Harlem rackets. A number of other black gunmen found employment in the Gallo family following their release from prison.

When Colombo was permanently crippled in the 1971 shooting, mob watchers logically assumed Gallo was responsible, given his friendship with the black underworld. That same year, 1971, Joe Gallo emerged from prison with a new outlook on life. He was not the same thug who had appeared before Senator Robert Kennedy in 1959, offering the observance that Kennedy's office rug "would be nice for a crap game." Now Joey Gallo was versed in the works of Jean-Paul Sartre and the German writer Hermann Hesse. After befriending actor Jerry Orbach, Gallo began to move in different circles. He was introduced to a number of uptown celebrities and show people and seemed to enjoy his new-found status.

On April 7, 1972, Gallo celebrated his forty-third birthday with the Orbachs, comedian David Steinberg, and columnist Earl Wilson at the Copacabana nightclub. They celebrated long into the night until Gallo, Pete the Greek, Gallo's wife, and his sister decided to adjourn to Umberto's Clam House in the Chinatown-Little Italy neighborhoods for a light repast. Gallo, his back to the door, did not notice a lone gunman entering the restaurant.

Larry Allow at the time he received news that his brother, Joseph, had been murdered; with the death of Crazy Joe, the Gallo gang ceased to be an effective underworld force in New York.

The casket carrying the body of Crazy Joe Gallo is shown outside of St. Charles Church in Brooklyn; his wife, a widow in less than a month from the date of her wedding, is shown above center, wearing dark glasses.

Armed with a.38-caliber handgun, the assassin opened up on Joe, who scrambled for the door, but the gunman kept firing. Joey Gallo died outside the restaurant. Control of the gang reverted to the last surviving brother, Albert Gallo, who extracted his revenge before the shooting ultimately stopped. At least twenty-seven more people were killed, many of them innocent bystanders. Crazy Joe's sister would later say of him, "He was a good man, a kind man. He changed his image, that's why they did this to him."

THE "TEFLON DON"/1980s-1990s

Following the Profaci-Gallo war, the disabling of limelighting Joe Colombo and the passing of many of the older dons, the five New York Mafia families and the national crime syndicate to which they belonged was in disarray. In 1976, an ailing Carlo Gambino, the leading don in New York, looked about the thin ranks of his criminal hierarchy for a successor. It was thought that Gambino would give the nod to his long-time and popular underboss Aniello "Neil" Dellacroce (1914-1985; AKA: The Hat), but blood was always thicker in the Mafia and the old man selected his younger cousin, Paul "Uncle Paul" Castellano (1915-1985) to assume control of the Gambino family.

Born in Brooklyn, New York, on June 26, 1915, Castellano was positioned early-on for high Mafia office. His older sister, Catherine, married Carlo Gambino while Castellano was a teenager. He was weened under the broad umbrella of the Gambino family, and later became a butcher, then a meat distributor, eventually taking control of the meat and poultry industry, continuing to control this lucrative business to the moment of his bloody death. Castellano was essentially a shrewd businessman, having deep knowledge and expertise on national labor unions and displaying sharp acumen in negotiating multi-million-dollar business contracts, of course, with the threat of the Mafia family he controlled.

Castellano tried to avoid mob murders and family wars, but found it difficult to control several of his upstart "soldiers," especially Roy Albert DeMeo (1941-1983), who, in the mid-1970s, following the destruction of the Gallo brothers, became one of the most feared gunmen in New York. DeMeo began by stealing and selling cars, then graduated to drug trafficking. He operated out of a seedy club called the Gemini Lounge, located in Brooklyn's Flatlands.

To this place DeMeo lured his enemies and even some members of his own Mafia family, shooting and stabbing them to death, reportedly with the help of his most trusted henchmen, Anthony Senter and Joseph Testa. These killers routinely murdered as many as 200 victims, sawing their bodies into pieces and then dumping the remains in garbage cans throughout the neighborhood. DeMeo once bragged that he enjoyed killing people, that such heinous acts gave him "the power of God...deciding who lives, who dies."

Local police and federal agents began to probe DeMeo's drug trafficking operations in the early 1980s, and when Castellano heard about these investigations, he became apprehensive that DeMeo might turn informer and he reportedly ordered his underboss killed on January 10, 1983. DeMeo was shot to death at the hands of his most trusted lieutenants, Senter and Testa, according to police reports, and then dumped into his Cadillac where the decomposing remains were discovered eight days later.

Castellano told aides that he wanted the Gambino family purged of such thugs. Underbosses like DeMeo endangered "the whole setup," he said. The last thing he wanted was a killing, because that brought on publicity from a dogged press. "Those bastards never give up," he once complained to Dellacroce. "They're like terriers—you can cut off the head but the teeth will still be buried in your flesh." He said the same thing about federal agents, whom he feared the most. The crime boss shunned publicity at all costs, meeting with his top capos at meeting places that were always changed to avoid police and federal surveillance. Castellano eschewed the New York nightlife, going home to his Staten Island mansion every evening to stay with his family.

All in the family: A 1976 gathering following a theatrical production in New York that includes (left to right, standing), Paul "Big Paul" Castellano, who later became the boss of the Gambino family; Greg DePalma; singer Frank Sinatra, who was identified as having strong ties to the Mafia-syndicate through this photo; Tom Marson; Carlo Gambino, boss of bosses, Sinatra's "godfather," and who was the role model for the godfather in Mario Puzo's classic Mafia novel; (sitting, left to right) Joseph Gambino and Richie Fusco.

No sooner had Castellano rid himself of DeMeo than he began to have similar notions about another tough upstart in his crime family, John Gotti (1940-2002), who had been making trouble for him for some time. Gotti, born in the Bronx, New York, on October 27, 1940, began like almost all Mafia members, as a street tough, especially after his family moved to a crime-ridden area in Brooklyn.

Gotti was involved in petty crimes and in the mid-1960s practiced extortion and truck hijacking, stealing freight from Kennedy Airport. He was a "made man" with the Gambino family in 1966 and two years later he had risen to the rank of lieutenant. He was named a capo or underboss in 1971, a position he would hold for fourteen years. Prior to that time, in 1969, Gotti was arrested for hijacking and was sent to prison for three years, being promoted to the rank of capo upon his release.

Although Gotti supervised a number of rackets for the Gambino family as a lieutenant (his capo being the aged, almost retired Carmine Fatico), he concentrated on the trafficking of heroin and cocaine, his crew—made up of Angelo and Sal Ruggiero; Gotti's brother, Gene Gotti; John Carneglia; and Anthony Rampino—operated out of two small restaurants, the Fish Social Club and Bergin Hunt Club. In those days and the decades to come, Gotti reveled in his public image of a powerful gangster.

Every Fourth of July, he supervised a huge, illegal fireworks display in his neighborhood (with local police paid to ignore the violation), and afterward his goons conducted street barbeques, grilling hot dogs and hamburgers which were distributed without charge to residents, children given all the ice cream they could eat and soda they could drink. Gotti became a local hero.

Paul Castellano (center, bottom) leaves a Brooklyn funeral home in 1976, following services for Carlo Gambino; Castellon would be murdered on December 16, 1985, on orders from John Gotti.

Gambino underboss Aniello Dellacroce sponsored John Gotti, promoting him to Mafia prominence; Gotti exploded when Castellano was named the new Gambino chief, instead of Dellacroce.

In 1973, Gotti received a murder contract, reportedly from Carlo Gambino himself, one that called for the extermination of James McBratney, who had allegedly murdered one of the Mafia don's nephews. Gotti dutifully performed the killing and was later charged with the murder. His attorneys managed to have the charge reduced to second-degree manslaughter and Gotti was again sent to prison, serving a two-year sentence. Upon his release, Gotti, who had earlier befriended the aging Gambino underboss, Neil Dellacroce, became incensed when hearing that Carlo Gambino had picked Castellano as his successor instead of Dellacroce. A traditionalist, Gotti thought Castellano weak and indecisive, lacking all the loyalties and dedication of the old Mafia dons and their underbosses, such as Dellacroce.

A NYPD photo of future don, John Gotti, in 1968, the same year he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant in the Gambino family.

Busying himself with drug trafficking, Gotti grew rich enough to purchase a comfortable Cape Cod-style home in the Howard Beach section of Queens. In 1980, however, his young son, Frank, was run down and killed by a neighbor in a car accident. The neighbor, John Favara, was told to flee for his life and that Gotti would have him killed, but he waved such notions away, saying that such gangster reprisals could be found only in the movies. Favara later disappeared and was never seen again.

Some time in 1984, Angelo Ruggiero reportedly went to his boss, Gotti, warning him about family chief Paul Castellano. The mob boss intended to have Gotti and Dellacroce killed, Ruggiero told Gotti, fearing that both were conspiring to murder him and take over the old Gambino family. This talk was thinly supported in fact, but it was most likely true that Castellano was consumed by paranoid apprehensions about his minions, believing that they were plotting to depose and destroy him, a gnawing fear commonly shared by his peers and predecessors. Gotti did not disguise his dislike for Castellano and continuously made remarks about his being a "poor boss," and a "gutless leader," and that "the Gambinos should have a better man on top."

A NYPD photo of street punk Gene Gotti, taken in 1966, before he rose to prominence through his brother's ruthless climb to power.

A NYPD photo of Gotti's long-time enforcer, Angelo Ruggiero, who told Gotti in 1984 that Castellon intended to have him killed.

Gotti said he "would not wait to be whacked," and moved first. A short time after Dellacroce died—he had struggled to make peace between Castellano and Gotti—Gotti sent a murder crew to kill his boss on the night of December 16, 1985. On that night, four men waited outside of Sparks Steak House on 46th Street in Manhattan and when Castellano and one-time chauffeur promoted to new underboss, Tommy Bilotti, stepped from a limousine in front of the restaurant, they were met by a hail of bullets that killed them on the spot. Sammy "The Bull" Gravano, who later turned informant and testified against Gotti, stated that he sat in Gotti's Lincoln car across the street from the murder scene with Gotti, witnessing Castellano's murder.

The killing of Paul Castellano shocked the other Mafia dons in New York, but they said nothing after Gotti assumed control of the old Gambino family. A few days after the Castellano killing, Gotti appeared in one of his $2,000 tailored suits for a court appearance, his expensive attire later earning for him the sobriquet of "the Dapper Don", and, by later apparently besting federal authorities, receiving the additional title of "the Teflon Don." He was asked if he was now the head of the Gambino crime family, now that Castellano was dead.

Gotti gave a broad smile to the cameras and replied: "I am the boss of my family—my wife and kids at home." Unlike Castellano, Gotti willingly became a public figure, bathing in the attention he received from the press as he was brought to trial one time after another in the mid-1980s and early 1990s. The more publicity Gotti received, the more he liked it. The press catered to his public posture, perversely showing him to be a criminal icon, a sub-culture hero. Typically, Andy Warhol did a portrait of the killer, which Time Magazine reproduced in 1986. The gangster put the cover into a frame that was placed on the wall of his office. He had arrived.

Also arriving was plenty of trouble for "the Teflon Don" in the form of criminal charges and trials. In May 1986, John O'Connor, vice president and business manager for the Carpenter's Union of New York City, offended Gotti, when he ordered a group of thugs to vandalize a restaurant controlled by the Gambino Mafia family. O'Connor was one of New York's most powerful labor leaders, an imposing figure, who was capable of shutting down virtually any construction project in the city unless union men were on the job. He was also reputed to be notoriously corrupt, and would allow a job to go through if a significant bribe was paid up front.

The restaurant in question, Bankers and Brokers in Lower Manhattan, was run by Philip "Philly" Modica, an alleged associate of the Gotti mob. To work on the restaurant, Modica hired a construction crew that did not belong to the local

The body of James McBratney, killed in 1973 in a Staten Island bar, murdered by John Gotti and others in front of many witnesses; Gotti went to prison for only two years after a manslaughter conviction.

FBI surveillance photo of Gotti headquarters in Queens (left building): The Bergin Hunt and Fish Club in Ozone Park; the man at the entrance is Gotti henchman, Anthony "Tony Roach" Rampino.

Another Gotti headquarters, the Ravenite Social Club in lower Manhattan, where John Gotti planned operations, following his 1985 murder of Castellano and takeover of the Gambino family.

Gotti shown in a FBI surveillance photo outside the Ravenite Social Club, talking with his mentor, Dellacroce.

union. In the early months of 1986, O'Connor reportedly visited the restaurant and was offered a $5,000 payoff in return for his guarantee of non-interference. O'Connor apparently decided that $5,000 was insufficient. A gang of labor union thugs descended on the restaurant and caused $30,000 worth of damage in less than an hour.

After hearing of this, John Gotti was believed to have met with his top lieutenant, Angelo Ruggiero, in Ozone Park, Queens, and ordered reprisals against O'Connor. A hidden microphone, placed there by the New York Organized Crime Task Force, captured Gotti's statements on tapes, which were introduced as evidence in his December 1989 trial for conspiracy and assault. "We're gonna bust him up!" Gotti allegedly said. Angelo Ruggiero followed Gotti's orders and hired four gunmen from the Westies, a violent Irish street gang, to carry out the assassination of O'Connor.

The murder attempt was unsuccessful and O'Connor sustained bullet wounds in the buttocks and legs. After a month in the hospital, the union leader was back on the streets. Gotti dropped the matter and went on to consolidate his empire and expand operations into New Jersey. During this time, Manhattan District Attorney Robert M. Morgenthau reviewed hours of secretly recorded conversations between Gotti and his henchmen taken at Gotti's restaurants in Ozone Park. Since Gotti had two felony convictions on his record already, under state law a third conviction would certainly mean twenty-five years in the state prison. Morgenthau carefully built his case against Gotti.

Morgenthau induced two of the Westies allegedly involved in the murder plot against O'Connor, Francis "Mickey" Featherstone and James "Studs" McEloy, to become informants. The two claimed that they decided to shoot O'Connor as a "favor" for the "greaseballs." Featherstone wore a concealed microphone in prison and secretly recorded conversations with other gang members that Morgenthau hoped to introduce in court.

Armed with an impressive array of evidence, the Manhattan District Attorney's office had the 49-year-old Gotti arrested outside a restaurant in Little Italy on January 24, 1989. Indictments were returned against Angelo Ruggiero, 48 (who died before the trial began), Anthony Guerrieri, 60, and Gotti, charging all three men with conspiracy. "I'll give you three-to-one odds I'll beat this case," Gotti boasted in a hidden taped recording. At issue was the admissibility of 28,000 taped conversations recorded between March 1985 and May 1986—the period in which Gotti was believed to have risen to preeminence in the New York underworld. Defense attorney Bruce Cutler argued that the tapes should not be admitted because the provision barring indiscriminate invasions of privacy did not seem to apply to Gotti.

After months of pretrial wrangling, Acting State Supreme Court Justice Jeffrey Atlas decided that the tapes could be used. The trial began in the Manhattan branch of the State Supreme Court on January 20, 1990. Gotti and Guerrieri pleaded not guilty. The jury heard taped conversations that portrayed Gotti as the undisputed "boss" of the Gambino outfit, New York's largest organized crime family, taking charge of the Gambinos following the slaying of Castellano.

In a 1986 telephone conversation a mob associate described Gotti as "God's gift to the underworld." Attorney Cutler, who had successfully defended Gotti in two other cases, derided Morgenthau as an opportunist and dismissed the FBI tapes as unimportant. "These supposed tapes show him doing nothing more than carrying on normal conversations with his friends," Cutler said to the jury. "You'll hear some rough language and some threats that are meaningless."

The jury retired February 5, 1990, to consider its verdict. Four days later they returned a verdict of not guilty against Gotti and Guerrieri. Attorney Cutler was jubilant. "The jury was able to see through a created case," he said. When interviewed by reporters, the jurors expressed mixed feelings about the tapes. Said one, "You couldn't take anything in that tape by itself. You have to place it in context." The credibility of Westie James McEloy was another issue. "The Westies were undisciplined," one juror said. "They were wild. They didn't need anybody's permission to kill anybody."

Ronald Goldstock, director of the state's Organized Crime Task Force, said, "It's only a battle, not the war." The government went after Gotti once again in 1992. This time a federal jury convicted him of five murders (including the Castellano killing), and numerous racketeering (RICO) charges, on April 2, 1992, along with fellow defendant, Frank LoCascio. On June 23, 1992, both men were sentenced to life imprisonment. Gotti's conviction was largely brought about by the testimony of Gotti's enforcer and chief capo, Salvatore "Sammy the Bull" Gravano, who had turned state's evidence.

Gotti in 1990 during his trial on charges of conspiracy; he was acquitted through the clever arguments of criminal attorney Bruce Cutler.

In exchange for protection and imprisonment, Gravano bragged to the court how he had "whacked" as many as nineteen persons and described all of Gotti's many crimes in detail. The overweight killer (who had once ballooned to almost 500 pounds), had become angered at Gotti, when he was told that the crime boss had made fun of him to other henchmen, saying that Gravano wet his bed and was addicted to watching cartoon shows on TV. Gravano served five years in prison for his killings and was released and sent into the Witness Protection Program. He authored a book with Peter Maas, promoted his own dismal music records and, in 2001, was arrested in Arizona for drug violations.

By then Gotti was residing in Marion Federal Penitentiary in Marion, Illinois. He continued to posture and gesture for occasional interviewers, but he no longer held power in the old Gambino family, being replaced by Nicholas "Little Nick" Corozzo, who was imprisoned, his place taken by none other than John Gotti, Jr., who, unlike his father, preferred a low profile. His father had taken ill while in prison after being attacked by an inmate in July 1996, and suffered from cancer of the head and neck, stemming from the injuries Gotti sustained in the 1996 attack, an ailment that finally killed him on June 10, 2002. The body of the "Teflon Don" was returned to New York, where it was buried two days later in the St. John's Cemetery at Maspeth, Queens.

Sammy "The Bull" Gravano, one-time underboss to Gotti, turned informer, giving evidence that sent Gotti to prison for life; Gravano served only five years for his many murders.

April 22, 1992: A stunned Gotti hears a jury pronounce him guilty, convicting him of five murders; he was sent to prison for life, where he died of cancer on June 10, 2002.

CHAPTER EIGHT:

KIDNAPPING

Kidnapping for ransom has been practiced by kings and common criminals since recorded time. The earliest and most famous kidnapping in the ancient world occurred in the 12th Century B.C., when Theseus kidnapped Helen, the legendary Greek beauty, as a child in Sparta, an abduction which sparked the attritional Trojan War. In 78 B.C., Julius Caesar was kidnapped and held for ransom by pirates. After a month, the Roman leader was released, but he quickly took revenge, gathering a small fleet and sailing to the pirate's lair, where he captured and crucified his former kidnappers.

Pirates practiced kidnapping for ransom for many centuries. Irish corsairs abducted St. Patrick in 405 A.D., holding him prisoner for six years on the island for which he would become the patron saint. A youthful Vincent de Paul (1581-1660) was abducted by Barbary pirates in 1605, sold into slavery and released two years later. He would be canonized in 1737 as a Catholic saint. Albanian buccaneers kidnapped Miguel de Cervantes (1547-1616) on September 26, 1575, selling him into slavery in Algiers. He was purchased by a Greek merchant who mistreated him, until Cervantes was released for ransom in 1580. (He would go on to fame as the author of Don Quixote, published twenty-five years later.)

Richard I (Coeur de Lion or Lion-Heart) of England, who was kidnapped in Austria and held for a ransom of 150,000 marks in 1192, a payment not made until two years later.

The rulers of ancient and modern kingdoms routinely conducted kidnappings or abductions of their fellow princes to remove them from the arena of political threat or to raise huge ransoms, as was the case of Richard I (Coeur de Lion or Lion-Hearted, 1157-1199) of England. In 1192, Richard I, while returning from the Third Crusade, was kidnapped in Austria by the forces of Duke Leopold, on orders of Emperor Henry VI (emperor of the Holy Roman Empire and the king of Germany). While Richard was kept a prisoner in a fortress on the Danube, Henry demanded a ransom payment of 150,000 marks (about $15 million in today's money) for the English king's return.

Richard's scheming brother, John, to whom the demand had been made, stalled in making the ransom payment, seeing the situation as an opportunity to usurp Richard's throne. When John's purpose was made clear to the English public, members of the merchant class raised the ransom and paid it to Henry VI. After almost two years of imprisonment, Richard was released in 1194.

Often enough, national leaders were abducted and held for political or military purposes. In 1519, Montezuma II (1466-1520), the Aztec ruler of Mexico, attempted to prevent Spanish conqueror Hernando Cortes from traveling to Mexico City and was abducted and taken hostage by Cortes. When the Aztecs attacked the Spanish forces, Montezuma was fatally injured while he was being held captive (some claimed he was murdered). A similar fate befell the Inca king, Atahualpa, of Peru, who, in 1532, was kidnapped by soldiers under the command of Spanish conquistador Francisco Pizarro, who demanded an enormous ransom of gold and silver. The Incas raised this ransom, but their king was nevertheless killed.

One of the earliest abductions that could be actually applied to the term "kidnapping" (the abduction of females for sexual purposes), involved the taking of two wealthy teenage girls, Ann and Catherine Kennedy, on April 14, 1779, in Ireland, by two poor men Garret Byrne and James Strange, who forced the girls to marry them, both abductors thinking that the unions would establish them within the insulated ranks of the wealthy class. No such thing occurred.

The girls were rescued and their kidnappers were promptly hanged after being convicted of stealing "property." A similar abduction occurred on March 4, 1822, when Honora Gould, a teenage girl from a wealthy family in Glangurt, Ireland, was kidnapped by the White Boys. The girl was raped and released three weeks later. Walter Fitzmaurice and William Costello were tracked down and tried, both sentenced to death. Costello was hanged, but Fitzmaurice was reprieved.

For centuries, the navies of many nations routinely conducted widespread kidnappings among the lower classes, roving "press gangs" seizing youths and pressing them into naval service. British press gangs kidnapped most to the seamen who served on board the ill-fated Bounty, a merchant ship commanded by the stern Captain William Bligh (1754-1817), William Bligh, the severe captain of the British ship Bounty; most of his crew that mutinied in 1789 had been officially kidnapped ("pressed") and forced to serve on the ill-fated ship. Flogged for minor offenses and given poor rations, these "captive" seamen finally rebelled in a classic mutiny.

these disgruntled and maltreated sailors, led by Fletcher Christian, mutinied in 1789, casting Bligh and eighteen men adrift in an open boat. Bligh survived in a spectacular voyage of 4,000 miles and eventually conducted an unsuccessful hunt for the mutineers.

In the process, official inquiries largely criticized the practice of press gangs in kidnapping English sailors, a practice that largely contributed to the rebellion. The mutiny was vividly portrayed in three novels by Charles Bernard Nordhoff and James Norman Hall in Mutiny on the Bounty, 1932; Men Against the Sea, 1934; and Pitcairn's Island, 1934. Several films were later based upon the mutiny, the best of these being the 1935 production directed by Frank Lloyd and starring Clark Gable as Christian and Charles Laughton (in a memorable performance) as Bligh.

Just after the turn of the 19th Century, the British Navy began stopping U.S. merchant ships on the high seas and forcing American sailors into British duty against their will. These flagrant impressments became one of the major issues leading to the War of 1812. This practice, called "shanghaiing," was also conducted by American ship captains, sending waterfront thugs to saloons, where collusive bar owners drugged able-bodied seamen, who were then carried unconscious to waiting ships, unwillingly serving on board ships bound for the Orient.

The most notorious kidnapper of seamen in San Francisco was "Calico Jim" Reuben, who, with his gang of thugs, coerced or drugged scores of sailors into sea duty aboard merchant ships bound for Southeast Asia and China, especially the port of Shanghai. It was Reuben who coined the phrase "shanghaiing." He later fled to Chile, with a dogged San Francisco detective on his trail and was shot dead in a fierce fight by the officer in Santiago.

By the 1850s, this brutal practice had become well-established in San Francisco and New York and lingered long through successive decades. These kidnappings were depicted in many narratives, particularly the compassionate and stirring accounts of Richard Henry Dana, Jr. (Two Years Before the Mast, 1840) and Jack London (The Sea Wolf, 1904), both of these works being made into excellent films.

A decade later, in 1861, the Chiricahua Apache chief, Cochise (1812?-1874), was taken into custody for abducting a settler's child. He escaped from a fort prison, abducted several persons and held them hostage, later murdering them. Cochise was captured ten years later, but he had by then established a practice of kidnapping by the Apaches for the purpose of holding hostages to later negotiate land treaties.

Kidnapping for ransom came back into prominence when, on April 11, 1870, Lord and Lady Muncaster of England and other tourists, were abducted in Greece by Takos Arvanitakis and his Greek outlaws, who demanded one million dracmas for the return of the English captives. Four of the victims were murdered and the others returned before Takos escaped from pursuing government forces.

Four years later, on July 1, 1874, Americans were shocked to learn that Charles B. Ross, the small son of a wealthy family in Germantown, Pennsylvania, had been kidnapped and held for a $20,000 ransom, this being the first sensational ransom kidnapping in the U.S. The child was never located. The alleged kidnappers, William Mosher and Joseph Douglass, were shot dead during a burglary and William Westervelt was sent to prison for the crime.

The U.S. saw only minor kidnappings until the 1890s, beginning on March 20, 1891, when a wealthy bachelor from Detroit was abducted and $15,000 was demanded. The captive was released and the ransom never paid. In March 1892, Ward Waterbury, the child of a well-to-do farmer, was kidnapped from his home in Longridge, New York, by his cousin and two others, who demanded a ransom of $6,000. No money was paid, the child was freed, and the three culprits were captured, tried and sent to prison.

In August 1897, John Conway, the child of a train dispatcher in Albany, New York, was kidnapped by his uncle and two others. Like the Waterbury case, the child was released, no money was paid, and the culprits were tracked down and sent to prison. On May 21, 1899, Marion Clarke, the child of a wealthy New York City family, was abducted by the child's nurse, Bella Anderson, aided by George and Addie Barrow, who planned to demand $300 ransom, but the child was quickly rescued and the kidnappers sent to prison.

The kidnapping of Ion Perdicaris, a wealthy Greek-American businessman on May 18, 1904, became an international incident laced with heavy-handed political repercussions. A nomadic bandit named Raisuli and members of his tribe had abducted Perdicaris and his stepson from Perdicaris' lavish villa in Tangier, Morocco. Raisuli sent his demands to the sultan of Morocco, seeking cash and several political concessions, including the release of many of his imprisoned men. President Theodore Roosevelt, always a man of action, sent the sultan of Morocco a blunt message: "Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead."

The sultan began to negotiate the kidnapper's demands, but when the bandit made additional demands, negotiations came to a standstill. Roosevelt would not wait and dispatched several warships of the American "Great White Fleet," to the waters off Morocco. His intent was clear: If Perdicaris was not released, the U.S. was perfectly willing to go to war with Morocco. One editorial blared the American attitude of that saber-rattling era: "Teddy will go to war over the kidnapping of a lone American—bully for him!"

War was not necessary. Roosevelt's show of force was enough to compel the sultan to quickly negotiate the release of Perdicaris and his stepson on June 24, 1904. The 1975 film, The Wind and the Lion, starring Sean Connery as Raisuli and Brian Keith (in a great performance) as Theodore Roosevelt, largely fictionalized the Perdicaris kidnapping.

At the turn of the 20th Century, widespread kidnappings were conducted among female immigrants arriving in the U.S. These hapless girls were seized by thugs and taken to cheap brothels, where they were sold into prostitution, then called White Slavery. The forcible abduction of young women for immoral purposes became an issue of national concern. The passing of the Mann Act in 1910, and the eventual suppression of the "red light" districts in major American cities effectively ended the White Slavery scourge.

Kidnapping in Italy at this time increased, but this had been a problem in that country for a century, with Black Handers routinely abducting children and holding them until Italian merchants agreed to pay extortion money. The organized criminal brotherhood, the Mafia, kidnapped children in order to dictate political or law enforcement policies or procedures.

Typical abductions in the mid 1900s in Italy included the kidnapping of the son of Francesco de Martino, a socialist politician in Italy, who had been crusading against the Mafia (Sicily) and its mainland counterpart, the Camorra. Sometimes huge ransoms were paid. Black Handers seized Vincenzo Guida, baby of a wealthy family, demanding $300,000 for the return of the child. In Milan, also in this period, Nicolletta di Nardi, child of a diamond merchant, was kidnapped and 2 billion lire was paid.

Ransom kidnapping in the U.S., increased in the 1910s and through the 1920s, but became an epidemic during America's Great Depression of the early 1930s, when roving gangs seized wealthy citizens and held them for huge ransoms. The large and murderous bank-robbing Barker gang (see Robbery) kidnapped several wealthy persons in the early 1930s, demanding and receiving enormous ransoms.

Rival gangs in major American cities began kidnapping high-ranking members of opposing gangs and holding them for ransom. This was the case with George J. "Frenchy" DeMange, who was kidnapped on June 15, 1931, by Vincent "Mad Dog" Coll, who received a $35,000 ransom from DeMange's senior mob partner, Owney Madden, for the safe release of Big Frenchy (see Gangs and Organized Crime).

A contemporary sketch of Theodore Roosevelt (backed by an approving Uncle Sam), who built the Panama Canal, fought the trusts, crushed child labor and the sweat shops and became the most popular U.S. president to that time. Wielding his "Big Stick," Teddy sent the American Great White Fleet to Tangier, Morocco, threatening war in 1904, if American businessman Ion Perdicaris, who had been kidnapped by Berber bandit Raisuli, was not released. "Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead," was Roosevelt's wired ultimatum to the Moroccan sultan. The victim was released.

The most sensational kidnapping at this time and one called "the crime of the century," was the 1932 abduction of Charles A. Lindbergh, Jr., the infant son of America's greatest hero, the aviator, Charles A. Lindbergh, Sr. A large ransom was paid, but the child was later found dead. Bruno Richard Hauptmann, a Brooklyn carpenter and illegal German immigrant, was later convicted of the kidnapping-murder and sent to the electric chair in New Jersey.

This sensational case, which obsessed the nation for years, largely brought about the passing of new, tough anti-kidnapping statutes. It became a federal crime punishable by death to transport a kidnap victim across state lines, and, for the first time, the FBI became involved in the investigation of such crimes.

Though sensational kidnappings occurred in the succeeding decades, such abductions were relatively sporadic, until the 1960s-1970s, when widespread kidnappings occurred and a new phenomenon, skyjacking, became almost routine, with scores of planes and their passengers abducted by disgruntled employees, drunks and terrorists. In the U.S., most of these myriad skyjackings were aimed at a single destination, Communist Cuba. Dictator Fidel Castro mostly welcomed these kidnappers with open arms, giving them political sanctuary. (Many of these abductors became unhappy with their miserable lifestyles in poverty-stricken Cuba and later opted to return to the U.S. or Canada to face imprisonment.)

The first American skyjacking took place on August 3, 1961, when Leon Bearden, who had a long criminal record, and his 16-year-old son, Cody, boarded Continental Airlines Flight 54, a Boeing 707 jetliner carrying sixty-one passengers in Phoenix, Arizona. Once airborne, the Beardens got into the cockpit and, brandishing guns, ordered the pilot, Captain Byron D. Rickards (who, ironically, had been involved in the first recorded skyjacking in Peru in February 1931) to alter his course for Cuba. Rickards told Bearden that the plane did not have enough fuel to fly all the way to Cuba, so it was agreed that Rickards would first stop at El Paso, Texas, for refueling.

Upon arriving at El Paso, Leon Bearden released a few of the passengers. When refueled, Rickards prepared the take off, but as the plane taxied down the runway, a motorcade of FBI agents suddenly appeared, the agents firing submachine guns at the undercarriage of the plane, flattening its tires and knocking out an engine. FBI Agent Francis Crosby then boarded the plane and tried to negotiate with Bearden.

The skyjacker shouted that he would kill a hostage, himself and his own son, before he surrendered. Crosby, standing close to Bearden, then punched the skyjacker in the face so hard that he knocked him out. Cody Bearden meekly surrendered. The boy was sent to a correctional facility, to be released at the age of twenty-one in 1965. His father got a life sentence, later reduced on appeal to concurrent terms of five and twenty years.

The most notorious skyjacking in America occurred ten years later on November 24, 1971, when a passenger using the alias of "D. B. Cooper" boarded Northwest Airlines Flight 305, a 727 Trijet, at Portland, Oregon. The flight was en route to Seattle, Washington, when Cooper showed an attendant a "bomb" hidden in his briefcase. He said that unless his demands were met, he would explode the device and kill all forty-two passengers and crew. Cooper handed the attendant a note that demanded $200,000 in unmarked $20 bills to be packed into a knapsack and four parachutes.

A police sketch of the elusive skyjacker D. B. Cooper, who parachuted from a jet plane in 1971, with $200,000 in ransom money.

Upon receiving the ransom and parachutes in Seattle, Washington, Cooper released all the passengers and two crew members, then ordered the pilot to fly to Reno, Nevada, adding that his ultimate destination was Mexico. While the plane was cruising at an altitude of 10,000 feet and traveling at 197 miles per hour, Cooper straddled two parachutes, strapped the knapsack on his back and, going to the rear of the plane and lowering the stairs beneath the tail, jumped into space, wearing only his business suit in his freefall. He was never seen again.

Police in several states aided FBI agents in an exhaustive search for the kidnapper, especially in the state of Washington, where, in February 1980, they located several thousand dollars of the ransom money, partly buried on the north bank of the Colombia River near Vancouver, Washington. It was assumed that the kidnapper either planted the money there or that it washed down the river from the unknown point where the skyjacker had landed (dead or alive).

Thousands of persons were investigated in the Cooper skyjacking. One of was Jack Coffelt, a burglar and one-time con man from Missouri, but Coffelt died in 1976, and this identification, like all the others over the last thirty plus years, was never confirmed. In August 2000, a Florida newspaper stated that Jo Weber, a 60-year-old Pensacola resident, claimed to know the identity of D. B. Cooper, that he was none other than her deceased husband, Duane Weber.

Photos of Weber seemed to match the police sketch drawn at the time of the 1971 skyjacking, but FBI officials were skeptical, saying that Weber was just another person in the more than 1,100 suspects pinpointed by the Bureau in their tireless search for the phantom kidnapper.

FBI officials concluded that in all probability Cooper was killed, when he attempted to parachute through the heavy rainstorm and high winds surrounding him at the time of his jump. He remains, however, a criminal enigma and a curious folk hero to some. An annual celebration is held in Cooper's dubious honor each year by the scoffing residents of Ariel, Washington, a town festival entitled "Cooper Caper Sunday," one that features a cook-out and sky-diving exhibitions.

From the time Cooper made his incredible leap into space, skyjacking and kidnapping increased with alarming alacrity. In Italy and France individual financial gain motivated the kidnapping of children of wealthy businessmen. In the Middle East, however, political and religious motives were behind the countless kidnappings, abductions and hijackings conducted by Muslim Shiite terrorist groups, who demanded concessions from the U.S., Israel and its European allies, ever-widening crimes that continue to this day (see Terrorism).

LITTLE CHARLEY ROSS IS TAKEN/ July 1, 1874

Not until the sensational abduction of a little boy, Charles Brewster Ross, in 1874, did ransom-kidnapping become a reality in the U.S. In the years that followed there were dozens of copycat abductions in which children were abducted, often under the watchful eyes of their parents. What made the Ross kidnapping unique was the fact that the men responsible for the outrage were identified, but that the little boy was never found, although he was presumed by one and all to be dead.

Charley Ross and his brother Walter were playing in front of their house on East Washington Lane, in Germantown, a suburb of Philadelphia, on the hot, steamy afternoon of July 1, 1874. They were interrupted by two men riding in a horse-drawn carriage that pulled to the front curb. Walter Ross later recalled that these same two men had come by the house the previous week and had offered them some candy. This time the bait was far more tempting. The men said they could take the boys to a place that distributed firecrackers. With the Fourth of July holiday looming, the offer was almost too good to be true, so they climbed in the carriage, which went northward down the street. Charley asked the men if they could stop to buy some candy. Near Palmer and Richmond streets, the driver of the rig stopped, gave Walter a quarter, and told him to go into a confectionery store and buy whatever he pleased. Unaware of the men's intentions, Walter meandered up and down the aisles of the store for about fifteen minutes, unable to make up his mind. By the time he made his selection and went back to rejoin his brother, the rig had long since vanished. A passerby, Henry Peacock, took pity on the frantic, screaming Abducted in 1874, 4-year-old Charley Ross was reportedly the first victim kidnapped for ransom in the U.S.; he was never seen again.

Charley's older brother, Walter, was also abducted, but was released.

The kidnappers are shown luring the two Ross boys from outside the mansion of their wealthy parents in Germantown, Pennsylvania, on July 1, 1874. The was a carefully planned abduction by professional criminals.

The abductors placed the Ross boys in a carriage after promising to take them to a store to buy candy.

little boy and asked him who his father was. Walter said his father was Christian K. Ross, a modestly wealthy retail merchant. Walter was returned to his home by 8 p.m.

The search for Charley began with neither the police nor the father suspecting that the boy had met with foul play. They chose to believe instead that he had gotten lost somewhere in the city and would soon return home. Charley's mother was vacationing in Atlantic City. Christian Ross, not wanting to unduly upset his wife, placed a discreet notice in a local newspaper, in which no names were mentioned.

On July 3, Mr. Ross received the first in a series of nearly unintelligible letters from the kidnappers. It was postmarked in Philadelphia. It read:

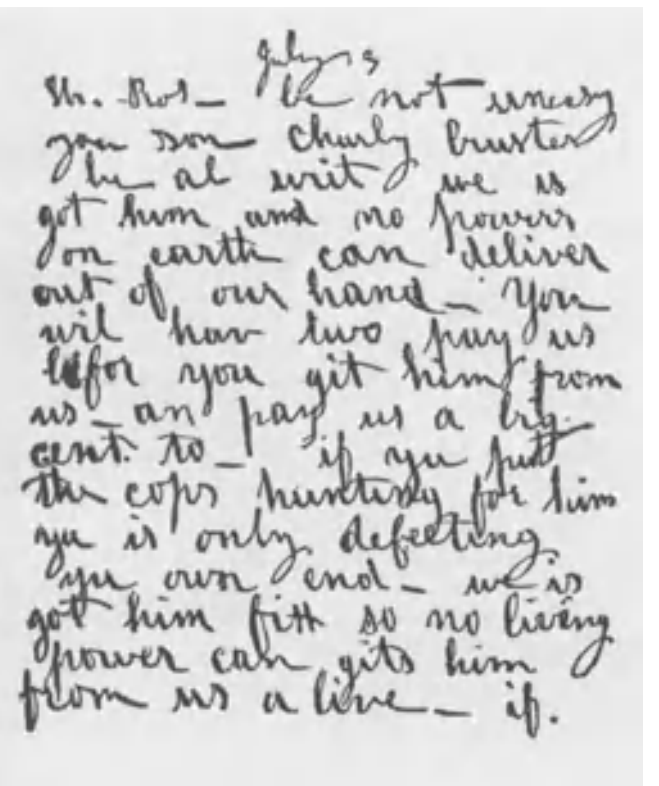
> Be not uneasy you son Charlie be all writ we is got him an no powers on earth can deliver out of our hand. you will have to pay us befor you git him from us, and pay us a big cent to if you regard his lif puts no one in search for him you mony can fech him out alive an no other existin powers.you here from us in a few days.

By now, the boy's mother had returned from Atlantic City. The story had leaked out to the press, which created an uproar in the city. Nervous parents kept their children locked inside their homes, while police commenced a house-to-house search.

On July 6, the kidnappers sent a second note outlining their ransom demand. They wanted $20,000, and warned of dire consequences if their demands were not met: "If you love money more than child yu be its murderer not us ... if we get yu money yu get him live if no money you get him ded."

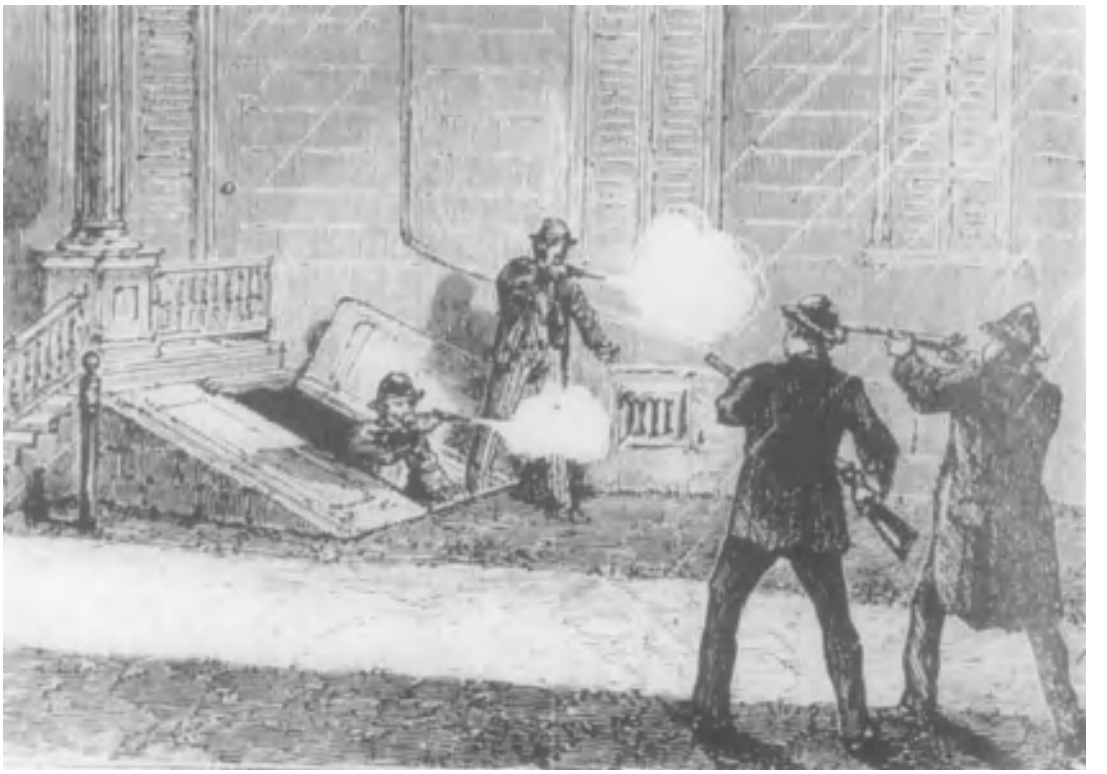
Mr. Ross did as he was told. He placed an item in a local newspaper to notify the kidnappers that he was ready to come to terms. But little Charley's captors were not the illiterates their poorly worded messages seemed to indicate. The police believed that the kidnappers disguised their writing because simple words were often misspelled in one letter but correct in the next. They suggested that their best hope of tracking down the offenders was through an on-going dialogue. They coached Ross to be slightly evasive in his replies to necessitate further correspondence. On July 9 the kidnappers, recognizing signs of delay, warned Ross about the imminent peril his son faced.

On July 22, Philadelphia Mayor Stokley posted a $20,000 reward on behalf of the city for the arrest of the kidnappers.



One of the ransom notes received by merchant Christian K. Ross; the kidnappers demanded $20,000 for the return of his son, Charley.

That same day, Christian Ross sent a notice to the gang that he was prepared to comply with their demands in every way. Eight days later, on July 30, the kidnappers advised Ross to pack $20,000 in small bills and take it with him to New York City. Then he was to change trains for Albany, New York, standing on the rear platform of the last car of the train and waiting for a signal along the way—a white flag on the ground.



Police are shown firing on two burglars attempting to escape a home they invaded in the Bay Ridge section of Brooklyn, on December 14, 1874; they proved to be two of Ross' kidnappers.

Ross' valise contained no money, though, just a note demanding to see the child before the exchange was made. There was no white flag signal either. Ross dejectedly returned home to Pennsylvania to find a letter from the kidnappers scolding him for not keeping the appointment. A newspaper had mistakenly reported that Ross had gone to the police in pursuit of another clue, and not on the train as he was instructed.

The first real break in the case occurred on August 2, when New York Police Chief George Walling asked the Philadelphia authorities to provide him with the original ransom letters. He had received a tip from a reliable informant that pointed to two men, William Mosher and Joseph Douglass, who had criminal records dating back to 1857. The tipster said that in April 1874 these two men had tried to persuade him to join them in kidnapping one of the Vanderbilt children at the family estate in Throgsneck, Long Island, New York. Walter Ross later verified the physical description the man provided. The writing on the ransom note was identified as Mosher's.

Mosher was a boat builder who had been arrested for burglary in 1871. He had escaped before the trial and was still a fugitive from justice at the time of the Ross abduction. Douglass was an amateur inventor who had manufactured a moth repellent, which he dubbed "Mothee." Neither man was able to provide for himself or his family due to the economic recession then sweeping the country. They had formulated the final plans for kidnapping Charley Ross in New York. Twenty-three letters had changed hands by November 6, 1874. Despite the efforts of several police departments and the Pinkerton Detective Agency, the suspects remained at large. Christian Ross followed up on the final communication sent by the kidnappers on November 15. A notice placed in the New York Herald told them where to go: "Saul of Tarsus: Fifth Avenue Hotel, Wednesday, eighteenth, all day." Mrs. Ross' brother and nephew left with a satchel of money on the seventeenth, but their effort was in vain. Mosher and Douglass were keenly aware of the presence of policemen and would not show themselves and claim the $20,000 ransom, even though both were going hungry.

Nothing more happened in the Ross case until December 14, when two burglars broke into the summer residence of Judge Van Brunt in the Bay Ridge section of Brooklyn. The judge was away at the time, but his brother, who occupied the house next door, heard the burglar alarm and summoned two of the hired men to go with him and investigate. Van Brunt cornered the intruders and ordered them to halt. When the burglars answered with a pistol shot, Van Brunt emptied his shotgun into one of the men, who staggered outside mortally wounded. Van Brunt's men dropped the second in his tracks in a fusillade of bullets. He was dead.

John Douglass told police before he died that he and his accomplice, William Mosher, had kidnapped Ross.

Burglar William Mosher, killed by police, was named as one of the Ross kidnappers by his accomplice, Douglass.

A third member in the Ross kidnapping, William Westervelt, an ex-NYPD officer (shown shooting a detective before his apprehension), went to prison in 1875 for seven years, but refused to disclose the whereabouts of the missing Charley Ross.

Van Brunt spoke with the wounded man lying in the mud outside the house. "Men, I won't lie to you," he said. "My name is Joseph Douglass and the man over there is William Mosher. He lives in New York and I have no home. I am a single man and have no relatives except a brother and sister whom I have not seen for twelve years. Mosher is married and has four children. I have forty dollars in my pocket that I made honestly. Bury me with that. Men, I am dying now and it's no use lying. Mosher and I stole Charley Ross." Van Brunt demanded to know why, and Douglass answered, "To make money." He asked where the child was now. "Mosher knows all about the boy, ask him." But they had killed Mosher. They dragged his lifeless body over to Douglass so he could have a better look. "Chief Walling knows all about us and was after us, and now he has us," Douglass gasped. "The child will be returned home safe and sound in a few days." Douglass died an hour later without saying anything more about the kidnapping.

Walter Ross was brought in to view the remains of the two men. He confirmed that this was the same pair who had offered him and his brother candy months earlier. Mosher's widow could shed no light on the whereabouts of the missing Charley Ross, though she confessed to having knowledge of the crime. Suspicion fell on Mosher's brother-in-law, a New York policeman named William Westervelt, who had assisted in the kidnapping. Chief Walling insisted that he had conclusive evidence that would prove Westervelt's guilt. The ex-policeman was convicted on charges of conspiracy and extortion in 1875 and was sentenced to prison for seven years. He could not (or would not), however, direct the police to the boy's location.

Westervelt, shown upon his prison release, reportedly drowned Ross in New York's East River after learning that police were on his trail.

Christian Ross posted a $5,000 reward with no questions asked, but there were no takers. Though the grieving father expanded the search, Little Charley Ross had simply vanished. Christian Ross traveled through Michigan, New York, Connecticut, Vermont, and Pennsylvania following up on every possible clue. By February 1878 he had interviewed 573 homeless boys, but none of them matched Charley's physical appearance. The showman P.T. Barnum offered a $10,000 reward, but Ross respectfully declined the offer. The story took a cruel twist on November 7, 1883, when the New York Times reported that a young man purporting to be Charles Ross was appearing at the Windsor Museum in the Bowery next to the other carnival sideshow freaks. Christian Ross went to the museum to discover that the young man was not his son.

Christian Ross went to his grave in 1897. His wife died in 1912. To the very last day, she held out hope that Charley might be returned to her, but it was not to be. The famous Ross kidnapping case remained an enigma and an open file in the Philadelphia police reports, a case that would be argued for generations to come.

"FROM YOUR OLD KIDNAPPER"/ December 18, 1900

Patrick Crowe was a disgruntled employee of the Cudahy Meatpacking Company of Omaha, Nebraska. Having lost his job, he decided to take revenge on his former employer by kidnapping his boss' son, 15-year-old Edward Cudahy, Jr. On the evening of December 18, 1900, Cudahy was returning from a doctor's office after having delivered second-hand magazines his father no longer wanted. Barring his path, wearing masks and wielding revolvers, were Crowe and accomplice James Callahan. "We're detectives," Crowe announced to the boy, "and you're a robber named McGee. We've been after you, McGee, and now we've got you. Come along with us."

Cudahy pushed away a revolver pointed at him and shouted: "You're crazy!" Ignoring the boy's protests, the kidnappers hustled him into a buggy, tied his arms and feet, and put a hood over his head. They then drove to an old abandoned house in the area and took Cudahy inside, handcuffing him to a chair and giving him a plate of food. Crowe and Callahan then celebrated their kidnapping feat by opening a bottle of liquor.

When the boy did not return home, Edward Cudahy, Sr. phoned the doctor, who told him that Eddie had delivered the magazines several hours earlier and had left for home. Cudahy then called the police, and the entire force turned out to look for the missing youth. They were joined by hundreds of Cudahy's workers, who had been ordered to help search for the meatpacking heir.

By morning, when the boy did not return home, Cudahy realized that his son had been taken and he immediately offered a sizeable reward with no questions asked if his boy was returned to him unharmed. He also called in the Pinkertons who began searching for Eddie. A ransom note delivered that day demanded $25,000 in gold. If the money was paid, the boy would be safely returned the note read, but if Cudahy refused to pay, the kidnappers vowed that they would blind the boy with acid. To instill fear within the Cudahy family, the kidnappers made mention of the fate that befell Charley Ross, who had been kidnapped in 1874 and how the boy vanished forever when the ransom for him was not paid.

Cudahy put five sacks of gold into a buggy that night and delivered this money to a remote spot on the outskirts of Omaha. His son was released unharmed some hours later. Cudahy, once his son was safely back home, offered a large reward for the capture of the kidnappers, but interest in apprehending these culprits was practically nonexistent as Cudahy was not a well-liked man. He paid his employees slave wages and was a severe

Edward Cudahy, Jr., the 15-year-old heir to an Omaha meatpacking fortune, was kidnapped on December 18, 1900. He thought his abductor was "crazy."

Kidnapper Patrick Crowe later made amends, returning the ransom money and sending greeting cards to his victim on the anniversary of the abduction.

taskmaster who had smashed several campaigns to unionize the suffering meatpacking workers.

Police detectives studying the case and various descriptions given of the men seen with the Cudahy boy, concluded that the kidnapping had been masterminded by a colorful character named Pat Crowe, one-time Cudahy employee, who had turned to train robbery and other criminal pursuits. Crowe, however, was nowhere to be found. Crowe was reported to be in China or in the South Seas, off on some adventure.

The kidnapper, in February 1901, then began sending a series of letters to Cudahy, first claiming he was innocent, then offering to return $20,000 of the $25,000 in ransom money. His accomplice, Callahan, was caught in 1901 and identified by Eddie Cudahy as one of the men who had kidnapped him. Callahan was tried for the Cudahy kidnapping. Oddly, Nebraska had no fixed laws governing the crime and Callahan was acquitted. The search for Crowe went on, however.

After reportedly serving with the Boers in South Africa in their fight against the British, Crowe returned to the U.S. in 1906. He later claimed that he returned Cudahy's money through an Omaha attorney. Then he publicly declared that he, indeed, had kidnapped Eddie Cudahy, and submitted himself to trial. Crowe had picked an opportune time to surrender. Feeling against the meatpacking trusts was high and Cudahy represented the oppressive and unyielding owner class. Unions were organized, and the meatpacking czar was under siege to change his employment procedures.

Crowe's trial took place at the height of this crisis, and he was, not surprisingly, acquitted as had been Callahan some five years earlier. Crowe went on to become a popular lecturer, railing against the trusts. Capriciously, he sent a postcard every year for many years to Eddie Cudahy on the anniversary of the kidnapping and signed these missives, "from your old kidnapper." There is no record of Eddie Cudahy ever sending a return card.

THE BUMBLING BOGLES/March 18, 1909

James H. Bogle and his wife, Helen McDermott Bogle (AKA: Mr. and Mrs. Boyle; Mr. and Mrs. Jones; Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Walters) kidnapped 8-year-old Willie Whitla in Sharon, Pa., on March 18, 1909. Bogle arrived at 9:20 a.m. at the East Ward School in Sharon and told the school's janitor, William Sloss, that he had been sent by Whitla's father to pick up the boy. The janitor went to Willie's teacher, Anna Lewis, who had the boy put on his coat and then escorted him outside to a waiting horse-drawn buggy driven by a heavy set, middle-aged man. As he drove off with the 8-year-old, Miss Lewis began to worry and remarked to Sloss: "I hope that man doesn't kidnap Willie." The unsuspecting boy rode on with Bogle, asking when he would see his father. The kidnapper told him soon and gave him a cheese sandwich. A short time later one of Willie's schoolmates saw the boy leave the buggy and mail a letter.

Whitla's father was a prominent lawyer, James P. Whitla, who was also the brother-in-law of steel tycoon Frank H. Buhl. That night, Willie's worried parents received a ransom note demanding $10,000. The note read: "We have your boy and no harm will come to him if you comply with our instructions.

James H. Bogle, who kidnapped Willie Whitla in Sharon, Pennsylvania, on March 18, 1909; he and his wife went to prison for twenty-five years.

If you give this letter to the newspapers or divulge any of its contents, you will never see your boy again. We demand $10,000 in $20, $10, and $5 bills. If you mark the money or attempt to place counterfeit money you will be sorry. Dead men tell no tales. Neither do dead boys. You may answer at the following addresses: Cleveland Press, Youngstown Vindicator, Indianapolis News, and Pittsburgh Dispatch in the personal columns. Answer: "A.A. will do as you requested.

Whitla complied, placing the notice in the newspapers. He informed police that he would not cooperate with any investigation until his son was returned. Then ensued a series of botched meetings arranged for the delivery of the money to the Bogles. Whitla was told to go to the Flat Iron Park in Ashtabula, Ohio, on March 20, 1909, and deposit the money at a certain spot in the park, but no one arrived to pick up the ransom. Another note told him that "a mistake was made in Ashtabula Saturday night." Whitla was then instructed to go to Cleveland by train and go to Dunbar's Drugstore, where a note would be waiting for him with more instructions. Once in the drugstore, Whitla picked up another note telling him to go to a candy store operated by a Mrs. Hendricks; he was to leave the money with Mrs. Hendricks, and mark it for the attention of "Hayes." Whitla left the money with the candy store operator, who had no idea who he was or who Hayes was. She handed Whitla a note from Hayes in a sealed envelope that told the attorney to go to the Hollenden Hotel in Cleveland and that his boy would be delivered to him within a short time.

The nervous father went to the Hollenden and spent several hours of frantic waiting, pacing the lobby, checking the staircases and the area around the hotel. At 8 p.m., two boys, Edward Mahoney and Thomas Rumsey, got on the Payne Avenue streetcar and recognized Willie Whitla from the photos that had been appearing in the daily newspapers. He seemed to be in a drugged state, and when the boys quizzed him as to his destination, Willie told them that he was going to see his father at the Hollenden Hotel. Oddly, he told them that his name was Jones. The boys saw a policeman, Patrolman Dewar, get onto the car and they pointed Willie out to him. Dewar took Willie to the Hollenden Hotel, where his frantic father rushed to embrace his son.

Willie then told his father that he had been in the custody of "Mr. and Mrs. Jones" who said that his father had put him in their safekeeping, so he would not catch smallpox, then reaching epidemic proportions in the area, and that he was to tell anyone who asked about his identity that his names was Jones. He added that he had been kept in a house, where he had to hide under a sink whenever there was a knock at the door because "it might be the doctor to take me to the pesthouse." Willie laughed when he said that "it was fun fooling the doctor." He told his father and police that "Mr. and Mrs. Jones" put him on the trolley car and told him where to get off to reach the Hollenden Hotel.

Willie's return to Sharon by train ended with a triumphant welcome. Thousands greeted him at the depot where bands played and cheering throngs pressed toward the Whitla family to view the boy. Cleveland Police Chief Kohler conducted a massive search of all boarding houses that would match the description given by Willie. His detectives found one house where a man and wife had recently departed in a hurry, the Granger Apartment House on Prospect Avenue. The owners told detectives that the couple had given the names of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Walters.

A saloon keeper, Pat O'Reilly, then informed police that a young couple had recently been in his place spending money lavishly, almost $30 (a lot of money to spend at that time), buying drinks for everyone in his place, always paying with new $5 bills. Bogle and his wife were found on March 22, 1909, both drunk in a Cleveland saloon, these wastrels lavishly spending the Whitla ransom money, blathering and babbling about "committing the perfect crime," and ridiculing the police as bumblers.

When arrested, the Bogles gave the name Boyle to Captain Shattuck and Detective Woods, and when they arrived in front of the police station, the man tried to break free, but Shattuck fired off a shot that stopped him in his tracks. Inside the woman's dress was found $9,848, almost all of the ransom money.

The couple, later identified as James and Helen Bogle, were tried in Mercer, Pennsylvania. Mrs. Hendricks, the confectionary store owner, identified Bogle as the man who left the note for Whitla and later picked up the package containing the ransom money. Helen Bogle, a loud-mouthed slattern, had already convicted the pair when they were arrested, bragging to police: "I planned the whole thing." She thought of herself as a criminal mastermind. When police pointed out that she and her husband had repeatedly botched the ransom pickup and had left a mile-wide trail for police to follow them, Helen Bogle bristled: "I'm not stupid. We did it and got away, didn't we? So you caught us. Everybody gets caught, don't they? So what?" She poked a finger at her forehead, saying: "I got brains, I do."

Willie Whitla testifed in court that Bogle had "whiskers here," pointing to his upper lip to indicate that the kidnapper had worn a mustache when picking him up at his school. A barber, Abner Hancock of Niles, Ohio, testified that he had shaved Bogle's mustache off a few hours after the kidnapping.

Cleveland's Hollenden Hotel, where James Whitla was reunited with his abducted son, Willie.

Neither Bogle nor his wife offered any kind of defense and both were convicted of kidnapping. On May 11, 1909, Bogle was given a life sentence and his wife was sentenced to twenty-five years' imprisonment. Before being sent to prison, James Bogle gave out a story that the idea of kidnapping Willie Whitla originated with Harry Forker, Mrs. Whitla's brother. He said that on the night of June 8, 1895, he found Forker removing papers from the body of Dan Reeble, Jr. on the sidewalk on Federal Street in Youngstown. Bogle went on to state that he had been blackmailing Forker since that time, receiving small amounts until November 1908, when he demanded a final payment of $5,000. Forker told Bogle he did not have that kind of money, according to Bogle, and suggested that Bogle kidnap his nephew, Willie Whitla, and hold him for ransom.

Police dismissed Bogle's story as fantastic and produced policeman Michael Donnelly, who said that he had known the dead Reeble, and had talked to him only a few minutes before his death. Reeble had gone upstairs and fell from a second-story window, when Officer Donnelly was only 200 feet from the building where Reeble lived. Donnelly stated that Reeble was in the habit of sitting in the open window before retiring and that he probably lost his balance and fell to his death. The officer insisted that no one, including Harry Forker, was near the body when Donnelly rushed up to discover his friend Reeble dead.

Willie Whitla is shown reunited with his family; his abductors bragged about their ill-planned kidnapping scheme

"I'M DIGGING AT THE FEET!"/August 2, 1921

Among the inmates of California's San Quentin Prison, one convict became a permanent pariah, a social outcast among social outcasts. He was William A. Hightower (b.1877), who committed the crime considered most odious to hardened criminals: He kidnapped and killed a priest. Born in Texas, Hightower left home to seek his fortune in the West. He worked in dozens of roadside restaurants learning the culinary arts. In time, he became an accomplished baker, specializing in pastries.

In 1910, Hightower married a girl in Fresno, California, but since she was the daughter of a religious fundamentalist, and Hightower enjoyed drinking and womanizing, the couple soon separated. Hightower also worked as a cook and fancied himself a genius inventor. During World War I, he claimed to have invented a new machine gun, but before anyone could test its effectiveness the plans were "stolen," he said. "I was going to have it patented and give it to the government, when the models got into the hands of German sympathizers," he said.

Hightower eventually settled in Bakersfield, California, where he opened a bakery, but it failed in the years following the war. He took to the road, trying desperately to peddle another one of his inventions: a candied fruit substitute. There were no takers. By 1921, Hightower was cooking for a section gang on the Southern Pacific line outside Salt Lake City, Utah. He soon quit and drove to San Francisco, where he concocted what he believed was a perfect money-raising scheme after noticing in the paper that 15,000 members of the Knights of Columbus, a Roman Catholic organization, were to arrive in the city for their thirty-ninth annual convention. In a moment of maniacal inspiration, the failed chef concocted a scheme that he thought would make him a fortune.

Hightower appeared on the doorstep of the Holy Angels Church in Colma, California, on the night of August 2, 1921. The housekeeper, Marie Wendel, opened the door and found an oddly dressed man shielding his face from view, who spoke in a foreign accent, saying: "I would like to see the Father. He is very needed. My friend is dying. We want the Father at once." The housekeeper summoned Father Patrick E. Heslin from his study. Hightower told him that his friend was seriously injured in an auto accident and had requested last rites. Father Heslin left the house with Hightower, the housekeeper watching them drive off into a fog-shrouded night.

When Heslin did not return, she contacted Archbishop Edward J. Hanna, who deemed it prudent to wait a few hours before calling police. Later, the archbishop was sent a ransom note demanding $6,500 for the return of the priest. The hastily scrawled note was given to Carl Eisenshimmel and Chauncey McGovern, two experts in the field of graphology. They could only state the obvious: the author of this note was a "deranged person ... a demented person."

The story was leaked to the press and within hours the city, including the thousands of delegates of the Knights of Columbus Convention, was in an uproar. Police conducted an exhaustive search through the city and its environs, but after eight days still found no sign of Father Heslin. Armed vigilantes combed the city streets, the surrounding hills, and the isolated beaches, to no avail. A second ransom note arrived, but did not specify where the drop was to be made.

What was particularly unusual was the kidnapper's demand for $6,500 rather than an even sum. "Fate made me do this," the second note explained. Handwriting experts Eisenshimmel and McGovern characterized the second note as having been written by a "goof." On August 10, the "goof" appeared before police officials. He was wearing a Palm Beach suit and he carried in his hand a Panama straw hat, typical mid-summer wear for the era. He announced that he was William A. Hightower, a businessman down on his luck.

Father Patrick E. Heslin, kidnapped and murdered on August 2, 1921, in a botched scheme to collect a $6,500 ransom from the Catholic Church.

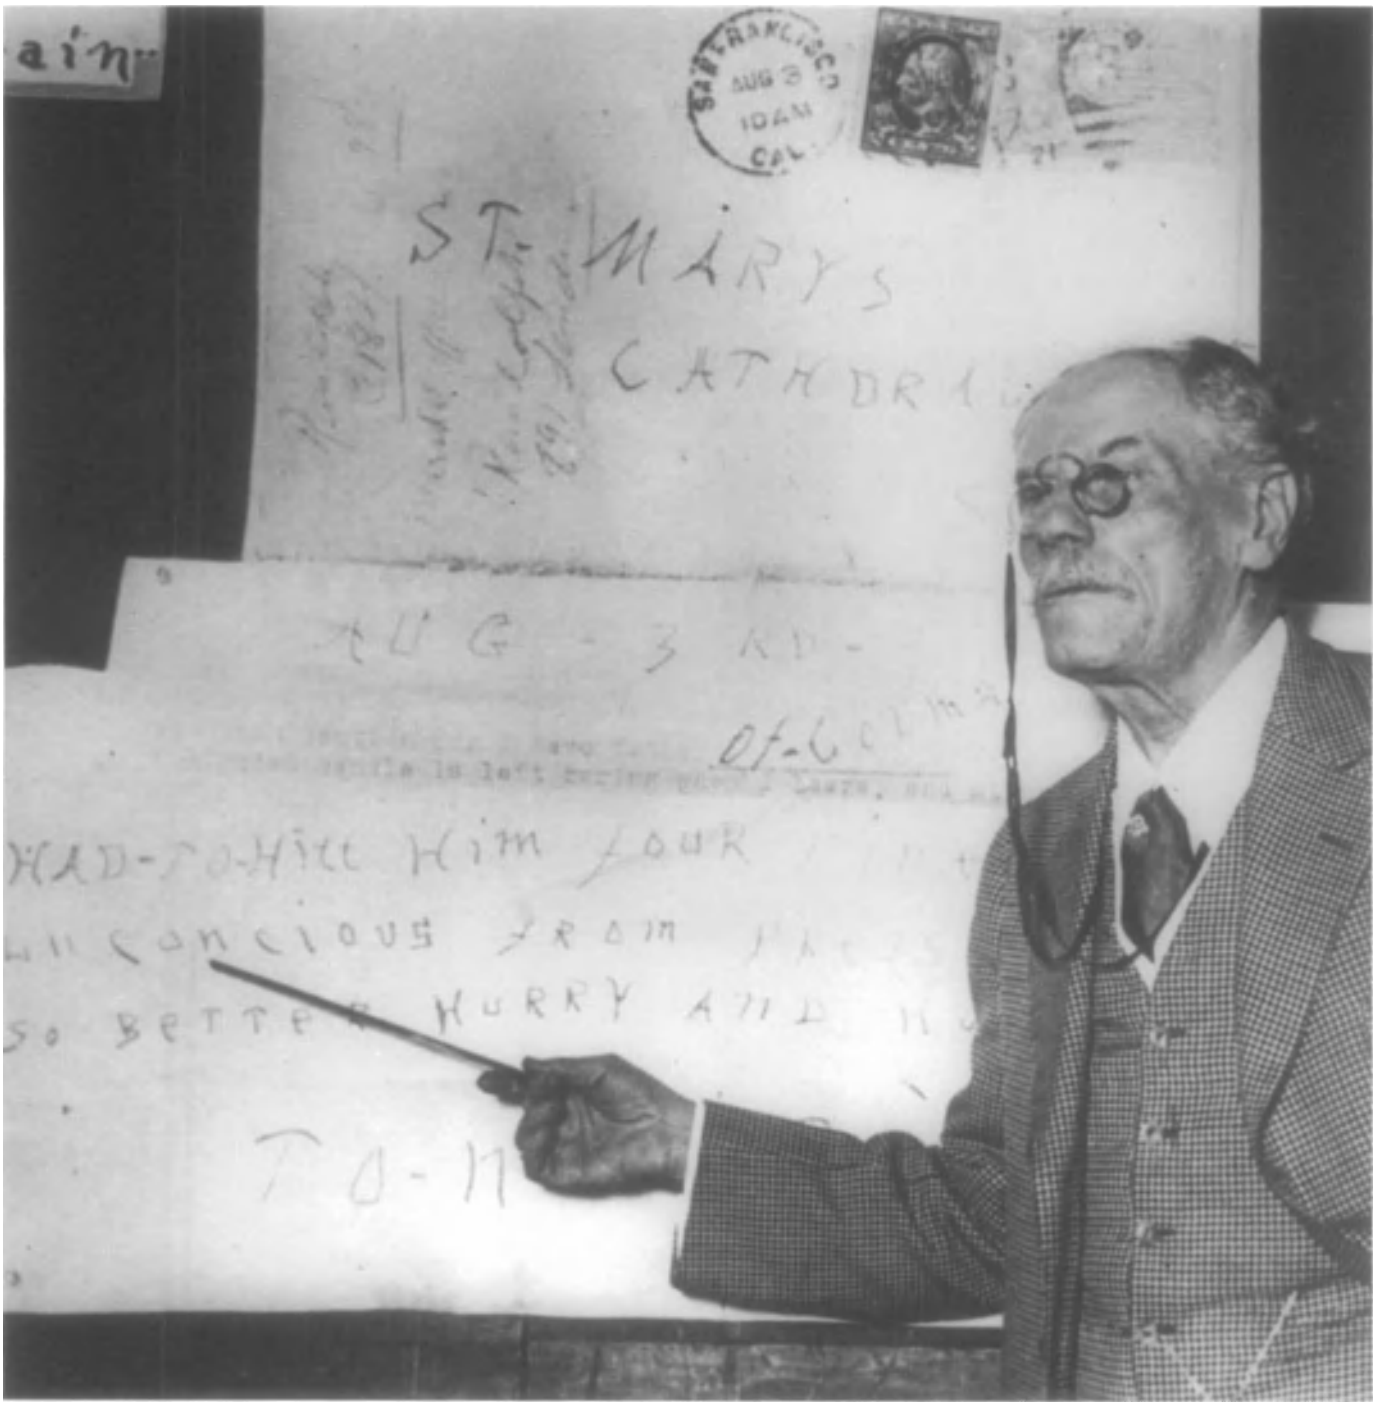
Hightower went on to state that he could help the police find the missing priest. "A man who fried flapjacks all the time is watching over him," he said. A reporter for the San Francisco Examiner standing nearby reasoned that Hightower referred to an Albers Milling Company billboard which featured a miner cooking flapjacks over an open fire. The billboard overlooked Salada Beach, a lonely strip of coastal highway running out of San Francisco.

Two women named Dolly Mason and Doris Shirley, both prostitutes, had tipped Hightower off about a cache of bootleg liquor buried under the sand, he told police. While digging for the Scotch he hoped to sell on the open market,



Graphologist Carl Eisenshimmel is shown examining the enlarged ransom note sent by Heslin's kidnapper, the handwriting expert stating that he believed the sender to be "a deranged person."

Bold kidnapper William A. Hightower, at the time he appeared in a police station to ask for a reward for pinpointing the whereabouts of the missing Father Heslin, the priest he had actually abducted and murdered.

Hightower (arrow) stands with police detectives at the beach grave he easily located and where he helped dig up his victim, the body lying at his feet; the kidnapper expected to receive a reward for pinpointing the remains of Father Heslin.

Hightower, right, leads the search party in carrying the body of his victim from Salada Beach; instead of a reward, he was charged with kidnapping and murder.

Hightower, extreme right, stands with the search party he led to the grave site, with the covered remains of the missing priest on a litter at their feet; Police Chief O'Brien, who was suspicious of Hightower's actions, stands (second from right) grim-faced next to the kidnapper-killer.

While serving out a life term at San Quentin, Hightower, shown in old age, became an accomplished chef, dying behind bars and never mentioning his victim's name.

Hightower had unearthed a black scarf which he figured belonged to the priest. "I left the scarf as a marker on the beach. Father Heslin, poor soul, is probably at the other end of it," Hightower said.

Accompanied by Police Chief O'Brien, a squad of detectives, and several reporters from the Examiner who sensed a scoop in the making, Hightower led them to a deserted strip of Salada Beach. The curious young man babbled incessantly about his nomadic life, and the jobs he took while on the road. There was the time he inadvertently shot the hat off a garrulous Texas Ranger, for example. "I sneaked over the county line and kept on going that night boys," he drawled. "Strange way for a man to lose his job, don't you think?"

In the swirling fog, it was difficult for the search party to gain its bearings. Hightower, who was satisfied that he would collect a fat reward for uncovering the body, jubilantly called to the detectives. "Over here, boys. Just this way!" he called. Constable Silvio Landini warned him to be careful with his digging. He might strike the face and obliterate valuable evidence. "Don't worry," Hightower replied. "I'm digging at the feet!"

"Didn't you say you didn't know if there was a body down there or not?" the chief asked.

"That's what I said," answered Hightower absentmindedly as he continued digging in a feverish manner. His remark had been a revealing slip of the tongue, one that indicated he knew the position of the body before it was unearthed. Chief O'Brien concluded at that moment that Hightower was, indeed, the kidnapper.

Father Heslin's body was quickly removed from the sand. A blow in the back of the head had crushed his skull and two gunshots had been fired into the body. Doris Shirley was located, and she admitted to spending one night with Hightower. Dolly Mason turned out to be Hightower's invention. On August 13, a local pawnbroker told police that Hightower had recently pawned a .45-caliber pistol, one that proved to be the same one used to kill Father Heslin. Inside Hightower's hotel room police found the typewriter used to prepare the ransom note.

Hightower was indicted for murder and convicted after a short trial. "That a poor priest going to assist a man in the throes of death could meet foul play seems so incredible that the archbishop hopes that in the clearing up of the death of Father Heslin some excuse may be found that will save the name of San Francisco," exclaimed Archbishop Hanna, trying to make some sense of the whole thing. To reporters, the convicted killer added his own snide observation: "Ish ka bible!"

Hightower was sentenced to life in prison, despite the crusading efforts of the San Francisco Examiner, which called for the death penalty. At San Quentin he was assigned to work as the prison chef. Here he became an accomplished cook, who won praise for his skill and dexterity in preparing cakes and pastries. Warden Duffy praised his efforts. "He made a candy out of fruit which was so delicious that Gladys [the warden's wife] asked him for the recipe. Neither she nor anyone else could duplicate it even after he wrote it out for her." An otherwise reclusive individual, the prisoner published a newsletter titled Observations from A. Hightower, a collection of nonsensical prose he truly believed would one day rival that of H.L. Mencken for literary genius.

Although he was shunned by his fellow convicts, Hightower never ceased to be enamored with himself. He demanded of publisher William Randolph Hearst that he be given editorial space in the pages of the Examiner so that he could publish a column. It was only fair, Hightower believed in his own convoluted way of thinking, since the newspaper had sent him to prison in the first place. In 1960, the kidnapper-killer sent a message to Warden Duffy which read: "[Hightower who] was supposed to be very ignorant [when sent to prison] is now such a wizard of words that he has surpassed all other men in writing punch lines." It was exactly the same kind of writing style used in the ransom notes, though Hightower never mentioned Father Heslin by name during his lifelong imprisonment.

THE ABDUCTION OF SISTER AIMEE/ May 18, 1926

Aimee Semple McPherson (Aimee Elizabeth Kennedy, 1890-1944) was a phenomenon of the Roaring Twenties, a religious icon that rocketed to fame and fizzled to disgrace, after it was discoverd that she had faked her own kidnapping to cloak her carnal desires. Wealth, fame, and power awaited this minister's daughter from Ingersoll, Ontario, Canada, when she took to the podium to preach her own fiery brand of revivalist gospel.

McPherson was a caricature of the crazy times in which she lived, personifying the 1920s, when Americans lived vicariously through the media heroes they created. "Sister" Aimee was a captivating huckster whose oratorical skills and forcefulness of personality stole the hearts and wallets of an entire generation.

Aimee Kennedy was born on a farm to a Bible-thumping Salvationist. Her mother, Minnie "Ma" Kennedy, a steadying influence through much of Aimee's life, saw to it that she was indoctrinated to fundamentalist religion early in life. At the age of seventeen Aimee fell in love with an itinerant preacher named Robert Semple, who appeared at a tent meeting in Ingersoll one day. His powerful words struck her heart like a "swift-flung arrow." She married the Pentecostal evangelist in 1908 and moved to China, where together they worked as Christian missionaries. Semple died in Hong Kong in 1910, leaving his wife and infant daughter penniless in a foreign land. Aimee earned her passage back to America preaching to the sinners on board the Empress of China. When the wealthy passengers responded by giving her enough money for a ticket and a few dollars to spare, Aimee Semple was suddenly face to face with her life's calling.

Sister Aimee Semple McPherson, center, waves to her adoring followers, often spiking her colorful sermons with jazz band music (note the saxophone—a symbol of the Jazz Age—resting next to the podium).

In 1912, she married a grocery store clerk named Harold S. McPherson. Their marriage produced one child before ending in divorce nine years later. Her career began in earnest in 1917 when she began to preach to her followers about a "Foursquare Gospel Evangelism." Moving to Los Angeles a year later, Sister Aimee, by her own account, "worked by day and dreamed by night in the shadow of the tent." The tent she imagined for herself was Angelus Temple, which opened in Echo Park on January 1, 1923. The chapel, an auditorium with a seating capacity of 5,000, and a specially constructed radio station that carried her message across the state, was built at a staggering cost of $1.5 million. It was all made possible by her celebrated "healing sessions" conducted in such remote locations as New Zealand, Australia, Canada, and the backwater towns of the U.S. A few of her followers who suffered from incurable diseases had suddenly recovered, and the publicity surrounding these "miracles" elevated her to celebrity status. "I am not a healer," she often said. "Jesus is the healer. I am only the little office girl who opens the door and says, 'Come in.'"

McPherson had a decided flair for the dramatic. She pandered to the sensational by appearing in long, flowing translucent gowns, tailored to display her curvacious and voluptuous body. On one occasion she wore a policeman's uniform to deliver a sermon on "God's Law." With her own magazine, a Bible School, some 400 branch churches in the U.S. alone, and the publication of two books, This and That (1919), and In the Service of the King (1927), McPherson had become one of the most influential religious figures in America. Her Angelus Temple payroll exceeded $7,000 a month, an impressive figure in those days. Her appearance on the altar of the temple was not only awe-inspiring, but erotic according to the recollections of Carey Williams. He wrote, "She suggested sex without being sexually attractive. The suggestion was to be found, perhaps in some quality of the voice; some radiation of that astonishing physical vitality. While constantly emanating sex, she lacked the graceful presence, the subtlety of manner, the mysterious reticence of a real siren."

Far from being the simon-pure Christian faith healer that her followers imagined, McPherson had a secret lover, Kenneth G. Ormiston, who worked quietly behind the scenes as McPherson's radio operator. The ubiquitous Ormiston already had a wife, but still "comforted" McPherson. "You sound as Sister Aimee is shown broadcasting a sermon from her own radio station; her radio operator, Kenneth G. Ormiston, was her secret lover and with whom she ran off on a love tryst, covering her flight into carnal desire by claiming that she had been kidnapped on May 18, 1926.

Sister Aimee, her face bruised, is shown consoling herself by reading from her Bible in a hospital bed after escaping from her so-called cruel abductors.

In a melodramatic re-enactment of her imagined kidnapping, Sister Aimee is shown being burned on her hands with a lighted cigar by a sadistic kidnapper she had sexually rebuffed.

An sinister abductor is about to cover Sister Aimee with a blanket as she awaits unknown terrors; this was the method her kidnappers employed, she said, when abducting her.

Bound hand and foot the helpless evangelist desperately hopes for rescuers and plots her escape from a remote cabin in the wilds of Mexico, where she said she was held for ransom.

Sister Aimee is shown making her escape from the hideout of her abductors in this re-enactment of her kidnapping, a fantastic story she invented to hide her assignation with Ormiston.

though you were tired tonight," he would tell her in soothing tones. "You have done splendidly tonight." Ormiston and McPherson registered under assumed names in various hotels in and around the Los Angeles area. It was for Ormiston that she staged her famous "kidnapping" on May 18, 1926.

With her secretary Emma Schaeffer, McPherson registered at the Ocean View Hotel in Venice Beach, Calif. That afternoon, as the evangelist worked on her next sermon, she asked Schaeffer to run an errand for her. When she returned, Schaeffer found that her employer had vanished. After another hour had passed Schaeffer notified the authorities. Ma Kennedy who was always there to lend encouragement to her daughter's endeavors, created a scene by hysterically yelling "Drowned!" Thousands of McPherson's friends and supporters combed the beaches, but there was no trace. The police dragged the floor of the ocean with grapplers, believing that McPherson had somehow been caught in the undertow. Others maintained that she had been abducted and killed by gangsters for her unrelenting war against sin.

A raging paranoia seemed to grip the country as McPherson's disappearance was reported in the newspapers. There were reports of miracles. One of her followers claimed to see her walking on the waters of the Pacific Ocean. He was removed to an asylum for evaluation. Twenty-six-year-old Robert Browning splashed into the ocean near Venice in a vain attempt to "rescue" McPherson. After running out of energy, he slipped below the waves and died. Minnie Kennedy, Sister Aimee, under indictment for fraud (faking her own abduction) sits with her protective mother, Minnie "Ma" Kennedy, at a court hearing in early January 1927; Ma Kennedy claimed to have received a ransom note demanding $500,000 for the safe return of her daughter. The case against the evangelist was dismissed.

Sister Aimee, left, is shown on board her private train car, with her manager (center) urging 1,500 followers at Union Station in Los Angeles to cheer her departure as she embarks upon her "Vindication Tour," through the U.S.

Sister Aimee, still magnetic and mesmerizing in the 1930s, addresses another packed audience at her Angelus Temple in Los Angeles, but her popularity waned the following decade and she took her own life in 1944.

meanwhile, commanded the followers to raise a $25,000 reward. She also chartered an airplane and, in a symbolic act, dropped lilies over the patch of ocean where her daughter was thought to have drowned.

The police concluded that McPherson had been abducted, though it seemed peculiar that she could have been dragged from a crowded beach without one person witnessing such an event and no one coming forward to provide a clue. Days later, a Long Beach attorney named R.A. McKinley reported to police that two men named Wilson and Miller had demanded a $25,000 ransom payment in return for McPherson's life. On June 4, 1926, Sheriff William Traeger received a communication from "Willow of the Wisp," who said that McPherson was being held against her will in Santa Barbara. These were among dozens of false leads the police received, some coming from as far away as Edmonton, Alberta. On June 19, Minnie Kennedy received a letter asking for $500,000. It was signed by the "Avengers." There were those who said that Kennedy wrote the letter to herself, then had it sent special delivery to her own address.

The protracted drama ended happily on June 23, 1926, when McPherson turned up on the doorstep of John Anderson, a resident of Agua Prieta, Mexico, just across the border from Arizona. She was sleeping peacefully on the front porch when he came home. "She had a pillow under her head," Anderson told police, "and a quilt thrown over her." McPherson filled in the missing details. She said that she had been approached by a woman on the beach, who asked her to bless a sick baby in a nearby car.

When she peered into the automobile, she said, three people named "Rose," "Steve," and "Jake" pulled her inside and then drove to Mexico. "The woman, Rose, treated me very nicely, and the men did not molest me with any undue attention," she said. "I prayed constantly and talked to them of God. I'll bet they were tired of hearing my preaching." She went on to say that on the night of June 22, 1926, she sawed through the rope that bound her hands by using a jagged tin can. The cabin was deserted, so she fled, running across a moonlit desert to freedom.

A team of posses went to search for the kidnappers, despite the vigorous protest of Mexican officials. There was an international incident in the making, which added to the lustre of McPherson's star. She was greeted by 100,000 well-wishers lining the streets of Los Angeles for a glimpse of her motorcade, which had been arranged by McPherson promoters capitalizing on her "triumphant recovery" from "dastardly kidnappers."

District Attorney Asa Keyes was skeptical thoughout. He questioned McPherson's motives and the strange way in which she had been kidnapped. Reporters asked the question in the minds of the LAPD: "Forgive me, Mrs. McPherson," one newsman said, "but didn't you really have a reason to vanish?" McPherson stood by her story, as unbelievable as it was. Some days later, the police learned that Ormiston had disappeared the same day McPherson was "kidnapped." Keyes pieced together a likely scenario. In order to be with her married lover and not arouse undue press attention, McPherson herself concocted this amazing piece of fiction. He secured an indictment against the evangelist charging her with obstructing justice during the disappearance and using the postal system to defraud.

To support his contention, Keyes located a blue trunk that Ormiston had brought from New York to California. Inside this trunk, police found a collection of McPherson's nightgowns, hosiery, and other personal items. Mrs. Lorraine Wiseman came forward to refute the story, but finally admitted under a barrage of police questions that McPherson and her mother had paid her a large amount of money to help dispel the gossip.

McPherson fought back, accusing members of the criminal underworld of trying to "frame" her, a charge that did not hold up in court. But it was equally difficult for the district attorney to prove his case even with a spate of circumstantial evidence. On January 10, 1927, Keyes moved for a dismissal. The next day McPherson jubilantly began her "Vindication Tour," but many of her fans had become disillusioned. Thousands deserted her ranks, coming to believe that she had, indeed, faked her kidnapping and, further, had milked sympathy and large donations for her fabricated abduction from her most gullible followers.

Aimee Semple McPherson continued to preach the gospel through the 1930s. Her temple became a popular tourist attraction, but the enthusiasm and immense base of support she enjoyed in the 1920s eroded a decade later. In September 1944 McPherson ended her own life by consuming a lethal dose of barbiturates, leaving behind a tottering religious empire that was taken over by her adoring son, Rolf.

Aimee Semple McPherson would be sympathetically portrayed as "Sister Sharon Falconer" in Sinclair Lewis' powerful novel Elmer Gantry (published in 1927, a year after Aimee's celebrated "kidnapping," the hustling male evangelist of that memorable work bearing the name of the title and being based upon McPherson's revivalist rival Billy Sunday). McPherson was accurately essayed as a role model by Barbara Stanwyck in Frank Capra's 1931 film, The Miracle Woman, and by Jean Simmons in the 1960 film Elmer Gantry. Memorable though these film portraits were, they could not equal the dynamic performances of the real woman that electrified, mesmerized and consumed her obsessed followers.

THE COLLEGE BOY KIDNAPPER/ December 15, 1927

Handsome and brilliant, William Edward Hickman (AKA: George Fox; The Fox; 1907-28) was nevertheless a mentally twisted person. He decided that the only way he could pay the $1,500 he needed for college tuition was to kidnap the daughter of wealthy Los Angeles banker Perry Parker. He knew Parker adored his 12-year-old twin daughters, Marian and Marjorie, because he had briefly held a menial job at the Los Angeles First National Trust and Savings, where Parker worked.

On the afternoon of December 15, 1927, Hickman drove to Mt. Vernon Junior High School in Arlington, a suburb west of Los Angeles. Hickman told the school principal that Parker had been injured in an auto accident and that he had been sent to take Marian home. There was nothing unusual about such a request, and the well-dressed, articulate Hickman inspired confidence among the school administrators. The school officials released Marian from her classes and the two drove away. It was the last anyone would see her alive.

An hour later a telegram arrived at Parker's office from Pasadena which read: "Do positively nothing till you receive special delivery letter. Marian Parker. George Fox." A telegram from Alhambra arrived a few hours later. It read "Marian secure. Interference with my plans dangerous. Marian Parker. George Fox."

The next day a special delivery letter written in a script style and followed with a Greek triangle, representing delta or death, arrived at the Parker home. The kidnapper demanded seventy-five $20 gold certificates, or $1,500 in currency, as the price of Marian's safe return. The ransom note read: "Failure to comply with these requests means no one will ever see the girl again. Except the Angels in Heaven." Two more letters, one written by Marian pleading for her release, were received on December 17, 1927. The second letter from the kidnapper was signed the "Fox" and contained an unexplained change in the ransom demand. It read:

> Fox is my name. Very sly you know. No traps. I'll watch for them. All you inside guys even your neighbor the B., know that when you play with fire there is cause for burns. NOT W.J. Burns [head of the Burns Detective Agency] and his shadows either. Remember that. Get this straight. Your daughter's life hangs by a thread and I have a Gillette [razor] ready and able to handle the situation. This is business. Do you want the girl or seventy-five $100 gold certificates, U.S. currency? You can't have both and there's no other way out. Believe this and act accordingly. Before the day's over I'll find out how you stand. I'm doing a solo so figure on meeting the terms of Mr. Fox or else FATE.

Parker was instructed to drive alone with the money to the corner of 10th and Gramercy and wait. The police laid a trap, which Hickman sensed and refused to show himself. A second note from Marian arrived the next day begging her father not to bring the police with him. Hickman added an ominous postscript. "Today is the last day. I mean Saturday, Twelve-year-old Marian Parker, kidnapped on December 15, 1927 and held for a $1,500 ransom; her abductor had no intentions of returning her alive.

Dec. 17, 1927. You are insane to ignore my terms with death fast on its way. I cut the time to two days and only once more will I phone you. I will be two billion times as cautious, as clever, as deadly from now on." However, Hickman had decided to kill the child on the same day he kidnapped the girl. He first held a knife to her throat and compelled her to write the first letter sent to her father, one which Hickman dictated to the girl and read:

"Dear Daddy and Mother:
I wish I could come home. I think I'll die if I have to be like this much longer. Won't someone tell me why all this had to happen to me? Daddy, please do what the man tells you or he'll kill me if you don't.
Your loving daughter,
Marian Parker.
P.S. Please Daddy, I want to come home tonight."

After the girl finished writing this letter, Hickman strangled her to death with a dish towel and then, for reasons he never explained, severed her arms and legs.

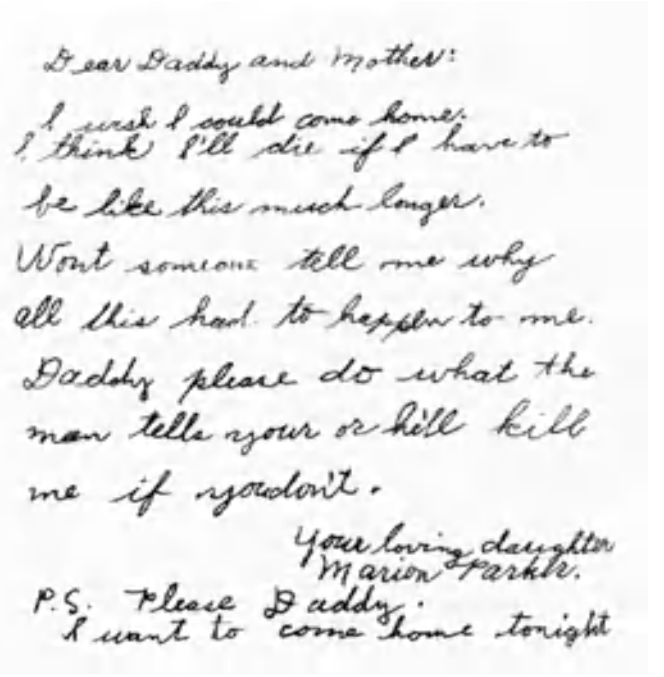
Deciding that he could still extort the money from Parker, he telephoned and arranged a second drop by phone. This time Parker complied with carefully worded instructions and met Hickman in a secluded spot outside Los Angeles. The father demanded to see his daughter. Hickman pulled back a blanket covering Marian's body, revealing only her face. "Don't follow me and be careful," Hickman said. "I'll drive up there and put her out and you can get her."

Parker handed over the money and waited as Hickman drove down the street, finally placing the body curbside before fleeing. Parker rushed to his daughter's side. He pulled back the blanket only to recoil in horror. The madman had combed the dismembered girl's hair, powdered her face, and tied her eyelids open with pieces of black thread. Within hours, news of the tragedy leaked out to the newspapers and radio. Frightened parents locked their children inside their homes as the police went to work.

One of the most intensive manhunts in California state history began. There was only one tangible clue found at the drop site for the police to work with, a blood-stained towel monogrammed "Bellevue Arms Apartments." That night detectives went to the Bellevue Arms and found Hickman in his apartment. Although they also found guns, a blood-stained floor, and rolls of cash in the apartment, they left the building without arresting him.

Years later, the theory came out that the Los Angeles detectives had known all along that Hickman was their man, but it was a Sunday and the First National Bank, the politicians, and the county board did not have enough time to set a reward for the capture of the felon. Acting under orders from Chief James Edgar "Two Gun" Davis, they planned to wait until Monday to arrest Hickman in the hope of collecting a sizable reward.

Taking advantage of the opportunity to escape, the murderer fled the city and headed toward Seattle. Hickman arrived there on December 22, 1927. He stole a green Hudson automobile and drove back to Arlington, Oregon, a distance



Dear Daddy and Mother:
I wish I could come home.
I think I'll die if I have to be like this much longer.
Wont someone tell me why all this had to happen to me.
Daddy please do what the man tells your or he'll kill me if you don't.
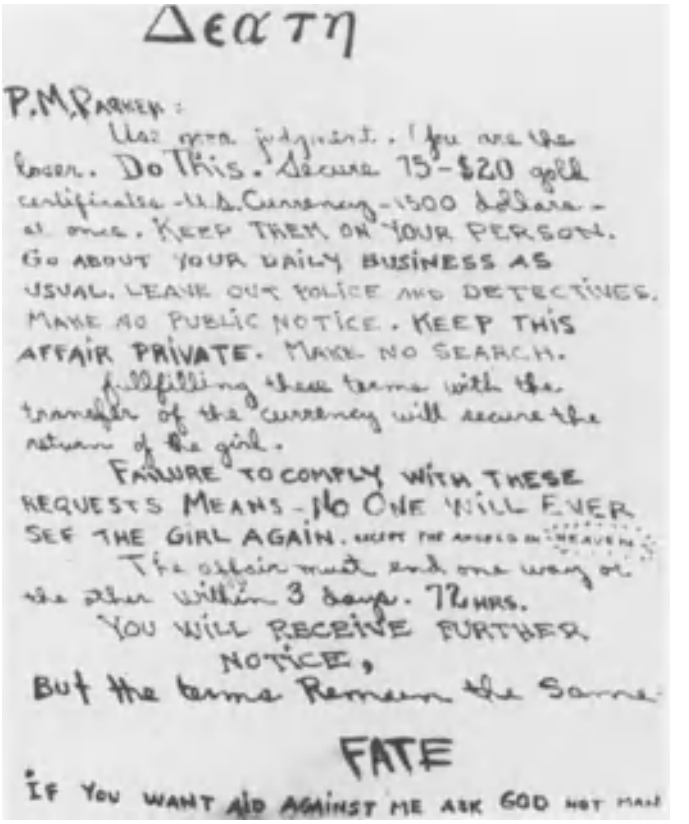
Your loving daughter
Marion Parker.
P.S. Please Daddy.
I want to come home tonight

While her abductor stood over her and held a razor to her throat, Marian Parker penned this plea to her parents; she was then killed by her captor



Δεατη
P.M. Parker:
Use your judgment. You are the loser. Do This. Secure 75-$20 gold certificates U.S. Currency-1500 dollars-at once. KEEP THEM ON YOUR PERSON.
Go about your daily business as usual. Leave out police and detectives.
Make no public notice. KEEP THIS AFFAIR PRIVATE. Make no search. fulfilling these terms with the transfer of the currency will secure the return of the girl.
FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH THESE REQUESTS MEANS - NO ONE WILL EVER
SEE THE GIRL AGAIN. [illegible]
The affair must end one way or the other within 3 days. 72 HRS.
YOU WILL RECEIVE FURTHER NOTICE.
But the terms Remain the Same FATE
IF YOU WANT AID AGAINST ME ASK GOD NOT MAN

A second letter sent to Marian's father, arranging for the ransom of Marian Parker, by then murdered and mutilated by her cold-blooded kidnapper.

William Edward Hickman, the egotistical 20-year-old college boy, who had abducted and murdered Marian Parker, is shown only a short time after he was taken into custody.

Vanity gnawing to the last moment, Hickman carefully combed his dark, wavy hair an hour before he mounted the scaffold at San Quentin and was hanged on February 4, 1928.

of eighty-six miles west of Pendleton. After his picture had appeared in the local papers, Hickman was picked up by local police in Echo, Oregon, following a high-speed car chase along the Columbia River.

"I am the Lone Wolf," Hickman boasted as he was being led away. "Do you think I'll be as famous as Leopold and Loeb?" Extradited back to Los Angeles, Hickman was put on a fast train going southward. He appeared docile while flanked by guards, but he attempted twice to commit suicide in the train's washroom. These were feeble efforts, apparently designed to convince his guards and later his jury that he was insane.

At the news of the kidnapper's capture, thousands of curious spectators gathered at stations along the route of the train carrying Hickman. His horrendous murder and dismemberment of Marian Parker intrigued the morbid and fascinated the ghoulish, who stood gaping at the window of the train car where Hickman sat. He smiled and waved at them, as if he were some Hollywood celebrity and some nervously waved back.

Hickman was tried for murder in the Los Angeles courtroom of Judge Carlos Hardy, who reserved ringside seats for his close friends and local politicians. Hardy was an intimate of Aimee Semple McPherson, the famous evangelist of the 1920s whose celebrated "kidnapping" created a national uproar a year earlier. Hickman's attorney attempted to enter an insanity plea, but this was promptly rejected. He was found guilty of kidnapping and murder and ordered to hang at San Quentin Prison. Before he went to the scaffold, Hickman spent hours combing his dark, wavy hair. On February 4, 1928, before a standing-room-only crowd of 400 in San Quentin, the noose was fastened around his neck. On the first attempt, where Hickman stood stoic and unresponsive, the poorly knotted and misplaced rope snapped. Hickman had to go through the gruesome ordeal a second time. This time, he quaked, quivered and sobbed before the rope jerked him to eternity.

THE LINDBERGH KIDNAPPING/ March 1, 1932

The crime for which Bruno Richard Hauptmann (AKA: Perlmeyer; Cemetery John; 1899-1936) paid with his life was undoubtedly the most sensational in America's twentieth century, the kidnapping and murder of Charles A. Lindbergh, Jr. The victim was the 20-month-old son of America's greatest living hero, Charles Augustus Lindbergh, who, in 1927, was the first to fly across the Atlantic in an historic solo flight that made him an aviational legend. For this startlingly heroic achievement, Lindbergh, a tall, clean-cut young man—an All-

Charles A. Lindbergh, Jr., the 20-month-old son of America's great aviator, who was kidnapped on March 1, 1932.

American youth by any standard—was honored and revered.

Lindbergh was seen as a pathfinder, a pioneer, a man of singular honor and dedication who had risked his life in his small monoplane, The Spirit of St. Louis, for the future of aviation and the glory of the United States. He had married the beautiful and cultured Anne Morrow, from one of America's most prestigious families. The union produced a blond-haired, blue-eyed little boy, Charles Augustus Lindbergh, Jr.

The Lindberghs occupied a large two-story house outside Hopewell, New Jersey, in a district called Sourlands, where they lived an idyllic life. Sourlands was remote enough that the famous Lindberghs had some distance between themselves and the hounding press that attempted to chronicle their every move. Newspaper and magazine articles pinpointed the whereabouts of the spacious, remote Lindbergh home, with photos to show its construction from the foundation up. Every room had been illustrated in magazines, including the baby's room, which was on the second floor.

On the cold, windswept night of March 1, 1932, Mrs. Lindbergh entered the child's bedroom at about 9 p.m. She had been worried about the infant since he had recently caught a slight cold. He was sleeping soundly in his crib. Colonel Lindbergh was working at the time in his library, when he heard a noise outside the house, but attributed it to a broken shutter banging outside the window of the baby's room.

At a few minutes before 10 p.m., Betty Gow, the baby's 28-year-old English nurse, entered the nursery to find the child missing from his crib. She did not panic, thinking that Lindbergh might have taken the child from the room. She also knew, much to her chagrin, that the colonel was a practical joker. Some months earlier he had taken the baby from its crib and hidden it in a closet as a practical joke, one which only he had found amusing. Nurse Gow went downstairs and asked Lindbergh if he had again taken the child. He said no and a frantic search began. It was first thought that the baby might have somehow gotten out of the crib and crawled away. Everyone in the home, including Ollie and Elsie Whately, the Lindbergh butler and cook who had come from Scotland to work for the Lindberghs, joined in the desperate search.

Then Lindbergh found a note in an envelope on the window sill of the child's room. He did not open it, but shouted to Ollie Whately: "Don't let anyone touch it! Call the police and tell them that the baby has been taken!" He then grabbed a rifle and dashed outside into the darkness, hoping to track down the kidnapper, whom he thought would be on foot somewhere on the Lindbergh estate. Hopewell chief of police Harry Wall arrived at the Lindbergh mansion first, but before he could begin a careful examination of the area, the estate was flooded with state police and officers from neighboring towns, all responding to a general alarm.

It was never determined exactly who had called in the additional police, but scores of troopers and patrolmen suddenly appeared and tramped through the mansion and about the grounds. A homemade ladder found next to the building at the window of the baby's room was so manhandled that any fingerprints the kidnapper might have left were obliterated. More than 500 sets of other fingerprints, mostly those of investigating officers, were taken from the ladder. The area around the house was muddy after a recent rain, but it was impossible to take any footprint casts since the state troopers had crisscrossed the area, trampling every clue underfoot. The ransom note was opened in the presence of the police. It was crudely written in ungrammatical English and read:

> Have fifty thousand dollars ready, 25,000 in twenty-dollar bills 15,000 in ten-dollar bills, and 10,000 in five-dollar bills. In 4-5 days we will inform you where to deliver the money. We warn you for making anyding public or for notify the police. The child is in gut care. Indication for all letters are signature and three holes.

No clues were turned up by the police and no one was immediately found in the area, who could testify to seeing anyone prowling about the Lindbergh place on the night of the kidnapping. Lindbergh realized that he had erred in having his butler immediately call the police. He preferred simply to pay off the kidnapper and retrieve his child with no police involvement. The only other approach, the most dangerous method, was to work closely with the police to develop a clever trap in which the child would be used as bait, the kidnapper caught, and the child returned unharmed. The procedure which Lindbergh finally adopted fell somewhere in between.

Unfortunately, it proved ineffective and turned into disaster. Lindbergh soon realized that because each department had its own theories about the identities of the kidnappers and how best to handle them, the several police departments involved in separate on-going investigations were bumbling the procedures. In agony over the safety of his child, Lindbergh reached out to any and all who might be of help.

Meanwhile, the press blared the news of the kidnapping. It created the type of shock waves one might expect if a child had been abducted from the White House. Of course, the

The ransom note left by the kidnapper in the baby's room, one which demanded a ransom payment of $75,000 in bills of small denominations.

The homemade ladder used by the kidnapper to access the baby's room at the Lindbergh home in Hopewell, New Jersey, rests against the house where the invader made his nocturnal entry.

Lindberghs were American royalty of sorts, the colonel being the most famous and most respected citizen at the time. A number of strange characters became involved in the case. Society grande dame, Evalyn Walsh McLean, offered to pay $100,000, twice what the kidnappers were demanding, for the child's return. To that end, the naive heiress conferred with a bizarre hustler, Gaston Bullock Means, one-time agent for the Bureau of Investigation when that agency was under the command of William J. Burns during the corrupt Harding era.

Means had had a spectacular career of underhanded and illegal offenses. He had mulcted the federal government during World War I of considerable funds, while pretending to spy on suspected German espionage agents. He had also functioned as a bagman for Jesse Smith and other Teapot Dome political chiefs, collecting huge sums of cash and delivering this money to cabinet ministers and federal officials of the Harding Administration. Means read of Mrs. McLean's humanitarian offer to pay off the kidnappers and immediately called and told her that, by virtue of his connections in the underworld, he was the perfect contact man.

Mrs. McLean gave Means several large cash payments for this purpose. When nothing happened over several months, she demanded results. Means suddenly appeared with a so-called underworld contact who informed the society matron that he was known as "The Fox" and represented the kidnap gang. More money was paid out. "The Fox" was later identified as a disbarred lawyer, Norman Whittaker, an associate of Means. Both Means and Whittaker were arrested and charged with fraud. They were convicted and given long prison terms. Such weird goings-on did nothing but confuse the desperate hunt for the Lindbergh child and caused one sensational claim after another to appear in print. Chicago crime czar Al Capone announced to the press that if the Lindbergh family would cooperate with him, he would have his men scour the country and return the baby within a week. Lindbergh did not respond to this offer.

John Hughes Curtis, another adventurer, called his socialite friends in Norfolk, Virginia, and put together an amateur detective club that made highly publicized searches for the baby. Curtis was given a great deal of attention by the press and the publicity went to his head. He began to hold daily press meetings and, for lack of anything better to tell reporters, he suddenly blurted that he had recently met with five persons, a woman and four Nordic sailors, who told him that they, indeed, were holding the baby and were waiting for the ransom. This story was wholly invented by Hughes who admitted the horrible fabrication when brought to the Lindbergh home and grilled by police captain John Lamb. Hughes was promptly escorted to the basement of the Lindbergh mansion where Lamb "beat the hell out of him," according to one reporter.

Lindbergh then began to receive more ransom demands by mail. There would be fourteen such notes sent to him. His greatest difficulty was in contacting the kidnapper. Moreover, his faith in the police was badly shattered, and he was constantly battling police efforts to locate the kidnapper. Two of the ransom notes had been sent from Brooklyn. New York police commissioner Edward Mulrooney learned that the two ransom notes were both posted from the same vicinity.

Mulrooney told Lindbergh that he planned to station men near these mailboxes, to identify anyone posting mail for the next week in an attempt to pinpoint the kidnapper. Lindbergh vetoed this plan, telling Mulrooney that such a tactic might alert the kidnappers, who then might murder his child. Mulrooney backed off but, ironically, a third ransom note was received a few days later and from the same Brooklyn mailing area.

Anne and Charles A. Lindbergh, the baby's parents, shown before their first child was born and while they were on an aerial tour of the Orient.

The kidnapper had carefully thought out his series of ransom notes. To make sure that the Lindbergh family knew that his notes were genuine, all of the ransom notes bore the same symbol, three interlocking circles. No other such notes were received from those pretending to be the kidnappers. Lindbergh then made another fateful decision. He brought an old family friend into the case, Dr. John F. Condon, asking the 70-year-old teacher to act as the go-between. Condon was to insert newspaper ads, as directed by the kidnapper, telling the kidnapper when the ransom money was ready. He was then to receive instructions on where to meet the kidnapper and deliver the ransom.

Condon was not a practical man. His role as arbiter of the child's fate caused him to see himself as the only lifeline between the child and his family. He imagined himself a Sherlock Holmes, an expert criminologist, as important to the case as the child or the Lindberghs. In his self-aggrandizing role, Condon helped to prolong the agony of the Lindbergh family, as well as confound police and confuse even the kidnapper.

Condon enjoyed basking in the limelight of his appointed position and he played cloak-and-dagger games that gave him a sense of power. He devised his own code name, "Jafsie," which was the phonetic spelling of his initials, J.F.C. He used this name in his contact with the kidnapper. After Condon had responded to several ransom notes through advertisements in a Bronx, New York, paper, he met a tall man with a covered face in Woodlawn Cemetery in the Bronx on the night of March 12, 1932, eleven days after the kidnapping.

The man wore a suit, tie, heavy coat, and hat pulled low over his forehead. Only his deep-set eyes showed. He asked for the ransom money, but Condon told him that he could not bring the money until he had seen "the package," meaning the kidnapped Lindbergh baby. At that moment the man bolted, saying that there was a policeman inside the cemetery. Condon ran after him, catching up with him in a clump of bushes. In this murky area, the man finally said: "It is too dangerous. It might be twenty years. Or burn. Would I burn if the baby is dead?"

Alarmed at this statement, Condon asked about the child's condition and was told that the baby was fine. Then Condon embarked on a ridiculous harangue, telling the kidnapper that his mother would be ashamed of him and that he ought to leave the kidnapping gang. Condon offered him $1,000 to come with him and "get out of it." Instead of negotiating for the child's return, Condon attempted to reform the kidnapper! Condon listened to the man talk and, noting his accent, asked if he were German. The man quickly replied that he was "Scandinavian."

Then the kidnapper grumbled about not receiving the ransom which had not yet been assembled. He now demanded $70,000 instead of the original $50,000. Condon objected. The man began to leave, telling Condon that he should have brought the money. Condon then asked the man if he was connected to any friends of Betty Gow, the baby's nurse, and the man said no, that Gow was innocent of any crime. To convince Condon that he was dealing with the "right parties," the man showed the retired teacher the symbol of the three interlocking circles on a sheet of paper, the symbol carried on all the genuine ransom notes. He told Condon that he would convince him further by sending the light blue sleeping suit, the child was wearing the night he was kidnapped.

The man reassured Condon that the baby was safe and that after the ransom was paid the following week the child would be returned. He claimed the child was on a boat some six hours away and that two women were caring for him. "You can put the baby's arms around Mrs. Lindbergh's neck," cooed the kidnapper. Condon was told to place an advertisement in next Sunday's edition of the Bronx Home News, an ad that would read: "Baby is alive and well. Money is ready." The man then shook hands with Condon and walked leisurely into the dark of the cemetery.

Charles A. Lindbergh, at the time his infant son was kidnapped. Throughout the negotiations with the kidnapper, he believed that his son was still alive and would be returned safely after the ransom payment was made.

Anne Morrow Lindbergh, who first believed that her husband had taken the child from the crib and hidden the baby as a practical joke, as he had done on past occasions, quickly learned that her child had been kidnapped.

Later that night Condon described the man as having deepset eyes, a small mouth, and high cheekbones. He also said that he was at least five-feet-ten-inches tall, was athletic and possessed a strong grip. Condon went on to describe the man's accent as decidedly German, pointing out that he pronounced the word "boat" as boad, the word "right" as ride, and the word "would" as vould. The kidnapper also pronounced the word "signature" as singature. The man had kept his hand inside his coat pocket, and Condon believed he had been armed.

The man spoke about others being involved in the kidnapping, which led Condon and the police to believe that they were dealing with a gang. A short time later, the baby's sleeping suit was sent to Lindbergh, who was now convinced that he was dealing with the true kidnappers of his child. Also, Betty Gow found the baby's thumb guard on the gravel road leading to the Lindbergh mansion. This had apparently been dropped by the kidnapper as he ran from the Lindbergh house with the child in his arms.

Following instructions, Condon placed an ad in the Bronx Home News the following Sunday. More instructions soon arrived which led Condon back to another New York graveyard, St. Raymond's Cemetery, on the night of April 2, 1932. Lindbergh, armed with a gun, accompanied Condon to this site. The ransom money, $50,000 in one package, and another $20,000 in a separate package, was in the car with Condon and Lindbergh. All of these bills were gold certificates and the serial numbers had been diligently recorded. Condon alighted from the car next to the cemetery and walked into the gloomy area, going down a path flanked by tombstones. No one was at the rendezvous point. He walked back toward the car and shouted to Lindbergh: "I guess there's no one here! We better go back!"

At that moment a voice called: "Hey, Doctor!"

The figure of a man stood up behind a tombstone within the cemetery and waved Condon toward him. The man shouted loudly: "Hey, Doctor! Over here!" Lindbergh distinctly heard the man's voice, one that he would remember for the rest of his life.

The baby's crib, where nurse Betty Gow discovered the child missing. Lindbergh found a ransom note some minutes later on the window sill of the child's room.

Condon approached the kidnapper, who said: "Did you got it, the money?"

"No, I didn't bring the money," Condon replied, walking toward the man. "It is up in the car."

"Who is up there?" the kidnapper asked.

"Colonel Lindbergh."

"Is he armed?

"I don't know," Condon lied. Then he added: "No, he is not." Condon then began to bargain with the kidnapper, saying that $70,000 was too much money to be raised in a short amount of time, even for Lindbergh, and that "these are times of Depression. Why don't you be decent to him?" Condon said that he had brought $50,000.

The kidnapper, who had identified himself simply as "John" to Condon, shrugged and said: "Well, all right. I suppose if we can't get seventy, we get fifty."

Condon thought at that instant that John was acting alone, that there was no gang of kidnappers. How else could he make a decision to accept less of the ransom than what had been demanded? Condon returned to the car and proudly told the anxious Lindbergh that he had bargained with the kidnapper, who was going to take only $50,000. Lindbergh handed him this money in a wrapped package, and Condon returned to the cemetery where he turned it over to the kidnapper. He then asked where the baby could be found. The kidnapper handed Condon an envelope, telling him that it contained instructions on how to locate the baby. The man calling himself John warned Condon that the envelope was not to be opened for six hours. Condon naively nodded as the man disappeared into the darkness of the cemetery.

An aerial photo shows the Lindbergh home and estate, located in a remote area and at the time swarming with police and newsmen, many of whom obliterated any clues that may have been left by the kidnapper.

Returning to the car, Condon handed the envelope to Lindbergh, telling him that they should do as instructed. The two then drove to a deserted house, which Condon owned, one on Westchester Square, and there they sat, waiting. After a short while, Lindbergh opened the note. It was written in the same language as all the previous ransom notes and it read:

> the boy is Boad Nelly. it is a small Boad 28 feet long. two persons are on the Boad. the are innosent. you will find the Boad between Horse Neck Beach and Gay Head near Elizabeth Island.

Lindbergh and Con-don were ecstatic. At last the child would be returned. The aviator immediately flew to the area, which was in the Cape Cod district of Massachusetts. He search-ed every cove and bay, but no one had ever heard of a boat named Nelly. A frantic search of the area ensued with Coast Guard cutters and even a Navy warship joining in. For days the waters around Elizabeth Island were scoured and scanned, but the vessel was never found. This was because it never existed. It had been created in the mind of the kidnapper, who knew that the Lindbergh child was already dead, that he had crushed the baby's skull on a rock only a few miles from the Lindbergh home after taking the baby from its crib on the night of the kidnapping and buried the small corpse in a shallow grave in some woods near the Lindbergh estate.

The search for the child went on through April and into May with no sign of the boy. The police by now felt that chances of finding the child were slim. The Lindbergh family continued to hope and pray that the little boy would still be found alive. All of that came to a tragic end on May 12, 1932, when two house movers pulled over to the side of a road near Mount Rose, a village only a few miles from the Lindbergh mansion. William Allen got out and went some fifty feet into the woods to relieve himself. In a small hollow, Allen saw what he first thought to be the remains of a dead animal, until, looking closer, he saw a baby's foot sticking up from the dirt. He bolted, running back to the truck to shout to his friend, Orville Wilson: "My God! There's a child, a dead child over there!"

Police were on the spot a few hours later. The Lindberghs were informed that their child had been dead, according to a local pathologist, since the night of the kidnapping. The bold kidnapper knew it, and still brazenly collected the ransom, risking the chance that the body had been found and that he himself would be arrested once he made his appearance to collect the money. No man but a supreme egotist would have been so bold, confident that the body would not be found and that his plans and moves were far superior to the gullible Lindberghs and their equally naive go-betweens, to believe that he could outwit the police and collect the ransom long before the body was discovered.

The Lindberghs were devastated. In their absolute grief, they remained silent. The public was in utter shock at the brutality of the crime as the details were graphically sketched in the nation's press. Hatred for the kidnapper-killer reached fever pitch and remained there for months. The grieving Lindberghs left for Europe. Everything in the U.S. reminded them of their murdered child. They later sold the house in Hopewell, New Jersey. The hunt for the killer, however, went on and on. He was now dubbed Cemetery John, after the rendezvous sites where Condon had met the kidnapper.

Nurse Betty Gow, who found the baby's thumb guard on the gravel road outside the Lindbergh home, where the kidnapper had dropped it while hurrying away with the child; she was later a suspect, but was proved innocent.

Violet Sharpe, the 28-year-old maid in the Lindbergh household, was interrogated so many times by police that she sank into despair and committed suicide. She was also a suspect and later proved to be innocent.

Publishing heiress Evalyn Walsh McLean, who offered to pay the ransom for the Lindbergh child, and was duped and bilked in the process by confidence man Gaston Means.

This crime had such impact that tough federal legislation was passed, and the Lindbergh Kidnapping Law went into effect, allowing the FBI to investigate these crimes, but restrictions for the Bureau remained. Agents were compelled to wait seven days after a kidnapping on the presumption that if the victim was not recovered in that period of time, the victim had been transported across a state line, thus making the crime a federal offense. That waiting period would be tested again and again, until agents were allowed to immediately act following the 1953 kidnapping of Robert Greenlease, Jr., which, because of the time delay, may have resulted in the boy's death.

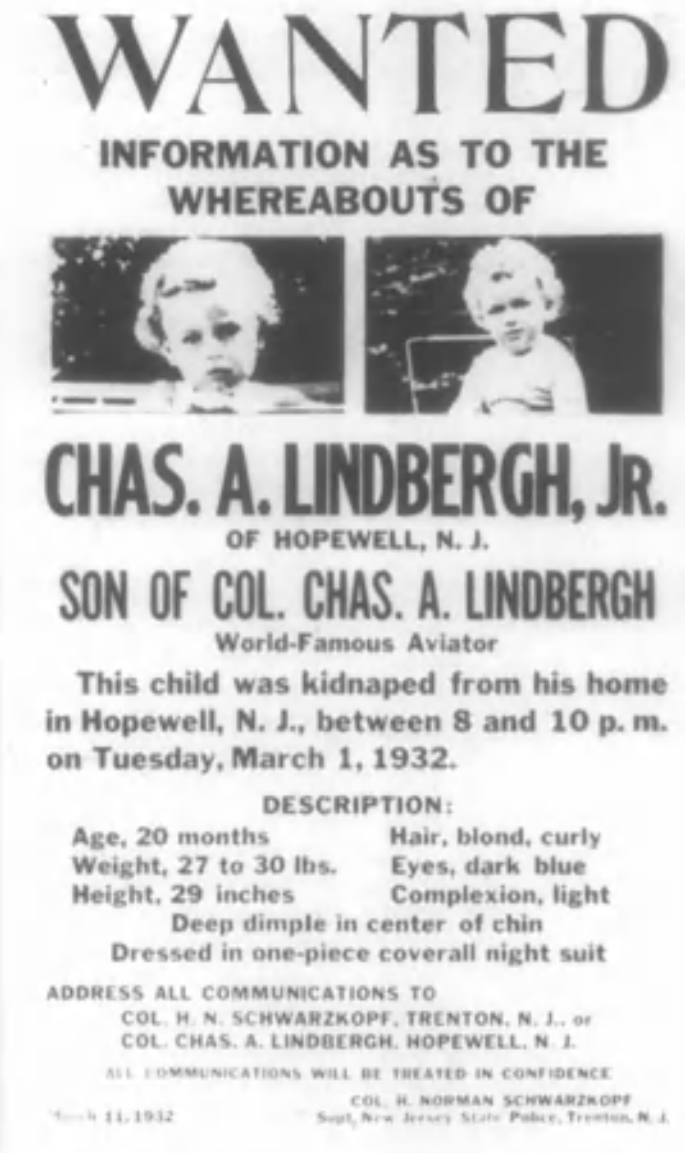
Scores of suspects in the Lindbergh kidnapping case were picked up and relentlessly questioned. Even Betty Gow, the nurse, was suspect for a time. So was a maid in the Lindbergh home, English-born Violet Sharpe. She was picked up and questioned so many times that she was eventually driven to despair and committed suicide. A German-born gardener who worked for the Lindberghs also felt incredible police pressure and took his own life a short time later. The New Jersey State Police came under intense criticism for its handling of the entire case, and years later, this force, while under the command of the aloof and authoritarian Colonel H. Norman Schwarzkopf (father of the famed U.S. Army general of the same name), was blamed for pressuring the maid into taking her life. She reportedly drank poison rather than face another lengthy interrogation. Schwarzkopf was also criticized for mishandling the case, allowing his men to clumsily destroy clues and failing to follow up the slim leads that developed in the case.

Former FBI agent and confidence trickster Gaston Bullock Means, who bilked more than $100,000 from Mrs. McLean on his phony promise to retrieve the Lindbergh baby alive; he was sent to prison for this fraud, dying behind bars, refusing with his last breath to reveal the whereabouts of McLean's money.

Socialite John Hughes Curtis, who told Lindbergh that he was in touch with rumrunners, who were holding the child, a cruel lie made by Curtis to enhance his public status. He was reportedly taken to the basement of the Lindbergh home and beaten by police for torturing the family with his fabrications.

Meanwhile, the ransom money began to appear only a few days after Cemetery John received the $50,000. The first bill, a $20 gold certificate, was deposited into the account of David Marcus at Manhattan's East River Savings Bank on April 4, 1932. Marcus was tracked down, but he was proved innocent and he had no idea how he had come by the bill, the serial number of which matched one of the bills in the ransom payment. Hundreds of New York and New Jersey policemen continued to hunt for the kidnapper-killer.

In 1933, the gold certificates were called in and this left Cemetery John with an enormous amount of money that was dangerous to spend. The Treasury Department had issued a complete list of all the serial numbers of the bills passed to the killer and this list was sent to every bank and every business in the U.S. It became the civic duty of every person in the U.S., particularly in the New York-New Jersey area, to check any gold certificates against this list.



WANTED
INFORMATION AS TO THE WHEREABOUTS OF
CHAS. A. LINDBERGH, JR.
OF HOPEWELL, N. J.
SON OF COL. CHAS. A. LINDBERGH
World-Famous Aviator
This child was kidnaped from his home in Hopewell, N. J., between 8 and 10 p. m. on Tuesday, March 1, 1932.
DESCRIPTION:
Age, 20 months
Weight, 27 to 30 lbs.
Height, 29 inches
Hair, blond, curly
Eyes, dark blue
Complexion, light
Deep dimple in center of chin
Dressed in one-piece coverall night suit
ADDRESS ALL COMMUNICATIONS TO
COL. H. N. SCHWARZKOPF, TRENTON, N. J., or
COL. CHAS. A. LINDBERGH, HOPEWELL, N. J.
ALL COMMUNICATIONS WILL BE TREATED IN CONFIDENCE
COL. H. NORMAN SCHWARZKOPF

The wanted poster issued by the New Jersey State Police immediately after the kidnapping of the Lindbergh baby.

The ransom bills began to turn up with more regularity in 1933. On May 1, 1933, someone calling himself J. J. Faulkner turned over $2,980 in gold certificates in compliance with the law that ordered these notes be exchanged for regular bills. All of the Faulkner bills were part of the Lindbergh ransom notes, but the federal reserve bank in New York that received these bills could not trace them back to Faulkner, although a Manhattan florist by that name was found and proven innocent. On November 26, 1933, a New York movie ticket seller sold a ticket to a customer who paid with a $10 ransom note. The notes kept appearing throughout 1934.

Then, on September 15, 1934, an extraordinary event occurred. An alert, suspicious gas station manager, Walter Lyle, approached a 1931 blue Dodge sedan, which had just pulled into his gas station, the Warner-Quinlan station at 127th Street and Lexington Avenue at the tip of upper Manhattan. The driver ordered five gallons of gas. He got out of the car and stretched his long legs. He was a lean man with a prominent jaw, high cheekbones, and deep-set eyes. Lyle pumped the gas and then charged the driver 98¢. The driver gave him a $20 gold certificate. Lyle went into the station to get the change, but before he did so, he looked at the sheets sent by the U.S. Treasury Department that listed all the serial numbers of the Lindbergh ransom money.

Lyle was an unusually conscientious citizen. He had read about the Lindbergh kidnapping and the bestial murder of the little boy. He religiously checked every gold certificate he received against the list. Lyle checked this gold certificate and then saw that it matched a number on the list, A73976634A. He then peered through the station window to note the license number on the car, 4U-13-41. Lyle wrote this number down on the gold certificate and then walked outside to hand the driver his $19.02 change.

"Don't see many of those gold certificates anymore," Lyle told the driver. The driver, speaking in what sounded like a German accent, agreed, adding that he had about 100 more at home. He then got into his car and slowly drove off. His gold certificate was deposited by Lyle, along with the rest of the station's receipts, at Manhattan's Corn Exchange Bank. Teller Miriam Ozmec noticed the gold certificate with the license number on it and called authorities. New York and New Jersey state police, along with FBI agents, traced the license number. It belonged to 35-year-old Bruno Richard Hauptmann, a carpenter who lived at 1279 East 222nd Street in the Bronx. This was not far from the two cemeteries where the Lindbergh kidnapper, the man known as John, had met Dr. Condon. Hauptmann's home was also close to the vicinity, where many of the ransom notes had been mailed to the Lindbergh family.

Police moved in almost immediately. On September 19, 1934, detectives waited until Hauptmann returned home and parked his car near the two-story house, where he lived. Hauptmann, his wife Anna, and their infant son, Manfried, occupied the second floor of the house, a five-room apartment with a living room, kitchen, two bedrooms, and bathroom. Officers approached Hauptmann as he sat behind the wheel of his car. Before he could utter a word, handcuffs were placed on his

John F. Condon ("Jafsie"), the eccentric, limelight-loving 70-year-old teacher and busybody, who took it upon himself to become the go-between, negotiating with the kidnapper for the return of the Lindbergh baby for a $50,000 payment.

The area at the Woodland Cemetery in the Bronx, New York, where, on the night of March 12, 1932, Condon first met with the kidnapper, whom he called "Cemetery John."

bony wrists. Detectives examined his large hands, noting that he had worked with them as a laborer. They were powerful hands, and the officers soon realized that Hauptmann closely matched the descriptions given of the kidnapper-killer, a man standing about five feet, ten inches, with deep-set eyes, high cheekbones, a small mouth, and a jutting jaw. He was lean and muscular. He had long legs, and when he walked, his stride was wide, a factor that later helped convict him of murder.

Officers hustled Hauptmann into his apartment and while his startled wife Anna stood with the baby in her arms, police stormed into each room, tearing the place apart in their search for the rest of the ransom money. They had already talked to the gas station manager, Walter Lyle, who had recalled his brief conversation with Hauptmann, telling officers about Hauptmann's remark that he had another 100 gold certificates at home. Officers did find $100 in gold pieces in a tin box. Hauptmann said that the gold pieces were what he was referring to in his talk with Lyle. The officers went through Hauptmann's wallet and found another $20 ransom note.

Hauptmann said that he did not know where he had gotten the gold certificates. He said he had no more certificates than what the police had already found. While he was being questioned in his bedroom, Hauptmann kept furtively glancing out the window. One of the detectives noticed this and asked Hauptmann what he was looking at. The carpenter said he was looking at nothing in particular. The detective went to the window and saw a thin wire stretching from the window to the roof of a small garage behind the house. The car that Hauptmann had parked there was a 1931 blue Dodge sedan that had been repainted from dark green to dark blue in 1932, shortly after the Lindbergh kidnapping.

"Is that where you have the money?" the detective asked Hauptmann.

The carpenter showed no emotion, lying in a monotone: "No. I have no money." He then explained that the wire was a homemade alarm system, that if someone opened the garage door during the night, lights would go on inside of the garage and frighten any burglar. The wire would also turn on a light inside the bedroom, alerting Hauptmann to the presence of intruders. Hauptmann was good at making homemade items, and the fact that he was a carpenter was not lost on the police, who knew that the ladder used in the Lindbergh kidnapping had been homemade. Hauptmann was arrested and then taken to police headquarters. There he was questioned by teams of police interrogators.

By then an inventory of the items of the Hauptmann household had been taken. Even though Hauptmann had been unemployed since the spring of 1932, he managed to pay $50 rent each month for his apartment, which contained a new console radio, purchased for $396. There was an expensive walnut bedroom set in his bedroom, recently purchased, and a costly ivory crib in which his baby son slept. He had recently purchased a $56 hunting rifle, a $109 canoe, which was stored in the garage, and paid $126 for a pair of powerful binoculars. Hauptmann sat passively as these purchases were read off to him.

A detective returned from the Hauptmann house dangling a pair of new suede women's shoes, stating that the police had learned that Hauptmann had purchased these shoes only a few days earlier for his wife, using another ransom certificate. Also, Hauptmann had had plenty of money to take his wife on a luxury trip to Florida in 1933 and he also sent her home to Germany with first class accommodations for a family reunion in July 1932, three months after the Lindbergh ransom was paid. As an unemployed carpenter, Bruno Richard Hauptmann had been enjoying the good things of life with no financial worries.

Hauptmann coolly explained that he had made the money for all these items by playing the stock market. Then a detective approached Hauptmann and showed him a chisel, asking if he had ever seen it before. The carpenter said, no, he had not. He was shown the faded blue sleeping suit that the Lindbergh child had worn. He had never seen it before, said Hauptmann. The child's rust-stained thumb guard was shown to him. He had never seen that before either. For some time there was silence in the room.

Then a detective leaned close to the impassive Hauptmann and said with a firm voice: "Didn't you build a ladder and put it against the Lindbergh house, and didn't you go up that ladder and into that room and kidnap that child?"

For the first time, Hauptmann showed emotion. He trembled and tightly gripped the arms of the chair in which he sat. His piercing blue eyes widened and he shouted: "No!"

Bruno Richard Hauptmann under arrest on September 19, 1934, traced through a marked bill from the ransom money.

Hauptmann in a NYPD lineup, where he was "unofficially" identified as "Cemetery John" by John F. Condon.

"And didn't you abandon that ladder and chisel and murder that child and strip the sleeping suit and thumb guard from its body?"

"No, I did not!," Haupt-mann roared back.

The questioning went on, but Hauptmann was a strong-willed, steel-nerved suspect, one who would not yield under pressure and would not admit to anything dealing with the Lindbergh kidnapping. More discoveries, damning revelations, were made at the Hauptmann house, or, specifically, in the garage that deeply concerned Bruno Richard Hauptmann. Behind a panel above Hauptmann's workbench, designed to conceal a hollow area, detectives, in the presence of Anna Hauptmann, found the cache of gold certificates from the Lindbergh kidnapping, each and every bill corresponding to the serial numbers on the Treasury list, a total of $18,860.

Detectives also found maps Hauptmann had bought which pinpointed the area about the Lindbergh home and the Cape Cod area, the spot where Cemetery John had said the Lindbergh baby could be found on the mythical boat, Nelly. Also, found next to the hidden ransom money was a small Lilliput German automatic pistol, fully loaded.

Hauptmann said nothing about the maps, but he changed his story drastically regarding the ransom money hidden in his garage. He said he had been given this money by someone named Isidore Fisch, a German national who had returned to Leipzig, Germany, and had died there in early 1934. He said that Fisch had given him a box, but did not tell him what it contained. He said that rain had caused damage to the box, which was stored in the garage and that he had opened the box to discover the money. Since Fisch owed him considerable sums, Hauptmann said, he merely took his share. All of this, of course, was another bold lie. Isidore Fisch was obviously a convenient dead scapegoat. Fisch had died impoverished in Leipzig, but there was no record that he had left any money with Hauptmann.

The carpenter's brazen accusation of Fisch being the kidnapper was belied by Hauptmann's own actions. He was identified as having passed ransom gold certificates six months before he said Fisch had given him the money to hold for him. Also, Hauptmann's spending habits, when it came to the ransom notes, indicated that he had been exchanging tens and twenties for a number of years and had been living off this money, supporting his family with it, as early as spring of 1932, almost immediately following the Lindbergh kidnapping.

Moreover, detectives quickly learned, Isidore Fisch, a small, mild-mannered businessman who bore no resemblance to Cemetery John (while Hauptmann fit the descriptions given by Dr. Condon) had no criminal background. Bruno Richard Hauptmann's case was an entirely different story. The carpenter was not only a convicted felon, but he had committed crimes in Germany that employed the identical modus operandi used in the Lindbergh kidnapping.

Investigators had quickly obtained Hauptmann's background. He had been born and raised in Kamenz, Germany, the youngest of three sons, who had all fought in World War I, Bruno being the only survivor. He had been a machine gunner and had been wounded and gassed. In 1918, when mustered out of the German army, Hauptmann, at nineteen, was penniless. He had had eight years of grade school and two years of trade school, where he had learned carpentry. Yet, there was little or no work for him in depression-torn Germany. In March 1919, Hauptmann, along with Fritz Petzold, a young friend, who had served with him in the army, went to the nearby town of Bernbruch.

Here, Hauptmann scouted about and learned the location of the home of Mayor Schierach, determining exactly which second-story room was the mayor's bedroom. On a night when Hauptmann knew the mayor was out of town, he stole a ladder and, under the cover of darkness, climbed the ladder to the mayor's bedroom. Hauptmann rifled the mayor's bureau drawers and took more than 100 marks and a silver watch. A few days later, the same pair again used a ladder to climb into the second-story bedroom of wealthy leather tanner Edward Scheumann and stole more money. Some days after this burglary, Hauptmann, using a ladder again, climbed into another bedroom and stole 200 marks and a gold watch.

While returning to Kamenz on foot, Hauptmann and Petzold saw two women pushing baby carriages filled with food, which, in impoverished Germany, was worth more than gold. Hauptmann produced a pistol and aimed it at the women, ordering them to turn the food over to him. They began to run, frantically pushing the carriages in front of them. Hauptmann shouted: "We'll shoot! We're radicals!" He shrewdly picked the word that would send terror into anyone then living in Germany, radicals, since the country was overrun with radical revolutionaries who had a complete disregard for life. The women stopped and Hauptmann took the food.

The women begged Hauptmann to leave them something to eat. He refused and ordered them to "keep quiet or get a bullet." This was the kind of merciless act that Hauptmann would exhibit years later when planning to murder the Lindbergh child. Only the most ruthless, cold-blooded of killers could plan on kidnapping and then murdering the child while nervelessly continuing to negotiate and obtain the ransom for a child he knew to be dead. More importantly, all of Hauptmann's early burglaries were committed in the same fashion, through the use of a ladder, the same modus operandi he would employ in kidnapping the Lindbergh child.

Hauptmann and Petzold were captured at the end of March 1919, and Hauptmann, the leader, was convicted of burglary and sentenced to five years in prison. As soon as he was imprisoned, Hauptmann tried to solicit help from one of the revolutionary groups in Germany, writing to the Spartacists, pleading that they should intercede for him, saying: "I have always been a faithful Spartacist." (He had never joined this party.) He received no reply. He was paroled four years later in March 1923. Hauptmann was arrested again a short time later for selling leather belting he had stolen from various shops in Kamenz. He was jailed, pending trial. A few days later, while being allowed exercise in an open yard, Hauptmann escaped, leaving his prison clothes in a neat bundle and with a note stating: "Best wishes to the police."

Hauptmann is shown during his first police interrogation; he lied when telling investigators that he had only a few of the bills belonging to the marked ransom money.

Within a few weeks, Hauptmann had made his way to the port of Hamburg and there he stowed away on the liner S.S. George Washington. He stayed in a hold for days, living off food and water he had brought with him, but he was discovered a few days before the ship landed in New York. Hauptmann was taken to Ellis Island for questioning. He gave the alias of Perlmeyer and was returned to Germany. He tried to stow away again on another ship the following month, but was discovered before the ship left Hamburg. He was held on board while police were called. The desperate Hauptmann, knowing he would be exposed as a wanted fugitive, suddenly jumped off the ship, swam to the pier, and hid among the pilings, later escaping. This bruising experience did not deter Hauptmann.

Hauptmann next managed to smuggle himself aboard another liner, and wearing a disguise and carrying stolen identity papers, he landed in New York without being detained. Hauptmann had only a few pennies in his pocket, but he soon got work in a German community in the Bronx. He later met Anna Schoeffler, who had immigrated to the U.S. on January 1, 1924, from Germany. They were married on October 10, 1925. Hauptmann worked during these years as a dishwasher, dyer, and finally a carpenter, earning $50 a week. His wife also worked and they frugally saved every dime not spent on essentials. In the late 1920s, Hauptmann reportedly dabbled in the stock market, then plunged, using up much of his savings and that of his wife's. Still, the couple earned enough money for Hauptmann to buy a 1931 dark green Dodge sedan. This was the car that had been repainted dark blue a short time after the Lindbergh kidnapping.

Detectives are shown digging up the earth beneath Hauptmann's garage outside his Bronx home—they took the building apart, board by board.

Some of the ransom money found in a hollowed-out board found in Hauptmann's garage, along with a small automatic.

By 1931-32, the building boom collapsed and Hauptmann was out of work. He took odd jobs, but he could barely keep up with his bills. The Hauptmanns used up their savings, but in early April (only a few days after Cemetery John picked up the $50,000 ransom money from Dr. Condon in St. Raymond's Cemetery) Hauptmann announced to his wife that he had worked out a foolproof way to play the stock market that would bring in money regularly. He bragged to his wife that his stock scheme would produce large amounts of money.

The uneducated Anna Hauptmann, a housewife who did not bother with "men's business," asked no questions. She was at first worried, but was soon surprised to see her husband providing plenty of money. He sent his wife to Germany in July 1932 to visit with his mother in Kamenz and also hired a lawyer to settle with the police the old warrants still pending against him. The following year the statute of limitations on the old charges automatically called for their dismissal.

Now, with plenty of money, Hauptmann could return to Germany without fear of being arrested and imprisoned. He made plans to take his family to Germany in November 1934. (It was later and logically theorized that he planned on permanently relocating in his native Germany and converting the ransom from the Lindbergh kidnapping there, where the gold certificates would not be so closely inspected, using these funds to buy his own business.) These plans evaporated when he was arrested on September 19, 1934, and charged with kidnapping and murdering the Lindbergh baby. After his arrest, Hauptmann was told he would be sent to New Jersey to stand trial for the kidnapping and killing of Charles Augustus Lindbergh, Jr.

Hauptmann immediately retained lawyers to fight this extradition, a battle that waged for months until Hauptmann was ordered to stand trial in a New Jersey court. He was placed on trial on January 2, 1935, in Flemington, New Jersey, appearing before 71-year-old Judge Thomas Whitaker Trenchard, one of the most distinguished jurists of his day, a judge who expressed himself with clear-mindedness and whose verdicts in murder trials had never been reversed.

Hauptmann was defended by Edward J. Reilly, a showboating attorney, who dressed like a tycoon, adorning himself with British-tailored suits, spats, and vests with silver piping. He believed in overwhelming juries with his own success and importance. Reilly had an amazing string of acquittals, but with Hauptmann, he was dealing with a truculent, arrogant client whose conduct in court alienated the bench and the jury. Prosecutor David Wilentz, thirty-nine, was wiry, aggressive, and indefatigable in presenting involved detail in a concise manner. His approach was one of clarity, but he was also zealous in prosecuting Hauptmann, whom he rightly portrayed as a German "superman" with nerves of steel, one who mocked and smirked at any attempt to convict him.

On the stand Hauptmann was defiant and aloof. He told his story about Isidore Fisch, saying Fisch had given him the ransom money to hold. When he related this tale, a sardonic smile played about Hauptmann's thin lips. Wilentz caught this look of contempt and turned on Hauptmann abruptly, saying: "This is funny to you, isn't it?"

"No, that is not true."

"You think you're a big shot, don't you," Wilentz said.

"No. Should I cry?" Hauptmann's face was a portrait of jutting granite.

"You think you are bigger than everybody, don't you?"

"No, but I know I am innocent."

"You wouldn't tell if they murdered you "

"No!"

"Will power is everything with you."

"No, it is I feel innocent that keep me the power to stand up."

Wilentz portrayed Hauptmann as an inveterate liar, recounting how he had repeatedly lied about the gold certificates in his possession, and after the ransom money had been found in his garage, how he again lied, saying that Fisch had given him the money. Hauptmann, for the first time in many hours of testimony, exploded. His eyes narrowed as he leaned forward in the witness chair and thrust out a finger at Wilentz, waving it like a weapon at the prosecutor, shouting: "Stop that!"

Heavily guarded, Bruno Richard Hauptmann (center, is led into a courtroom at Flemington, New Jersey, to stand trial for kidnapping and murder; as in this photo, he remained smug, smiling throughout his trial.

A few minutes later, Wilentz stared back at Hauptmann, saying: "I see that you have stopped smiling. Things have become a little more serious."

Hauptmann's low voice answered: "I guess it isn't any place to smile here."

Wilentz then returned to Isidore Fisch, the man Hauptmann claimed had given him the Lindbergh ransom money to hold. The prosecutor described the life and career of Fisch, a mild-mannered businessman who was a friend of the Hauptmanns'. Wilentz pointed out that Fisch had died in the spring of 1934 in Germany, and Hauptmann had said earlier that it was not until some time after Fisch's death that he examined the box he had been given by Fisch and found the money and then took sums he felt Fisch owed him. Wilentz then pointed out that Fisch had never given Hauptmann any money to hold, that he was a pauper and that if he had been the kidnapper, he certainly would have taken the money with him to Germany, where he died in debt. In fact, Wilentz said, it was Hauptmann who was known as a man of means from his so-called stock deals, deals that Hauptmann failed to prove ever existed and it was Hauptmann who had loaned Fisch $5,500 of the ransom money. Hauptmann almost left the witness chair when he yelled his denial at this.

The prosecutor stood before Hauptmann, leaning close and saying: "Didn't you write to Mr. Fisch's family in Germany after his death, claiming that you had given Fisch $5,500 from your own private bank account?" Hauptmann again began to loudly deny this claim when Wilentz produced the letter Hauptmann had written the Fisch family, reading the demands Hauptmann had made in the letter for the return of the $5,500.

"Well, I " Hauptmann grumbled, squirming in the witness chair.

"My God," Wilentz said with a look of disgust, "don't you ever tell the truth?"

Handwriting experts took the stand to state that Hauptmann's handwriting and that of the writer of the ransom notes were one and the same. The defense put up its own handwriting experts, but these experts were feeble in their claim that there were some "differences" in the handwriting. Copies of the ransom notes and Hauptmann's handwriting were blown up and shown to the jury, and even with the naked, untrained eye, most agreed, the writings were identical. Moreover, Hauptmann continued to mispronounce the very words that Cemetery John mispronounced in his conversations with Dr. Condon, boad for "boat," for instance.

Charles Lindbergh sat in the court throughout every day of the long trial. At one point, while sitting at the prosecution's table, he leaned forward and he was seen wearing a shoulder holster with a gun tucked into it. No one said a word about it. Lindbergh was called as a witness, and after hearing Hauptmann speak, said that the defendant's voice was the same he had heard calling after Dr. Condon on the night Cemetery John met with Condon at St. Raymond's Cemetery to receive the ransom money and turn over a message that led Lindbergh on a futile and agonizing search for his son, a child already murdered.

Dr. Condon then appeared and identified Hauptmann as Cemetery John. The eccentric Condon had withheld his official identification of Hauptmann earlier when seeing him in a police lineup, preferring to make his grandstand identification in court, where it would be more widely reported. These identifications damned Hauptmann as the man who received the ransom money, making sure of his conviction of extortion. But the next witnesses Wilentz paraded before the court were the ones who sent Bruno Richard Hauptmann to his death as convicted kidnapper and murderer.

The first of these was Cecelia Barr, a ticket agent who worked in the booth at Loew's Sheridan Square Theater, who positively identified Hauptmann as a man who gave her one of the gold certificates from the ransom money when he bought a ticket in November 1933, fully six months before Hauptmann said Fisch gave him the money to hold in a sealed box. John Perone, one of two taxi drivers, who had delivered ransom notes to the Lindberghs, identified Hauptmann as the man who paid him to deliver the letter. Millard Whited, a student who lived close to the Lindbergh home outside of Hopewell then took the stand to state that he had seen Hauptmann twice walking about the woods near the Lindbergh home, studying it from a distance.

Then elderly Amandus Hochmuth took the stand. Hochmuth had a house right at the corner, where the highway from Hopewell met the dirt road that led to the Lindbergh mansion. Hochmuth, eighty, stated that he spent a good deal of time sitting on his front porch and watching traffic, especially cars turning onto the dirt road where, because of the grade, the cars were forced to slow down or go into a ditch. He clearly stated that toward dusk on the day of the kidnapping, a Dodge sedan, dark green (the color of Hauptmann's car before he had it repainted dark blue) had turned onto the road and had stopped abruptly to avoid going into the ditch. The car had stalled. Hochmuth got up from his chair on the porch, he said, and walked out to the road. He was only a few feet from this car and saw the driver clearly. In the back seat of the car, Hochmuth said, was a wooden ladder that had several sections to it.

The old courthouse in Flemington, New Jersey, where Hauptmann's trial was held; the place swarmed with scores of reporters and millions of words were spewed forth on the proceedings through the maze of wires (shown in front of the building) hooked up for the occasion.

Charles A. Lindbergh at the Hauptmann trial; he carefully studied prospective jurors and, when testifying, identified Hauptmann as "Cemetery John"; at one point, the famed aviator leaned forward and his jacket fell open to reveal a gun in a shoulder holster.

Colonel Norman Schwarzkopf, who headed the New Jersey State Police in charge of the Hauptmann investigation (his son became the celebrated army general who led U.S. troops in the "Desert Storm" campaign); he is shown with Anne Morrow Lindbergh and her mother, Mrs. Dwight Morrow, outside the Flemington, New Jersey, courthouse.

"Do you mind stepping down [from the witness chair] and showing us this man," Wilentz asked Hochmuth. The witness left the chair and slowly walked to the defendant's table. He unhesitatingly walked up to Bruno Richard Hauptmann. As all in the courtroom held their breath at this dramatic moment, Amandus Hochmuth reached out a steady hand and dropped it on Hauptmann's shoulder. "This is the man," he said in a resolute voice.

Hauptmann lost all composure, turning his head quickly to look at his wife who sat in the visitor's gallery. Shouted Hauptmann: "Der alter ist verrucht!" ("The old man is crazy!")

Albert S. Osborn, the chief handwriting expert for the prosecution; the noted graphologist testified that the ransom notes had been written by Hauptmann.

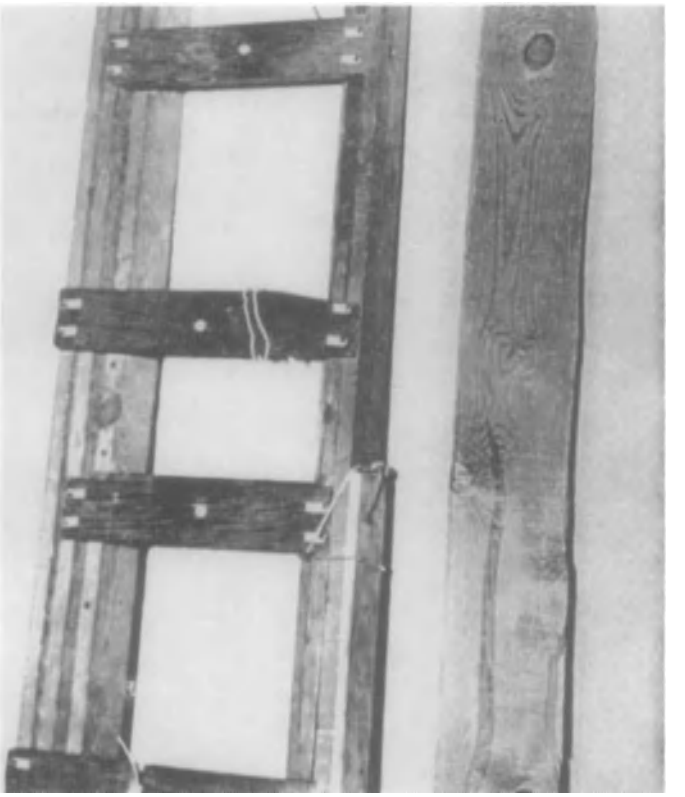
Wilentz did not rest his case at this point, but brought forth the ladder used by the kidnapper and left at the side of the Lindbergh home after the child was taken on that cold and windy night of March 1, 1932. Taking the stand was Arthur Koehler, the U.S. government's top wood expert, who had been examining the kidnapper's ladder for more than two years. He knew every inch of that ladder, and he described it in detail, pointing out the various types of wood employed in the building of it. It was homemade, and built so that it telescoped one section into the other, so that it could, when its sections were joined, fit into the back seat of a car.

This ladder had much to say through the expert observations of Arthur Koehler. It had to have been made by someone who was an experienced carpenter. Koehler reported how an exact duplicate of this ladder had been made at his specifications. When the kidnapper's ladder was first inspected, Koehler stated, it was noted that the top rung of the ladder had broken under the kidnapper's weight as he went back down the ladder with the Lindbergh baby in his arms. (It could not have broken before the kidnapper entered the room since the space between the top rung and next rung was too widely separated to allow the kidnapper to then reach the room.)

In the reconstruction of the ladder, the top rung was the exact same weight, length, and width as the original top rung. It was tested up to certain weights and broke at the weight of 210 pounds. The Lindbergh child had been weighed only a day before the baby's kidnapping and the child weighed exactly thirty pounds. This meant that the kidnapper weighed 180 pounds which was Bruno Richard Hauptmann's exact weight when he was arrested. Also, the space between each rung of the ladder had been built by the kidnapper to accommodate his own long step or stride, almost twice the distance between the rungs of a normal ladder. Hauptmann's long legs and his stride were measured against the spaces of these ladder rungs and fit his normal leg reach.

Moreover, the wood used in the kidnapper's ladder, identified Hauptmann as surely as if he had left a perfect set of fingerprints in the child's room. The ladder had been made from pieces of old wood, scavenged from a number of unknown sources. All of the wooden sections, except one, bore nail holes that contained rings of rust. These were obviously used pieces of wood that had been outside in the weather. One side section, however, bore square nail holes, uncommon for U.S. builders, but typical of European nails, and these holes were dry and without rust. This led Koehler to order a search of the Hauptmann house, especially the garage. He figured that, for this last side panel in the ladder, Hauptmann had cannibalized wood inside his house or garage. The attic of Hauptmann's house verified Koehler's suspicions. A piece of a floorboard in the attic had been cut lengthwise by Hauptmann and used to make the ladder. Koehler matched the grain, rings, and lines of the wood of the ladder section to the piece of board that remained in Hauptmann's attic. The match was perfect.

Arthur Koehler, one of the nation's leading wood identification experts, who matched the wood on the kidnapper's ladder to a cut board taken from Hauptmann's attic. His expert testimony contributed greatly in securing the prosecution's case.



The ladder used by the kidnapper and the cut board taken from Hauptmann's attic, both used as evidence by the prosecution to prove that Hauptmann, a carpenter, had cut one of his own attic boards to make a side panel on the kidnap ladder.

Against this overwhelming evidence, Reilly could present no effective witnesses. He gave an impassioned plea for his client's life, stating that he did not believe Hauptmann was guilty, but he reserved his final statements for Lindbergh, turning to the grim-faced aviator, saying: "May I say in closing that he has my profound respect. I feel sorry for him in his deep grief and I am quite sure that all of you agree with me that his lovely son is now within the gates of Heaven." Reilly had shown more concern for the victim than he had for his client, the steel-eyed Hauptmann.

Wilentz then addressed the jury with his closing argument on February 12, 1935, and he showed no mercy in his attack on the defendant. Unlike the docile, almost indifferent summation by Reilly, Wilentz stepped forth like David about to slay Goliath, confident, demanding, and speaking, he believed, for every man, woman, and child in the U.S. He held up a Bible, which his opponent had earlier employed in his closing argument. "Judge not lest ye be judged,' my adversary says. But he forgets the other Biblical admonition: 'And he that killeth any man shall surely be killed, shall surely be put to death." Wilentz went to the table holding exhibits of evidence and placed the Bible there, as if it, too, were part of the prosecution's evidence.

"For all these months, since October of 1934," Wilentz said while slowly pacing in front of the jury, "not during one moment has there been anything that has come to light, that has indicated anything but the guilt of Bruno Richard Hauptmann. Every avenue of evidence leads to the same door: Bruno Richard Hauptmann." Then Wilentz took a rather xenophobic view, one that gathered in the specter of sinister foreigners with super egos, the implication certainly conjuring the image of Nazi Germany's Adolf Hitler and the evil Nazi myth of the German Superman.

"What type of man would murder the child of Charles and Anne Lindbergh?" Wilentz asked the jury. "He wouldn't be an American. No American gangster ever sank to the level of killing babies. Ah, no! An American gangster that did want to participate in a kidnapping wouldn't pick out Colonel

The defendant's doggedly loyal wife, Anna Hauptmann, who never abandoned her belief in her husband's innocence; she is shown with criminal defense attorney Edward J. Reilly, a flamboyant 52-year-old lawyer who had lost only a few criminal cases in the several thousand he had defended.

Colorful, dynamic and politcally ambitious, 39-year-old David Wilentz, New Jersey's attorney general, personally led the prosecution against Hauptmann, destroying the defense and showing the defendant to be an inveterate liar. Wilentz' triumph in the Hauptmann case later won him the governorship.

Lindbergh. There are many people much wealthier than the colonel. No, it had to be a fellow who had ice water, not blood, in his veins. It had to be a fellow who had a peculiar mental makeup, who thought he was bigger than Lindy, a fellow who, when the news of the crime came out, could look at the headlines screaming across the page, just as the headlines screamed when Lindy made his famous flight. It had to be an egomaniac who thought he was omnipotent."

Wilentz then described the character of Bruno Richard Hauptmann, slapping his hands together as exclamation points to his sentences. He pointed out that Hauptmann trusted no one and never told the truth to his wife, telling her that he was making money in the stock market without a shred of proof to support this claim to her or to the authorities after his arrest. Hauptmann was the kind of man, Wilentz pointed out, who held up at gunpoint women pushing baby carriages, as he had done in Germany, a man who would not talk, "even if you killed him. And let me tell you, men and women of the jury, the State of New Jersey and the State of New York, and the federal authorities have found an animal lower than the lowest form in the animal kingdom, Public Enemy Number One of this world—Bruno Richard Hauptmann!"

The prosecutor then slowly pointed out that Hauptmann had all along shouted that he was being framed. Who was framing him, Wilentz asked. Dr. Condon? Amandus Hochmuth? Arthur Koehler? For what purpose? There was none, there was only the truth. And if Hauptmann was as innocent of this terrible crime as he insisted he was, why then, Wilentz asked, did he fight so hard not to be extradited from New York to New Jersey? "When he heard that the State of New Jersey wanted him, did he say, `I'll come right over?'"

Then Wilentz launched into a graphic description of the crime. He portrayed Hauptmann climbing up the ladder and entering the child's room through the window. As all eyes were focused upon Hauptmann, Wilentz went on: "I think a stranger could walk into a child's room, if the child were asleep, without the child awakening." He slammed his palms together loudly. "But let me tell you this! This fellow took no chances on the child awakening. He crushed that child right in the room, into insensibility. He smothered and choked that child right in that room. That child never cried, never gave any outcry, certainly not! The little voice was stilled right in that room. He wasn't interested in the child. Life meant nothing to him. That's the type of man we're dealing with.

"Public Enemy Number One of the world! That's what we're dealing with! You're not dealing with a fellow who doesn't know what he's doing. Take a look at him as he sits there! Look at him when he walks out of this room today panther-like, gloating, feeling good!"

Hauptmann, flanked by a state trooper and Deputy Sheriff Barry Loeb, no longer smiles in court as he listens to prosecutor Wilentz's damning summation.

Hauptmann's face was red and his lips tightly closed as if he were fighting against making a loud outburst. He squirmed in his chair, using a handkerchief to wipe away perspiration. He had not shown the slightest appearance of uneasiness during the course of the long trial until this point. Now he moved in his chair, crossing and recrossing his legs.

Wilentz went on relentlessly: "Certainly he stilled that little child's breath right in that room! That child did not cry out when it was disturbed. Yanked from the crib how? Not just taken up. The pins were still left in the bed sheets. (The nurse had pinned the baby's sleeping suit to the bed sheets to keep it from rolling over.) Yanked and its head hit up against the headboard must have been hit. He couldn't do it any other way. Certainly it must have hit up against the board. Still no outcry. Why? Because there was no cry left in the child. Did he use the chisel to crush the skull at the time or knock it into insensibility? Is that a fair inference? What else was the chisel there for? To knock that child into insensibility right there in that room."

"And the note in the nursery. This fellow had planned this crime. He wasn't going to let any faker come in and take that money. He had something on the note so that Colonel Lindbergh could tell, if another one came, that it was from the right party. So he put his signature on it. You couldn't reproduce it. The blue circles, the red center and the holes, b in blue, for Bruno; r in red, for Richard; holes, h for Hauptmann." Then Wilentz pointed out another glaring error Hauptmann had made. He recalled for the jury his question to Hauptmann about the police asking him to duplicate the ransom notes and how he had asked Hauptmann on the witness stand if the police had asked him to write the word signature. "They did," Hauptmann had replied.

"Why?" asked Wilentz of no one. "Because it was spelled that way in the ransom note and Hauptmann wanted to show that he didn't write it. So he swears that the police told him to spell it signature." Again the slapping of the hands, like cymbals clashing. "Now, men and women of the jury, take those writings Hauptmann made in the police station. Go through every one of them and you won't find the word signature anywhere. He was never asked to write it, right or wrong! And still he swears on the witness stand that he was told by the police to misspell it!"

Wilentz closed down his attack, like a plane prop slowing its revolutions, saying solemnly: "There are some cases in which a recommendation for mercy might do, but not this one, not this one! Either this man is the filthiest and vilest snake that ever crept through the grass or he is entitled to an acquittal. And if you believe as we do, you have got to convict him. If you bring in a recommendation of mercy, a wishy-washy decision, that is your province, and once I sit down I will not say another word, so far as this jury and its verdict is concerned. But it seems to me that you will have the courage to find Richard Hauptmann guilty in the first degree."

The jury that convicted Hauptmann of first-degree murder, which then made execution mandatory (left to right, first row): Elmer Smith, Mrs. Ethel Stockton, Charles Snyder, Mrs. Verna Synder, Mrs. Rose Pill, Charles Walton, foreman (second row, left to right), Robert Cravatt, Philip Hockenbury, George Voorhees, Mrs. Mary Brelsford, Liscom Case, Howard Biggs.

Following Hauptmann's conviction by a jury of four women and eight men, 71-year-old Judge Thomas Whittaker Trenchard, above, sentenced Hauptmann to death by electrocution. The sentence was appealed by Hauptmann's attorneys and was rejected, as well as a commutation from New Jersey's governor.

A grim-faced Bruno Richard Hauptmann (center) is escorted from the Flemington, New Jesery, courtroom, on February 16, 1935, after hearing his death sentence; he was executed by electric chair at the state prison in Trenton on April 3, 1936.

As he sat down, Vincent Burns, an eccentric non-denominational religious leader, tried to interrupt the proceeding, but he was led away before his comments could have created a mistrial. After long, precise instructions to the jury by Judge Trenchard, the jury retired. The next day, the four women and eight men of the jury found Hauptmann guilty and recommended the death sentence. A number of appeals were filed on Hauptmann's behalf, but all were denied. While Hauptmann awaited execution in the New Jersey State Prison, he showed no emotion. He did not talk to other prisoners in the death house and ignored all those who walked to the execution chamber before him. John Favorito, a convicted murderer, who had the cell next to Hauptmann's on Death Row, went to the electric chair on October 15, 1935. He expected Hauptmann to say goodbye to him but when he passed Hauptmann's cell he saw the kidnapper-killer soundly sleeping and snoring.

Hauptmann's own turn to sit in the electric chair finally came on April 3, 1936. He remained silent to the last. Bruno Richard Hauptmann, convicted baby-killer, walked wordlessly to the death chamber, sat down in the electric chair, and executioner Robert Elliott then sent the current into his body that killed him at 8:44 p.m. Anne and Charles Lindbergh were in London at the time. Their thoughts about the execution of their child's murderer were not recorded. Anna Hauptmann continued to believe that her husband was innocent, despite the overwhelming evidence against him. (Through her relentless efforts, one author later published a disgraceful book that flagrantly altered the actual facts in an attempt to show that Hauptmann was framed by the New Jersey State Police, a book obviously aimed at book sales, not the truth.) Mrs. Hauptmann lobbied for decades to have her husband's case reopened, re-examined, to have him somehow proven to be anything other than what the world believed him to be (and still does)—an inhuman kidnapper, who had bestially slain an innocent child.

THE AMATEUR KIDNAPPERS/May 27, 1933

In early summer of 1933, a rash of kidnappings involving large ransoms swept the U.S. The dramatic escalation of this crime caused deep alarm among citizens and law enforcement officials. For months that summer, one newspaper published a "scorecard" showing the many abductions that occurred, updating a "box score" of the many kidnappings, with headlines for "Name," "Date Stolen," "Returned," and a summary of sentences given to convicted kidnappers.

The first of these sensational abductions was that of Mary McElroy (1913-40). She was the apple of her father's eye, a tall, willowy girl who devoted her life to her father's service. Her father, Judge Henry F. McElroy, the city manager of Kansas City, although believed by many to be an independent-minded politician, was actually an important cog in the Thomas Pendergast political machine.

McElroy attended a girl's college in Rockford, Illinois, where she was elected president of the student body. After her graduation, McElroy returned to Kansas City to assist her father in his political career. She became his shadow in the city council and at social functions. She called him the "Old Boy," a sobriquet the press found amusing, given his usual testiness and inherent mean streak. McElroy was no reformer, though Mary often pointed out that her father maintained a soup kitchen and always had something to spare for someone down on their luck.

Mary McElroy, daughter of Kansas City's manager, who was kidnapped on May 27, 1933; her abductors were in her last thoughts before her 1940 suicide.

Mary McElroy's orderly existence was permanently shattered on May 27, 1933, when four amateurish kidnappers, led by Walter McGhee (or McGee), an ex-convict from Oregon, abducted her from the family home in Kansas City. She was taking her morning bath when two "delivery" men appeared at the door and told Heda Christensen, the McElroy cook, that they had a package for the Judge's "little girl." The rather timid kidnappers were Walter McGhee, his brother George, Clarence Stevens and Clarence Glick. None knew that McElroy was a grown woman; their original target was the judge's son Henry, but he was not home at the time.

Stevens pulled a revolver and forced the maid to show them the way upstairs, where McElroy was relaxing in the tub. McGhee commanded her to get dressed and follow them. The young woman recovered her composure and got dressed. McElroy did not seem to fear her kidnappers. She talked with the McGhee brothers, Stevens, and their confederate, Clarence Glick, in the getaway car. She found out that George McGhee wanted to be a doctor, but had dropped out of medical school. She found him kind and considerate, and called him "doctor." Walter McGhee greatly impressed her with his gracious manner and won her sympathy.

The kidnappers drove to their hideout, a modest-looking frame building near Shawnee, Kansas. McElroy was handcuffed to a wall in the basement garage for twenty-nine hours, while the gang attempted to negotiate a $60,000 ransom with McElroy. McElroy claimed he was unable to pay $60,000 and negotiated with the kidnappers until they agreed to a compromise figure of $30,000. Boss Pendergast was on hand to lend a sympathetic ear, and to "gag" the newsmen from printing the story until the woman was safely returned. Kansas City's reigning gang kingpin, Johnny Lazia, who was Pendergast's enforcer and secret partner in all Kansas City rackets, set out to raise the ransom money from his coterie of criminal associates.

After the ransom was paid the next day, the kidnappers took McElroy to the Milburn Golf Club, where they gave her a dollar for car fare and released her. She waved good-bye to the McGhee brothers and their friends, and then identified herself to the manager of the club. In the crush of publicity that followed, Mary expressed sympathy for the McGhees, an attitude that shocked and dismayed McElroy and prompted reporters to speculate about a romance between Mary McElroy and Walter McGhee.

The kidnappers were quickly captured. Clarence Glick, who owned the farmhouse, where McElroy was imprisoned, was sentenced to eight years in prison as was Stevens. George McGhee was sentenced to life. Walter McGhee, who had planned the crime, was tried under the death penalty, the first time in U.S. history a kidnapper faced execution. The state of Missouri was, for the first time, seeking to execute a kidnapper, who had not harmed his victim.

Kansas City's Boss Tom Pendergast, shown with his wife and daughter at the time of his daughter's 1929 wedding, ordered his underworld enforcer Johnny Lazia to pay off the kidnappers in effecting the release of Mary McElroy.

Assistant U.S. Attorney General Joseph B. Keenan traveled to Kansas City to assist in the prosecution. On July 26, 1933, the prosecution presented its closing statements, concluding that "the nation is watching this courtroom today ... As soon as a message is sent out from this room that a jury has said a man shall hang by the neck until he is dead for this kidnapping, you will have taken a big step to stop this wave of kidnapping."

Walter McGhee was found guilty and sentenced to death. Only hours before the jury reached its verdict, U.S. Attorney General Homer Stiles Cummings and President Franklin Delano Roosevelt agreed upon the bolstering of the Federal Bureau of Investigation with new legislation that focused upon deterrence and prosecution, particularly in kidnapping cases. The rash of kidnappings that year undoubtedly influenced the jury's verdict regarding Walter McGhee.

A month earlier, on June 15, William Hamm, Jr., a millionaire brewer in St. Paul, Minnesota, had been kidnapped by the infamous Barker gang. Then John King Ottley, a wealthy banker in Atlanta, Georgia, became the victim of an unsuccessful ransom kidnapping, where $40,000 had been demanded. The day after the Ottley case was reported, the kidnapping of 24-year-old John J. O'Connell, son and nephew of the political bosses of Albany, New York, was announced in the press. On July 22, 1933, millionaire oil man Charles F. Urschel was kidnapped from his front porch in Oklahoma City.

Mary McElroy had reluctantly testified as a witness for the prosecution and, following the trial, began to suffer bouts of depression. When Mary McElroy returned to Kansas City after an extended vacation, she found that Walter McGhee's conviction had been upheld by the Supreme Court. She began visiting the McGhees in jail, offering them her support and encouragement.

On February 10, 1935, Mary McElroy left home. She boarded a bus for Normal, Illinois, but eventually wound up in Springfield. From there she wired her father, "Sorry, but am so frightened. Don't know what I am doing." An uncle of McElroy's went to Springfield to escort her back to Kansas City. She explained to Conwell Carlson, a reporter for the Kansas City Star: "Do I try to forget them? Yes, I have seen them, and no, I cannot forget them. I have visited all of them in person. I have tried to help their relatives. Something drives me to do this, I cannot let them go."

In an effort to relieve his daughter's unhappiness and growing alienation, Judge McElroy asked Governor Park to extend executive clemency. "In pleading for Walter McGhee's life, I am pleading for my own peace of mind," his daughter added. Walter McGhee's sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. McElroy recovered her health, and, for a time at least, her previous outlook on life.

McElroy inexplicably supplied the jailed kidnappers with gifts and arranged for each of them to take correspondence classes from their cells. "I am not sure exactly what I am trying to do. I only know I want to help those McGhee boys find themselves," she said. It was never clear whether or not her benevolence concealed a deeper romantic longing. What did eventually become clear was that McElroy's brush with the criminal world had changed her. She began keeping company with known Kansas City hoodlums.

When the Pendergast regime finally toppled in 1939 and McElroy was indicted for failing to report $300,000 in kickbacks, Mary still attempted to shield her father from the scrutiny of the press. In June 1939, McElroy died following a long illness. "He has done certain things that, technically, can be criticized but he has not done anything that is economically unsound or ethically wrong," Mary said shortly before his death.

With the Pendergast machine crumbling, Mary found Kansas City a changed world. On January 20, 1940, after her plans for an intimate dinner party went awry, Mary McElroy committed suicide by shooting herself in the head. Her maid found the body the next day, with a note lying nearby. "My four kidnappers are probably the only people on earth who don't consider me an utter fool. You have your death penalty now so please give them a chance." Her planned memoir, A Politician's Daughter, was never written.

SNATCHING AN OKLAHOMA OIL MAN/ July 22, 1933

Despite his fierce reputation, which had been wholly manufactured by a scheming wife, George "Machine Gun" Kelly (George R. Barnes; AKA: E. W. Moore; J. C. Tichenor; 1897-1954) was an inept bank robber who was vaulted to underworld fame through a single crime, the kidnapping of Oklahoma millionaire Charles F. Urschel, a crime that also sent him to prison for life. Born George Barnes in rural Tennessee, George Kelly was raised in poverty and received little formal education. He was in and out of trouble throughout his teens, working petty rackets and operating an illegal still at one time.

With the coming of Prohibition, Kelly (he changed his name at this time from Barnes to Kelly) began supplying well-to-do citizens and social clubs in Memphis, Tennessee, with bonded liquor smuggled from Canada. He was a strapping fellow, standing six feet, one inch, broad-shouldered, with piercing blue eyes, a florid face, and a wide smile. When not peddling illegal liquor, Kelly sold cars and sometimes men's clothing. Most of the big money, however, was in bootlegging, and Kelly soon became known in circles as a "society bootlegger."

When Kelly began to sell his liquor to speakeasies, Memphis bootlegging gangs sent him word to leave town or "wind up in a ditch." Kelly was all braggart and hated violence. He left town, drifting to New Mexico, where he attempted to peddle more liquor. In 1925, he was arrested for violating the Volstead Act, while making a delivery and was sentenced to three months in the New Mexico State Prison.

After his release, Kelly moved to Fort Worth and began making liquor runs between that city and Oklahoma City. It was in Fort Worth in 1927 where Kelly met Kathryn Thorne, a striking, sleek, dark-eyed brunette. She was beautiful, but her beauty had a hard edge. She was strong-willed, domineering, and utterly corrupt.

It was this tall, sensuous woman with a sharp, scheming mind who made Kelly into a national menace, one of the most feared and celebrated criminals of the early 1930s, a creation of her own fertile and twisted imagination. It was Kathryn Kelly, not her handsome, friendly husband, who masterminded a sensational kidnapping for which she, Kelly, and others would go to prison for life. Kathryn Thorne had been born Cleo Coleman in 1904 in Saltillo, Mississippi.

The affable George "Machine Gun" Kelly, a small-time bootlegger and an inept bank robber, who reluctantly turned to kidnapping in 1933, a crime that sent him to prison for life.

Cleo's father was a hard-working farmer, but her mother hated their share-cropper's life and devised illegal ways to make money. Little Cleo dreamed of becoming rich some day and living like the grande dames she read about in the society columns. Underfed and emotionally deprived, little Cleo spent her pennies at the nickelodeon, dreaming of the day she would possess glamour, money, and power.

At age fifteen, Cleo married a local youth and bore him a daughter, but when her mother left her father in 1917, Cleo divorced her husband and left Mississippi with her mother and child, resettling in Coleman, Texas, a town from which her mother's family had taken its name. The Colemans of Texas were a notorious, far-flung family that ran illegal stills and cheap brothels.

Kathryn (Cleo Coleman) Thorne Kelly, foreground, the beautiful and manipulative mastermind behind the Urschel snatch; she shaped her husband's criminal career, shored up his reputation as a bad man, and henpecked him into kidnapping.

Cleo's mother opened a small hotel in Coleman that was nothing more than a bordello. Cleo eventually changed her name to Kathryn, which she thought was more stylish. By then her mother had met and married R. G. "Boss" Shannon, who owned a small ranch outside of Paradise, Texas, a dusty, one-horse town used as a hideout for wanted criminals.

Kathryn moved to Fort Worth, leaving her 2-year-old child with her mother. Kathryn Coleman worked as a manicurist in a large hotel and met many men to whom she prostituted herself. She was arrested twice for soliciting, but avoided convictions on prostitution charges. She spent most of her money on stylish clothes and movies. She affected the mannerisms of movie stars and larded her limited vocabulary with overly formal terms. She played the part of the southern belle, but she was hard and tough inside. One man who dated her stated: "She knows more bums than the police department, can drink liquor like water, and has some of the toughest women friends I ever laid eyes on."

Albert Bates, a slow-witted Kelly gang accomplice, who helped to abduct the Urschel; he went to prison for life.

In 1924, she met bootlegger Charlie Thorne, who was making considerable money. She was enamored of Thorne's bankroll, his big touring cars, and his high lifestyle. They were married and Thorne bought a large home for Kathryn in Fort Worth and another in Coleman. The marriage was not happy. Kathryn nagged Thorne to produce more cash. She wanted a mansion and a lot of money in the bank. The couple argued constantly and more than once Thorne blackened Kathryn's eyes. On a hot July night in 1927, Kathryn Thorne drove into a Fort Worth gas station. As the attendant, an old friend, filled the tank of her sixteen-cylinder roadster, he noticed that Kathryn was upset.

"What's the matter, Kate?" he asked.

"I'm bound for Coleman to kill that goddamned Charlie Thorne," she snapped with sincerity.

A few days later Thorne was found shot to death. He had left a suicide note which read: "I can't live with her, or without her, hence I am departing this life." Those who knew Thorne said that the bootlegger's language was certainly not the formal kind of writing found in his so-called suicide note. Such wording was more in keeping with his wife's affected vocabulary. "Charlie wouldn't even know what a word like hence meant," one of his friends said, while pointing the finger at Kathryn Thorne. A coroner's jury, however, ruled Thorne's death a suicide and Kathryn received what was left of his estate.

About this time, Kathryn began making mysterious trips out of town, each lasting several weeks. She had met a number of small-time bank robbers and it was rumored that Kathryn was casing banks, drawing getaway maps for these men, and sharing in the proceeds from these robberies. Through her underworld contacts, Kathryn met George Kelly, who was then, in 1927, running illegal booze from Texas to Oklahoma.

The big, burly Kelly appealed to Kathryn, even though she knew he was a drunk and a phony. She liked his blowhard ways, especially when he snarled tough guy statements like "no copper will ever take me alive." This man, she concluded, had possibilities, but he had to be molded, shaped into her idea of his image, one that would convince her underworld contacts he was a genuine "big-leaguer," a man who could commit important crimes. Kathryn began building up Kelly's image. She told him to stop peddling cheap booze to druggists and learn to use firearms. Kelly told her that he had hated weapons ever since he was a child. "But you've got to be able to hurt people, George," Kathryn told him. "You've got to be tough or nobody will respect you. And I'm going to get you something that will get you that respect."

Kathryn bought him a Thompson submachine gun and took him to the Shannon ranch, where he practiced shooting it every day. Kathryn lined up walnuts along a fence and Kelly shot them off. He actually became a marksman with this unwieldy wasp-like weapon and Kathryn rewarded him by allowing him to get drunk. She drove into Fort Worth with the empty cartridges from Kelly's gun and handed them to underworld friends and acquaintances, saying: "Here's a souvenir from Machine Gun Kelly." She then boasted how her daring husband was away robbing banks. In reality, however, Kelly was invariably lying on a cot in a shack on the Shannon ranch, struggling with another fierce attack of the DTs.

Oklahoma oil man Charles E. Urschel, kidnapped from his mansion in Oklahoma City, on July 22, 1933.

The ramshackled cabin on the Shannon ranch in Texas, where Urschel was held prisoner by the Kelly gang. Lawmen later rounded up the Shannon family members in a raid that failed to snare the Kellys and Bates.

W. R. Jarrett, who was kidnapped along with Urschel; he was released on the night of the abduction.

The room in which Urschel was held for ransom; he was tied to the bed and fed meager meals by his kidnappers; blindfolded, Urschel had conversations with George Kelly, who expressed his hatred for the oilman's wealth.

Kelly continued to peddle illegal liquor and in 1930, made the mistake of driving a truck load of booze onto an Indian reservation in Oklahoma. He was arrested without a fight and was given a short term in Leavenworth. While he was away, Kathryn told friends in Fort Worth that her husband was up north in Kentucky and Indiana robbing banks.

In Leavenworth, Kelly proved to be a happy-go-lucky prisoner, who was liked by prisoners and guards. He was so amiable that he was made a trusty and given a job in the prison records room. Kathryn visited Kelly at Leavenworth and gave him a list of names of his fellow prisoners, men to contact and with whom to curry favor.

"These men will be on the outside soon and you will need them as contacts when we go into the bank robbing business," she told him. "They are high class, important people. Get to know them here, do them favors, be their friend. It will pay off for us when you get out." Kelly shrugged and did as his wife ordered. He befriended Frank Nash, Thomas Holden, and Francis Keating, some of the most notorious bank robbers in custody. While working in the records office, Kelly prepared fake passes for Holden and Keating and these two infamous robbers simply walked through the front gates of Leavenworth wearing borrowed civilian clothing.

This escape suddenly vaulted Kelly's reputation inside the walls of Leavenworth. Holden and Keating, who joined the celebrated Harvey Bailey, boasted that they had escaped thanks to George "Machine Gun" Kelly, and that when Kelly was paroled within the year, they wanted him to accompany them in their bank robberies. Meanwhile, Kelly came to believe his wife's conception of him. He began to swagger and play the big-time gangster to other prisoners. To Morris "Red" Rudensky, one of America's foremost safecrackers at the time, Kelly stated one day: "This place is getting on my nerves, Red. I've got fifty grand sitting on the outside and I could throw a party that would last for a year, but I can't get at it."

"Why don't you go over the wall?" Rudensky suggested.

The idea of escaping unnerved Kelly even more. In fact, the prospect of risking death to escape thoroughly frightened this capacity -

I am putting all my dependence in you regarding this matter and feel sure you will take any precaution possible
Best regards as ever -
Yours truly
Chas. Urschel
When safe contact is made party will have my identification card. Please see endorsement after for Bernice to Arthur or Kirk

A letter Urschel wrote in which he asked that the $200,000 ransom be paid so that he could be released, a missive dictated by the calculating Kathryn Kelly.

will be out for the ceremonies, "Your slaughter"
Your Sap - it is up to you, if the shamous are convicted you can get your auntie and wife in Hell, because that will be the only place you can use one.
"adios" sweet one
"your worst enemy"
Geo. R. Kelly.
I will put my print below so you can't say some crank wrote this.
(Ought)

A threatening letter sent by Kelly to Urschel after the oil man's release, one promising death if any of his wife's relatives were imprisoned.

him. He laughed off the idea, however, saying: "Hell, Red. I'm too old for that. I'll be out in a year. But if you get any ideas [to escape], I'll help you for laughs. You young guys are the ones who should be licking your chops over busting out. And if you do, you might help old George make the wheels spin a little faster." Kelly was only thirty-three at the time, but he appeared to be in his mid-forties, his appearance due to the wear-and-tear of alcoholism that had afflicted him when he had been on the outside. But he used his appearance to convince others that he was a seasoned professional, suggesting to men like Frank Nash that he had been robbing banks during the early 1920s. When Nash escaped from prison later, he too promoted the idea of using Machine Gun Kelly in some of his more important robberies.

When Kelly was released in 1931, Kathryn Kelly was waiting for him. They were married, and she took him to the Shannon ranch in Paradise, where she ordered him back into training. He practiced every day with the submachine gun, and every day Kathryn showed him newspaper clippings about bandits like Clyde Barrow and Bonnie Parker, about Charles Arthur Floyd of Oklahoma, Harvey Bailey, and others. She had arranged for him to meet some small-time but energetic bank robbers, including a rather accomplished bank burglar named Albert Bates.

From 1931 to 1933, Kathryn reportedly cased a number of banks and Kelly, Bates, and a few others committed the robberies. The Kelly gang robbed a bank in Tupelo, Mississippi, taking less than $2,000. The gang raided a small bank in Wilmer, Texas, also for a small amount of money. There a guard tried to shoot it out with the thieves and was machine gunned to death. Kelly was credited with the killing, but it is more likely that another member of the gang killed the guard. Kathryn insisted that it was her husband, who had done the shooting. "Who else but Machine Gun Kelly would have that kind of nerve?" she bragged. Other bank robberies took place in Tacoma, Washington, and Dallas, Texas that were attributed to Kelly.

The income from these robberies was unsatisfactory to Kathryn Kelly. By 1933 a wave of kidnappings had rolled across the nation. Kathryn avidly followed these cases in the press. Mary McElroy, the daughter of the city manager of Kansas City, had been successfully kidnapped and held for ransom. Charles Boettcher had been kidnapped in Denver and millionaire William A. Hamm, Jr. had been snatched by the Barker mob in Minnesota and had been ransomed for $100,000. She decided that the gang would go into the kidnapping racket. "We've got to put the snatch on one of these rich birds, George," she told Kelly. "It's the only way to make any money these days."

Celebrated bank robber Harvey "Old Harve" Bailey, shown manacled at the feet after he was captured while hiding out on the Shannon ranch when the place was raided by FBI agents.

George R. "Machine Gun" Kelly, shown under arrest (center, manacled hand and foot) in Memphis, Tennessee, the day following his capture on September 26, 1933, by a local police detective. Despite the pompous claims of FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, Kelly was not captured by Bureau agents and never said at the time of his capture: "Don't shoot, G-Men!" This was a myth created by the promotion-minded Hoover several years later.

"Too risky," Kelly replied.

"We're going to do it, George." Kathryn had made up her mind and Kelly finally agreed, as usual. Kathryn Kelly then began to scout likely kidnap victims. She selected a businessman living in South Bend, Indiana, but this plan went to pieces after Kathryn got drunk with some detectives in Fort Worth, Texas, that she thought were crooked. She bragged to these men about the South Bend kidnapping, which was to take place shortly. The detectives notified Indiana police, and when the Kelly gang arrived in South Bend, they found police patrolling the streets around the businessman's home. Ironically, Kathryn later found out that her intended victim was broke and no one would have paid a dime for his return.

Then Kathryn read in the society columns about millionaire oil man, Charles F. Urschel of Oklahoma City. The feature story showed photos of his mansion in that city, almost a blueprint for Kathryn Kelly's kidnapping scheme. On the night of July 22, 1933, Kelly, accompanied by Albert Bates, pushed open the screen door to the porch of the Urschel mansion in Oklahoma City and walked inside. On the porch were four people playing cards. Kelly pointed his submachine gun at them and snarled in his best gangster fashion: "Stick 'em up! Which one's Urschel?"

Walter R. Jarrett and his wife were sitting next to the Urschels, but they said nothing. "All right, wiseguys," Kelly said. "We'll take both of you." He ordered Jarrett and Urschel off the porch and into a waiting car, which was being driven by Kathryn Kelly. The car raced out of town.

Inside the car, Kelly examined the contents of the wallets both men carried to determine which man was Charles F. Urschel. He then ordered Jarrett out of the car and left the man standing in the middle of a deserted farm road. The car headed for Texas and the Shannon ranch, which was now being used as a hideout for wanted bank robbers. To those criminals on the run, R.G. Shannon charged $50 a night for a bunk in one of his fly-ridden cottages and two cheap meals per day.

It was to this seedy underworld haven that Urschel was taken. He had been blindfolded in the car and was taken to the ranch, where he was confined day and night in a small one-room bunkhouse. The Kellys, meanwhile, demanded $200,000 ransom for Urschel and thus began prolonged negotiations with E.E. Kirkpatrick, Urschel's friend and go-between. It was finally decided that Kirkpatrick was to take the Sooner, a fast train running between Oklahoma City and Kansas City. He was to stand on the observation deck at the end of the train and when he saw two fields of wheat on fire he was to toss a briefcase with the $200,000 onto the tracks.

Kathryn and George Kelly shown at their trial; their lawyers could mount little defense against the solid kidnapping case against them.

At the appointed time, Kirkpatrick boarded the Sooner. He stood on the observation platform on the last car of the train and peered into the night, looking for the two fields to blaze up. There were no fires. Kelly, at the last minute, had flooded the gang's car so that the kidnappers were late at the rendezvous and never got the fires started. The gangsters watched helplessly as the Sooner and the ransom money rattled past them and disappeared into the darkness.

Finally, Kelly arranged to meet Kirkpatrick on Linwood Avenue in Kansas City, Missouri. Kirkpatrick walked down the street and was suddenly faced by a large man wearing a custom-tailored suit, a snap-brim Panama hat and brown-and-white spectator shoes. He was tall and big-shouldered. "I'll take that bag, Mr. Kincaid," he told the go-between, using Kirkpatrick's prearranged code name.

Kirkpatrick was cautious. He held on to the bag containing the $200,000 ransom money and said: "How do I know you're the right man."

"Hell, you know damned well I am!" Kelly said.

"Two hundred thousand dollars is a lot of money," Kirkpatrick said. "I want some sort of assurance that Mr. Urschel will not be harmed."

Kelly snarled: "Don't argue with me! The boys are waiting!" He gave a short nod to a nearby car where a man sat with a hat pulled low over his face. This was Albert Bates.

Kirkpatrick was not a man to be bullied. He said: "I want a definite answer I can give to Mrs. Urschel. When will her husband be home?"

The tough-man pose Kelly had been projecting suddenly seemed to evaporate. He shifted his weight from one foot to another as he nervously glanced about. He seemed unsure, indecisive. He kept staring at the black bag in Kirkpatrick's hand and all the authority went out of his voice when he said: "He'll be home in twelve hours."

Kirkpatrick, without another word, suddenly dropped the bag to the sidewalk and walked away briskly. Kelly grabbed the bag, tossed it into the back seat of the car in which Bates sat, crawled behind the wheel, and drove off. At the Shannon ranch Kathryn Kelly counted every bill in the black bag twice to make sure the gang had not been shortchanged. When the count tallied to $200,000, she turned to her husband and said: "Okay, George. Now we've got to bump the old man off."

"What?" Kelly said, shocked at the prospect of cold-blooded murder. "We can't do that. Kidnapping is bad enough, but murder is out. Absolutely out. We don't do that."

"He'll talk and we'll get caught." Kathryn said flatly. "It's the only way."

This time George "Machine Gun" Kelly stood his ground. "No, murder is out. I gave my word to Kirkpatrick that we'd get Urschel home to his wife."

"Your word! What does that mean? Nothing. The old man gets croaked, understand, George." Kathryn Kelly was adamant.

Albert Bates, a mild-mannered man who abhorred violence as much as Kelly did, stated: "George is right, Kathryn. If we get nailed for kidnapping, well, that's federal prison, but murder, that's the electric chair for all of us."

Kelly, with Bates' backing him, defied his masterminding wife: "Nobody's getting murdered, Kate. Nobody! I'm taking the old man home tonight, now."

That evening Kelly and Bates drove Urschel, who was still blindfolded, back to the outskirts of Oklahoma City. He was ordered out of the car and was given a hat and $10 "for cab fare." Kelly and Bates then turned around and headed back to Texas.

When arriving home, Urschel was questioned by FBI agents. The Bureau had been ignored throughout the kidnapping because the Urschel family feared that if agents got involved, Urschel might be killed. Agents pieced together enough information from the astute oil man to determine that the length of time it had taken the kidnappers to drive from the Urschel home to the hideout, where Urschel was kept would put them in Texas.

Arrogant to the last, Kathryn Kelly is shown laughing as she is sent to prison after receiving a life sentence.

The oil man recalled hearing a plane fly overhead twice daily, while he was being held captive in the bunkhouse and a check of plane schedules showed a mail flight that would cross a certain area near Fort Worth. Next, the FBI got a tip from two Fort Worth detectives, who reported their earlier conversations with Kathryn Kelly, when she had drunkenly bragged about kidnapping someone in Indiana.

FBI agents moved went to the Shannon ranch and found R. G. "Boss" Shannon, Kathryn's mother, her stepbrother Armand, and a much-wanted bank robber, Harvey Bailey, who had escaped jail and was hiding out on the ranch, where he was nursing a leg wound he had received when running a roadblock. Bates was found a short time later in Denver where he had gotten drunk and was liberally spending his share of the ransom. But the now-infamous Machine Gun Kelly and his wife Kathryn were nowhere to be found.

The Kellys had driven north with their share of the loot, going first to Chicago. They took expensive hotel suites and gave huge parties, inviting strangers to the festivities. Kathryn splurged along Michigan Avenue, buying a fabulous wardrobe and George bought a huge touring car.

When Kathryn heard that her mother, stepfather, and stepbrother had been arrested and were being charged with Urschel's kidnapping, she exploded and ordered George to write to Urschel and get him to drop the charges against the Shannons. At first Kelly resisted, but Kathryn hounded him every waking minute. Finally, Kelly wrote and mailed the following letter to Urschel:

> Ignorant Charles:
>
> If the Shannons are convicted look out, and God help you for He is the only one that will be able to do you any good. In the event of my arrest I've already formed an outfit to take care of and destroy you and yours the same as if I was there. I am spending your money to have you and your family killed nice, eh? You are bucking people who have cash planes, bombs, and unlimited connections both here and abroad ... Now, sap it is up to you, if the Shannons are convicted you can get you another rich wife in Hell because that will be the only place you can use one. Adios, smart one.
>
> Your worst enemy,
> Geo. R. Kelly
>
> I will put my prints below so you can't say some crank wrote this.

Kelly did exactly that, boldly inking his fingerprints and imprinting them at the bottom of the letter to Urschel, an act that would later assure him of a conviction and a life sentence.

At this time Kelly was drinking heavily and gushing bravado, but his nerves were shattered. When he read about Bates being arrested in Denver, he shouted to Kathryn: "Kate! Kate! They got Albert in Denver! Oh, my God, it's all over!" He and Kathryn then fled to Kelly's home town, Memphis, Tennessee. There local residents spotted him and reported that he and his wife were holed up in a small bungalow. FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover told the story years later that when his agents barged through Kelly's door, the fierce gangster cowered before them, nervously quaking and screaming: "Don't shoot, G-Men! Don't shoot, G-Men!" None of this ever happened and Kelly never uttered these much-publicized words.

George "Machine Gun" Kelly, shown entering Alcatraz to serve out a life sentence. He later wrote to Urschel: "These five words seem written in fire on the walls of my cell: Nothing can be worth this!"

On September 26, 1933, Memphis police officers surrounded Kelly's bungalow. Detective W. J. Raney went inside the small house and crept across the living room to the bedroom door which was suddenly thrown open. Kelly stood there, framed in the light from the bedroom, where Kathryn hid beneath the covers of the bed. In Kelly's hand was an automatic, not a machine gun. Detective Raney jabbed the barrel of his shotgun into Kelly's ample paunch and ordered him to drop his gun. He did. Kelly, who by then was being called "Pop-Gun Kelly" by underworld associates, turned and affably said to Raney: "I've been waiting all night for you."

The Kellys were quickly tried. George, Kathryn, and Bates received life sentences. The Shannons were sent to prison for shorter terms. Kelly was sent to Alcatraz, where he remained until 1954, when he was removed to Leavenworth. From there he wrote to his old kidnap victim, Charles Urschel: "These five words seem written in fire on the walls of my cell: Nothing can be worth this!" He died in that cell in 1954. His cell mate, Willie Radkay, later reported that Kelly had complained of gas pains after having eaten a plate of beans for dinner. He then suffered a fatal heart attack. R. G. Shannon was still alive at the time and he sent money to Leavenworth so that Kelly's body would be shipped back to Paradise, Texas, where it was buried in a family plot. A grave was reserved next to him for Kathryn Kelly. Kathryn Kelly, the "brains" behind the Urschel kidnapping, been sent to the Cincinnati Workhouse for Women and was paroled from there in 1958. She returned to Texas, but all trace of her was lost in the mid-1970s.

The last known photo of Kathryn Kelly, who planned the Urschel kidnapping; she is shown in prison while serving out her life term, the flowers had been sent to her on her birthday from her imprisoned husband.

A KIDNAPPING IN SAN JOSE/ November 9, 1933

On November 9, 1933, Thomas Harold Thurmond (1909-1933) and a friend, John Maurice Holmes (d.1933), kidnapped and killed 22-year-old Brooke Hart, son of a department store owner in San Jose, California. Thurmond, who came from a respectable, middleclass family, had lived in San Jose all of his life and had never committed a crime until abducting Hart. The only reason he later gave for this offense was that he had been "driven half crazy" by the nagging thought that he could not marry his high school sweetheart for lack of money. Thurmond altered his story later, saying that he wanted to marry an older woman, who had rejected him because he was impoverished and that ransom money from a kidnapping would assure his marriage to this woman. "I don't even know that man," the woman later insisted, when she was confronted with the tale.

Whatever the reason, Thurmond, and his high school chum, John Maurice Holmes set out to abduct Hart, when the youth left his job at the department store. He had recently graduated from Santa Clara College and his father had made him a vice president at the store only a few days earlier. The kidnappers followed Hart's Studebaker in their own auto.

After forcing Hart's car to the side of the road, they drove Hart in his car to the San Mateo-Hayward Bridge, which spans San Francisco Bay. There they bludgeoned him with a brick, fastened cement blocks to his body, and threw him into the bay. Hart regained consciousness, however, and started screaming as he frantically splashed about, shouting that he could not swim. Thurmond fired several shots at him. The cries ceased, and Hart sank beneath the water.

About an hour later, Thurmond telephoned Hart's father and demanded $40,000, warning him not to contact the police. Hart disregarded the instruction and immediately called the police, who initially considered the "abduction" a prank by Hart and his college friends. They did nothing. Eventually, however, it became clear to police that the kidnapping was genuine. When Brooke Hart did not surface and several ransom notes arrived at the Hart residence, authorities then glumly concluded that the youth had been kidnapped.

One of the notes instructed Alex Hart to place a large "L" in the window of his department store to indicate that he was willing to pay the $40,000 ransom Thurmond and Holmes had demanded. This was done. Then Hart was told to drive a cart to a certain destination, bringing the ransom money in small bills. This Alex Hart did not do.

Thurmond called Hart the next day, stating: "What gives, Mr. Hart? You didn't show up last night. You got one more chance."

"I don't drive," Hart told Thurmond.

The kidnapper paused, then said: "We'll call you back."

When Thurmond called Hart back on November 15, 1933, his call was traced by police. Hart kept Thurmond on the phone, asking for specific instructions on where to deliver the ransom money, stalling the kidnapper long enough for detectives to pinpoint Thurmond's location. They found him still on the phone arguing with Hart from a phone in a San Jose gas station. Thurmond quickly confessed, but signed a statement that put most of the blame for the kidnapping and killing on his partner Holmes. When Holmes was shortly arrested, he, too, confessed, but insisted that Thurmond had masterminded the abduction and murdered Brooke Hart.

The two kidnappers were locked up in separate cells in the Santa Clara County Jail in downtown San Jose, where they awaited trial. Nine days later, Brooke Hart's body was found on the shore by several hunters. The entire community, especially the students at San Jose College, went wild with rage upon hearing the news. A crowd estimated to be more than 15,000 gathered in a park which fronted on the Santa Clara County Jail where the kidnappers were being held. Sheriff

William Emig, realizing he had a potential lynch mob on his hands, called in all available manpower to protect the jail and his charges. His request that California Governor James "Sunny Jim" Rolfe send the National Guard was refused.

Emig called Rolfe back, holding him on the line as he looked from his second-floor office window to see hundreds of young men pick up planks, pipes and paving stones from a nearby construction site and then approach the front of the jail. They were howling for the release of Thurmond and Holmes. "You hear that?" Emig said, holding the phone's mouthpiece through the open window. Rolfe did not respond for some time. Then he curtly told Emig again that he would not send troops to San Jose. He hung up.

Thomas Harold Thurmond (center), shown with FBI agent R. E. Vetterli (right), who had survived the Kansas City Massacre; Thurmond, with John Maurice Holmes, kidnapped 22-year-old department store heir Brooke Hart on November 9, 1933, killing their victim and then got caught during a blundering ransom negotiation.

At about 9:00 p.m. on November 24, the crowd had increased to around 15,000 and was going wild. They stormed the building, and police held them off for two hours using high-powered hoses and tear gas. Alex Hart appeared at the request of Sheriff Emig and pleaded with the rioters to go home. He was brushed aside.

A young boy of about sixteen stepped from the crowd waving an iron bar and shouting: "I want fifty men with guts to follow me!" More than 100 men charged against the front door, battering it down. They located Holmes' cell and, taking keys from a battered guard, opened it. Holmes fought ferociously. His clothes were stripped from him and his face beaten so badly that it was turned to a raw pulp, an eyeball dangling from its socket. He was led half-unconscious from the jail.

One of the rioters called out from a second-floor window of the jail: "We've got Holmes and he's coming down to you! Now, we'll get Thurmond!"

The rioters stormed through the cell block, but could not locate their quarry. A terrified guard pointed to an open cell which had been Thurmond's. One of the vigilante's entered it and saw it empty. He stood silently for a moment and then heard heavy breathing above him. He looked up to see Thurmond, clinging to the water pipes above the cell's toilet.

The body of kidnapper Thomas Harold Thurmond, his clothes torn away by enraged citizens in San Jose, California, is shown dead, lynched on November 26, 1933, for his brutal kidnapping-murder of Brooke Hart, the same fate that befell Thurmond's accomplice, John Maurice Holmes.

A scene from Fritz Lang's 1936 film noir classic, Fury, where the director recreated the crowd that attacked the San Jose jail and lynched Thurmond and Holmes, the case upon which this film was based; Lang had studied the newsreel footage of the 1933 lynch mob to later dramatize its savage actions.

The kidnapper was dragged downward, then punched senseless as he was dragged out of the jail and into the park.

The two largest trees facing each other in the park were selected as execution sites. Thurmond was lynched first, pleading frantically with his captors. As his lifeless corpse swayed in the breeze, Holmes was dragged to the spot and forced to look up at the dead body. "How do you like your pal, now?" someone asked him.

Holmes quivered and shouted: "For God's sake, give me a chance!"

The crowd roared with cynical laughter and he was promptly strung up to a tree. Spotlights were trained on both bodies. The dead kidnappers, half naked, their faces almost unidentifiable from beatings, drooped solemnly in the midnight air as the stark and eerie lights played upon them.

About an hour later a small army of state police arrived on motorcycles and bullied its way through the hostile crowd. Boos, jeers and catcalls greeted the police when they cut down the bodies and put them on stretchers.

"Throw them into the bay, too!" someone shouted to the police.

"Why waste time," another yelled. "They're headed for hell anyway!"

As the bodies were carried through the pressing throng, men, women and even children spat upon the corpses and punched them with vicious swipes. Not one person in this massive crowd was ever indicted for the lynchings.

Newspapers and radio commentators throughout the state condemned the mob violence. These views were not shared by "Sunny Jim" Rolfe, the governor of California, who openly declared that the lynch mob had provided "the best lesson ever given the country. I would pardon those fellows if they were charged. I would like to parole all kidnappers in San Quentin and Folsom to the fine, patriotic citizens of San Jose."

For years, members of that lynch mob kept and cherished grisly souvenirs obtained on that terrible November night in 1933, swatches of clothing ripped from the prisoners, pieces of bark chipped from the trees that bore the bodies of Thurmond and Holmes. To thousands of citizens in San Jose, this was a night to remember.

Film director Fritz Lang also remembered the awful incident, and was particularly riveted by some newsreel footage he viewed, which depicted the frenetic lynch mob in action that night. He indicted the entire community in his classic 1935 film noir production, Fury, which starred Spencer Tracy as a wrongly-accused man, who is attacked in his jail cell by a lynch mob. The only difference between this film and the reality of the Thurmond-Holmes case was that Lang's protagonist was innocent and the kidnappers of Brooke Hart were, in the words of one San Jose citizen, "guilty as hell."

THE STOLL KIDNAPPING/ OCTOBER 10, 1934

On the afternoon of October 10, 1934, a family maid announced to Alice Speed Stoll, who lay sick in bed with a 103-degree temperature, that a telephone repairman wanted to check the extension in her bedroom. Mrs. Stoll got from her sickbed and put on a dressing gown, moving into a room just off the bedroom of her Louisville country estate. Seconds later, a wild-eyed man pushed the maid into the room, where Stoll was waiting. If Alice Stoll did not go with him peaceably, the kidnapper said, he would kill her husband, who was due home shortly.

Thomas H. Robinson, Jr., who kidnapped Alice Speed Stoll from her Louisville, Kentucky, home on October 10, 1934; he was caught and sent to prison for life.

Mrs. Stoll reached for his gun and then tried to get to her own gun, which she kept next to her bed. The intruder struck her with a lead pipe, almost knocking her senseless. The kidnapper then dragged Stoll, who was bleeding from a head wound, from the house and into the backseat of his car. He left a note demanding $50,000 ransom from her husband, Berry V. Stoll, son of C.C. Stoll, millionaire founder of the Stoll Refining Company.

FBI officials then received a big break in the case. They were able to trace the prints on the lead pipe, which the kidnapper had left behind in the Stoll home, to Thomas H. Robinson, Jr. (AKA: John Simons, b.1907). Robinson had been arrested in 1929 in Nashville for impersonating a police officer and possessing fake search warrants, which he used to gain entry to the homes of two wealthy families to steal jewelry. Although he was acquitted of robbery charges, officials had held him for psychiatric observation, before releasing him at that time.

Six days after the kidnapping, Stoll paid the ransom money and his wife was released. She had been bound and gagged, locked in a closet, and physically abused during her six-day incarceration in an Indianapolis apartment. On October 20, 1934, Robinson's father Thomas H. Robinson, Sr. and Robinson's wife, Frances Robinson, were arrested and charged with complicity in the kidnapping. The search continued for the kidnapper.

The elder Robinson said C. C. Stoll had given his son a job in the past—pumping gas in one of the Stoll gas stations—but the younger Robinson had been fired. The senior Robinson was alleged to be a middle man in the kidnapping, while Frances Robinson was accused of delivering the ransom money to her husband. In late October 1935, a jury deliberated nearly eight hours before finding Mrs. Robinson and her father-in-law not guilty on charges of complicity.

Nineteen months after the kidnapping, the FBI apprehended Robinson in Glendale, California. He was found living under the alias of John Simons. Robinson still had more than $4,000 of the ransom money. He was arrested May 12, 1936, and pleaded guilty to kidnapping charges. He was sentenced to life imprisonment. Robinson's attorney initiated further proceedings calling for a new trial on the basis that Robinson was insane, when he pleaded guilty, but this came to nothing.

THE WEYERHAEUSER SNATCH/May 24, 1935

The abduction of 9-year-old George Weyerhaeuser on May 24, 1935, resulted in a ransom payment of $200,000, one of the largest such sums ever paid during the 1930s, when kidnapping became almost routine in the U.S. The perpetrators of this crime were professional criminals, but were nowhere near as spectacular as the Barker gang that conducted two kidnappings in this period, commanding the same kind of ransom. In fact, the two men who abducted the Weyerhaeuser Nine-year-old George Weyerhaeuser, heir to a billion-dollar timber fortune, was kidnapped on May 24, 1935, in Tacoma, Washington, and held for a $200,000 ransom.

Newsmen and neighbors gather outside the Weyerhaeuser home in Tacoma, Washington, the day after George Weyerhaeuser was abducted. The largest ransom amount in state history had been demanded for the boy's return.

The remote wilderness area, where the Weyerhaeuser kidnappers received the $200,000 ransom payment and where they released their 9-year-old captive, the boy wandering to a farmhouse and safety a short time later.

Kidnappers Harmon Waley, his wife Margaret, and, reportedly, William J. Dainard (AKA: William Mahan), all were tracked down and captured by FBI agents.

Kidnapper Harmon Waley (right), shown in custody in 1935; he was sent to Alcatraz for forty-five years. His wife received a 20-year term, and William Dainard was captured a year later, joining Waley on the Rock.

The dilapidated Salt Lake City residence, where Harmon Waley was captured by FBI agents on June 9, 1935; he frantically burned his share of the ransom money, while agents were battering down the door, and then gave up without a fight.

boy were small time thieves far out of their element. They were William Dainard and Harmon Waley.

William J. Dainard (AKA: William Mahan) was born on a farm in Cando, North Dakota, in 1902. His father, Samuel Dainard, moved the family to farmlands near Vidora, Saskatchewan. When Sam Dainard died in 1914, the family struggled to maintain a small farm, but Dainard and his brothers and sister were forced to abandon it when Louise Dainard died in 1921.

Fending for himself, the 19-year-old Dainard broke into a liquor warehouse and fled to Montana before being brought to trial. There he stole a car, was caught, and, following a quick trial, sent to the Montana State Penitentiary for two years. He was paroled within a year and for a while sought honest work, laboring as a coal miner in Malta, Montana

The work, however, was too exhausting for Dainard. According to FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, Dainard put aside his pick, turned to a fellow miner one day, and said: "You can work your head off if you want to. I'm through with it. There's too much easy money laying around for a fellow who's game for a crooked job." Dainard quit and went to Oakville, Washington, where, on January 31, 1927, he robbed the local bank at gunpoint, fleeing with more than $5,000. He quickly spent this loot and, six months later, Dainard, gun in hand, robbed the Rathdrum State Bank in Rathdrum, Idaho, taking more than $100,000 in cash and securities.

This was a spectacular amount of loot for a lone bandit like Dainard, who spent lavishly on women, bought new cars, and stayed in the best hotels. But he bragged about his crooked ways and was soon arrested and identified as the lone robber of the Oakville and Rathdrum banks. He was sent to prison for twenty years for the Rathdrum job and a detainer in Washington was placed on him. Once he had served his time in Idaho, he would face another long term in Washington.

At twenty-five, the tall, dark-haired, handsome Dainard boasted to his fellow prisoners that he would never serve his full term, that he would escape "anytime I please." He did plan a prison break, but the plot was revealed and Dainard was given eighteen months in solitary confinement. In 1930, he met another hardcase prisoner, Harmon Metz Waley, a 20-year-old burglar from Tacoma, Washington, with a long criminal record.

Harmon Waley is shown on the first day of his trial, June 21, 1935; he was convicted of kidnapping, but avoided a life sentence in that he had spared the life of his victim. His careful plans went awry when his wife began wild spending of the ransom money.

Convicted of kidnapping and given a 20-year sentence, Margaret Waley, is shown awaiting trial on July 13, 1935; she was captured by FBI agents following the trail of ransom money during her shopping spree in Salt Lake City, which led to her husband's arrest.

Waley was impressed with the swaggering Dainard and thought of him as a prison "big shot." Waley, however, was glib where Dainard was tight-lipped. Waley's smooth talk finally convinced authorities that he had reformed and he was paroled within a year. Within three months, he was convicted of another robbery, but Waley persuaded the judge to give him a suspended sentence. He then promptly robbed a store and was given a sentence of from two to five years in the Washington State Prison. Waley was paroled again in September 1933, when his friend Dainard was also given an unconditional pardon from the Idaho State Prison and walked free. The Washington detainer still pending against Dainard was apparently forgotten.

Dainard and Waley did not immediately team up. Dainard first embarked on a series of robberies after which he resumed an alias and pretended to be a stove salesman. In 1934, when Dainard entered a Tacoma bank and attempted to rob it, a female teller panicked and screamed hysterically. Dainard hit her so hard with the butt of his gun that he thought he had killed her.

Dainard fled to a Spokane hotel and later learned that the teller had lived, but he resolved that bank robbery was too dangerous and that kidnapping, then being practiced widely by gangsters in the Midwest, involved less risk and returned more profit. He contacted his friend, Harmon Waley. Dainard, Waley, and Waley's wife, Margaret then planned to kidnap 9-year-old George Weyerhaeuser after reading in a local newspaper that the boy's father, J. P. Weyerhaeuser, had inherited a large timber fortune from his father, a lumber tycoon who had died only a few days earlier.

On May 24, 1935, Dainard waited for George Weyerhaeuser to return from school, dragged the boy from a Tacoma street, and drove off with him. A short time later, a ransom demand for the boy's return was sent to J. P. Weyerhaeuser, the kidnappers ordering him to deliver $200,000 to them. Meanwhile, Dainard, Waley, and Margaret Waley carried the boy from hideout to hideout, from caves and holes in the earth throughout Idaho, then to houses in Washington. The money was finally paid and the Weyerhaeuser boy was released unharmed on June 1, 1935.

The boy had been chained to trees and rocks for days, kept in dark holes, and he was finally placed in a car trunk and driven to a remote wilderness spot and released to fend for himself against the elements. Fortunately, he found a farmhouse and was soon reunited with his parents in Tacoma. Dainard and Waley each took $100,000 and fled in separate directions. They left a trail of marked bills, however, and FBI agents dogged them for months.

Dainard, realizing that agents were following the trail of the marked money, looked for Waley and his wife in Salt Lake City, but he was too late. Margaret Waley was already under arrest, apprehended after she had gone through several Salt Lake City stores spending the marked bills recklessly. Waley was cornered in his apartment on June 9, 1935. While agents were battering down his locked door, he tried to burn tens of thousands of dollars in marked bills in a stove, but agents stopped him before he was able to destroy all the evidence. The Waleys identified their fellow kidnapper as William Mahan, giving Dainard this alias with the thought that they were not violating the underworld code of silence.

Waley's lawyers pointed out to the court at his trial that the Weyerhaeuser boy had not been harmed and therefore the mandatory death penalty under the Lindbergh kidnapping law, which specified a death penalty if the victim had been killed, did not apply. It was expected that Waley would, nevertheless, receive a life sentence.

On June 21, 1935, he was placed on trial in the U.S. district court in Tacoma, Washington. He pleaded guilty and the court sentenced him to forty-five years in prison, a lenient sentence according to standards of the time. Margaret Waley was tried before a jury on July 13, 1935, and was convicted. She was given a twenty-year sentence.

Dainard, the mastermind behind the Weyerhaeuser kidnapping, remained at large until May 7, 1936. For almost a year after Waley's capture, Dainard lived a miserable life. He was afraid to spend the ransom money and every time he did, police and FBI agents were hot on his trail. He moved about the Northwest and then the Southwest, living like a hobo, in dirty, ragged clothes, with tens of thousands of dollars sewn into the lining of his tattered coat.

July 11, 1948: Thirteen years after he was kidnapped and held for one of the largest ransoms in U.S. history, George Weyerhaeuser is shown wedding Virginia Lee Wagner, also an heir to a lumber empire, a marriage that united two of the great American timber fortunes.

Finally, tired of this furtive existence, Dainard went on a money changing spree, almost racing from store to store and bank to bank in California, going from Sacramento to San Francisco and then Los Angeles, where he was almost caught by an alert bank teller. Dainard bought a broken-down 1929 car and drove to San Francisco. There, sleepless, he took a bed in a flophouse, so tired that he left his bag with the ransom money in the back seat of the unlocked car.

FBI agents traced the car and soon discovered it in the San Francisco parking lot. When Dainard approached the car the next morning, on May 7, 1936, he saw the money bag still there. He reached for it, and then heard a federal agent shout: "Hands up, Dainard! We're federal officers! Don't try to resist!" Dainard's hand instinctively dropped to his pocket, where a .45-caliber revolver rested.

Dainard then jerked his hand upward, deciding it was futile to resist the dozen FBI agents closing in on him. Dainard was tried quickly and given a sixty-year sentence, beginning at the federal penitentiary at McNeil Island. Waley had been sent to McNeil Island in 1935, but had then been transferred to Alcatraz. Dainard joined his friend Waley on the Rock the following year. Both men were released in the 1960s. One rumor held that Waley, who had once worked for the Weyerhaeuser family, returned to work for the very person he had kidnapped decades earlier.

KIDNAPPING CHIANG KAI-SHEK/ December 12, 1936

America had no monopoly on kidnapping. In far-off China, this crime had been practiced for centuries by roving bandits, who obtained substantial ransom money by abducting wealthy merchants. In late 1936, however, that nation and the rest of the world was shocked to learn that China's foremost leader, Chiang Kai-shek (1887-1975) had been kidnapped. More astonishing was the fact that his abductor had been Chiang's strongest political and military supporter, Chang Hsueh-liang (b.1898).

Son of the Chinese warlord Chang Tso-lin (1873-1928), Chang Hsueh-liang was called "The Young Marshal," after his father's assassination in 1928 by Japanese militarists. Chang Hsueh-liang was an adept military leader, a graduate of the Mukden Military Academy, and when he assumed command of Manchuria, he immediately became subservient to Chiang Kai-shek, representing nationalist interests.

Chang Hsueh-liang headed the northeastern frontier defense (1929-31) and, in 1933, was driven out of Manchuria by overwhelming Japanese forces. Chiang Kai-shek appointed Chang Hsueh-liang commander of the Tungpei army, but instead of directing Chang Hsueh-liang to energetically attack the invading Japanese forces in northeastern China, Chiang Kai-shek insisted that the Tungpei army combat the growing Communist forces in that area.

Chang resisted this directive, pointing out to his superior that the common enemy of China was not the Communists, but Japan. He wanted to join with the Communists in fighting Japanese troops. Chiang Kai-shek said no, or ordered Chang to destroy the red forces, which the Generalissimo considered bandit armies and a more serious threat than the invading Japanese.

Nationalist Chinese leader General Chiang Kai-shek, shown at the time he was held hostage by his aide and kidnapper, Chang Hsueh-liang, on December 12, 1936, in Sian.

Chinese Communist leader Mae Tse-tung (left), former ally of Chiang Kai-shek, shown with newsman Earl Leaf, Chu Teh, and Madame Mao; Chang Hsueh-liang had abducted his chief, Chiang, to force a union between Chiang and Mao in order to unite their forces against invading Japanese troops.

When Chiang heard that Chang had entrenched his army of ten divisions before Japanese forces and that he had come to an agreement with the Communists wherein they would assist his armies in fighting the Japanese, Chiang flew to the front, planning to convince his most loyal commander that attacking the Communists was the best policy. He brought along a 200,000-word manifesto, which he had written and which detailed Chiang's reasons for pacifying the Japanese and eradicating the Communists, believing that once Chang had read this complicated document he would do as instructed.

Chiang flew to Sian and confronted his recalcitrant commander, Chang. Neither man would concede to the other, and then the unthinkable happened. Chang Hsueh-liang kidnapped his leader, Chiang Kai-shek. This was done either to force the Generalissimo to join with the Communists to fight Japan or to save his face in light of the fact that his top commander had already committed China to this military coalition.

At 5 a.m., on the morning of December 12, 1936, Chiang Kai-shek, asleep in a suite behind a temple, was awakened by gunshots. He leaped from his bed in his nightshirt and ran outside, scaling a ten-foot wall and dropping to the other side where, as he later claimed, he followed two white scurrying rabbits to a rocky niche, where he hid from would-be assassins, these creatures serving as his mythical guides to preservation.

A group of nationalist soldiers searching for Chiang found the supreme commander in his rocky hideout at noon of that day. The Generalissimo stood up proudly and courageously demanded that these soldiers either shoot him, if that was their purpose, or provide the proper escort back to the temple quarters. A battalion commander immediately kneeled and offered his broad back to Chiang, who climbed onto the officer's back and was thus carried to his lodgings.

Upon returning to his quarters, Chiang took to bed and refused to leave it until his host read his manifesto. Chang kept his superior under guard and sat down to read Chiang's treatise on the evils of Communism and why China must rid itself of this political plague. Chang was also in contact with Communist officials who, then taking orders from Moscow, advised him that although Chiang Kai-shek was not a popular leader, he was the universally recognized general and politician in China and that his death would lead to chaos.

Chiang, the Russian advisers cautioned, was the only person who could keep together the myriad political and military factions in China and thus present a united front against the threatening Japanese armies, which also posed a threat to Russian territory to the north. At this point, Chiang, who knew very well his firm position as China's national leader, began to fast, telling his subordinate that unless he agreed to follow his orders, he would starve himself to death, leaving the nation leaderless.

A nervous Chang Hsueh-liang brought Chou En-lai to see the Generalissimo. Chou En-lai, later to be Foreign Minister of Communist China, pleaded the cause of his leader, Mao Tse-tung, one-time ally of Chiang Kai-shek. After much conversation, Chiang agreed to form a military coalition with the Communists. After another ten days of remaining in bed, the Generalissimo flew back to Nanking and going with him, as an act of good faith, was his commander, Chang Hsueh-liang, who was arrested by Chiang's secret police.

Chang Hsueh-liang was not harmed, however, but kept under house arrest. He went into permanent retirement, but lived comfortably and remained at Chiang Kai-shek's side for the rest of his life as an adviser and friend. When Chiang Kai-shek was driven from the mainland to Taiwan in 1948, and the Communists took control of mainland China, Chang Hsueh-liang went with him. This was, perhaps, the strangest case in the annals of kidnapping, one where the kidnapper became a kidnap victim, but in the inscrutable machinations of Chinese politics, the whole drama may have been a charade devised by Chiang and his loyal Chang, one where, from the onset, Chiang Kai-shek and Chang Hsueh-liang arranged the "kidnapping" to save the face of the Generalissimo, who had publicly denounced the Communists for years. He could now join with their much-needed forces to defeat the Japanese, appearing to have been forced into this unsavory alliance for the good of his country.

American dancer Jean De Koven, kidnapped in Paris, on July 23, 1937, and later murdered by the man she loved.

The villa at St Cloud, outside of Paris, where tourist Jean De Koven was held hostage for ransom and then strangled by her abductor. Dectectives are shown removing her body, which was found buried at the doorstep of this house.

"SOMEBODY IS WAITING FOR ME"/ July 23, 1937

A vacation in Paris, France, was the ambition of Jean De Koven's life. A professional dancer from Brooklyn, New York, she crossed the Atlantic to begin a holiday in the "City of Lights." De Koven was chaperoned by her aunt, Ida Sackheim, who accompanied her to the usual tourist attractions, the Louvre, the Eiffel Tower, and the Café de la Paix. It was an idyllic summer. The looming war was but an distant echo on the continent. It was a time for lovers, and Jean De Koven was no exception. On the boulevards of Paris she met a handsome German named Eugen Weidmann, who seemed perfect in every way. He was charming, cultured and gentle. He spoke French, English, and Portuguese fluently.

Ida Sackheim had no inkling that her niece had met this man, an ex-convict, who had spent five years in German prisons for larceny when she disappeared from Le Studio Hotel on July 23, 1937. Jean had returned alone to her hotel room from a tour of sightseeing that day. She changed her clothes and told the elevator operator at the hotel that she expected to be back by 8 p.m. "I have no time to leave her [Sackheim] a note," she said. "Somebody is waiting for me."

When De Koven failed to turn up, the worried aunt notified the American Embassy and then the French police. The law enforcement officers told Sackheim not to worry because young women frequently got caught up in romantic intrigues. Then a ransom note was delivered to the hotel which demanded $500 or, the note read: "we will stop all negotiations and she will be taken for a ride. You know how the gangsters of Chicago operate." The police insisted it was a publicity stunt until $240 in American Express travelers' checks belonging to Jean De Koven turned up in Paris. The missing woman's young brother, Henry De Koven, arrived from New York to post a 10,000 franc reward. New York governor Herbert Lehman placed the local FBI office at the disposal of the Surete, but the investigation was already in the hands of Detective Primborgne, whose work on this case was remarkable for its thoroughness.

Eugen Weidmann, center, the kidnapper of Jean De Koven, shown in custody and wearing a bloody bandage after resisting arrest; he was convicted and beheaded by the guillotine in France's last public execution on June 17, 1939.

In September 1937, the body of Josef Couffy, a chauffeur, was found lying in a ditch south of Paris. The police surmised that the man had been shot in the back of the neck while driving his client to the Riviera. The car had been stolen. On October 16, 1937, Roger Leblond, a young press agent was found slumped over the dashboard of his abandoned car in Neuilly, a Paris suburb. He, too, had been shot in the back of the neck.

A month passed before another shooting murder was reported to police. On November 22, real estate agent Raymond Lesobre was found lying on the stairs of an empty house in Saint Cloud, a suburb not far from Neuilly. A business card belonging to Arthur Schott was found in Lesobre's office.

Schott was a German businessman who provided a detailed account of his movements before, during, and after the murder. He was ruled out as a suspect, but his client list was examined for possible clues. Schott told the Surete that he was concerned about one of the names on the list, a German exile named Fritz Frommer, who had fled his native land after Adolf Hitler came to power.

The police called on Frommer at his Paris hotel, but found out from the concierge that he had left the premises on November 22 and had not returned. From his uncle, an Alsatian named Hugo Weber, they learned that Frommer had recently been keeping company with Siegfried Sauerbrey, a former political prisoner in Germany. Sauerbrey had changed his name to Karrer, and Weber believed this man was somehow connected to the murder of Lesobre.

The detectives went to a house Karrer had rented on the outskirts of the Saint Cloud forest. The outer gates were locked and the house looked deserted until suddenly a French-speaking man with a foreign accent inquired of the detectives their reason for coming. "Are you Monsieur Karrer, because if you are we would like to have a word with you about your tax payments," a detective replied.

Karrer asked for further identification. The detective produced his badge and one look told Karrer he had been duped. He turned his back on the men, pulled out a Mauser pistol and began firing wildly at the detectives. A fight began that was ended by the detectives only after they had clubbed Karrer over the head with a hammer.

When taken to police headquarters, Karrer issued a statement. "My name is neither Sauerbrey nor Karrer as you may think," he said. "But my real name is Eugen Weidmann. Now I'll tell you a story that you won't believe, but every word I am going to tell you is true." Weidmann went on to say that he had rented the villa at La Voulzie with two petty criminals named Roger Million and Jean Blanc for the purpose of extorting money out of the friends and relatives of kidnap victims. "Now I am going to tell you something that will absolutely horrify you. I killed Jean De Koven," he said with an air of diffidence.

Weidmann explained that murder was never in his plans. He merely intended to kidnap the dancer and extort some money from her, but was seized by a sudden, uncontrollable impulse. "Darling Jean, how sweet she was ... she was gentle and unsuspecting," he added with regret. "I enjoyed speaking English to her, which I learned in Canada. When I reached for her throat she went down like a doll."

De Koven's body was found buried at the doorstep of the villa La Voulzie. Detectives also found several items of women's clothing. which turned out to be those of Weidmann's fifth victim, 30-year-old Jeannine Keller of Strasbourg, France, who answered an ad in a Paris newspaper. Weidmann told the woman he was seeking the services of a "nurse-companion." She had been kidnapped and then murdered in the caves at the Forest of Fontainebleau near Barbizon.

Weidmann's accomplices, including Rene Tricot, mistress of Jean Blanc, were quickly arrested and charged with murder. The four—Weidmann, Million, Blanc and Tricot—were tried at the Assize Court at Versailles. In attendance during much of the deliberations was the famous French writer of the pleasures and pains of love, Sidonie-Gabrielle Colette, who covered the case for her newspaper. "Weidmann was a romantic," she waxed in her narrative of the trial. "He loved flowers and was cultivating roses. He also loved nature. It was not merely the necessity of the professional killer that made him choose the forests for his murders ... "

After three weeks Weidmann, Million, and Blanc were found guilty. Tricot was acquitted on all charges. A death sentence for Roger Million was commuted to life imprisonment by the president of the Republic, while Blanc received twenty months. On June 17, 1939, Weidmann, "the romantic," was guillotined. He was the last man in France to be publicly executed by the guillotine, and his ordeal was cause for a great public celebration. A strutting egotist to the last, Weidmann sought the final rays of his grim limelight as he bowed, waved and smiled to the spectators before placing his head beneath the falling blade.

"THEY'RE DEAD IN A HOLE"/ September 25, 1937

Kidnapping was not a planned crime by drifters John Henry Seadlund (AKA: Peter Anders; 1910-1938) and James Atwood Gray (1915-1937). Two cheap crooks, the pair decided to abduct anyone they thought might produce a substantial ransom and this they did on a whim in 1937, a crime that resulted in the death of their victim, as well as themselves.

Kidnap victim Charles Ross, a Chicago businessman, was photographed by his kidnapper to prove that he was still alive, while his abductor negotiated a $50,000 ransom.

Seadlund, born and raised in Minnesota, tramped through the Midwest for ten years, embarking on his criminal career in 1927, when he was seventeen, by attempting to burglarize a restaurant. He was caught red-handed and sent to jail. Seadlund escaped, hopping freights that took him southward into Wisconsin and Illinois. He took odd jobs to survive but even these meager positions became scarce in the Great Depression. Seadlund took to robbing rural gas stations and small stores in Minnesota and Illinois.

In 1937, Seadlund met 22-year-old Kentuckian James Atwood Gray, who showed Seadlund a pair of ancient pistols, telling him that his ambition was to become a bandit. The pair decided to work as a team and began robbing houses and blackjacking drunks. They drove aimlessly about looking for criminal opportunities and one presented itself on the night of September 25, 1937, when the pair spotted an expensive late-model car cruising down a lonely road in Franklin Park, Illinois.

Driving this car was 72-year-old Charles S. Ross, a Chicago manufacturer of greeting cards. Next to him in the car was his secretary, Florence Freihage. The couple was returning to Chicago from the Fargo Hotel Restaurant where they had dined that night. Seadlund and Gray were parked in the old car when the Ross auto drove past. Both thought the occupants of the expensive-looking car to be good prospects for robbery. Seadlund drove behind the Ross car, then pulled in front of it, cutting in front of it and forcing it to come to a halt.

With one of Gray's pistols in his hand, Seadlund jumped from his car and ran toward the Ross auto. Ross watched him run forward in the lights from his car, oddly and prophetically remarking to his secretary at that moment: "I've often thought of being kidnapped."

Apparently Seadlund overheard Ross' remark and seized upon the idea. He had originally thought to simply rob the couple, but changed his mind. He would kidnap Ross and hold him for ransom. Seadlund ordered Ross at gunpoint to get out of his car into his own, telling Freihage to remain where she was. Seadlund and Gray then drove off with their captive, leaving the by then hysterical secretary to scream for help. Recovering her emotions, she drove unsteadily to a gas station and called the police, telling them that her escort had been abducted.

Mrs. Ross received word from the police and told them that her husband had a heart ailment. She stated that "if he's kidnapped, my husband can't live long. His doctors say that he must have constant attention." Police and FBI agents began to search for the missing manufacturer, who by then had informed his abductors that he had a friend, Harvey Brackett of Williams Bay, Wisconsin, who could act as an intermediary. Seadlund drove to Wisconsin where Ross wrote a brief note to Brackett, dated September 30, 1937: "I am held for ransom. I have stated that I am worth $100,000. Try and raise $50,000."

Mrs. Ross received this note from Brackett, turning it over to Special FBI agent Earl Connelley, who had been sent to Chicago by J. Edgar Hoover to personally supervise the investigation into the kidnapping. A second note then arrived, also in Ross' handwriting, which detailed how the money was to be delivered to the kidnappers. Mrs. Ross then placed an ad in a Chicago newspaper which was easily interpreted by Seadlund that she could only pay $25,000. The kidnapper wrote back, demanding the full $50,000.

FBI agents studying the notes soon determined that the typeface on the notes indicated that the kidnapper was using a new typewriter. More than 150 agents scoured every shop selling typewriters and finally a description of a curly-haired young man was given, one that seemed to match the kidnapper Freihage had seen on the night of abduction. Agents were able to use this clue to track down an address of a cheap Chicago rooming house where a "Peter Anders" had stayed only weeks earlier. Prints in that room matched a single fingerprint agents had removed from one of the ransom notes.

Agents also discovered a number of racing forms in the Chicago room and concluded that the kidnapper was an habitual gambler. A third note was then received by Mrs. Ross, one which showed a dark picture of her husband in a wooded area and holding up a Chicago newspaper dated October 2, 1937. Following Seadlund's instructions, a motorcyclist, George Kukovac, was hired by Mrs. Ross (and with FBI approval) to deliver the $50,000 in marked bills.

Kukovac, following directions from the kidnapper, drove northwest in a strange stop-and-start pattern. While he was driving toward Rockford, Illinois, a car came up slowly behind him. The motorcyclist was dressed all in white and his cycle was also white, as had been dictated by Seadlund so that he could identify the man delivering the ransom. The car behind the cyclist blinked its lights three times and Kukovac, following instructions, dropped the package containing the ransom money and continued driving ahead. Seadlund stopped his car, got out, retrieved the money and then drove in the opposite direction.

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover supervised the arrest of kidnapper John Henry Seadlund in 1938. He stated that Seadlund was "the most vicious, cold-blooded killer I ever knew."

Nothing more was heard from the kidnappers or Ross for three months. Seadlund had sent Mrs. Ross a final note that said Ross would be returned to Chicago "if I collect and I have an opportunity to get rid of the bills by that time."

Agent Connelley minced no words with Mrs. Ross. He told her that the kidnapper's note showed that he knew that the ransom bills were marked and that it would take months for him to pass them off. Mrs. Ross abandoned all hope of ever seeing her husband again. Agents, nevertheless began tracking the kidnapper through the trail of bills he spent, chiefly at racetracks in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Miami, Atlanta, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit. They put pins into a map which indicated that he was heading West when bills turned up in Denver and concluded that he would be found at the Santa Anita Racetrack outside Los Angeles.

J. Edgar Hoover flew to Los Angeles where he personally supervised FBI operations to catch Seadlund. He had FBI agents man each betting window at the racetrack and check every bill against the list of marked bills in the ransom payment. The Bureau had performed poorly in the 1932 Lindbergh case and Hoover was taking no chances this time in allowing Ross' kidnapper to elude capture. This time, the FBI had calculated correctly.

John Henry Seadlund arrogantly mocks fear by pretending to wipe away non-existent perspiration from his forehead after receiving a death sentence following his 1938 trial.

On January 14, 1938, Seadlund stepped up to a $10 window at the Santa Anita Racetrack to make a bet. The man at the window was an agent and he quickly identified the bill Seadlund gave him as part of the Ross ransom money. He signaled to several other agents standing nearby and they surrounded the kidnapper. One of the agents standing next to him, showed his FBI badge and pressed an automatic to his spine, saying to Seadlund: "You're under arrest." Seadlund casually slipped his hand into a coat pocket and another agent gripped his wrist with an iron grasp, saying: "You make the wrong move and you die on this spot." Seadlund gave up without a struggle.

Once in custody at FBI offices in Los Angeles, the kidnapper admitted his guilt.

"Where is Ross?" an agent asked.

"Dead, of course," said Seadlund calmly. "I shot him. I also killed that fellow with me, a punk named James Atwood Gray. They're dead in a hole up in Wisconsin."

After confessing, Seadlund gave the agents an idiotic grin and asked: "Will I get hanged or fried?"

Seadlund then told the agents where to locate the rest of the ransom money. They recovered $47,345 of the ransom payment, then asked the kidnapper why he had not spent more of the loot. "I was lucky. I won at the track," he explained. Also following Seadlund's instructions, agents found the bodies of Ross and Gray in a pit outside Spooner, Wisconsin. Their killer told agents how he had driven both men to the spot and ordered them to dig their own graves before he shot them and threw them into the pit. Quickly convicted, Seadlund was condemned to death and, within two months of his apprehension, was executed in the electric chair in the jail at Cook County, Illinois.

THE "EVIL-EYE" ABDUCTOR/1950-1951

Within twenty-two days in 1950-51, William Edward Cook (1929-52) kidnapped nine people and killed six of them. He reacted to the injustices that had befallen him since he was a child by having the words "HARD LUCK" tattooed on the fingers of his left hand. He reveled in brutality, pain and death and was a man without compassion or remorse.

One of eight children of an uneducated miner, Cook was born and raised outside Joplin, Missouri. When Cook's mother died, his father, W. E. Cook, moved the children into an abandoned mine shaft, but soon jumped a freight train and left them to fend for themselves. Social workers found foster homes for all the children except little Billy Cook. People were repelled by his drooping right eye lid, a sinister-looking affliction that caused adults and playmates to shun him. Some superstitious persons said that he was possessed of "the evil eye."

William Edward Cook, Jr., who went on a kidnapping-murder spree, killing eight persons, before his capture near Tijuana, Mexico; he is shown with Mexican police, his drooping left eyelid in evidence.

The courts finally agreed to pay a woman to take care of Cook. The relationship between Cook and his foster mother was one of constant disappointment for the small child. For two years in a row, the woman gave Cook a bicycle for Christmas, only to have it repossessed, when she could not make the payments. At an early age, the boy sought trouble in petty thievery. He was caught and when brought before a judge, screamed that he would rather "go to a reform school," than return to his foster home. He was sent to a reform school.

By the time Cook reached his twenty-first birthday, he had served time in both of Missouri's reform schools. When he was seventeen, he was sent to a reform school after robbing a cabdriver of $11 and stealing a car. He became so unruly that he was then sent to the Missouri State Penitentiary, where he was a much-feared inmate, whose conduct was erratic and always violent. On one occasion, a fellow convict made a sarcastic remark about his deformed eyelid and Cook seized a baseball bat and knocked the convict senseless, almost killing him.

Two Americans prospectors in Mexico, James Burke (left) and Forrest Damron (center), of El Centro, California, tell a reporter how Cook kidnapped them and tied them in the back of their car, where they awaited execution, before Mexican police came to the rescue.

Released in 1950, Cook made his way to Joplin and looked up his alcoholic, wayward father, whom he hated. He told the old man: "I'm gonna live by the gun and roam." Moving westward, Cook found a job washing dishes in Blythe, California, the only legitimate job he ever had. Just before Christmas, Cook left his job without giving notice, and headed to El Paso, Texas, where he bought a .32-caliber pistol.

Outside Lubbock, Texas, on December 30, 1950, Cook hitched a ride with 56-year-old mechanic Lee Archer, whom he robbed and then abducted, forcing Archer into the trunk of his car. The car broke down outside Oklahoma City, but by this time Archer had pried open the trunk's lock and escaped.

With Cook behind the wheel, Archer had used a crowbar to break the lock on the trunk and opened it as the car sped down the highway. When Cook slowed the auto at a turn, Archer jumped from the trunk, rolling to the side of the road. Cook heard the banging trunk lid and stopped. He jumped from the car and pointed his pistol at Archer, who was by then desperately sprinting across the flatland—"It was either run or be killed by that maniac," Archer later said.

Edmond O'Brien and Frank Lovejoy appear in a scene from Ida Lupino's riveting 1953 film noir production, The Hitch-Hiker, which focused upon the horrific experiences of Burke and Damron, while they were held captive by the murderous William Cook (essayed, with drooping eyelid and all, in a mesmerizing performance by William Talman).

Cook, wearing leather jacket at left, is turned over to U.S. authorities by Mexican police; he was executed in San Quentin's gas chamber on December 12, 1952.

Cook shouted after him: "You better stop, mister! I'm gonna kill you for sure if you keep running!"

Archer kept running and Cook, thinking to save ammunition, pocketed the gun, got back into the stolen car and drove off. The car ran out of gas along a lonely stretch of Highway 66, between Tulsa and Claremore, Oklahoma. Cook abandoned the auto and continued along the highway on foot.

On Route 66, Cook flagged down a 1949 Chevy sedan driven by Carl Mosser, a 33-year-old farmer from Atwood, Illinois. Mosser was with his wife and three small children in what started out as a vacation trip through the Southwest. For the next three days and nights, Cook drove the Chevy aimlessly. He covered 2,500 miles, crisscrossing Oklahoma, Texas, and Arkansas.

When Cook stopped for gas in Wichita Falls, Texas, Mosser saw one last opportunity to free his family. Inside the store, Mosser grabbed Cook and wrestled with him, but the frightened elderly attendant pointed an old .44-caliber pistol at the two men and ordered them outside. Mosser pleaded with the attendant, shouting: "He's been in my car all day! He's got a gun and he says he'll kill us!"

"Let him loose," shouted the attendant from the doorway of the store. Cook broke free and pulled his gun, again subduing his prisoners. When the elderly attendant saw this, he locked the door of his store, but thought better of his mistaken actions and went to his battered pickup truck, giving chase to Cook.

Cook saw the old man gaining on him and stopped the Mosser car. He stood in the middle of the road and fired several shots at the old man, who gave up the pursuit and turned around. He later reported the incident to police, but by then Cook and the Mosser family had driven out of the state.

Cook ordered Mosser to drive to Carlsbad, New Mexico. From there they went to El Paso and Houston, Texas and Winthrop, Arkansas. The journey ended back in Joplin, Missouri. The three Mosser children, Ronald, seven, Pamela, three, and Gary, five, had grown restless. Thelma Mosser, had lost her composure. Cook tied up his hostages and, when seeing a police car pass by, emptied the .32 into his victims. Even the family dog did not escape his vengeance, shot several times by the kidnapper.

After throwing the bodies of his victims down a mine shaft in Joplin, Cook drove to Osage County, Oklahoma, where he abandoned the Mosser car. Five days after authorities found the car, the kidnapper-killer disarmed Deputy Sheriff Homer Waldrip and took his car. The lawman was found alive, but bound and gagged in the blazing Oklahoma sun. By this time, Cook had kidnapped his final victim, vacationing Seattle salesman Robert H. Dewey, who was found in the California desert with a bullet in his head.

Following the discovery of Dewey's body, more than 1,000 police officers began an intensive search for Cook. Police traced Cook to the Mexican border. He had slipped into Tijuana, where, on January 15, 1951, Chief of Police Francisco Morales spotted the murderous kidnapper. Morales calmly walked up to Cook and yanked the pistol from his belt, arresting him. He found and freed two prospectors from El Centro, California, whom Cook had seized during his flight from the U.S. and were tied up in the back of their car, one Cook had commandeered.

Cook was extradited to Oklahoma, where federal judge Stephen Chandler sentenced him to five consecutive sixty-year terms in Alcatraz. But Justice Department officials and Judge Chandler surrendered Cook to Imperial County, California, where he was convicted and sentenced to death for the murder of Robert Dewey. On December 12, 1952, nearly two years after his kidnapping-murder spree, Cook entered the gas chamber in San Quentin. He was asked if he had any last statements. He did: "I hate everybody's guts and everybody hates mine," he said. He was then executed.

Glan Boydstun, an undertaker in Comanche, Oklahoma, asked Cook's father if he could bring the body back to town for burial, as a kind of memorial. W. E. Cook agreed, not knowing that the undertaker planned to use Cook to advertise his funeral home. A steady flow of people filed past the casket, and Boydstun rented a loudspeaker and hired a preacher to rail against the evils of Satan. This proved too much even for the neglectful W. E. Cook, who filed an injunction against Boydstun. Cook's body was removed to Lone Elm, Kansas, where it was quietly buried. A startling and chilling 1953 film, The Hitch-Hiker, was based upon the horrendous exploits of William Edward Cook.

"THE BOY IS DRIVING US CRAZY"/ September 28, 1953

The kidnapping of 6-year-old Bobbie Greenlease in 1953 shocked America, but when citizens across the land later learned that his two alcoholic abductors had planned long in advance to brutally murder the boy before obtaining any ransom, nation-wide rage demanded their executions. Unlike William Edward Cook, who kidnapped his victims simply to exercise life-and-death control over them, the kidnappers of Bobbie Greenlease planned their crime to obtain, $600,000, the largest ransom ever paid in a U.S. kidnapping to that time. The kidnappers got the money and enjoyed its use in a brief, boozy spree that ended with their capture and a path to the gas chamber.

The precocious 6-year-old Bobbie Greenlease, at right, kidnapped from his school in Kansas City, Missouri, on September 28, 1953.

The French Institute of the Notre Dame de Scion, where Bonnie Brown Heady convinced a nun to release Bobbie Greenlease to her custody, telling the sister that she was the boy's aunt.

Carl Austin Hall (1916-1953) was the pampered son of a wealthy St. Louis lawyer. He never had to work for a living. His father died in 1946 and left Hall more than $200,000. Through wild drinking and drug addiction, Hall quickly squandered his fortune. To obtain more funds to feed his drug habit, Hall began to rob taxicabs. His clumsy robberies soon brought police to his door and he was given a five-year term in the Missouri State Prison. Hall served sixteen months and was released on April 24, 1953. He immediately began planning the kidnapping and murder of a small child, the 6-year-old son of one of the wealthiest men in Kansas City, Missouri, Robert Greenlease, a 71-year-old car dealer.

When Hall stepped from prison, he was greeted by a woman who had never met him before, a plump, 41-year-old overweight widow with a porcine face. She embraced Hall and kissed him passionately on the mouth, then introduced herself. She was Bonnie Brown Heady (1912-1953), who had been a gun moll in 1935, when she was married to Dan Heady, a bank robber. Heady had been imprisoned and then broke prison only to be shot down by a sheriff's posse while trying to reach his 23-year-old red-headed wife, Bonnie.

When Mrs. Heady was told that her husband had been shot to death, she crinkled a crooked grin and said out of the side of her mouth: "That's too bad." Bonnie Heady was as addicted to criminal types as Carl Austin Hall was addicted to heroin. She had heard about Hall from ex-prisoners and became intrigued by the playboy crook. She took him to her home in St. Joseph, Missouri.

Bonnie Heady was an alcoholic and drank most of her waking days. Hall either drank himself into stupors with her or mainlined heroin and was in a drugged state. When the couple sobered up, they began to work out the details of the Greenlease kidnapping, which Hall had been planning in prison. The idea of committing an atrocious crime excited the jaded Bonnie who listened to Hall's kidnapping and murder plan and then squealed: "Why, that's better than sex!" She readily agreed to take part in the atrocious crime.

The night before the kidnapping, Hall and Heady, in a downpour, put on boots and took a shovel into Mrs. Heady's yard. There they dug out a small, shallow grave, one in which they intended to bury the body of the child they would kidnap the following day. After completing this ghoulish chore, the couple celebrated by getting drunk.

The next morning, September 28, 1953, at 10:55 a.m., Bonnie Heady appeared at the entrance of the French Institute of Notre Dame de Scion, an exclusive pre-grade school in Kansas City. She rang the front door bell which was answered by Sister Morand. She sobbingly told the nun that she was the sister of Bobby Greenlease's mother, who had suffered a heart attack and was in St. Mary's Hospital. Mrs. Greenlease was calling for her son, Bonnie said, and she had come to fetch him.

Sister Morand asked Mrs. Heady to wait in the chapel and she returned with a small blonde-haired boy in a few minutes. Bonnie Heady was in a pew, on her knees. She got up and said to Sister Morand: "I have been praying for my sister's quick recovery. I am not a Catholic and I don't know whether or not God heard my prayers." This show of devotion further assured the nun that Bonnie Heady was who she said she was. Bobby Greenlease did not react to Mrs. Heady, and, even though she was a total stranger to him, he went along with her without a word of protest.

Mrs. Heady took the boy to the curb, where she had a cab waiting. The cab took her and Bobby to Main and 40th streets, where the woman got out, and holding the boy by the hand, walked across the street to a waiting 1947 Plymouth station wagon. The cab driver thought he recognized the driver, a balding man with drooping eyelids and a receding chin, who appeared to be half-asleep. Mrs. Heady and the little boy got into the station wagon and it drove away slowly, going south toward Highway 169, out of Kansas City.

About this time, Sister Morand realized her awful error. She called St. Mary's Hospital just after Bobby and the woman left the school, and learned to her horror that Mrs. Greenlease Carl Austin Hall, an alcoholic and heroin addict, who kidnapped and killed Robert Cosgrove Greenlease, Jr. Hall had attended Kemper Military School in Booneville, Missouri, in 1933, with Paul Robert Greenlease, and knew he was wealthy.

Bonnie Brown Heady, former gun moll and Hall's eager accomplice in the abduction and murder of Bobbie Greenlease. Cold-blooded and calculating, she craved thrills and money, saying before her execution: "I'd rather be dead than poor."

was not a patient. Then she called the Greenlease home and found Bobby's mother was well and at home. The nun told the story of how the woman had picked up Bobby. The Greenleases instantly realized their son had been kidnapped, and a ransom letter arriving the next morning proved it.

The ransom note read:

> Your boy been kidnapped get $600,000 in 20s—10s—Fed. Res. notes from all twelve districts we realize it takes few days to get that amount. Boy will be in good hands—when you have money ready put ad in K.C. Star—will meet you in Chicago—Signed Mr. G. Do not call police or try to use chemicals on bills or take numbers. Do not try to use radio to catch us or boy dies. If you try to trap us your wife your other child and yourself will be killed you will be watched all the time. You will be told how to contact us with money. When you get this note let us know by driving up and down main St. between 39 & 29 for 20 minutes with white rag on car aeriel.
>
> If do exactly as we say and try no tricks, your boy will be back safe within 24 hours—after we check money. Deliver money in army duefel bag. Be ready to deliver at once on contact—$400,000 in 20s $200,000 in 10s.

Although the note assured the nervous Greenlease parents that their child was "in good hands," Bobby Greenlease was by then dead. Carl Austin Hall had taken him for a ride with Heady and then dragged him out of his station wagon and fired three bullets into his head. Heady and Hall then wrapped the little body in a blanket and returned to Heady's St. Joseph house, where they buried the body on the night of the kidnapping.

When news of the kidnapping spread about the world, lawmen and the public alike were shocked. There had not been a major kidnapping in the U.S. for a decade, not since the racket-busting days of the 1930s, when the FBI had tracked down a number of vicious kidnappers like William Dainard and John Henry Seadlund. The Bureau, still hampered from acting immediately, could not enter the case for seven days under provisions in the 1932 Lindbergh Kidnapping Law.

The upstairs bar in Bonnie Heady's home in St. Joseph, Missouri, where Hall and Heady got drunk after digging a shallow grave in the back yard of Heady's home, to celebrate the kidnapping they were to put into action the following day.

The law stated that after seven days, if the kidnap victim was not recovered, authorities could presume that the kidnappers had taken the victim across a state line and thus broken a federal law. The Bureau, despite inclinations of its agents to act promptly, waited. (Because of the tragic outcome of this case, the kidnapping law was later changed to allow federal agents to act immediately in any kidnapping.) The local police also waited at the insistence of the Greenleases, who still believed that no one would really harm an innocent little boy.

The kidnappers, however, dragged out negotiations for the ransom delivery for several weeks. Hall made more than a dozen calls to the Greenleases, ambiguously setting up arrangements for the delivery of the money and then altering the plans.

One phone call from Hall, who called himself "M," with Mrs. Greenlease at the other end, was recorded by federal agents:

Mrs. G.: This is Mrs. Greenlease.

M: Speaking.

Mrs. G.: We have the money, but we must know that our boy is alive and well. Can you give me that? Can you give me anything that will make me know that?

M: ... A reasonable request, but to be frank with you, the boy is driving us crazy. We couldn't risk taking him to a phone.

Mrs. G.: Well, I can imagine that. Would you do this? Would you ask him two questions. Give me the answer of two questions.

M: Speaking.

Mrs. G.: ... If I had the answer to these two questions, I would know my boy is alive.

M: All right.

Mrs. G.: Ask him what is the name of our driver in Europe this summer.

M: All right.

Mrs. G.: And the second question, what did you build with your monkey blocks in your playroom the last night you were home ... If I can get those answers from you, I'll know you have him and that he is alive, which is the thing you know that I want.

M: We have the boy. He is alive. Believe me. He's been driving us nuts.

Mrs. G.: Well, I can imagine that. He's such an active youngster.

M: He's been driving us nuts.

Mrs. G.: Could you get those answers?

M: All right.

Hall and Heady sadistically delighted in playing a cat-and-mouse game with the Greenleases, purposely dragging out their negotiations, making numerous, brief calls that slightly twisted their instructions and cleverly evaded answers that might assure the parents that their son was still alive. Their communications often broke down, chiefly due to the drunkenness of the kidnappers. The abductors left sixteen notes under rocks, behind trees, under mailboxes, many of these directing go-betweens to find more notes in a crazy paper chase that confused both kidnappers and their victims.

Delivery of the ransom money was finally arranged by Hall, who instructed go-betweens to leave the $600,000, which weighed eighty-five pounds, in a duffel bag in some high grass near a country lane on October 4, 1953. Hall had difficulty in finding the money as he reeled drunkenly about in the grass. Failing to find the ransom money, he called Robert Ledterman, a Greenlease contact and go-between, another conversation recorded at 8:28 p.m., October 4, 1953, by FBI agents:

Ledterman: Greenlease residence. Ledterman speaking.

M: How are you?

Ledterman: Fine. How are you tonight?

M: A little late.

Ledterman: You said eight o'clock. Are we all set?

M: We're all set. We have a perfect plan. It couldn't be any...

Ledterman: How's that now? Give me that again.

M: There could not be any mistake. This is a perfect plan. It will have to be a little later. I am sorry, too, but we want to make sure there's no mixup this time.

Ledterman: Yes. Let's get things over—say, by the way, M, did the boy answer any of those questions?

M: No ... I couldn't ... we didn't get anything from him.

Ledterman: Couldn't get anything from him?

M: He wouldn't talk ... I'll tell you this much. You will get him in Pittsburgh, Kansas.

Ledterman: You're not bunking me in that, are you?

Heady and Hall in custody, October 7, 1953; Bonnie Heady bears face bruises and cuts from her violent struggle with officers arresting her. Hall, who was arrested in a hotel bedroom, while nurturing a fierce hangover, shows the effects from a binge he enacted immediately after picking up the $600,000 ransom payment.

M: That's the gospel truth.

Following this call, two Greenlease family friends, Ledterman and Norbert S. O'Neill, according to the arrangements Hall made in his phone call, retrieved the duffel bag containing the ransom money from the tall grass and left it near a bridge close to the junction of highway 40 and 10E at midnight on October 4, 1953. This time Hall found the money and he called the Greenlease home, again identifying himself as "M," to state that he had picked up the ransom, but that the bills had not yet been counted.

Ledterman: I can assure that all the money you demanded is there.

M: Well, I am sure of that. You can tell his mother that she will see him as we promised within twenty-four hours ... We will certainly be glad to send him back.

The murdering kidnappers immediately left for St. Louis, where they bought two large metal suitcases and dumped a total of about $300,000 into both, according to later statements. They reportedly buried these in an ash pit somewhere in south St. Louis. Hall took the rest of the cash with him. The pair got roaring drunk and spent lavishly, drawing attention to themselves. The pair then went to a cheap hotel room where Bonnie Heady passed out. As soon as she fell unconscious on the bed, Hall grabbed the suitcase, left $2,000 in his paramour's purse, and deserted her.

Hall did not leave town, but merely went to the expensive Congress Hotel, where he bought the favors of a young whore and then began to tip so lavishly that he drew the suspicions of hotel employees. One of these, alerted by the news coverage of the recent kidnapping in Kansas City and the largest ransom paid up to that time in U.S. history called St. Louis police and reported that "a man is spending big money around the Congress Hotel and he doesn't look the part."

St. Louis Police Lieutenant Louis Shoulders and Patrolman Elmer Dolan went to investigate. They found Hall nurturing a terrible hangover in his room at the Congress Hotel. Inside his bags, according to Shoulders, the two officers found more than $250,000 and a .38-caliber snubnosed revolver with three cartridges fired. Hall was taken in for questioning. Some hours later, police picked up Heady. Both were grilled until dawn. FBI agents went to Heady's home and here the body of Bobby Greenlease was found. They sadly informed the shocked parents.

The callous killers then began to talk. Heady at first insisted that she did not know that she was part of a kidnapping. She said she thought Hall was the former husband of Mrs. Greenlease and that she was merely trying to help him obtain his son, who had been kept from him. This story quickly evaporated when FBI men and local police confronted her with the real facts that proved she and Hall had been together since his prison release.

Hall and Heady then admitted the kidnapping, but loudly denied having killed the child. Hall placed the blame on an ex-convict, Thomas John Marsh, a man he had known in prison. This, too, was another fabrication. Finally, Hall made a full confession. For all his promises and assurances to the Greenlease family, his sadistic cruelty was capped with a bland confession that Bobby Greenlease was dead and that he had murdered the child only a few hours after the abduction, having driven from Kansas City to a deserted farm.

Hall said that Heady took a stroll in a field, while he placed his hands about the boy's neck and tried to strangle him inside the car. Bobby Greenlease was a feisty youngster. He fought for his life, striking his attacker and squirming repeatedly from his grasp. Hall told investigators that he had been prepared for such resistance.

"I had the gun in my coat pocket," he said. "I pulled it out and shot once, trying to hit him in the heart. I didn't know if I hit him or not, for he was still alive ... I shot him through the head on the second shot. I took him out of the car, laid him on the ground and put him in a plastic bag. I remember a lot of blood there. This farm where the killing occurred is about two miles south and two miles west of the state line."

After murdering and bagging the boy, Hall said he called out to Heady, who walked back to the car and helped the murderer load the body into the back seat. After arriving at

Found in Hall's hotel room were the kidnapper's personal effects, a .38-caliber pistol, and two steel cases containing $293,972 of the $600,000 ransom money; two Kansas City detectives were later sent to prison for appropriating the missing cash.

Heady's home in St. Joseph, Missouri, the couple waited until nightfall so that next-door neighbors could not see their movements. They dragged the plastic-wrapped body to the shallow grave they had prepared several days before the kidnapping, dumped it inside and then covered it with dirt. The next morning, both bought chrysanthemums, which they planted on top of the grave.

When realizing that they faced the death penalty, the kidnappers made a show of expressing their regrets to the parents, writing the Greenleases and begging for forgiveness. The two were tried on November 16, 1953, and the jury quickly found them guilty of kidnapping and murder on November 19, 1953. The jury also recommended that both these callous killers be sent to the gas chamber. After they were sentenced to death, Bonnie Heady sneered: "I'd rather be dead than poor!" When the sentence was announced, the gallery in the courtroom exploded with thunderous applause. Said the elderly Robert Greenlease who had been sitting quietly in the courtroom throughout the trial: "It's too good for them, but it's the best the law provides."

Meanwhile, Hall no longer claimed that he buried half the ransom money. He insisted that all the $600,000 was in his hotel room when he was arrested, but only $250,000 was ever turned in by the two officers who arrested him. "That's a pack of lies," Lieutenant Shoulders said. Robert Greenlease said that he believed Hall was telling the truth about the money, saying: "With certain execution facing him, Hall has no reason to lie." The St. Louis Police also believed the condemned prisoner. Patrolman Dolan was suspended by the department, which announced that Shoulders would be charged with theft.

The suitcases in Hall's room that contained the money, it was announced, were not delivered to police until an hour after Hall was booked. Shoulders was summoned before the St. Louis Board of Police Commissioners, but he was too ill to attend, a doctor stating that the lieutenant was exhausted because of work and was in "too nervous a condition" to stand questioning.

Police officials and newsmen gather behind the home owned by Bonnie Brown Heady, at 1201 S. 38th Street, St. Joseph, Missouri, while workers (center) dig up the body of Bobbie Greenlease on October 7, 1953, the day his killers were apprehended.

October 8, 1953: Bobbie Greenlease's classmates are shown praying for the soul of the slain boy at a funeral mass in the chapel of the French Institute of the Notre Dame de Scion.

The 55-year-old Shoulders, under great pressure, announced from his home that night: "The suitcases with the money were delivered to the police station at the same time as the prisoner. I can prove that the money I found in Hall's room was the same money I turned over to the FBI. Where that money is will come out at the right time, and when it does I know that Lou Shoulders will be in the clear." Shoulders later underwent a six-hour interrogation about the money. He then resigned from the St. Louis Police Department "to save the force further embarrassment," it was announced. Shoulders was not finished, however. He claimed that he was the victim of "character assassination."

Moreover, Shoulders said: "I got the kidnappers. I got the woman. I got the gun. I did not get the money." He wrote a letter of resignation which ended with: "After twenty-seven years as a police officer, to be castigated on the heels of performing my duty with the highest sense of responsibility is more than I can bear." Shoulders then packed his bags and flew to Hawaii to stay with his son, followed all the way to Honolulu by FBI agents who continued to keep an eye on him.

Hall and Heady, meanwhile, prepared to die. Heady would be the first woman executed in Missouri since 1834. She was permitted to visit her lover on the night of their execution and they dined together on their favorite meal, fried chicken. Heady sat outside of Hall's cell while he nervously gripped the bars. Bonnie Heady was clearly the strongest of the two, stroking his hands and patting his head, telling him that "everything is going to be all right." Hall had been terrified for days that he would be killed by inmates at the Missouri State Prison.

Child killers, as the warden and guards knew, seldom survived in the general prison population. Fathers, brothers, sons, all with memories of children on the outside, hold these criminals in the greatest contempt and traditionally slay killers of women and, especially, children. For this reason, Hall was kept in a separate holding cell, away from the other prisoners.

The execution of these two killers attracted great attention. The warden of the prison originally announced that Hall and Heady would enter the gas chamber in bathing suits and the local newspapers had their artists draw Hall in swimming trunks and Heady in a two-piece swimming suit. This brought down the wrath of womens' groups who called this "unseemly and indecent." The warden changed his mind and ordered that Hall was to die wearing green denim slacks. Heady would wear a green denim dress. About a half hour before they were to die, the warden allowed the pair to be alone together in a cell, undisturbed and without supervision. When Hall stepped from the cell, lipstick was smeared on his mouth and neck.

Convicted of kidnapping and murder on November 19, 1953, Carl Austin Hall and Bonnie Brown Heady are shown en route to court to hear their fate; Judge Albert L. Reeves sentenced both to death in Missouri's gas chamber.

Blindfolds were then placed on the condemned pair and they were led to the gas chamber. Heady's chief concern at the moment of her death was how she would appear before those witnessing her death. She had put her hair in curlers early that morning and spent several hours combing her hair and fixing her face. She was led trembling to a metal chair only inches from where Hall sat in the gas chamber. She turned her blindfolded face to the warden and said: "Thanks for everything. You've been very kind." Then she turned to her partner in cold-blooded murder and said to Hall: "Are you all right, honey?"

Hall replied in a dull, resigned voice: "Yes, Momma."

A U.S. marshal leaned close to Hall, still trying to determine the whereabouts of the missing $300,000, asking the killer: "Have you anything to tell me." Both Hall and Heady said nothing. The doors to the chamber were closed and witnesses could see through the glass of the chamber that Heady and Hall were talking quickly to each other, but none of their last words could be heard. The cyanide pellets were dropped into the small vats of sulfuric acid beneath the chairs in which the killers sat. Hall breathed deep, swallowed once, and died. Bonnie Brown Heady fought death to the last second, holding her breath until the fumes surrounded her and she had to take a breath, her last.

The story was still not over, however. The hunt for the money went on. Only a day after the execution of Hall and Heady, ex-patrolman Dolan was indicted for perjury by a federal grand jury, which declared he had given false evidence concerning the suitcases full of money found in Hall's hotel room. Then Shoulders was indicted and both men were placed on trial. After a prolonged court battle, both men were found guilty of misappropriating the funds and perjuring themselves and sent to prison. Dolan was given a two-year sentence, Shoulders three years.

The Greenlease money never surfaced. Only a few of the marked bills appeared, some in Michigan, some in Mexico. Officers looked for it in Europe and South America, but no trace of it could be found. It was later concluded that the money had been sold at a cut-rate price, for about 25¢ on the dollar. In the hunt for this money, the press gave more coverage to its possible whereabouts than it rendered to the unsuspecting 6-year-old boy who paid with his unfulfilled, unlived life.

December 18, 1953: Carl Austin Hall and Bonnie Brown Heady are shown in an artist's sketch wearing swim suits at their scheduled execution, but women's groups protested, stating that such garb was "unseemly" and "indecent," and the two were allowed to wear prison uniforms at the last moment when they were strapped into twin chairs inside the gas chamber of Missouri's state penitentiary. Both wore blindfolds and died within seconds of inhaling the lethal gas.

THE ABDUCTION OF STEPHANIE BRYAN/ April 28, 1955

Burton W. Abbott (1928-57), the kidnapper and killer of 14-year-old Stephanie Bryan in San Francisco in 1955, first appeared to police as an unlikely sex abductor and murderer. The San Francisco native had attended the University of California, majored in accounting, and, at an early age, married an older woman and had a small son to whom he was ostensibly devoted.

Abbott dressed neatly and lived comfortably on a large pension from service-related injuries. Abbott had served in the U.S. Army during World War II, but had never left his Kentucky army base since he suffered double pneumonia, which activated a latent tuberculosis. A lung and five ribs had been removed.

Fourteen-year-old Stephanie Bryan, kidnapped on April 28, 1955 in Berkeley, California, while walking home from school; her body was later found near a remote cabin in the Trinity Mountains.

Using the G.I. Bill following the war, Abbott entered college and became what was later described as a "professional student," stretching courses over many years, indulging in endless intellectual debates with his professors and fellow students, visiting student hangouts, and chatting with young college girls until running off to visit his wife at work. In his off hours, Abbott sought out talented chess players to best in his favorite game.

Abbott dabbled in little-known recipes and liked to think of himself as an expert chef, preparing special dishes for his wife. Whenever they could get away, the Abbotts left their Alameda home and drove 300 miles north to the Trinity Mountains, where they had a small cabin. Burton often went alone on such journeys, staying at the cabin to hunt and fish and mostly contemplate life, or so he later told police investigators.

All seemed well in the comfortable, middle-class life of Burton Abbott until the night of July 15, 1955. Georgia Abbott was entertaining guests that evening, Otto and Leona Dezman. Mrs. Abbott worked in Leona Dezman*s beauty parlor as a beautician. Talk turned to a play Georgia Abbott was writing and suddenly she decided to check some storage boxes in the basement to see if she had material for costuming the amateur drama.

Inside a box in a basement corner, Georgia Abbott found a wallet which contained photos of school children, a half-written letter penned to a boy in a teenage scrawl, and the identification card of one Stephanie Bryan. Mrs. Abbott was trembling as she went upstairs to show her discovery to the Dezmans and her husband.

"Isn't this the girl who disappeared?" she asked her husband. Burton Abbott stared at the identification card with a quizzical look and said nothing. Stephanie Bryan had been in the news since she vanished on April 28, 1955, after walking a schoolmate home. The girl was last seen walking past the Hotel Claremont in Berkeley and some hazy reports given later to police described a teenage girl struggling with a handsome young man in a car parked nearby. The police of Contra Costa County and Berkeley had been conducting a massive hunt for the girl and had only turned up Stephanie's French textbook in a distant canyon.

After Otto Dezman looked at the wallet, he immediately called police and detectives were soon questioning the Abbotts, who could offer no explanations. Burton Abbott seemed so unconcerned that he sat at his chessboard, moving pieces about, as if figuring new moves to create a checkmate was more important than the missing girl. Police left that night only to return first thing the next morning. While they conducted an exhaustive search of the Abbott basement, Burton Abbott sat quietly in an upstairs bedroom working on a crossword puzzle.

Officers took shovels to the earthen floor of Abbott's basement and dug up the girl's bra, her glasses, and some of her school books. When confronted with these items, Abbott showed no signs of nervousness, never flinching when telling the police that his garage had been recently used as a polling place and any of the dozens of strangers, who were then present could have buried these items. Again, even with such incriminating evidence, the police seemed unwilling to arrest Abbott on suspicion. After all, they had no body.

Then there was Abbott's reserved demeanor and an air of innocence. Berkeley police and the local district attorney were convinced that Abbott knew nothing about Stephanie Bryan's fate. He freely took a lie detector test in Berkeley and this was labeled "inconclusive." Abbott stuck by his story that he could not have been with Stephanie on the day of her disappearance since he was at his cabin in the Trinity Mountains for the opening of the fishing season. He was released.

It did occur to some investigators to search the area around the Abbott cabin in the Trinity Mountains. By the time two men, a newsman and local hunter, Harold Jackson, arrived at the scene, they discovered the cabin burned down. They were told that some drunken lumbermen had torched the cabin after hearing that the Abbotts might be involved with the missing teenager. They were superstitious, investigators were told, since the cabin had played a peripheral part in another murder in 1948, and thought the place should be destroyed.

Jackson nevertheless unleashed his bloodhounds and, 335 feet above the cabin, on the side of a steep ridge, the dogs found a shallow grave. Inside of it was the badly decomposed corpse of Stephanie Bryan. Since bears and bobcats had been at the body and the weather had done its worst to destroy what was left, coroner*s pathologists identified the girl through the clothing she was wearing. The girl's panties had been tied about her throat, but her death was not attributed to strangulation. Severe blows to the head had almost crushed her skull.

Burton Abbott was arrested and charged with killing Stephanie Bryan and was held in the Alameda County Jail in Oakland. He went to trial on January 19, 1956, before Judge Charles Wade Snook. There was no question of Abbott's sanity; he had allowed psychiatrists to examine him and had been pronounced sane. His only defense was his alibi of having been at his mountain retreat when Stephanie Bryan disappeared and that he could not have been in the Trinity Mountains and in Berkeley at the same time.

Proving that alibi was something else. Several of Abbott's acquaintances swore he was in a restaurant or tavern in the resort area on the night of April 28, 1955, not in Berkeley. Others contradicted this claim, saying he did not appear until the morning of April 29. District Attorney J. Fred Coakley was aggressive, some said ferocious, in his prosecution of Abbott, tearing away at his cabin alibi by presenting not a portrait of a shy, sickly man interested in only intellectual pursuits, but a psychopathic kidnapper and killer, who lurked beneath an exterior purposely postured as weak and timid. In fact, Abbott, shortly after the trial began, pleaded his illness and requested that he be removed to a hospital for treatment. This request was denied.

Newsmen learned that police had uncovered a long history of sexual misconduct by Abbott, that he reportedly had preyed upon young girls for a number of years and that they had received a complaint about him from a 13-year-old girl some time after Stephanie Bryan had disappeared. A Berkeley housewife claimed that Abbott had, three years earlier, followed her home, flirting with her.

The woman at the time was thirty-eight and Abbott was twenty. Newsmen and police concluded that this would fit in with Abbott's penchant for older women. Abbott himself responded to this story by blurting an indignant denial: "She is absolutely false. I cannot explain how she could have said such a thing. I'm not in the habit of following women." When asked if he ever followed any woman, Abbott replied, "Yes, my wife!"

Not once did Abbott ever show emotion in court as his attorneys, Harold Hove and Stanley Whitney, energetically sought to save him from the gas chamber. He was implacable and unperturbed, even when the prosecution heaped upon him the most damning accusations. Though Abbott was charged with kidnapping and murder, the prosecution had earlier on conceded that he sought no ransom from Stephanie's well-to-do parents.

Abbott was, in the mind of Alameda County's assistant district attorney, Folger Emerson, a sexual deviant, who had killed the girl lest she inform the world that he had abducted and molested her. Said Emerson, "If ever there was a crime that fitted the punishment of death, this is it. Stephanie Bryan's body was too decomposed to tell whether or not she was violated, but the evidence shows that the original intent of the defendant when he kidnapped her was to commit a sex crime. In all probability he raped her."

The defense fought back, pointing out that Abbott, sickly, weighing only 130 pounds, would have found it impossible to rape and kill this girl and then carry her 105-pound body 335 feet up the side of a steep mountainside to bury her remains. Exactly, countered the prosecution; Abbott was so emotionally charged with his sexual thrill-killing that he did find the energy to do so and it was suggested that he could have led the girl alive to the place of her burial and then killed her, bludgeoning her to death and leaving her for the forest predators.

As the court battle waged, jury members kept glancing to Abbott, who, for a week, showed not a flicker of anger at his dogged accusers. He displayed no shock at the death of the victim and evinced no dismay at his own predicament. This posture was interpreted by many as arrogance, the kind of willful superiority found in many a psychopathic killer in the past and not a bit unlike the intellectual murderer Richard Loeb, killer of Bobby Franks in Chicago in 1924 (see Celebrity Murders), or burglar Richard Allen Davis, murderer of Polly Klaas in 1993 (see Burglary).

Burton W. Abbott, a quiet family man, who kidnapped and murdered Stephanie Bryan, his guilt established by his own wife in an offhand discovery; he went to San Quentin's gas chamber on March 15, 1957.

Yet, in his cell, Abbott tried to explain to authorities the reason for his nerveless behavior. "There is no reason to be immature and jump up and down and yell," he said. "After all, I've spent several years in the hospital and have learned to keep myself under control while looking death in the eye." Character witnesses for Abbott spoke about his gentility, his love for his son, his devotion to his wife.

Georgia Abbott explained how Abbott was called Bud, after the popular comedian of Abbott and Costello fame, and that all who knew him thought of him as considerate and peace-loving. "Bud is gentle and kind and good," Georgia Abbott insisted. "No woman could ask any more of a husband and I am not easy to live with." She went on to point out her husband*s astrological virtues, compared to her own aggressive birth sign. "I am Leo born. I am the lion. He is an Aquarius, the gentle one."

To his lawyers visiting him in his cell, Abbott did show emotion, asking them to tell his wife that he had remembered her birthday and that this was the first time in seven years that he had not celebrated the event with her. "Please tell her I am thinking about her," he said tearfully.

Also, with tears welling up in his eyes, Abbott said in his cell to his attorneys, "All I want to say is that I didn't do this." To a reporter, also with Abbott in his cell, the accused man said in a quavering voice, "Each night as I lie on my jail cell bunk, I pray that the person who did this thing gets caught."

No one saw Burton Abbott kidnap or kill Stephanie Bryan, this the prosecution admitted. Such direct evidence was not available, but other evidence, which would subsequently damn the cool and collected Abbott, was supplied by Dr. Paul L. Kirk, from the criminology department of the University of California. Kirk testified that he had collected hairs and fibers from Abbott*s Chevrolet, the car in which the state claimed Abbott kidnapped Stephanie Bryan.

The criminologist showed how he had compared and matched the fibers from the car to the victim's sweater, and two hairs found in Abbott's car matched the hairs of the victim's head. Human blood was found, though only pinpoints, in Abbott's car also, but Kirk admitted this could not be matched to that of Stephanie's, such blood examinations being in an age before the use of DNA.

Defense attorneys brought forth their own forensic witness, Lowell Bradford, who headed the Santa Clara County Crime Laboratory. Bradford tried to show how the hairs could have come from other sources, but in the end it was Kirk, who was believed. The discovery of the victim's body on Abbott's property, the forensic evidence, the flimsy alibi, the seemingly indifferent attitude on the part of the accused, all of this added up to a jury verdict of guilty on January 25, 1956.

Abbott did not break down in the face of his conviction. A short time later, back in his cell, he said to reporters: "I guess the jurors feel they're correct, but they're wrong. That's all there is to it. They are wrong, wrong, wrong."

The death sentence was passed and Abbott was scheduled to die in the gas chamber at San Quentin Prison on March 15, 1957. His family and friends conducted a desperate campaign to find the real killer, still believing in Abbott's innocence. They placed ads in local papers, offering $2,500 in rewards for identification of the real killer. No one responded.

Abbott*s lawyers fought hard for stays of execution, petitioning Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas and California Attorney General (later governor) Edmund G. Brown, both avowed foes of capital punishment. Both men denied the appeals. Abbott remained stoic, awaiting the end.

A few days before he was scheduled to die, the prisoner was visited in his cell by San Quentin's resident psychiatrist, Dr. David Schmidt, who again asked him about the murder. Abbott shook his head and reportedly said: "I can't admit it, Doc. Think of what it would do to my mother. She could not take it." This oblique admission of guilt, revealed some time after Abbott's execution, created a political storm which took some years to abate.

Abbott's last hours were whiled away reading magazines, and the condemned man did not eat a hearty meal, as the saying goes. Abbott made out a fussy, detailed list of items for his last meal, specifying that he wanted "cocktail sauce, not tartar sauce" to adorn one dish and that his salad be made up of "principally romaine lettuce with vinegar and oil dressing."

Abbott showed no nervousness when he was led to the gas chamber on March 15, 1957. He sat down calmly and Warden Harley O. Teets ordered the execution to proceed. The phone in the room outside the gas chamber rang and at the other end was an aide of Governor Goodwin Knight. "Can you stop it?" the aide asked Teets. "No," replied the warden. "Too late. The gas has already been released." At 11:25 a.m., Burton Abbott was pronounced dead. The request for a stay of execution, it was later explained, was only for one hour, but the reason for that hour's stay was never explained.

The condemned man's body, as per his request, was sent to the University of California, where the corpse was to be used for medical experiments and the eyes used for cornea transplants. Abbott's small son was deprived of his father's veteran's life insurance of $10,000, because of the execution. Abbott had told everyone that at least he could leave his boy something to cover college expenses through the policy. Georgia Abbott changed her name and her son's name and left the state. It was her conduct, many later pointed out, that put her husband in the gas chamber.

The infamous "Red Light Bandit," rapist and kidnapper, Caryl Chessman, befriended Abbott at San Quentin and later claimed that Abbott had told him that Bryan's actual abductor and killer was someone else, but he named no one. Chessman, a jailhouse lawyer and crafty felon, who legally wangled eight stays of execution before going to the gas chamber on May 2, 1960, was nevertheless known widely as a notorious liar and his statements about Abbott were routinely dismissed.

After finding the damning wallet in the basement, why did she blurt out her discovery when she knew its serious implications—that her discovery on the premises of her home would certainly involve her husband if not herself? Some criminologists have suggested that Mrs. Abbott purposely did this to throw suspicion on her husband.

Others claimed that she merely did a simple-minded thing, an unconscious act. Still others suggest that Mrs. Abbott's declaration of her discovery in front of house guests was to embarrass her husband and his proclivity for sexual deviance, unaware that such aberrant behavior had actually led to the girl's murder.

Convicted rapist Caryl Chessman, who befriended Abbott in San Quentin, while he himself awaited execution, later claimed that Abbott had admitted that Stephanie Bryan had been killed "by someone very close to him," and that he had taken the body to the mountains to bury it to protect that person. Chessman's deserved reputation for lying, however, lends little credence to this tale.

Perhaps even more puzzling than Mrs. Abbott's oddball behavior on the night of her basement discovery was the fact that Abbott kept the effects of his victim on his premises. Some criminologists later proposed that he intended to distribute her possessions all over Alameda County to confuse police such as dropping the French textbook in the remote canyon and that his wife uncovered the belongings before he could distribute the rest of these items.

Another theory, which has some support in the historical behavior of psychopathic kidnappers and killers, is that Abbott had committed, like Richard Loeb, an intellectual crime, a perfect murder, which would hold little interest for him unless he could jeopardize himself by allowing certain clues to lead toward him, but not surround him with guilt.

Like the game of chess he so admired and played well, the idea was to let the police think he was the killer, and then, with an absence of real proof (the body itself) to establish his heinous act and to secure a conviction, he, Burton Abbott, would escape the ultimate checkmate and win the game. Such strange machinations on the part of killers is not unknown.

Murderer Richard Loeb thought the police to be his intellectual inferiors and mocked their search for him by actually volunteering to help them in that search, offering clues to the identity of the killer, presenting a psychological profile of the killer to investigators, daring them, as it were, to see beyond the obvious and to have the nerve, his kind of nerve, to accuse him, the real killer, and then prove it.

THE WEINBERGER KIDNAPPING/ July 3, 1956

Peter Weinberger, the one-month-old son of a wealthy drug firm executive, was kidnapped from his home in Westbury, Long Island, New York, on July 4, 1956. He was stolen from his baby carriage, which was sitting on the patio of the Weinberger home, while Mrs. Weinberger was momentarily absent. When she returned, she found the child missing. In the empty carriage she found a ransom note demanding $2,000 for the return of the child.

When learning of the kidnapping, the police examined the ransom note, which curiously gave an apology for the abduction, the kidnapper stating that the ransom demand was a bare minimum in order to meet the abductor's pressing debts. It also cautioned the Weinbergers that if they went to the police, their son would be killed.

One-month-old Peter Weinberger, who was abducted for a $2,000 ransom payment from his home in Long Island, New York, on July 3, 1956; his body was later found in a thicket a half mile from his home, where his kidnapper had abandoned him on the day following the abduction.

Police attempted to blackout the news of the kidnapping by asking the five major New York City daily newspapers to report nothing on the case during negotiations with the kidnapper. All but The New York Daily News complied. Its story of the kidnapping appeared the next day in front page headlines and many criticized the paper's editors as being unconscionable in their ruthless ambition to sell newspapers.

By the time the baby's father, Morris Weinberger, carried the $2,000 ransom money to the designated location near the Weinberger house, reporters were everywhere. Since the Daily News had broken silence, police Secretary John MacDonald released the other papers from their promises. Three reporters were even allowed to accompany the baby's father to the drop-off and watch him from a nearby car. When the kidnapper failed to appear, the parents denounced the newspapers for interfering in the case. Family members later learned that the kidnapper had slowly driven past the pickup site, but failed to retrieve the ransom, when he became frightened at the sight of several reporters and policemen lurking about.

Angelo John LeMarca, who kidnapped and caused the death of the Weinberger baby, and who was identified through the handwriting on the ransom note; he was arrested six weeks after the kidnapping and shortly convicted, dying in Sing Sing's electric chair on August 7, 1958.

The kidnapper was Angelo John LaMarca (1925-58), a 31-year-old truck driver and father of two. He had recently purchased a $15,000 split-level house. Deep in debt, he spontaneously decided to kidnap the baby from the Weinberger home. The day after the kidnapping, LaMarca abandoned Peter Weinberger in a thicket a half-mile from his home in Plainview, Long Island. The infant died from exposure. Meanwhile, the kidnapper continued half-hearted attempts to collect the ransom money.

The mother, Beatrice Weinberger, was instructed to go on the air with television newscaster John K. M. McCaffery, host of the Eleventh Hour. By this time LaMarca had raised the ransom demand to $5,000. Despite Mrs. Weinberger's tearful plea for the baby's safe return, LaMarca did not respond.

At the time of the Weinberger kidnapping, the Lindbergh Kidnapping Law prohibited the FBI from entering the case for fourteen days. As a result of this case, however, President Eisenhower signed federal legislation (the Keating Bill, which was passed by the House of Representatives on July 23, 1956 and ratified by the Senate five days later), reducing the FBI waiting period to twenty-four hours.

Meanwhile, FBI experts began sifting through more than 75,000 signatures of people in the area with police records in an attempt to match their writing to that left on the Weinberger ransom note. FBI field agents expanded the search to probation records and other official documents. The agents finally identified LaMarca as the author of the ransom note through papers on file at the Brooklyn federal district court. On August 22, 1956, LaMarca was arrested at his home.

LaMarca quickly confessed and, on August 24, 1956, led investigators to a thicket adjacent to the Northern State Parkway, where the infant's body was recovered. LeMarca explained that he had lived in constant fear for the lives of his two children. He owed $500 to a juice collector, and needed some fast money to pay off his loan or face reprisals. After making a formal confession, LaMarca was charged with kidnapping and murder. Federal prosecutors withdrew from the case, leaving New York prosecutors to try LaMarca, an act easily interpreted to mean that the kidnapper stood a much better chance of being executed after a conviction in the State of New York.

Angelo LaMarca was, indeed, convicted of kidnapping and felony murder by an all-male jury on December 7, 1956, in the Nassau County Court. The jury did not recommend mercy, making the death penalty mandatory. A week later, Judge Mario Pittoni sentenced him to die in the electric chair. LaMarca appeared downcast but showed no other emotion. He was taken to Sing Sing where, after six stays of execution, he was electrocuted on August 7, 1958.

THE RAPIST-KIDNAPPER/1957-1958

Though he once scored 130 on an I.Q. test (shortly before he was executed) that showed he possessed above average intelligence, Harvery Murray Glatman (AKA: Johnny Glynn; George Williams; 1927-59) was a moral imbecile. Using various ruses, Glatman sexually attacked many females. He also kidnapped, raped and murdered three women, crimes for which he paid with his life in San Quentin's gas chamber.

Born on December 10, 1927, in Denver, Colorado, Glatman was a quiet child deeply attached to his mother. He had one hobby in his formative years, playing with ropes. He became a Boy Scout and became proficient in tying any kind of knot and in rope handicraft. He later stated that "it seems as if I always had a rope in my hands when I was a kid."

Glatman was a model student and never caused problems at home. He was quiet and kept his room orderly. Yet, at the age of twelve, his parents became alarmed when noticing red welts about his neck. His mother later stated: "We noticed one evening, when my husband and I got home [from work], that Harvey's neck was all red with what looked like rope marks." Mrs. Glatman asked her son about it and "he said he went up in the attic, took a rope, tied it around his neck, and tortured himself ... In that way, he got satisfaction."

Harvey Murray Glatman, a professional photographer in Los Angeles, used his occupation to lure the attractive victims he kidnapped, raped and murdered, claiming three (or more) lives within a one-year period.

A family doctor provided some sedatives to give to their son, telling them to "keep him busy. He'll outgrow it." By seventeen, Glatman developed an unusual approach in meeting girls. He was undersized and ugly, with a large, bulbous nose and puffy cheeks. To get the attention of girls he admired, he played the clown, running past them, snatching their purse, laughing in his high-pitched voice and then stop on a dime and hurl the purse back at the startled girl. Mrs. Glatman thought little of such prankish behavior, commenting: "It was just his approach."

Glatman altered his "approach" in 1945, when he accosted a teenage girl in Boulder, Colorado, confronting her one night with a toy girl the girl thought to be very real. Glatman ordered her to take off her clothes. The girl let out a piercing scream and the frightened Glatman ran off. The girl and her parents signed a complaint and Glatman was arrested, then released on bond. While awaiting a court hearing, he fled to

New York, where he promptly committed a robbery, was caught and sent to Sing Sing for five years.

Prison psychiatrists studied Glatman and recognized his abnormal traits. He was under psychiatric care at the time he was released from Sing Sing in April 1951. Glatman vowed to reform. He moved to his parent's home in Denver, Colorado, but, in January 1957, he moved to Los Angeles, where he worked as a television repairman and opened a repair shop. He also became an avid amateur photographer. He lived a quiet bachelor's life, never dated and seldom had anything other than brief conversations with his customers.

One of those customers, blonde-haired, 19-year-old Judy Ann Dull, caused Glatman to have more than a terse conversation with her as he repaired her television set on August 1, 1957. The recently-married young woman told him that she was a professional model and Glatman quickly informed her that he was a freelance photographer and that he had recently been given an assignment by a New York detective magazine to photograph attractive young women in distress. "You know," Glatman told Dull, "the usual bound and gagged stuff."

Mrs. Dull agreed to pose for Glatman, especially after he stated that he would be paying her a top modeling fee. When she got into Glatman's car, however, she was startled to see him produce a gun, which he trained on her, while he drove one-handed to his apartment. There he repeatedly raped Mrs. Dull, then tied and gagged her. He then photographed the terrified young woman in her underwear as she strained against the bonds, terror evident in her eyes.

Carrying the woman to his car, he threw her onto the back seat and drove into the desert, 125 miles east of Los Angeles, stopping near the small town of Indio. He dumped the girl onto a barren stretch of desert and took more photographs of her. He then decided to kill Mrs. Dull because "she could identify me later." He produced a thick, short rope, his favorite Lured by a promising modeling job in which she would reportedly pose for bound-and-gagged detective magazine photos, Judy Ann Dull, nineteen and newly married, was kidnapped, raped and murdered by Glatman in August 1957.

A terrified Judy Ann Dull was photographed by Glatman before he raped and killed her; he then put her body into the trunk of his car and drove 125 miles east of Los Angeles to bury the corpse in a shallow grave near Indio, California.

Shirley Ann Bridgeford, a 30-year-old divorcee, also posed for Glatman, who kidnapped, raped and murdered her on the night of March 7, 1958.

Ruth Rita Mercado, age twenty-four, a part-time model and stripper in Los Angeles, who was raped and murdered by Glatman on July 22, 1958.

and one he carried with him at all times and looped this around the woman's neck, strangling her to death with it. He placed the body in a shallow grave, covered it up, then drove back to Los Angeles.

In December 1957, two hitchhikers saw the bleached bones of Judy Ann Dull a few feet from the roadway. Wind had swept away the sand covering her remains and had exposed what remained of the corpse. Investigators found no clues and could not identify the remains. Meanwhile, Glatman developed the photos he had taken of Mrs. Dull and plastered these on the walls of his bedroom. Then he went looking for his next victim. He met 30-year-old Shirley Ann Bridgeford, a divorcee from Sun Valley, California.

Telling Mrs. Bridgeford that he was a plumber, Glatman asked her out on a date, telling her that he would take her dancing at "a swanky supper club." On the night of March 7, 1958, Glatman called for the woman at her apartment. She appeared in a semi-formal dress, since she expected to be going to an upperclass dancing club. Glatman drove toward the Anza-Borrego Desert, a state park about fifty-five miles east of San Diego. The long distance alarmed Mrs. Bridgeford, but Glatman assured her that they would arrive at the club soon, even though it was "out a ways."

Then Glatman employed the same procedure he had applied to Mrs. Dull. He later told investigators: "I decided I would kill her the same way I killed Judy. I used the pictures to tie her up without alarming her." Apparently, Mrs. Bridgeford agreed to pose for some detective magazine shots, but after she was tied, Glatman raped her several times. He took pictures of her and then strangled her with his "favorite" rope. He did not bother to bury the body this time, leaving the corpse to rot beneath a cactus plant.

Glatman's next victim made it easy for him. On July 22, 1958, he was scanning the personal ads in a Los Angeles newspaper and noticed an insertion placed by 24-year-old Ruth Rita Mercado, a model and part-time stripper in Los Angeles. Miss Mercado's ad stated that she was looking for modeling work. Glatman called her phone number and told her he was a photographer with some magazine assignments, saying she could "make some good money" for only a few hours' work. Mercado invited Glatman to her apartment.

Once Mercado allowed Glatman into her home, he produced a gun, forcing her to disrobe. He repeatedly raped her and, allowing her to wear only a slip, he kidnapped her, taking her into the desert, where he tied her up and photographed her. Glatman did not immediately murder Mercado. For some reason, he thought he might spare her. He waited until nightfall. He told detectives later: "Late that night, I decided to kill her. She was the one I really liked. I didn't want to kill her. I used the same rope, the same way."

Within a year's time, Harvey Murray Glatman had murdered three attractive young women and had littered the desert with their bodies, all of which were discovered. Police, realizing that all three victims had been murdered in the same manner, came to believe that they were looking for a madman, but they had no clues whatsoever by which to identify or track him down. Glatman himself realized that the police were not on his trail; he avidly read all the newspaper reports about his murders which stated that investigators had "little or nothing to go on."

Feeling free to continue his kidnapping-murder binge, Glatman next selected 20-year-old Joanne Arena as his next victim. The French model agreed to pose for some pinup shots, but she refused to go anywhere alone with Glatman. She said she would drive her own car and bring a friend along at the photo shoot. Glatman made some excuse to postpone the photo session, realizing that Arena was too smart for him. The girl's caution undoubtedly saved her life. "I'm not so dumb," she later told police when Glatman was finally in custody. "You know, I think he wanted to kill me ... I knew it even then."

Glatman by then boldly placed ads in newspapers for attractive models to pose for him. An attractive brunette, 28-year-old Lorraine Vigil, replied. Glatman picked her up on October 28, 1958, and told her that he would drive her to his studio, using the same kidnapping ruse as he had employed on other victims. But when he began to leave Los Angeles on the Santa Ana Freeway, Vigil became alarmed, screaming for him to turn around and take her home.

The kidnapper pulled his car onto the shoulder of the Freeway, pulled out his .32-caliber pistol and pointed it at her. He then attempted to tie her wrists with one hand, but had difficulty when she began to struggle. Vigil later told investigators: "I knew he was going to kill me. I tried to plead, but I knew that pleading wouldn't do any good." She decided to fight for her life and lunged at the kidnapper. "He wasn't very clever," Vigil said. "I grabbed his gun."

In the struggle, a shot went off, wounding Vigil in the thigh, but she would not give up the fight. The courageous woman held onto the gun, training it on Glatman. He dove at her, wrestling her from the car, both bouncing onto the roadway, kicking and punching each other. Vigil got to a sitting position and leveled the pistol at Glatman, who stood up, holding his strangling rope. "If you come any closer, I'll kill you," Vigil promised. Glatman hesitated, staring down at the gun pointed at him.

A state policeman cruising the freeway saw the couple on the shoulder of the road and pulled over. He spotted the gun held by Vigil and realized that Glatman, rope still in hand, was about to attack the girl. He withdrew his own weapon and fired a shot into the air. Glatman, who had had his back to the officer, froze, then turned around, smiled and dropped the rope.

Glatman, in custody an hour later, began to freely admit his kidnappings and murders to detectives, bragging: "If I wanted to, I could have killed that highway patrolman, who arrested me, but I gave up the ghost." He then spewed out a repugnant litany of his many crimes, dwelling upon the most perverse aspects, as if relishing his sordid memories of the naive women he had victimized.

Harvey Murray Glatman, shown en route to his trial; he asked for the death penalty and his request was granted when he was put to death in San Quentin's gas chamber on September 18, 1959.

While Glatman was under arrest, a police search of his apartment uncovered the photographs of his victims and articles of their clothing and personal belongings, which Glatman had kept as souvenirs. Friends of three of the victims identified Glatman in a police lineup and he officially confessed to several kidnappings, rapes and murders. In Decameter 1958, Glatman pled guilty in court to two murders (Bridgeford and Mercado). He asked for the death penalty. Glatman was granted his wish and died in the gas chamber at San Quentin on September 18, 1959.

FRANCE'S PLAYBOY KIDNAPPERS/ April 12, 1960

Author Lionel White's obscure mystery novel The Snatchers, published in 1953, inspired two minor French hoodlums to hatch a kidnapping-for-ransom scheme on April 12, 1960. A convicted car thief and smuggler named Pierre-Marie Larcher (AKA: Beau Serge; b.1923) came across the paperback translation of the White novel while hiding as an escaped fugitive. In an abandoned farmhouse near the tiny village of Grisy-les Platres, the stocky hoodlum read the novel, and was inspired.

Larcher decided that the kidnapping racket was a good one for an enterprising crook such as himself. So he rushed back to Paris with the book in hand to show his young associate, 24-year-old Raymond Rolland (AKA: Raymond de Beaufort; b. 1936). "Here's a good way to make money," Larcher gushed. "This would solve our problems!"

For the dashing young Rolland, who imagined himself in a world of glamorous women, jet-setting celebrities, and fast cars, the prospect of gleaning a huge ransom from a kidnapping was appealing. The reality of his drab existence never measured up to the standards he had set for himself early in life. Rolland was born in an economically deprived region in Brittany.

Following his discharge from military service, Rolland adopted a more debonair-sounding name, one that was more to his effete tastes: "Raymond de Beaufort." He rented a third-floor walk-up apartment in Paris. It was a modest surrounding to be sure, but Rolland had high hopes. He promised to build a mighty factory and provide employment for all of his school chums one day. "No matter how high I rise, I shall never forget you," he said.

Eric Peugeot, the 4-year-old son of the French millionaire car manufacturer, is shown with his mother after his kidnappers collected a ransom of fifty million francs and released the boy at the entrance of a Paris nightclub.

The factory, of course, never got built. Rolland spent much of his time lounging in Parisian cafes and nightclubs, supporting his profligate lifestyle through smuggling and money-laundering deals. In Copenhagen, he seduced a woman named Ingelise Bodin, who had represented Denmark in London's 1960 Miss World Contest. With his devilishly good looks, easy manner, and air of mystery, he easily took in Miss Denmark.

Larcher and Rolland agreed that the kidnapping techniques perfected by the Americans years earlier were perfect for them. The only issue left on the table was the choice of a victim. After poring over the French social register Bottin Mondain, they at last settled on 4-year-old Eric Peugeot, grandson of Jean-Pierre Peugeot, the 63-year-old head of the French auto dynasty, who was then estimated to be worth $40 million. The kidnappers carefully studied the habits of the family before kidnapping Eric Peugeot on April 12, 1960.

That afternoon, Jean-Pierre Peugeot was playing golf at the St. Cloud Country Club, leaving his grandchildren in the care of a governess. Eric and his brother, Jean-Philippe, were playing happily in the sandbox, when the maid returned to the car to retrieve her coat. Realizing his chance, the kidnapper (it was not later known if this was Larcher or Rolland) approached the boys. "Come," he said, motioning to Eric. The boy was led through the garden and down an alley into a waiting black getaway car, ironically a Peugeot 403 sedan. A typewritten ransom note that aped author White's literary style was left behind. "You are a member of the filthy rich. You must cough up 50 million francs if you ever want to see the kid alive again," it read.

The child was taken to a farmhouse in Grisy-les Platres, where he was placed under the supervision of Larcher's 19-year-old girlfriend, Rolande Niemezyk. Meanwhile, the kidnappers negotiated with the family. A second letter was sent, and two telephone calls were placed to the father, Roland Peugeot, communicating instructions.

The tearful father went on public television to plead for his son's safety. "Everyone who has children and loves them will understand me," he said. "I have not brought charges and have asked that the kidnappers not be trailed." Peugeot followed their instructions to the letter. He met Rolland in a darkened alley near the Arch of Triumph three nights after his son's abduction. After hearing the predetermined password "keep the key," Roland Peugeot dropped the satchel and turned and walked away. Late that night the scared boy turned up on the doorstep of a popular nightclub adjacent to the drop site. Eric Peugeot was returned to his parents in good health minutes later.

The French Surete took over the case at this point, commencing one of the widest manhunts in French history. Detectives pursued sketchy leads in France, Turkey, the U.S., and Spain. They checked the registration papers on 1,500 Peugeot automobiles and followed up on some 2,000 leads, but the trail was cold.

Not until six months later, when an anonymous tipster contacted Interpol headquarters in Paris, were the French authorities able to identify a viable suspect. The informer told Interpol that two men named Larcher and Rolland were living beyond their means. Neither held a job, and one could only wonder where their money came from. Rolland's ex-wife, Ginette, told police that Rolland had borrowed a Hermes typewriter, but had neglected to return it. The type face was found to be identical to letters on the ransom notes sent by the kidnappers.

Officers from the Surete trailed Rolland and Larcher to the resort town of Megeve, near the Swiss border in February 1961. There they found the two fast-moving playboys entertaining girlfriends in lavish style. Rolland had rented an eleven-room suite that he shared with Larcher and a medical student friend, Jean-Simon Rotman. One puzzling aspect to this case was the presence of the Peugeots and little Eric at the chalet. The kidnappers and their victim frequently passed each other in the streets and restaurants. Larcher called it a comedic episode. "I've always had a taste for risks," he joked.

Raymond Rolland was arrested with Ingelise Bodin in the hotel room they shared, and their carefree days of visiting nightclubs and going on skiing holidays abruptly ended. Larcher and his girlfriend were picked up later on a road to Paris. Roland Peugeot identified Rolland as the man he had passed the ransom money to near the Arch of Triumph, which helped close the case against the suspects. French detectives grilled Rolland for forty-five consecutive hours. At one point, he collapsed in exhaustion. Revived with smelling salts, Rolland confessed to the kidnapping under the relentless interrogation of the police. The Hermes typewriter, he explained, could be found on the murky bottom of the Seine.

The headquarters of Interpol in Paris, where an informant gave information to investigators that led to the arrest of Peugeot's abductors.

Skindivers plunged into the icy river and located the machine, where the kidnapper said it would be. The remaining $11,500 of the ransom money was found in a locked trunk in Larcher's apartment. Armed with this impressive array of evidence, the case went to trial at the Versailles Criminal Court in Paris in October 1962. Larcher and Rolland were each convicted and sentenced to twenty years in prison, the maximum under French law for the crime of kidnapping. Jean Verdier, the head of the Surete Nationale, rejoiced in the news, for he had won his bet with J. Edgar Hoover of the American FBI, who had predicted that the Peugeot kidnappers would never be apprehended.

THE GIRL IN THE BOX/ December 17, 1968

The only significant crime ever committed by Gary Steven Krist (b.1942), was the kidnapping of wealthy heiress Barbara Jane Mackle in 1968, but, like all of the petty crimes he had earlier committed, he botched the job and was quickly apprehended. A native of Pelican, Alaska, where his family operated a small shrimp processing firm, Krist stole a boat at age fourteen and later ran off to Utah, where he committed a string of petty thefts that resulted in a one-year sentence in the Utah State Industrial School at Ogden. Krist escaped, but was recaptured a few weeks later on July 29, 1961.

Upon his release, Krist moved to California, where he began stealing autos in Alameda County. Caught and convicted for two car thefts, Krist, then eighteen, was sent to the state vocational school at Tracy, California. He was released on December 4, 1964, and immediately committed more auto thefts. After stealing two cars from a sales lot in San Mateo, California, Krist was arrested on January 6, 1966. He was convicted for these thefts on May 20, 1966, and was sentenced to six months to five years in the state prison. Krist, however, escaped on November 11, 1966, and resolved to develop another criminal pursuit—kidnapping.

While grifting his way about the country, Krist encountered Ruth Eisemann-Schier (b.1942), a 26-year-old exchange student from Honduras, who had graduated from the Marine Science Institute in Miami and who was working as a biological researcher. She shared Krist's dark dream of obtaining a great fortune through a spectacular crime and helped him research potential victims of considerable wealth. They selected Barbara Mackle, a 20-year-old student at Emory College in Atlanta. whose father was a millionaire land developer in Florida.

Barbara Jane Mackle, photographed in her underground grave before her kidnappers buried her alive on December 17, 1968. The grave was equipped with ventilation pipes, a fan and a battery-powered light.

While driving home for the holidays to Miami, Florida, with her mother, Jane Mackle, Barbara Jane Mackle came down with the flu. The two women stopped at an Atlanta motel on December 17, 1968, to rest before driving to Miami the next day. At 4 a.m., Krist, claiming to be a police officer investigating an accident, knocked on their motel room door. When Mrs. Mackle answered, she was greeted by a chloroform-soaked rag. While her mother was left unconscious, Barbara Mackle was abducted by Krist and Eisemann-Schier. Still wearing her flannel nightgown, she was driven twenty-two miles outside of Atlanta to a wooded area.

Krist placed her in an eight-by-three-by-two-foot box buried eighteen inches below the ground, equipped with ventilation pipes, a fan, and a battery-powered light. He also provided her with water and sleeping pills. One hour after Mackle was abducted, her father, Robert F. Mackle, received a phone call at his home in Coral Gables, Florida, demanding a $500,000 ransom. Details for the ransom dropoff were outlined in a note buried in the front yard of the Mackle home, specifying that the money be paid in old $20 bills.

Mackle placed an ad in a Miami newspaper on December 18, 1968, which stated in code that he was ready to make delivery of the ransom money. Following instructions from Krist, Mackle, on the night of December 19, groped his way along a causeway on Biscayne Bay that led to uninhabited Fair Isle. He carried the ransom in a suitcase, but lost his way in the darkness and arrived an hour late at the drop site. Mackle received a call a short time later from Krist, telling him that the ransom delivery was confirmed and that his daughter would be in safe hands within a short time.

The police had not been involved in the negotiations with the kidnapper, yet Krist's careful plans were upset by a policeman routinely patrolling the drop site area. At the moment Krist retrieved the suitcase containing the ransom, the patrolman spotted him and thought he was a thief. The cop gave chase and Krist, following a wild pursuit, abandoned his car and fled on foot, making his escape with the ransom. On the night of December 20, 1968, the FBI field office in Atlanta, Georgia, received a call from Krist that told agents where to find the buried Barbara Mackle. She was located after having been buried alive for eighty-three hours, and was found alive and well.

The clue-ridden car abandoned by Krist, however, soon revealed to police the identities of Krist and Eisemann-Schier.

While still at large, Gary Steven Krist and Ruth Eisemann-Schier were charged with the kidnapping and both were put on the FBI's Top Ten Wanted list, Eisemann-Schier being the first woman ever to be put on that list. Krist was also wanted for both interstate flight to avoid prosecution from an automobile theft charge and escape from a California prison.

Krist and Eisemann-Schier separated, with Krist buying a speedboat, thinking to escape the Florida area by water. The boat was spotted by a Coast Guard helicopter, which followed it to Hog Island in Charleston Harbor, where Krist fled on foot. He was captured on December 22, 1968, only five days after the kidnapping, by Sheriff Richard McLeod. All but $20,000 of the ransom money was found in the kidnapper's abandoned speedboat. Krist had reportedly given the $20,000 to Eisemann-Schier when he brushed her off, keeping the rest of the ransom money for himself. Krist was held on a $500,000 bond while awaiting trial. He and Eisemann-Schier, who was still at large, were charged on January 3, 1969, with kidnapping in Georgia, then a capital crime demanding the death penalty.

On March 5, 1969, the elusive Eisemann-Schier was captured in Norman, Oklahoma. She had applied for a nursing job under the alias of "Donna Wills," but a routine fingerprint check mandated on the hiring of all nursing applicants, soon identified her as Ruth Eisemann-Schier. She was arrested and extradited to Georgia, where she and Krist were tried separately. Krist was convicted on state kidnapping charges on May 16, 1969, and was sentenced to life imprisonment. He was spared the death penalty because he had made an effort to save his victim's life by telling FBI agents where Mackle could be found and rescued.

Eisemann-Schier pleaded guilty on kidnapping charges on May 19, 1969 and received a seven-year prison sentence. Upon her release, she was deported to her native Honduras, as was stipulated in her sentence. Krist, meanwhile, began serving his life sentence while investigators launched searches for the bodies of four persons he claimed to have murdered in Alaska, Utah and California.

While awaiting trial, Krist had reportedly told fellow prisoners and guards that he had committed these murders years earlier, but Krist was never charged for these homicides in that he refused to corroborate the statements of others regarding these deaths, which Krist's attorneys dismissed as hearsay. Further, investigators learned that Krist, at least on one occasion, was in prison at the time one of these victims was murdered.

On May 13, 1979, the Georgia Board of Pardons paroled Krist a move that was supported by Barbara Jane Mackle. He returned to his family's home in Pelican, Alaska, to take over the family shrimping business. He resurfaced in 2002, when investigative journalists announced that, in October 2001, Krist had moved to the Midwest and, incredibly, had obtained a medical license as a doctor working in Chrisney, Indiana, about thirty-five miles east of Evansville. Unlike many other states, Indiana does not prohibit convicted felons from obtaining a medical license.

It was learned that Krist had received medical training at schools in Grenada and Dominica. Upon receiving his medical degree, Krist applied for a medical license in Alabama, but the state rejected his application. Indiana accepted his application, but gave Krist a "probationary" license, which required him to undergo a psychiatric evaluation, submit monthly reports on his medical practice and appear before Indiana's medical licensing board every six months. The state's controlled substance advisory board prohibited Krist from writing prescriptions for narcotic drugs.

Krist, who had earlier written a self-aggrandizing book in which he portrayed himself as the victim in the Mackle kidnapping case, lashed out at the reporters who exposed his medical practice in Indiana. He refused all interviews, but angrily stated: "Ambush journalists inflicting pain on people who are trying to do the right thing are almost as shameful as Osama bin Laden."

The kidnapper-turned-physician had nothing to say about the young woman he had buried alive, a nightmare experience vividly portrayed in Gene Miller's book, 83 Hours to Dawn. Miller, who had covered the case for the Miami Herald at that time, summed up the girl's state of terror through Mackle's own recollection: "I screamed and screamed. The sound of the dirt [being shoveled onto her buried box by Krist] got farther and farther away. Finally, I couldn't hear anything above. I screamed for a long time after that." At this writing, Barbara Jane Mackle, 54, is happily married and lives on Florida's east coast. She had no comment on Krist's new vocation as a doctor. Mackle's mother, Jane, 85, lives in a condo in Key Biscayne.

Kidnapper Gary Steven Krist, left, manacled to a waist-belt, is shown after his capture following a spectacular motorboat chase on December 22, 1968. He was spared the death penalty because he provided information that saved his victim's life.

THE MISTAKEN IDENTITY ABDUCTION/ December 29, 1969

Brothers Arthur Hosein (AKA: King Hosein, b.1936) and Nizamodeen Hosein (AKA: Nizam; b.1948) were poor immigrants from Trinidad, who settled in England. Arthur, a tailor, arrived in September 1955, with the grand ambition of someday making £1 million. In 1967, he and his German-born wife, Else, bought Rooks Farm, consisting of ten acres outside the village of Stocking Pelham. Nizamodeen arrived in May 1969 on a visit with his papers marked for a January 1970 expiration date.

On October 3, 1969, kidnapping for ransom apparently occurred to the Hosein brothers as they watched David Frost interview Australian media tycoon Rupert Murdoch on television. Murdoch lived in London with his wife Anna. Arthur, thirty-four, and Nizamodeen, twenty-two, decided to seize Anna Murdoch and hold her for a £1 million ransom.

Slowly the plan took shape. They identified the Murdochs' Rolls-Royce and followed the car home. What they did not know was that the Murdochs were in Australia on vacation and had entrusted the car to Alick McKay, deputy chairman of the News of the World. McKay lived on Arthur Road in Wimbledon. In the midst of the preparation for the kidnapping, Arthur's wife, who was not a conspirator, left to spend Christmas in Germany.

On December 29, 1969, the Hoseins mistakenly grabbed 56-year-old Muriel Frieda McKay, the wife of the deputy chairman. She was taken to Rooks Farm and blindfolded, while the Hoseins made contact with the family. A letter postmarked from the north of London contained a written message from the kidnappers and an urgent plea from Mrs. McKay: "Please do something to get me home. I am blindfolded and cold. Please cooperate for I cannot keep going. I think of you constantly and the family and friends. What have I done to deserve this treatment?"

The kidnappers called the family repeatedly in the next few weeks and demanded £1 million. Arthur Hosein called his two-man abduction team "Mafia Group 3," or "M-3." Nothing more was heard from them in the first two weeks of 1970. The calls resumed on January 14, as the police vainly checked all available records, but there was little evidence and nothing prior was known about the M-3 group.

A letter dated January 26 warned that Mrs. McKay would be executed if the money was not paid. During the first attempt to collect the ransom, the Hoseins had seen police in the area and the rendezvous was aborted. A second unsuccessful attempt was Muriel Frieda McKay, who was abducted by kidnappers thinking that she was the wife of media tycoon, Rupert Murdoch, on December 29, 1969l her body was never found.

The remote home of Muriel and Aleck McKay in Wimbledon, England, where Mrs. McKay was abducted, her kidnappers demanding a £1 million ransom for her safe return.

Kidnapper Arthur Hosein, who was convicted of blackmail and abducting and murdering Muriel McKay; he was sent to prison for life, plus twenty-five years.

Kidnapper Nizamodeen Hosein, was sent to prison for life, following his conviction for blackmail, kidnapping and murder. Fifteen years was added to his life term.

made on February 6, 1970, at Bishop's Stortford in Essex. The Hosein brothers circled the area in their Volvo, but they thought police were in the area, so they drove off without retrieving the money.

This time, though, the police observed the car and checked the license plates. The detectives went immediately to Rooks Farm, but there was no trace of Muriel McKay. Incriminating items were found, and the brothers were found and arrested. They refused to say anything about the location of Muriel McKay. It was presumed that the woman had been executed, and her remains cut up and fed to the livestock at Rooks Farm. A neighbor testified that she had heard a gunshot on or about New Year's Day. The pigs had been sold or butchered by then, however, making forensic investigation all but impossible.

The Hoseins were convicted of blackmail, kidnapping, and murder at the Old Bailey. Justice Sebag Shaw sentenced them both to life imprisonment for murder, tacking on an additional twenty-five years for Arthur and fifteen for Nizamodeen. In passing sentence Shaw noted, "The kidnapping and detention of Mrs. McKay was cold-blooded and abominable," and the punishment must be sanguine so that law-abiding citizens will be safe in their homes."

CHINA'S MOST NOTORIOUS KIDNAPPER/ 1970s-199Os

Cheung Tze-keung (AKA: Big Spender; 1953-1998) was the most notorious gangster in Hong Kong. Cheung Tze-keung, who headed a mob of more than fifty hardened criminals, had been committing hundreds of major crimes for two decades since the early 1970s. The crimes included gun-running, robbing gold stores, stealing more than 277 tons of steel (with at least one person killed during this heist), smuggling dynamite, and, chiefly, widespread kidnappings of wealthy Hong Kong residents. The most sensational of the crimes netted Cheung and his associates a record-setting ransom of $210 million for the return of two Hong Kong real estate tycoons.

Cheung Tze-keung began his criminal career in Hong Kong in his early twenties, forming a gang of burglars and robbers. The gang, under Cheung's close direction, hijacked enormous amounts of goods and fenced these shipments to glean millions of dollars. Gheung bought up legitimate businesses, which he then used as fronts for his criminal operations. He also purchased several mansions in Hong Kong, which he lavishly decorated.

Always accompanied by an army of heavily-armed bodyguards, Cheung dined at the finest restaurants and patronized the most expensive bordellos in Hong Kong, where he was known to prostitutes as "Big Spender," because of the huge tips he gave the women servicing him. By the early 1990s, Cheung planned and executed dozens of high-profiled robberies, including the robbery of the Guardforce Security Company armored car at Kai Tak Airport in 1991. He was accused of masterminding this spectacular robbery and brought to trial. Convicted, he was sentenced to eighteen years in prison, but Big Spender Cheung continued to direct his underworld operations from his lavishly-appointed cell. In 1995, he was released from prison on a technicality.

After conducting twenty years of widespread kidnapping in Hong Kong, the crafty gangster Cheung Tze-keung (AKA: Big Spender), left, is shown at his 1998 trial in mainland China, listening to his death sentence; he was executed on December 5, 1998.

Cheung immediately planned several more kidnappings. On May 23, 1996, his gang members abducted Victor Li Tzar-Kuoi, son of Li Ka-shing, one of the wealthiest residents of Hong Kong. On September 29, Cheung's goons kidnapped Walter Kwok Ping-sheung, chairman of the Sun Hung Kai Properties Company. The ransoms paid to Cheung for these two kidnappings amounted to a stagging $210 million, the largest ransoms ever paid to that time. It was reported that Cheung was able to successfully complete these kidnappings with the aid of high-ranking politicians and corrupt police officials, who shared in the enormous ransom payoffs.

Thought to be above Hong Kong law, Cheung's criminal empire toppled when the British released its century-old authority over Hong Kong to Communist China in July 1997. Unable to flee Hong Kong (no other country would permit him to immigrate), Cheung went into hiding, but he was tracked down by Communist agents and arrested. Cheung and seventeen of his Hong Kong gang, along with eighteen other gang associates on the mainland, were taken to the mainland city of Guangzhou, where they were tried and convicted of dozens of crimes in a closed-door trial. Communist policemen wearing bullet-proof vests and carrying submachine guns ringed the courtroom where Cheung and his men were being tried.

On November 12, 1998, Cheung was sentenced to death for cross-border crimes, including kidnapping and arms smuggling. Critics complained that China had no real right to try Cheung and that he should have been brought to trial in Hong Kong, where no death penalty exists. The rest of Cheung's gang received either death sentences or lengthy prison terms.

On December 5, 1998, the 45-year-old Cheung was taken from a cell in Guangzhou and into a "death room." Big Spender was then unceremoniously shot and killed with a bullet fired into the back of his head. Cheung, who was executed immediately after losing his brief appeal, was allowed a last wish, a final visit from his 4-year-old and 7-year-old sons.

Four of his henchmen met the same fate after a hearing that lasted only ninety minutes. Two others who had been sentenced to death won two-year reprieves, while twenty-nine others began serving long prison terms. The executions of these known criminals still raised serious questions about jurisdiction between China and Hong Kong. Since taking over the former British Crown colony, China, as expected, imposed its Communist dictatorship on all levels of Hong Kong society, including the mandating of jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases as its secret tribunals decree. It was speculated that had Cheung and his gang members been tried in Hong Kong, no death penalties would have been imposed.

THE ABDUCTION OF GENE PAUL GETTY II/ June 10, 1973

The grandson of J. Paul Getty, the richest man in the world, once confessed to a girlfriend that the only way to raise money to support his Bohemian lifestyle was to fake his own kidnapping. The offhanded remark was made by Gene Paul Getty II (b.1956), to a 24-year-old West German woman named Martine Zacher. Getty's words took on new significance when he mysteriously disappeared in the early morning hours of June 10, 1973, while on his way to purchase a newspaper and a comic book.

Getty, the grandson of the famous American oil-billionaire, was known as the "golden hippie" for his gypsy lifestyle in Rome's Trastevere and Piazza Navona sections. His mother, a former actress, Gail Harris, at first refused to cooperate with Italian police, fearing recriminations at the hands of the gang, who demanded a ransom payment of $17 million for the safe return of her son.

Speaking from London, the boy's grandfather announced

Billionaire J. Paul Getty, reportedly the richest man on earth, allegedly paid a $2.9 million ransom for the return of his kidnapped grandson, who was abducted on June 10, 1973.

To prove that Getty's kidnapping was genuine, his abductors cut off the boy's right ear and photographed him after the mutilation, sending this photo to a Rome newspaper; this gruesome "evidence" convinced J. Paul Getty, Sr., that his grandson had, indeed, been kidnapped and prompted him to pay the enormous ransom demanded by the abductors.

Mrs. Gail Harris Getty, mother of the kidnapped Getty heir, telling a newsman that she had received no positive word as to her son's fate at the hands of kidnappers; she was at the time divorced from J. Paul Getty, Jr., and had reportedly begged her former father-in-law, J. Paul Getty, Sr., to pay the huge ransom demanded for her son's safe return.

Gene Paul Getty IV, known as "The Golden Hippie," is shown, left, with an Italian police officer, following his release by Mafia kidnappers, who had held him captive for five months, until the enormous ransom was paid by his grandfather; the senior Getty initially stalled the payment, wrongly thinking that the kidnapping might be a staged abduction.

Gene Paul Getty IV, right, is shown with his mother, Mrs. Gail Harris, in Rome, following the boy's release; "The Golden Hippie," continued his drug-addiction in later years, which resulted in paralysis and blindness.

Giuseppe Lamanna, ringleader of the Calabrian Mafia gang that kidnapped Gene Paul Getty IV, and the man who cut off the boy's ear; Lamanna, shown in custody in 1974, was sentenced to sixteen years in prison in 1976.

that he would not pay the extortion, adding that it would only encourage kidnappers. "If I pay one penny now, I'll have fourteen kidnapped grandchildren," he said. Four months passed. Getty's abductors then cut off his ear and sent it to the family on October 21, 1973 to demonstrate that the kidnapping was not a hoax.

The grandfather was forced to negotiate. He dispatched Fletcher Chase, his 54-year-old business associate, to Rome with 52,000 banknotes of lire, (the three billion lire, $3.4 million in U.S. currency, weighed close to a ton on delivery) each one carefully microfilmed by Italian police. Following the kidnappers' instructions, Chase drove a rented car southward past Naples. Outside the village of Lagonegro, a Citroen automobile pulled up alongside.

The occupants of the car rolled down the windows and began pelting Chase's vehicle with small pebbles as a sign to pull over. While the ransom money was being passed a third car pulled off to the side of the road. A man and a woman pretending to be tourists eyeballed the kidnappers and drove back to Rome to provide an accurate description to police. Getty was then released, after five months of imprisonment.

Eight members of the Calabrian Mafia were later identified as the kidnappers. Just after Getty was released on December 15, 1973, Italian police stepped up efforts to bring the gang into custody. In early January 1974, the police closed in on the tiny village of Cicala located in the mountainous regions of Calabria in the southern tip of Italy.

In a daring predawn raid, they seized Antonio Mancuso, thirty-five; Domenico Barbino, a 26-year-old hospital orderly, who knew Getty from the hippie community in Rome; Vincenzo Mammoliti, forty-three; Gioia Tauro; Saverio Mammoliti; Giuseppe Lamanna; Antonio Femia; and Girolamo "Momo" Piromalli, fifty-eight, the top-ranking Mafia boss in Calabria. A 137-page indictment filed by Lagonegro District Attorney Maurizio Rossi dismissed any lingering suspicions that Getty staged his own abduction. The ransom money obtained by the kidnappers, Rossi stated, was to be used to finance a drug-running operation.

On July 29, 1976, Lamanna was sentenced to sixteen years in prison after being identified as the knife-wielding assailant who cut off Getty's ear. Antonio Mancuso, the only other defendant to go to jail, received eight years. The seven remaining defendants were acquitted for lack of evidence. Gene Paul Getty II continued his lavish lifestyle, his drug addiction increasing until he overdosed on a combination of drugs and alcohol that left him a paraplegic and almost blind.

THE KIDNAPPING OF REG MURPHY/ February 20, 1974

Posing as a benefactor for the needy, William August Helm Williams (AKA: Lamont Woods; Colonel One; b.1940) visited the editor of the Atlanta Constitution, John R. "Reg" Murphy, on February 20, 1974 at the editor's home. The 25-year-old Williams introduced himself as a wealthy Georgian named "Lamont Woods." He persuaded the 40-year-old editor to accompany him to his home in an Atlanta suburb to obtain goods for a charity, telling Murphy that he had 300,000 gallons of heating oil he wanted to donate to the poor and that he wanted to receive proper coverage for his charitable donation from the media, chiefly Murphy's newspaper, The Atlanta Constitution.

After the editor got into the car, Williams flashed a gun and informed the newspaperman that he had been kidnapped by a representative of the American Revolutionary Army and that he was its ranking officer, "Colonel One." Murphy was bound, blindfolded, and forced into the trunk of the car, and then taken to a house, where he was forced to make ransom tapes.

The next day, the editor called a lawyer with the $700,000

John R. "Reg" Murphy, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, is shown in his office shortly before he was kidnapped from his home on February 20, 1974, by an abductor claiming to be a charity donor seeking publicity.

A haggard Reg Murphy is shown with family members at a press conference only hours after his release by his abductor on February 22, 1974.

Kidnapper William August Helm Williams (AKA: "Colonel One"), is shown handcuffed and under arrest two days after he had abducted editor Reg Murphy; he was sent to prison for forty years. His wife, Betty, got probation.

FBI agents are shown counting the $700,000 ransom money retrieved from the home of the kidnapper in Lilburn, Georgia. This was one of the largest ransoms ever paid in U.S. history.

ransom demand. Murphy and Williams stayed in a hotel the second night, and on February 22, the two drove around for several hours before the abductor then picked up the ransom money, which was delivered by Murphy's managing editor, Jim Minter. Shortly afterward, Williams released the editor.

Acting on a tip, police arrested Williams and his wife, Betty Ruth Williams, at their home in Lilburn, Georgia, on February 23, 1974 and recovered the ransom money. In custody, Williams, a self-employed contractor, admitted that the militia group he had claimed to represent was fictitious. Murphy had no kind words for his kidnapper, saying that Williams was "just plain mean as hell."

Williams tried to defend his bold kidnapping through an insanity plea, claiming that he had been mentally unstable at the time of Murphy's abduction. Further, he claimed that he had been abused as a child—one of the oldest defense ploys by criminals—and that he had conducted his crime while in a drugged state in that he had consumed a number of amphetamines before seizing Murphy.

On August 4, 1974, he was convicted on charges of extorting $700,000 from the newspaper, using the mails for the ransom demand, and using a firearm. On December 21, 1976, Williams, thirty-six, was sentenced to a total of forty years in prison, twenty years for extortion and ten years each for the firearm and mail charges, all to be served consecutively. His 28-year-old wife, Betty Ruth Williams, was convicted of failing to report Williams' crimes. She was given a three-year suspended sentence with probation.

Williams was paroled nine years later in February 1984 from a federal prison, after having served the statutory ten-year minimum sentence, but with strict instructions to stay out of the state of Georgia. When that requirement lapsed, Williams returned to Georgia, remarried, became a born-again Christian and obtained a legitimate job.

KIDNAPPINGS IN "MURDER MACK"/1979

Two young men with deep criminal backgrounds conceived the vicious idea of kidnapping, torturing, raping and murdering teenage girls while both were inmates of the California's Men Colony in San Luis Obispo in 1978. One was Lawrence Sigmond Bittaker, who was serving time for assault with a deadly weapon. The other was convicted rapist Roy Lewis Norris, born on February 2, 1948 in Greeley, Colorado. Norris was a drug addict, who had been convicted of several rapes and rape attempts and was diagnosed by prison psychiatrists as having "psychological problems," and a "severe schizoid personality."

Both men planned, upon their release, to join together in kidnapping, raping and killing teenage girls "for fun," Norris later said. They planned to kidnap and kill at least one girl from each "teen" age, from thirteen to nineteen, these attacks to be taped or filmed. Norris apparently pinpointed the locale, where these attacks were to be made, the Redondo Beach area, where countless teenage girls gathered, and where Norris had earlier strangled into semi-consciousness a 27-year-old woman and dragged her into some bushes, raping her.

Shortly after his parole on November 15, 1978, Bittaker acquired a 1977 silver GMC cargo van, one without side windows to shield his sexual attacks and one which he and Norris called "Murder Mack." Bittaker equipped the van with photo equipment, a powerful stereo system, and chains, ropes and manacles affixed to the steel panels inside the back part of the van. The van was purchased specifically for the purpose of housing kidnap victims. When Norris was paroled on June 15, 1979, from the Atascadero State Hospital, where he had been under psychiatric observation, he immediately joined with Bittaker to jointly undertake their kidnapping spree.

On June 24, 1979, only nine days after Norris was released, he and Bittaker abducted and murdered 16-year-old Linda "Cindy" Shaeffer, while she was returning home from a church service in Torrance, California. The two men picked her up near Redondo Beach, which would prove to be their favorite "preying" spot, and drove her into the San Gabriel Mountains. The kidnappers both raped her and then strangled her to death with a wire coat hanger.

On July 8, 1979, 18-year-old Andrea Joy Hall of Tujunga was picked up, while she was hitchhiking on the Pacific Coast Highway. She was driven to a remote area in the San Gabriel Mountains, where she was raped. Bittaker then killed her with an ice pick, which he jammed into her ear. He did not bother to remove the murder weapon when the two men buried her in a shallow grave.

The murderous kidnappers struck again on September 2, 1979, this time abducting and killing two hitchhiking girls, who told Bittaker and Norris that they were lost when they were picked up in Redondo Beach. Jacqueline Leah Lamp, thirteen, and Jackie Gilliam, fifteen, were driven to the San Gabriel Mountains, where, for two days, they were subjected to repeated rapes and torture, before both were murdered.

Next, 16-year-old Shirley Ledford of Sunland, California, was picked up and kidnapped by the two men on October 31, 1979. Her body was found the next morning in Tujunga. Bittaker had strangled her with a coat wire after both men had tortured her. Police discovered that her face and breasts had been mutilated, her arms slashed and that her entire body was covered with welts and bruises.

The kidnappers tried to abduct and murder another girl on November 20, 1979 at Hermosa Beach, spraying her in the face with Mace, and dragging her into "Murder Mack," where she was raped. But before Bittaker and Norris could murder the girl, she fought back wildly and managed to escape, immediately calling police. The two men were tracked down and arrested, charged with assault. Their victim, however, failed to make a positive identification.

California kidnapper Lawrence Sigmond Bittaker, who abducted, raped and murdered five teenage girls, successfully avoiding execution for twenty years.

Police nevertheless held both men in custody after discovering drugs inside "Murder Mack." They were held for trial on charges of violating their paroles. At a preliminary hearing in Hermosa Beach, Norris blurted his regrets "for my insanity," which caused detectives to probe further. Norris suddenly became talkative and soon began detailing the five kidnapping murders he and Bittaker had committed.

Norris snickered his contempt for the victims, laughing at their gullibility and stupidity in easily being taken in by him and his partner. He described how Bittaker took photos of the girls, telling them they were good prospects for high-paying modeling jobs he could offer them. Both men offered them marijuana and lured them into "Murder Mack" by telling them they would drive them to Bittaker's "studio," for a photo shoot.

Many wary girls refused to go with the kidnappers and those who were abducted were physically dragged into "Murder Mack" where blaring Rock music playing on through a sound system installed by Bittaker drowned out their screams for help. They were manacled or tied to the iron rungs inside the back of the van and driven to a fire road in the San Gabriel Mountains, where they were repeatedly raped and tortured before being murdered. Bittaker either strangled the girls, Norris said—he put all the murders on his partner—or drove ice picks into their heads.

A closer police examination of "Murder Mack," revealed a tape recording of Jacqueline Lamp's last screaming moments on earth. Investigators also found more than 500 photos taken of grinning girls, snapshots taken by Bittaker, many of these being murder victims. On February 9, 1980, Norris accompanied officers to the San Gabriel Mountains, where he directed them to shallow graves in San Dimas Canyon, which revealed the grisly remains of Lamp and Gilliam.

Bittaker and Norris were charged with five kidnapping murders. While they awaited trial, Los Angeles County Sheriff Peter Pitchess stated that the two killers might have committed as many as thirty to forty other kidnappings and murders. On February 20, 1980, investigators announced that out of the hundreds of photos of attractive young girls Bittaker had taken, nineteen had been identified as missing persons, in addition to the five known murder victims attributed to Bittaker and Norris. Norris, however, declined to talk about any more killings. Bittaker had refused to talk at all from the moment of his arrest.

Police and prosecutors knew that Bittaker was a criminal hardcase, a sneaky, clever kidnapper and murderer, who would maintain silence to the end. Born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on September 27, 1940, he had been adopted by George Bittaker and his wife. An aircraft factory worker, George Bittaker moved his family many times, going from Pennsylvania to Florida, then from Ohio to California, in search of such work. The nomadic family had few friends and Lawrence Bittaker had next to none. He was a listless student, dropping out of high school in 1957.

A short time later, Bittaker was arrested in Long Beach, charged with auto theft, hit-and-run and evading arrest. He was sent to the California Youth Authority, released when he turned nineteen. He immediately stole a car and drove it across state lines, causing his arrest by FBI agents in Louisiana on charges of violating the Interstate Motor Vehicle Act. Convicted, he served eighteen months in the federal reformatory in Oklahoma, where his abnormal behavior caused him to be sent to the U.S. Medical Center in Springfield, Missouri, so that he could receive close psychiatric examinations.

Bittaker returned to California, where he committed a Los Angeles robbery in December 1960. He was sentenced to one to fifteen years in the state prison. He was again subjected to close psychiatric inspection, one psychiatrist stating that though he possessed "superior intelligence," Bittaker had "considerable concealed hostility," was "basically paranoid," and "a borderline psychotic."

Paroled in 1963, Bittaker was arrested a few months later for suspicion of robbery and violation of his parole. He was returned to prison. Released again, he committed a burglary, which brought him another long prison term. He was released in 1974 and promptly went to a supermarket, where he shoved a steak down the front of his pants. When an employee followed him outside, Bittaker stabbed the man and was convicted and sent to prison for attempted murder.

Before his trial on that charge, Bittaker was examined by Dr. Robert Markman, a noted psychiatrist, who dismissed previous diagnoses of this habitual criminal as having a "borderline psychosis, and classified him as a "classic sociopath," one incapable of obeying any kind of law or conforming to any kind of regulation.

Markman went to state that Bittaker would escalate his criminal activities, moving to capital crimes, and that he was "a highly dangerous man, with no internal controls over his impulses, a man who could kill without hesitation or remorse." Almost up to the time of his 1978 parole, Bittaker's psychiatric profile remained unchanged, a prison psychiatrist stating that he was a "sophisticated psychopath." This observation was made only four months before Bittaker was released and began to plan the kidnapping murders he later committed with Norris.

Mass murderer Charles Manson, who was Bittaker's murderous idol; early in his criminal career, Bittaker bragged to fellow prison inmates that he would someday be "bigger than Manson."

On March 18, 1980, Norris pleaded guilty to five counts of murder. Turning state's evidence against Bittaker, he was sentenced to forty-five years to life for his cooperation with authorities, eligible for parole in the year 2010. Bittaker, on the other hand, admitted to nothing. He was tried on February 5, 1981, stating that Norris, not he, had committed the five murders charged against him and that Norris told him about the murders that he, Norris, had committed, only a short time after their 1979 arrest.

On February 17, 1981, Bittaker was found guilty on all counts, and, with the jury's recommendation, was sentenced to death on March 24, 1981. Bittaker, still on California's death row at this writing, has received stays of execution for more than two decades. After initial appeals by his attorneys, his execution was scheduled for December 29, 1989, but his lawyers won yet another stay. On June 11, 1990, the California Supreme Court declined to hear Bittaker's case again and the convicted murderer remains in an official "limbo," where his execution has yet to be rescheduled.

The egotistical Bittaker vexed the California prison system by repeatedly filing nuisance suits, one claiming that he had been subjected to "cruel and unusual punishment" when a broken cookie was placed on his lunch tray, this suit costing the state of California more than $5,000 in legal fees. He gleaned money from serial killer groupies by selling them his fingernail clippings. Many condemned killers sell personal items to obtain money they can spend at the prison commissaries. Convicted murderer Charles Manson (see Mass Murder) for years penned "smile" faces on his white sox and sold them to gullible cult followers. He once sent a pair of his "art" socks to this author, who returned them without payment.

Bittaker was an early admirer of Manson and reportedly boasted to a fellow convict early in his criminal career that some day he would be "bigger than Manson." He thought of himself as a brilliant jailhouse lawyer and social savant, but to many who have studied his miserable life, he amounted to nothing more than a conniving killer, whose every action and thought proved predictable.

The kidnapper-killer had a business card printed for himself while awaiting execution, one he sent to all of those writing to him, which read: "Lawrence Sigmond Bittaker, Death Row Philosopher." He contemptuously signed his letters to fans with his nickname, "Pliers," the favorite tool he reportedly used in torturing his long-ago victims.

THE MORMON KIDNAPPER/1979-83

Kidnapper and killer of five children, Arthur Gary Bishop (AKA: Roger W. Downs; Lynn E. Jones, 1951-88) was born in 1951 in Hinckley, Utah. His family later moved to Salt Lake City, where his Mormon parents raised him as a devout parishioner in their church. An honor student in high school and an Eagle Scout, Bishop was a popular teenager. He was also devoutly religious, and later served as a missionary in the Philippines for the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (the Mormons).

When returning to Utah, Bishop attended Steven Henager College, where he majored in accounting and graduated with honors

Bishop appeared to have a promising future. He went to work at a Ford dealership in Murray, Utah, but was arrested in February 1978 for embezzling almost $9,000 by forging the owner's signature on a check. Because of his sterling background and lack of any criminal activity, and because Bishop displayed regret at his offense and promised restitution, he was given a five-year suspended sentence.

One-time Mormon missionary, Arthur Gary Bishop is shown entering court in 1984, to face charges of kidnapping and murdering five small boys during 1979-1983.

Bishop, however, made no attempt to repay the dealership for his theft and a warrant was issued for his arrest. He refused to surrender and was officially excommunicated from the Mormon Church. Bishop decided to disappear. He ended all contact with his family, and changed his name to Lynn E. Jones, and later, Roger W. Downs. Under these aliases, Bishop worked with the Big Brother Program, working with disadvantaged children. He was well liked and many children, at his invitation, spent time at his home and some accompanied him on camping excursions.

At this time, small children began to vanish from their homes without a trace. Alonzo Daniels, four, was playing in the front yard of his Salt Lake City home on October 14, 1979, when he disappeared. His kidnapping was the first of five that would puzzle police in the next four years. At the time of the Daniels disappearance, police routinely interviewed all of the boy's nearby neighbors, including Bishop, then using the alias of Roger Downs and who lived down the hall from the Daniels apartment in a building complex. He could provide no information about the missing boy and was not considered a suspect.

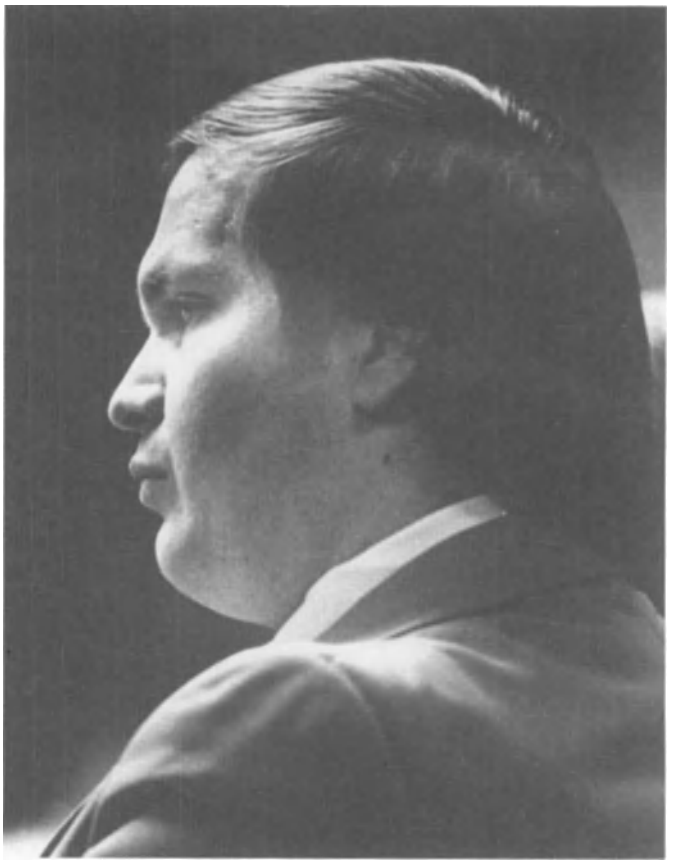
Kim Peterson, eleven, was taken on November 9, 1980, after he left his home to sell a pair of skates, reportedly to an adult male, who lived nearby and was waiting for the boy on a nearby corner, but this person's identity could not be determined by searching police. The body of the Peterson boy was later found in a shallow grave in Cedar Fort, Utah County.

On October 20, 1981, 4-year-old Danny Davis accompanied his grandfather to a shopping center in Salt Lake County. While the grandfather was buying some items, the boy utterly vanished. Again, Roger Downs (Bishop) was interviewed, as he lived close to the area where Davis disappeared, but detectives did not relate him to the Daniels disappearance two years earlier and he was not considered a suspect in the Davis disappearance. The decomposing corpse of the Davis boy, along with the remains of Alonzo Daniels were also later found near the area where the kidnapper had deposited the body of Kim Peterson.

Troy Ward, who was celebrating his sixth birthday, was kidnapped and murdered on June 22, 1983. Then, on July 14, 1983, 13-year-old Graeme Cunningham vanished. Police learned that Cunningham, two days before he disappeared, was scheduled to go on a camping trip with a friend, both of the boys being chaperoned by a Big Brother named Roger Downs.

Police had been looking for Bishop on charges of embezzling $10,000 from Ski Utah, one of his many employers, while using the alias of Lynn Jones. He was arrested on July 25, 1983, after police questioned him about the disappearance of Graeme Cunningham. They learned that Bishop had been planning a trip to Southern California with the Cunningham boy. The county sheriff revealed that Bishop had been living in the immediate vicinity at the time of the five murders.

Bishop did not hide his real identity and confessed to police, stating that he had kidnapped and killed all five children from 1979 to 1983. He then led investigators to the shallow graves near Cedar Fort, and to a secluded area in Big Cottonwood Canyon where the remains of Troy Ward and Graeme Cunningham were found. There was evidence of sexual assault, and police found explicit sexual photographs at Bishop's residence.



Bishop passively hears a guilty verdict, convicted on five counts of aggravated kidnapping and murder; sentenced to death, he chose to be executed by lethal injection on June 9, 1988.

Further, Bishop admitted to having kidnapped and molested dozens of small children in the Salt Lake City area for several years, although, for reasons he never explained, he did not murder them. The parents of many of these victims had certain knowledge that Bishop had sexually molested their children, but kept silent, even throughout the period when Bishop murdered the five children.

Investigators found all the evidence they needed for murder convictions, including photos he had taken of his victims. They also found a revolver and a bloody hammer which Bishop had used in bludgeoning the children to death. During his trial, Bishop's taped confession was played to the jury, one in which he giggled and laughed in a high falsetto voice in detailing the five brutal kidnapping murders. He was also heard in lengthy detail describing how he, a necrophiliac, fondled the bodies of his victims following their deaths. At the end of this tape, Bishop was heard to say: "I'm glad they caught me because I'd do it again."

Arthur Gary Bishop was convicted after a six-week trial in 1984 of five counts of first-degree murder, five counts of aggravated kidnapping, two counts of forcible sexual assault, and one count of sexual abuse of a minor. Under Utah law, he could choose death by firing squad or lethal injection. Bishop chose to take the injection on June 9, 1988. He spent his last moments studying the Book of Mormon, and expressing regret for his crimes.

THE ATLANTA KIDNAPPINGS/1979-1981

In 1979, the police force in Atlanta, Georgia, was alerted to the presence of a serial killer within the metropolitan area, one who preyed on young black children between the ages of seven and fourteen. Before the nightmare was over, various experts from across the country would be brought in to lend their special talents to a criminal investigation that dragged on for more than two years, one that sorely tested the resources of the city administration and its police force. In March 1981, President Ronald Reagan committed up to $1.5 million in federal funds to help defray costs of the investigation. At that time the death toll stood at twenty-six. It would climb to twenty-eight before a suspect would be formally charged.

The bodies of the first two victims were found lying adjacent to Niskey Lake on July 28, 1979. A man scavenging for tin cans stumbled across the remains of what he first thought to be a dead animal. Upon further investigation he noticed a pair of boy's pants, a belt, and a human torso. Lying in the underbrush some 150 feet away a second body was found. Forensic investigators identified the sets of remains as 13-year-old James Evans and 14-year-old Edward Smith. Both boys had disappeared from their Atlanta homes earlier in the week.

Evans by all indications had been asphyxiated, while Smith was shot. The dual murders did not attract much press attention at the time, and neither did the discovery of the skeletal remains of 14-year-old Milton Harvey on November 5, 1979. The youth was first reported missing in October after wandering away from his home in northwest Atlanta. The police were unable to determine the precise cause of death. Three days later a fourth black child was found, 9-year-old Yusef Bell, the son of noted civil rights worker Camille Bell from Mechanicsville. The boy disappeared after he had been sent out on an errand and was found in the maintenance shaft of an abandoned schoolhouse.

Nothing more was heard from the unknown assailant until March 1980, when the killing resumed with sickening regularity. Twelve-year-old Angel Lanier, the first female victim, was found tied to a tree with her panties stuffed in her mouth in early March. The fact that she had been raped puzzled the police who had concluded that the killer was a male homosexual. By July 1980, the death toll had climbed to twelve, following the discovery of the bodies of Eric Middlebrooks, Christopher Richardson, Aaron Wyche, and LaTonya Wilson.

Atlanta's black community was convinced that the murders were racially motivated and were being carried out by a white supremacist. The police did not give much credence to this theory, believing that the presence of a white murderer in the all-black neighborhoods, where these children lived would have eventually been detected by the local residents. In July, Camille Bell and the parent of Mary Mapp, one of the victims, called a press conference to announce the formation of the Committee to Stop the Children's Murders.

Public Safety Commissioner Lee Brown, the first American black to receive a doctorate in criminology, was taken to task for his department's failure to apprehend a suspect by community activists and officials on the federal level. Former Attorney General Griffin Bell remarked, "I think you ought to be able to catch somebody. If you have more than twenty deaths, why isn't at least one person caught? That's what I hear people saying."

Brown responded by organizing a five-man task force to supplement the police investigation. "I have the utmost confidence in our investigation," Brown said. "I don't believe all knowledge rests in Georgia." By year's end the task force had been expanded in the wake of additional killings.

Some of the leading figures in criminal investigation were brought in at Brown's behest, including retired Los Angeles Police Department Captain Pierce Brooks, who cracked the Onion Field murders, Lieutenant George Mayer of Stamford, Connecticut, who had worked on the "Merritt Parkway Bra" murders, and Lieutenant Gilbert Hill of Detroit, who brought the Browning Gang to justice after they had murdered fifteen victims. Their presence failed to mollify anxious members of the Negro community who believed a policeman was responsible for the slayings.

Wayne Bertram Williams is shown greeting the press after he was indicted in 1981 for many of the kidnapping-murders occurring in Atlanta, Georgia, from 1979 to 1981.

Law enforcement officials replied that the killer was in all likelihood a black teenager who was looked up to and trusted by his victims. A $100,000 reward was posted by the city, and additional cash incentives were put up by three recording companies and celebrities from the world of sports and entertainment.

And still it continued. By March 1981, twenty bodies had been found. Autopsies showed that none of the victims to date were drugged or given alcohol. Only 23-year-old Michael McIntosh, found floating in the Chattahoochee River on April 20, 1981, was completely disrobed.

The first major break in the case came on May 22, 1981, when police officer Fred Jacobs sat in his patrol car near a bridge spanning the river. He heard a resounding splash and then saw a man get into a station wagon. The information was relayed to a second patrol car driving in the vicinity. Before the station wagon could exit the bridge, the second patrol car stopped the driver for questioning. The police searched the vehicle and found some nylon rope, a pair of gloves, and a blood-stain on the front seat.

The driver was identified as 23-year-old Wayne Bertram Williams, a black man who lived with his parents in a modest brick home in northwest Atlanta. Williams told the police that he was returning from a musical audition. He denied stopping on the bridge and swore he knew nothing about a bundle being dropped in the river. The police warned him that if a body turned up they would be calling him in for further questioning. Williams drove off.

Two days later the remains of Nathanial Cater, the twenty-eighth and final victim (according to the police tally), was removed from the Chattahoochee River. An eyewitness told police that Williams and Cater, a 27-year-old homosexual, were seen leaving a movie theater together.

A second witness came forward and told police that Williams had also been keeping company with Jimmy Ray Payne, a 21-year-old man pulled out of the muddy waters of the Chattahoochee on April 27, 1981. Payne was reported missing after he failed to show up for a job interview.

Convinced that Williams was their man, police detectives sent the car seat of his car containing the bloodstains to the state crime lab in Atlanta for analysis on June 4, 1981. It was found that the blood type matched that of Williams and Cater. Additionally, dog hairs found on the body of Cater were identical to those in Williams' car, according to police. The dog in question was Williams' German shepherd.

Wayne Williams is shown at his trial in January 1982; he was convicted of two of the Atlanta kidnapping-murders and received two life sentences.

On June 18, 1981, Williams was indicted for the murders of Nathanial Cater and Jimmy Payne. The accused was the only child of Homer and Fay Williams, two retired schoolteachers from Atlanta. Mrs. Williams described her son as a "miracle child" who was born when she was forty-one. From the time he was a child Wayne's parents encouraged the learning process. They had invested all of their savings into radio equipment Wayne needed to start a radio station. A transmitter was installed in the family home, and it was powerful enough to broadcast a mile in each direction.

The project failed and the family suffered financial hardship as a result. Williams was alternately described as a "media junkie" and a frustrated dreamer, obsessed with his own success and failings. He dabbled in photography and promoted himself as a talent scout. Williams printed leaflets offering young black men between the ages of eleven and twenty an opportunity to embark on a musical career through his influence, which was apparently limited if not non-existent.

One of the men answering his ad was Patrick Rogers, an aspiring soul singer, who was later murdered. Under heavy security, the murder trial of Wayne Bertram Williams began at the Fulton County Courthouse on January 5, 1982. Superior Court Judge Clarence Cooper imposed a gag order on district attorney Lewis Slaton and defense attorneys Alvin Binder and Mary Welcome, preventing them from discussing aspects of this highly controversial case with the media.

Legal experts conceded that the prosecution faced an uphill battle trying to secure a conviction based solely on forensic evidence and the testimony of police officers. Though inadmissible in court, the most damaging evidence against Williams was the fact that the killing immediately stopped after he was taken into custody.

Williams took the stand on February 22, 1982. He denied he was a homosexual and refuted the testimony of a youth who claimed to have been molested by him. "Ain't no way I'm a homosexual," he said. "I have no grudge against [homosexuals] as long as they keep their hands to themselves. I'm scared," he added. The jury, composed of eight blacks and four whites, retired on February 27, 1982, to consider its verdict. After deliberating for less than twelve hours, they returned a verdict of guilty. Judge Cooper sentenced Williams to two consecutive life sentences.

The verdict was upheld by the Georgia Supreme Court, amidst growing doubt that Williams was railroaded through unsupported circumstantial evidence. It was alleged that several of the witnesses were more interested in the reward money than securing justice for the defendant. Commented Homer Williams: "It's impossible to find a young man like this guilty." Since 1981, however, the city of Atlanta has not experienced a similar outbreak of child murder, suggesting that the police and the courts had been right all along. Williams has repeatedly demanded a new trial on the grounds that important evidence was suppressed at his original trial. All of his appeals were denied.

LEONARD LAKE AND CHARLES NG/1984-85

Two of the worst kidnappers in California proved to be the bloodlusting Leonard Lake (1946-85) and Charles Ng. Lake, born in San Francisco on July 20, 1946, early on became obsessed with pornography and reportedly seduced his older sisters before joining the Marine Corps in 1966. He served as a radar operator in Vietnam, but saw no action, and was shipped back to Camp Pendleton. There he was subjected to intensive psychiatric examination, which reportedly lasted two years, before his discharge in 1971.

Lake married, but the union soured when he began to collect guns and date young girls, whom he photographed for bondage magazines. He was apprehended after burglarizing materials from a construction site and received a year's probation in 1980. Lake again married—a common law union—and, in August 1981, moved to a hippie commune at a dilapidated ranch near Ukiah, California. Some months later Lake met Charles Chitat Ng.

Born in either Hong Kong or Vietnam (Ng gave both locations as birthplaces at various times and his year of birth as either 1958 or 1961), Charles Chitat Ng (pronounced "ing") was reportedly the son of wealthy Chinese parents living in Hong Kong. He stole items at his school and was expelled. He was then sent to a private school in England, where he was also expelled after committing thefts. With considerable funds, Ng fled England, going to California, where he evaded a hit-and-run charge by giving false information to police and then enlisting in the Marine Corps.

Stationed in Hawaii, Ng boasted to his fellow Marines that he was a black belt "ninja warrior." He and two others broke into a Marine arsenal and stole weapons valued at $11,000. Quickly captured and kept under arrest, Ng bragged to military investigators that he had "assassinated" someone in California, but refused to name his victim. He escaped in 1981 before going to trial, being listed as a deserter. A game addict, Ng subscribed to a war game newsletter published by Leonard Lake.

Ng, at Lake's invitation, joined Lake there and a short time later U.S. Treasury and FBI agents raided the ranch, charging the pair with possession of illegal firearms. Lake posted a $3,000 bond, then disappeared. Ng, who was identified as a deserter from the Marines, was sent to prison for two years. Upon his release in 1984, Ng rejoined Lake at a mountain cabin Lake owned at Wilseyville, in the Sierra Nevada foothills about 150 miles east of San Francisco.

Lake, a psychotic survivalist, had built a bunker that served as an underground cell under his cabin, and he and Ng kept their many victims here, before they tortured and killed them. Men, women and children were kidnapped or lured to the place through advertisements offering items for sale at cheap prices, from cars to guns, or even offering jobs. When victims arrived at the cabin, they were seized, bound and then slowly tortured and then killed. All the women were raped repeatedly by both men. The total number of victims slain between 1984 and 1985 was never fully determined, but the number was estimated to be between twenty and fifty.

On June 2, 1985, Ng stole a vise from a lumberyard in Leonard Lake, who kidnapped and murdered between twenty to fifty people in California, with sadistic henchman Charles Ng; Lake escaped punishment by committing suicide in June 1985.

The arrogant, crafty Charles Chitat Ng, shown in custody in Calgary, Canada, after fleeing California when fellow kidnapper-killer Leonard Lake was jailed; Ng later tenaciously fought extradition to the U.S., to vainly avoid a trial that later revealed how he had taunted and tormented his victims on video tapes before killing them.

South San Francisco, placing it in the trunk of a parked Honda and then, as employees walked forward to question the shoplifter, he fled on foot. Police officers arrived to see a bearded man sitting in the Honda, who identified himself with a driver's license that said he was "Robin Stapley," but the driver bore no resemblance to the photo on the license.

The stolen vise was retrieved from the trunk of the Honda and "Stapley" was arrested on charges of theft. Also found in the car was a .22-caliber pistol with a silencer attached to it. A weapons violation was added to "Stapley's" charges. The man in custody was Leonard Lake, who, while in a detaining cell, took cyanide pills hidden behind a shirt lapel and died four days later on June 6, 1985. Fingerprints taken from the dead man identified him as Leonard Lake.

The driver's license he had been using was that of one of his many murder victims. The Honda had been stolen from another victim, 39-year-old Paul Cosner, a San Francisco car dealer, who had vanished in November 1984 after telling a fellow employee that he was going to see some "weird guy" wanting to buy a car.

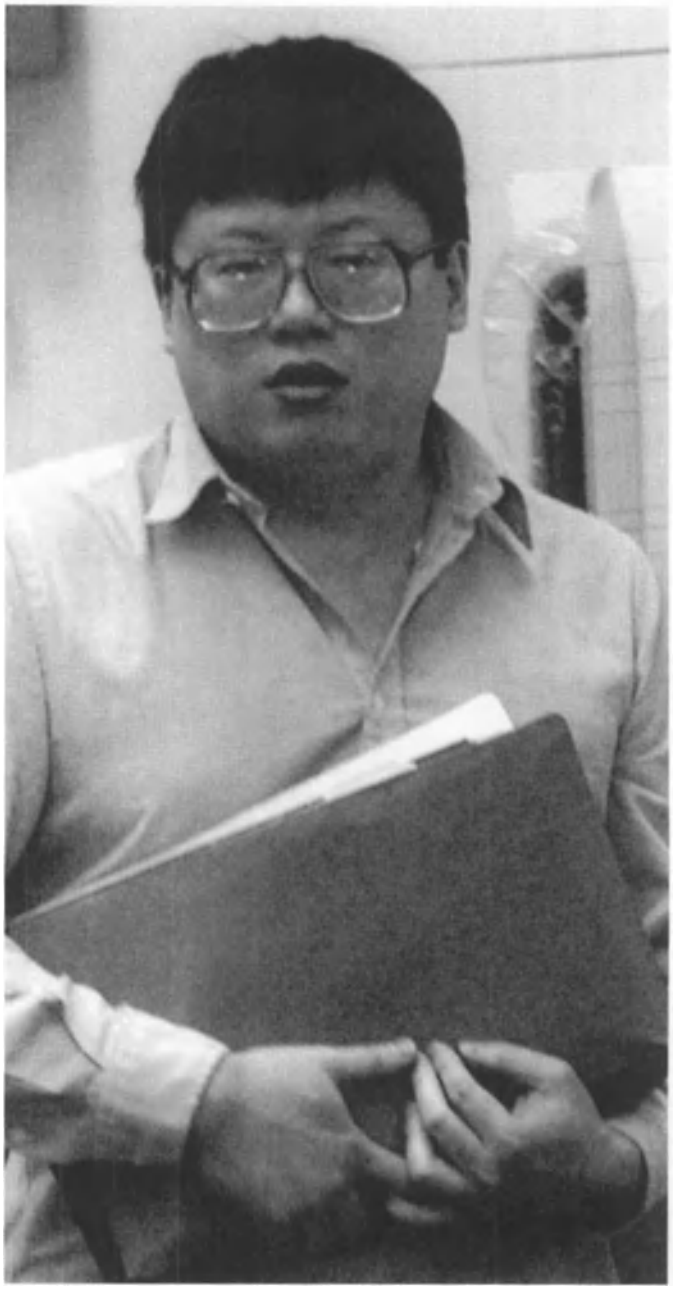
Ng, meanwhile, fled to Canada on foot, where he was arrested on a fugitive warrant and fought off extradition for six years. While being held in Canada's Edmonton Penitentiary, Ng reportedly slid notes and drawings under his cell door to fellow inmate Maurice Laberge, who later testified against him, showing the notes and drawings. One of Ng's drawings showed him frying a baby in a wok with the caption, "Daddy died, momma cried, baby fried." Other drawings by Ng showed women being raped and strangled and babies being smashed, drowned, fried or put into a microwave oven.

Police then found Lake's cabin near Wilseyville, discovering his diaries, which described in obscene terms the many murders he and Ng had committed. They also found video and sound equipment Lake and Ng had used to record the torture, rapes and murders inflicted upon their victims, as well as video tapes of many of these gruesome mutilations. One was identified as Deborah Dubs, who, with her husband and infant son Sean, had been reported missing from their San Francisco home on July 25, 1984 and had been subsequently killed by the murderous Lake and Ng.

Ng was finally extradited to California and was able to stall off his trial by insisting that he receive a change of venue, that publicity in Northern California was so prejudiced against him that he could not get a fair trial there. His trial was eventually moved to Santa Ana, California, in Orange County, but the case was purposely dragged on and on by Ng, who hired and fired attorneys. It would become one of the most expensive cases in California history, costing more than $14 million.

When Ng finally did go to trial, he ignored his lawyer's advice and talked openly, denying that he killed anyone. Yet, videotapes that Ng had taken showed him with two of the women before they were murdered. On one tape, he appeared with 19-year-old Brenda O'Connor, one of the many women he and Lake raped and then murdered. O'Connor was shown as she sat handcuffed in a chair, pleading for the lives of her boyfriend and their 1-year-old son (unknown to her at the moment, both had been murdered).

After slicing away O'Connor's shirt and bra, Ng could be seen smirking in front of the camera and telling the terrified O'Connor, "You can cry and stuff like the rest of them, but it won't do you no good. We are pretty, ha, cold-hearted."



Ng tried to blame his dead partner for scores of murders at his trial, but his defense (costing $14 million, one of the most expensive criminal cases in California history) collapsed and he was found guilty of kidnapping and killing eleven persons; he was sentenced to death on June 30, 1999.

She was murdered a short time later, her bones found among hundreds of others when police closed in on the mountainside cabin.

Throughout his trial, Ng's lawyers blamed the dead Leonard Lake for all the killings, portraying their client as nothing more than a stooge, a patsy, someone who killed no one. In the end, this lame defense fell apart. On February 24, 1999, a Santa Ana jury found Ng guilty of murdering six men, three women and two baby boys. He was to pay for these horrendous serial murders with his life after a jury recommended the death penalty on May 3, 1999. Ng was sentenced to death on June 30, 1999. The conniving kidnapper-killer immediately began preparing the many appeals that would prolong his miserable life.

THE FAMILY MAN KIDNAPPER/1988-89

In February 1989, the family of 17-year-old Shari Dawn Teets of Lexington, South Carolina, placed an advertisement in a local paper to sell their waterbed. The ad was answered on February 6, 1989, by Richard Daniel Starrett (b.1960), an engineering technician and family man. Starrett arrived at the Teets' home when Shari was alone.

After examining the waterbed as if he were interested, he drew a gun and forced Shari to return with him to his apartment in Martinez, Georgia, a suburb of Augusta, just across the state line. There he held her for four days, much of the time handcuffed in a closet. While Starrett drank himself into a stupor, Shari Teets escaped early on Saturday morning, February 11, 1989.

She ran to a neighbor's house and sobbed out her kidnapping. She next led police back to Starrett's residence. Starrett, however, had fled, but police found criminology textbooks detailing how police investigate serial crimes—particularly kidnapping and child molestation; a collection of pornographic magazines and videotapes, including tapes of himself assaulting women; and books about serial killer Ted Bundy. Lexington County, South Carolina, Sheriff James Metts said the preliminary investigation showed Starrett "was having trouble at work and at home and developed a serious drinking problem."

Starrett was arrested on February 15, 1989, by Harris County, Texas, sheriff's deputies conducting a routine license plate check on cars at an interstate rest stop outside Houston. A barefoot Starrett was sleeping in his red sports car with a .38-caliber handgun on the seat between his legs. A deputy aimed a 12-gauge shotgun at him before they woke him.

Starrett waived his right to challenge extradition and returned east, where he faced investigations in six states. In cooperating with police, he led South Carolina authorities to a creek in rural Newberry County, northwest of Columbia, where he had abandoned the body of 15-year-old Jean Taylor McCrea after abducting, raping, and shooting her to death just before Christmas 1988.

Starrett told police that while his wife and children were away on trips to see family members, he would hunt for young girls to kidnap and rape. He confessed to sexual assaults in the Columbia, Charleston, and Atlanta areas, seven in all. He was formally charged on February 17, 1989 with kidnapping and raping a 12-year-old girl from Lexington County, South Carolina, on June 21, 1988. He was indicted on March 10, 1989 by a Richland County, South Carolina, grand jury on four counts of kidnapping and one count of criminal sexual conduct for his activities in and around Columbia.

Kidnapper-killer Richard Daniel Starrett (shown in wheelchair), who went to prison for life.

The day Starrett pleaded not guilty to those charges, Charleston County, South Carolina, officials presented warrants for his arrest on charges of first-degree burglary, kidnapping, and criminal sexual conduct. The charges were based on an incident in June 1988 in which a Charleston woman was handcuffed and videotaped as she was being assaulted by a man who answered an ad in the paper—Starrett's usual modus operandi. He later faced nine criminal counts in Columbia County, Georgia, where he lived.

In March 1989, Starrett went on two hunger strikes and attempted suicide by slashing his wrists after his wife filed for divorce. A South Carolina state psychiatrist diagnosed Starrett as suffering from depression but determined that he still could distinguish right from wrong. A second psychiatrist, Dr. Harold Morgan, stated that Starrett's crimes stemmed from paraphilia, a compulsive sexual disorder that constituted an unusual form of mental illness. Morgan recommended counseling and hormonal therapy to control Starrett's sex drive.

The prosecutors had prepared to present another side of Starrett. Their investigations showed he had researched police procedure to learn how to leave less evidence and how to make his crimes against children look more like missing-person cases than abductions. At least twice, Starrett had passed up opportunities to assault girls because he recognized the possibility of being caught.

Authorities believe he passed up other opportunities because when he showed up at one would-be victim's door, she was not as pretty as he had expected. Although he had no prior arrests, Starrett used aliases to rent locations he could use as crime scenes, and planned his assaults for occasions when he knew his wife would be out of town. Authorities believe these details indicated that Starrett was calculating in his approach, rather than driven by uncontrollable impulses.

The prosecutors, however, did not need to present evidence in Columbia, for when Starrett went to court there on June 19, 1989, he pleaded guilty, but mentally ill, and remarked before sentencing that he was tormented by "anguish, remorse, and self-hatred." Circuit Judge J. Ernest Kinard, Jr. gave him the maximum of life in prison for kidnapping and twenty years for criminal sexual conduct, to be served consecutively.

Starrett was also arraigned in the city of Lexington, South Carolina, on July 6, 1989, but was not charged in the death of Jean McCrea. When her name was mentioned in court, he covered his ears and fell to the floor, sobbing, "Don't say her name." Starrett later told investigators that he killed Jean Taylor McCrea because he was falling in love with her. After he shot her, he said, he wrapped her body in a green blanket and trash bags, then drove her body to a creek bed near her home in Irmo, South Carolina, where he dumped it as one might discard a bag of garbage.

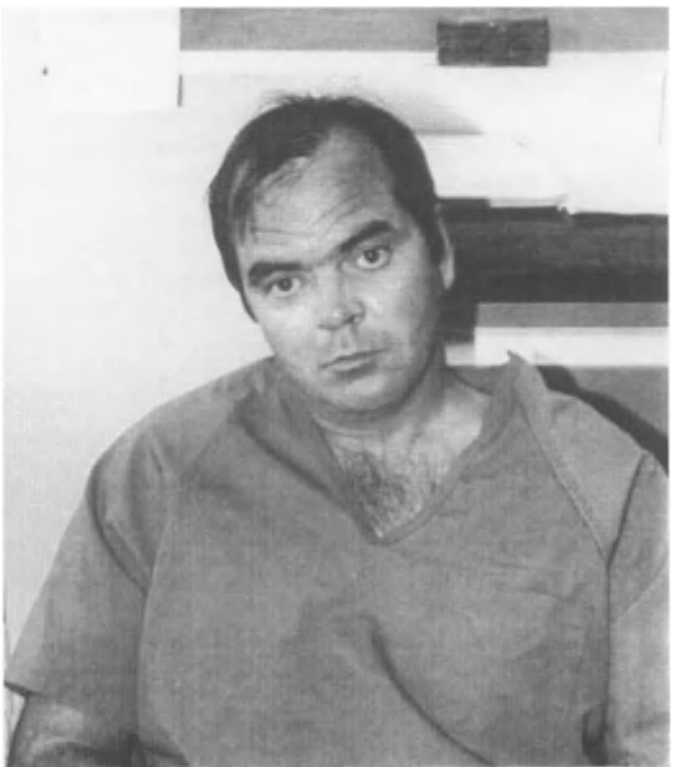
Starrett pleaded guilty in Columbia to the kidnappings of the unidentified 12-year-old and of Shari Teets. He received two more life sentences, to be served consecutively. He was on another hunger strike and had to be wheeled in and out of the courthouse in a wheelchair due to weakness from hunger. His mother speculated that the self-imposed fasting was an act of penance. She repeated doctors' suggestions that her son's behavior might have been rooted to two concussions he had sustained during childhood that caused headaches and damaged his growth. Richard Daniel Starrett is, as this writing, serving life in prison in South Carolina with no possibility of parole.

THE SELF-ACCLAIMED MONSTER/ August 1, 1991

The news of Jeffrey Dahmer's (see Cannibalism) serial killings had no sooner burst into headlines in 1991 when an even more shocking self-admitted kidnapper-killer was identified, Donald Leroy Evans (1957-99). Arrested in August 1991 in Biloxi, Miss., Evans confessed to kidnapping, raping and murdering Beatrice Louise Routh, a homeless 10-year-old child, on August 1, 1991, the day the girl disappeared from a playground in Gulfport, Mississippi.

Evans, a native of Watervliet, Michigan, who was living in Galveston, Texas, at the time of the Routh kidnapping and murder, led police to the girl's shallow grave ten days after he kidnapped, raped and strangled her to death. He was tried and convicted in 1993 for the Routh kidnapping and murder and sentenced to death, but authorities did not close the case on Evans.

Almost immediately after his original confession, Evans began to recite a list of murders he had committed, telling



Donald Leroy Evans, who was sentenced to death for the kidnapping-murder of a 10-year-old girl; before he was killed by a fellow inmate in the state penitentiary at Parchman, Mississippi, on January 4, 1999, Evans arrogantly claimed to have slain more than sixty people in twenty-one states.

Mississippi authorities that he had been killing people since his discharge from the Marine Corps in 1977. He claimed to have murdered more than sixty people, which would, if substantiated, have made him the worst serial killer in 20th Century America. He insisted that he had raped and murdered six women in Illinois, California, and Texas and he rattled off more victims in more states.

On August 15, 1991, George Payne, police chief of Gulfport, Mississippi, announced that federal and local law enforcement officials would be investigating all of Evans' murder allegations, although Payne had little regard for the kidnapper's statements, believing that the kidnapper was inflating his murder lists to boost his own terrible image as a human monster. "You're not going to see us doing a Henry Lee Lucas thing," Payne said. Payne's reference was to drifter Henry Lee Lucas (see Murder: Serial Killers), then on death row in Texas. Lucas had boasted that he had slain more than six hundred persons, causing an exhaustive and expensive nation-wide hunt for the bodies of these so-called victims. (Out of this outlandish, incredible murder list, three of these victims, including his own mother, were substantiated as actual killings performed by Lucas.)

One of the many people Evans claimed to have killed was Ira Jean Smith, a prostitute in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, insisting that he had strangled Smith to death in 1985. He went to trial for this killing in 1994 in Fort Lauderdale and attempted to glean as much publicity as he could through eccentric behavior and outlandish demands. Evans repeatedly insisted that he be allowed to wear his Ku Klux Klan costume—a white robe and hood—during the trial and that his name be officially changed to "Hi Hitler," so that all records would refer to him under that name.

Hitler, Evans said, was his idol and he wanted to emulate the German dictator. At one point, he shouted that the records be changed to read "State of Florida vs. Hi Hitler." His demands were ignored. No one even bothered to tell the illiterate, uneducated Evans that Adolf Hitler's followers employed the hail of "Heil Hitler," not "Hi Hitler." The last of four attorneys attempting to defend Evans in the Smith case found his client wholly uncooperative and asked that he be allowed to withdraw from the case, saying: "Our attorney-client relationship has gone downhill from the moment it began." Evans was convicted for the Smith murder and given a life sentence, although he still awaited execution in Mississippi for the Routh killing.

Following his return to death row in Mississippi, Evans continued to insist that he had slain more than sixty people in twenty-one states. Investigations into those killings dragged on, until January 4, 1999. On that day, Jimmie Mack, another death row inmate at the state penitentiary in Parchman, Mississippi, attacked and stabbed Evans to death, while both men were being led back to their cells, following a confrontation between Evans and Mack as they were being led to the prison shower room.

Mack, a Negro, who had been sentenced to death for the 1990 beating death of a man in Gunnison, Mississippi, killed Evans with a home-made knife called a "shank." It was believed that the killing of Evans, who publicly stated his racial prejudices as a white supremacist, had enraged Mack by his bigoted remarks and prompted the attack. District Attorney Cono Caranna, who prosecuted Evans for the Routh murder, stated: "We do not mourn him. We simply close his file. Everything I saw in his life was pure self-involvement and as close to evil as I have ever seen."

THE GIRL IN THE HOLE/December 28, 1992

A bachelor all his life, building contractor and handyman John Esposito (b.1950) of Bay Shore, Long Island, New York, was a suspect in the 1992 disappearance of 9-year-old Katie Beers, who lived with her crippled godmother, Linda Inghilleri and, on occasions, with her unemployed mother, Marilyn Beers. She had reportedly been sexually abused by Inghilleri's husband, Sal Inghilleri, a charge denied by the man who claimed Marilyn Beers had invented the charge in a custody battle over Katie.

John Esposito, of Bay Shore, Long Island, New York, who kidnapped his neighbor's child, 9-year-old Katie Beers, on December 28, 1992, and held her for almost three weeks in an underground pit; Esposito confessed and was sentenced to fifteen years to life.

The girl was befriended by a neighbor, John Esposito, who had a child's playground behind his Bay Shore property, replete with swimming pool, deck, basketball court, and play area. Two days before her tenth birthday, Esposito took Katie on an outing to a video arcade on December 28, 1992 and later that day tearfully reported that she vanished from his sight.

Police searched for the girl for sixteen days. Investigators also closely watched Esposito, a surveillance so intense that it apparently unnerved the contractor. His anxiety at being watched and trailed by police, his every move monitored, eventually prompted Esposito to voluntarily go to officials on January 13, 1993, and admit that he had taken the girl. He led police to an underground dungeon he had constructed eighteen months earlier, one built beneath his garage, its entrance covered with a 200-pound concrete slab.

Inside of this dark, dank place, chained by the neck to a wall, officers found Katie Beers still alive. Freeing the girl, authorities quickly placed Katie Beers in a foster home. Police inspecting the Esposito home also found photos of other unidentified children, believing that Esposito had kidnapped them and perhaps murdered them, although no bodies were found of these children. He denied at that time that he had abducted or injured any other children.

A police check revealed that Esposito had a few years earlier pleaded guilty to unlawful imprisonment and sexual offenses of a young boy, but had escaped long-term punishment in that case. In the Katie Beers case, Esposito was charged with kidnapping and was convicted and sent to prison to serve fifteen years to life.

Authorities then reviewed the charges against Sal Inghilleri and gathered enough evidence to prosecute him for sexually abusing Katie Beers years earlier. He was convicted and was sentenced to four to twelve years in prison. Inghilleri served eight years and was paroled in 2002 at the age of forty-nine.

Katie Beers later graduated from high school with honors, going to college on a scholarship, majoring in psychology and planning to attend law school. Her nightmare experience saw a happy outcome, but she was the exception in a rapidly increasing trend of child kidnappings, most of which, according to an FBI report, resulted in death.

The Bureau estimated that an estimated 37,000 children were murdered in the U.S. between 1976 and 1994. Children under the age of eighteen accounted for eleven percent of all murder victims in 1994 and nearly half of these child victims were between the ages of fifteen and seventeen. One in five child victims were known to have been killed by another child.

"SHOOT DOWN THAT RABID DOG!"/1993

A child molester and serial child killer who may have murdered as many as a dozen young children, Lewis S. Lent, Jr. (b.1950), was a former Bible student and theater janitor living in North Adams, Massachusetts, when Pittsfield police arrested him in 1993 for the attempted abduction of a 12-year-old girl. At the time of his arrest, Lent reportedly confessed to having abducted, molested, and murdered 12-year-old Sarah Anne Wood, who vanished from her Franklin, New York, home on August 18, 1993, while riding her bike to a summer bible school about a mile from her home.

Lewis S. Lent, Jr., who may have kidnapped and murdered a dozen children, is shown (wearing glasses) in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, on April 29, 1996, after pleading guilty to killing a 12-year-old boy; he was sent to prison for life.

The search for Wood, the daughter of a church lay pastor, had been massive and included a reward poster that was mailed to fifty million households across the country, the largest known mailing ever distributed in the U.S. for a missing child. When investigators from New York confronted Lent, however, he recanted his statements about the Wood girl.

Placed on trial for the attempted abduction of the Pittsfield girl, Lent was found guilty on January 12, 1995, and was sentenced to seventeen to twenty years in prison. Five months later, Lent was charged and tried for the October 1990 murder of 12-year-old Jimmy Bernardo, also of Pittsfield, who had been abducted and murdered, his naked body dumped near Newfield, Massachusetts, in November 1990. Rather than face trial, Lent pleaded guilty to the Bernardo murder and received a life sentence.

Though he insisted that he was innocent of kidnapping and killing Sarah Anne Wood, Lent was arraigned for the abduction on June 7, 1996. As he was being led up the steps of the Herkimer County Courthouse that day (wearing a bullet-proof vest), a throng of angry citizens cursed Lent, one shouting: "Why put that bastard on trial—shoot down that rabid dog!" He went on trial for this crime on October 24, 1996.

A day before the trial, Lent, following his usual course of legal action, pleaded guilty to second-degree murder and was sentenced to twenty-five years to life in prison. He refused to tell officials where he had buried the body of Sarah Anne Wood. The girl's parents, Robert and Frances Wood pleaded in court with Lent to give them the location of their child's body, but Lent would say nothing.

Frances Wood showed the kidnapper photos of his victim and talked about how the girl loved to dance and read poetry. Seeing no response from the killer, who sat passively behind thick-lensed glasses, Mrs. Wood concluded: "This is probably a waste of time trying to express to you that she was a person. You are her murderer."

Lent was later pinpointed as the kidnapper of missing 16-year-old Jaime Lusher, who vanished on November 6, 1992, after leaving home on his new bicycle—his birthday present—in Westfield, Massachusetts, while pedaling toward his grandmother's home in Blandford. The bike was later found off a lonely road, but the boy was never located. Westfield police stated that two eyewitnesses insisted that they saw Lent in the area at the time of the Lusher disappearance, but he was not charged in that case.

The convicted kidnapper also became the prime suspect in the kidnapping and murder of 10-year-old Holly Piirainen, who vanished from her grandparents' home in Sturbridge, Massachusetts on August 5, 1992. The girl's skeletal remains were located in a wooded area near Brimfield on October 23, 1993.

THE KIDNAPPINGS IN BELGIUM/1994-1995

A convicted child molester, Marc Dutroux (b.1963) reportedly led a gang of child kidnappers who abducted young girls, used them in pornographic films, raped them and held them as sex slaves, their horrific activities protected by policemen. In August 1995, two girls, one 12 and one 14, were freed from an underground dungeon in one of Dutroux's homes in Charleroi. Four bodies of other young girls were dug up on Dutroux's property.

Arrested, Dutroux was charged with kidnapping, rape and murder. It was thought that he and gang members had abducted and used as sex slaves and child prostitutes more than thirteen other missing Belgian girls before murdering them. Dutroux allegedly offered to pay kidnappers $5,000 for each young girl brought to him and his henchmen.

The arrest of Dutroux was followed by the arrests of several Belgian police officers who had reportedly protected Dutroux's operation, sharing in his high-end returns from child prostitution and pornography. Dutroux had been sentenced in 1989 to thirteen years in prison for kidnapping, torturing and raping children, but had served only three years of his sentence, being released early, it was claimed, through bribery of corrupt politicians, lawmen, and court officials. Dutroux, a clever, cunning criminal, had convinced officials that he had been rehabilitated by his imprisonment and was released in 1991.

Though under constant suspicion in the disappearances of many young girls, Dutroux was simply picked up and routinely questioned, then released to go about his child prostitution business. At the same time, incredibly, he collected $1,200 in public assistance. A court of inquiry later rejected the accusations that police directly aided Dutroux in his illegal activities, saying that the police were simply inept.

In 1993, police officials received a report that Dutroux was constructing underground makeshift cells in one of his houses, where he planned to hold kidnapped children before they were shipped overseas into child sex slavery, particularly to the Orient, where the children would be reportedly filmed while being raped and then murdered on camera in so-called "snuff" movies, which were purchased by perverted high-ranking government officials and business leaders, these voyeurs paying between $20,000 and $40,000 each for such films.

At right: Belgium's most notorious criminal, Marc Dutroux, in handcuffs, is shown entering court on August 16, 1996; he confessed to abducting at least two of the dozens of children he was accused of kidnapping and killing in a white slavery operation, where he reportedly sold abducted children to wealthy degenerates as sex slaves, a scandal that rocked the nation.

Further, Dutroux, who became Belgium's most notorious criminal, was linked with high officials, who had been accused of committing similar crimes. In November 1996, prosecutors petitioned the Belgium Parliament to lift the official immunity of 45-year-old Elio Di Rupo, Belgium's deputy prime minister, so he could be charged with having illegal sex with underage boys. Similar charges were made at that time against 64-year-old Jean-Pierre Grafe, a regional minister.

Most disturbing at the same time were revelations of a vast network of child pornography controlled by Marc Dutroux. When the public discovered that Dutroux, a sex offender of long standing, had been released early from prison against the advice of prosecutors and that he had effected his release due to payoffs to corrupt police officials, the outcry in Belgium was deafening.

More than 300,000 irate citizens marched through the streets of Brussels on October 20, 1996, demanding that the government corruption be stopped. Most of all, the public was incensed that more than a dozen children were missing, presumably kidnapped, raped and murdered by Dutroux and possibly others, and that officials seemed indifferent to the fate of these hapless children.

Meanwhile, Dutroux claimed that his two accomplices, Bernard Weinstein, a businessman and politician, and Michel Lelievre, a drifter who stayed in one of Dutroux's houses, had actually carried out the kidnappings of Julie Lejeune and Melissa Russo in August 1995, at a time when police actually searched the house (on August 24, 1995) in which the girls were held captive (silenced by being drugged) in their underground chamber. Dutroux allegedly claimed that he had paid Weinstein and Lelievre $1,600 for each girl they kidnapped for him.

Michelle Martin, Dutroux's wife and the mother of three children, was later implicated in the kidnapping and pornographic operations of her husband. Even though two kidnapped girls were held in the underground cell of one of the Dutroux houses when Dutroux was imprisoned, the kidnapper's wife knew of their presence and did nothing to effect their release.

Dutroux, his wife and Lelievre were arrested on August 13, 1996. A short time later Dutroux began to talk about his crimes, telling police to go to one of his houses where they found two dead girls, Melissa Russo and Julie Lejeune, as well as Dutroux's former accomplice, Weinstein. Dutroux blamed Weinstein for allowing the two girls to die of starvation and in retaliation, he said, he gave Weinstein barbiturates and, while his accomplice was in a drugged state, buried him alive next to the bodies of the two girls. Dutroux then told police where they could find two other girls, Laetitia Delheze and Sabine Dardenne, who were being held prisoner in one of his houses. Officials found the girls alive.

Police began digging up the basements and gardens of all of Dutroux's houses. Under the floor of a shack in a garden behind one house they found the bodies of 17-year-old An Marchal and 19-year-old Eefje Lambrecks. Dutroux admitted to raping and killing both of these girls. Dutroux, imprisoned at this writing since 1996, later recanted his confessions, insisted that he was innocent of all the crimes attributed to him and mounted a spirited defense, although his lawyers found him impossible to work with, one of these, Daniel Kahn, withdrawing from the case in July 2003.

At the time, Dutroux was positioned as a lone predator and that there was no secret network of wealthy sponsors financing his kidnapping and forced sex operations, a contention disbelieved by most Belgians, as well as attorney Kahn. Enforcing this belief was the fact that Dutroux's trial, and that of his wife and Lelievre, has been repeatedly and inexplicably postponed, the new trial date expected some time in 2004.

"THE MONSTER WITHIN CHARLES RATHBUN"/November 16, 1995

Linda Sobek, an attractive 27-year-old blonde who worked as a model and had been a cheerleader for the Los Angeles Raiders, vanished from her home in Hermosa Beach, California, on November 16, 1995. Police looked everywhere for a clue and finally learned that photographer Charles Rathbun (b.1957), also of Hermosa Beach, had been the last person to see Sobek.

California photographer Charles Rathbun sits passively listening to Judge Donald Pitts as he sentences him to life imprisonment on December 16, 1996, for the kidnapping, rape and murder of 27-year-old model, Linda Sobek.

Police called the photographer and asked him to come to headquarters, but Rathbun stalled them time and again. Finally, he arrived almost dead drunk to tell police that he had accidentally run over Sobek, while demonstrating a high-speed turn. Discovering her dead, he panicked and buried her body.

When detectives appeared skeptical, he began to spin off another tale, a stranger story, one that involved him driving Sobek into the desert, where he began a photo session with her, using a Lexus sport utility vehicle as a prop. He said she suddenly was seized by a fit that compelled him to sit on her to calm her down. Inexplicably, he said, she suddenly died of asphyxiation.

Panic gripped him, Rathbun explained, so he hid the body. He would gladly take police to the site and he did. Nine days after Sobek's disappearance, the photographer took police to her shallow grave next to a lonely road in the Los Angeles National Forest amidst the rugged San Gabriel Mountains.

The condition of Linda Sobek's body, according to a coroner's report, indicated that she had been raped, sodomized with a blunt instrument, and then strangled to death. By this time, police had unearthed information that described how Rathbun had earlier been arrested and charged with the rape of a married woman, but he had escaped prosecution.

That record indicated Rathbun might be a sexual predator. The coroner's report was nevertheless explicit, pointing directly to the murder of Linda Sobek. Rathbun was charged and held for trial. He reportedly attempted to shoot himself shortly before his arrest and, when jailed and awaiting trial, he tried to cut his wrists in his cell. He botched both attempts.

Rathbun tried to mount a defense by having his attorneys place into evidence an unclear photo of a naked woman touching herself sexually. That gesture, Rathbun insisted, caused the model to go into spasms and die. It was not uncommon for Rathbun to photograph attractive models at remote California locations. He had become quite successful in selling "cheesecake-and-car" shots to many automotive magazines.

Stephen Kay, Los Angeles deputy district attorney, examined the photo carefully and realized that it showed the dashboard of a car, which was not that of the Lexus used in the fatal photo shoot. When he brought this to the attention of Rathbun on the witness stand, the defendant mumbled some sort of incoherent explanation. The photo was a blatant fake Rathbun had staged to mislead prosecutors. Kay would not be misled. He pointed out that the woman in the photo was not that of Linda Sobek, but of another model Rathbun had photographed.

The analysis of the photo in evidence was conducted by the National Law Enforcement and Corrections Technology Center (NLECTC), located in El Segundo, California. The NLECTC had completed image analysis and enhancement for police departments in more than 200 criminal cases. Also examined in Rathbun's extensive photo collection were shots of many other attractive models, who were "portraying death," according to officials, pointing out Rathbun's obsession with murder. (A number of other missing girls were alleged to have been kidnapped and slain by Rathbun, but he consistently denied having committed such crimes, particularly the abduction and murder of an attractive Latino model, whose body was found in 1993.)

Using NLECTC's report, Stephen Kay utterly discredited the photo. Next he portrayed Rathbun as a predator beast. "He literally tortured Linda Sobek," Kay told the jury, "as he repeatedly assaulted her." The excruciating pain suffered by the victim, he said, "defies comprehension."

On November 1, 1996, a jury in Torrance, California, returned a guilty verdict of first-degree murder. Rathbun, a pale-faced, fish-mouthed killer with deep-set eyes glaring from behind large glasses, said nothing. He was just as impassive when he was sentenced to life in prison by Superior Court Judge Donald Pitts on December 16, 1996. He received an additional eight-year sentence for the felony of anal rape with a foreign object.

Judge Pitts concluded by stating, "Linda Sobek experienced a death of unspeakable horror and brutality. The physical torture and emotional torture she experienced prior to her death demonstrates the monster within Charles Rathbun."

"STAY AWAY FROM HIM"/October 1, 1997

Jeffrey Curley, a 10-year-old boy living in Cambridge, Massachusetts, had had three bicycles stolen over the past few months, and Jeffrey like nothing more than riding his bike. The boy met a young man who promised to give him a bicycle and Jeffrey told his mother about it. She said, "Nobody gets a bike for free. Stay away from him." A few days later the boy told his mother she was right; he was not going to get the bike.

On October 1, 1997, Jeffrey Curley was approached by two men in a Cadillac. They were 22-year-old Charles Jaynes (b.1975), an overweight homosexual predator, and his 21-year-old lover Salvatore Sicari (b.1976). Jaynes and Sicari had been Salvatore Sicari, who, with his homosexual lover, Charles Jaynes, abducted and killed 10-year-old Jeffrey Curley in Cambridge, Massachusetts on October 1, 1997; Sicari, who went to prison for life, participated in the search for the boy, while knowing where the body was hidden.

Charles Jaynes (heavyset man center, head bent forward), a black car repairman in Brockton, Masschusetts, is shown wearing a bullet-proof vest as officers hustle him toward the court building in Newton, on October 3, 1997 (police had received a report that citizens planned to shoot Jaynes before he went to trial); Jaynes was sent to prison for life.

stalking the boy for weeks and one report had it that they were the very persons who had stolen his bicycles in order to offer him a new one as a lure to having sex with them.

When Curley refused, the men offered him a bike, plus $50 in cash. He still refused. Then the men dragged him into the Cadillac and sped off. While in the car, one of the men smothered Curley to death with a gas-soaked rag. The men drove to an apartment in Manchester, New Hampshire, where these two inhuman beasts sexually assaulted the body of the dead boy. They then dumped the body into a plastic container filled with cement and lime and drove to the Great Works River, a tributary of the Piscataqua River, and dumped the container into the water, not far from South Berwick, Maine.

Following his disappearance, a widespread search ensued for Curley. Dozens of Cambridge neighbors passed out flyers describing the boy. One of those passing out flyers was Salvatore Sicari, one of his kidnappers and abductors. Several older boys and relatives of Curley, then received a tip that an auto reconditioner from Brockton, Massachusetts, had been seen talking to Curley shortly before he vanished.

The youths went to a car dealership on the night of October 2, 1997, confronting the reconditioner, Charles Jaynes. When he gave contradictory replies to their questions, the youths attempted to drag Jaynes into a car, but police were called and rescued him from what might have been a vigilante-style execution. His lover, Sicari, was picked up a short time later. Sicari almost immediately pleaded innocent, telling police that Jaynes had killed Curley. He then lied in telling them that the body had been dumped near Portsmouth, New Hampshire.

Sicari stated that he saw Curley for the last time on October 1, 1997, the day of his kidnapping, and that the boy had threatened to have his dog attack him. Sicari told police that he shouted a counter-threat at Curley at the time, that he would kill his dog if he didn't stop. It was Jaynes who offered the bicycle to Curley, said Sicari and he said he warned the boy to stay away from the heavyset Jaynes.

Feelings against the two predators were so high that when Sicari left a Newton, Massachusetts, courthouse after testifying, swarms of angry residents mobbed him and his police escort, screaming obscenities at the killer. When Jaynes was brought to the same courthouse, he was ordered to run into the building by a squad of policemen who surrounded him. Jaynes and the officers all wore bullet-proof vests. They had received a tip that snipers were planning to kill both Jaynes and Sicari.

When hearing that Sicari had informed on him, Jaynes pinpointed Sicari as the actual killer, and the man behind the plot to abduct and molest Curley. When the boy resisted, Jaynes said, Sicari angrily smothered him to death. Police, however, concluded that it was Jaynes, who was the leader of the kidnapping-murder of Curley.

When arresting the kidnapper, officers found in Jaynes' wallet receipts for recent purchases, including a new bicycle, lime and cement bought at Home Depot, a Rubbermaid container and No-Doz pills. A video camera had recorded these purchases, showing both Jaynes and Sicari carrying away the items. Both men were charged with child molestation, kidnapping and murder. Both were found guilty and given life sentences.

Charles Jaynes presently resides at the Massachusetts Correctional Institute at Concord, where he is serving out his life sentence. Jaynes attempts to communicate with anyone who will chat with him on the Internet. In some 2002 online correspondence he stated: "I'm a sentimental con [convict], not ashamed to cry if a movie or book touches me, or life for that matter ... I dislike people who are ignorant enough to believe all they read and see in the news media as the absolute truth ... I like to meet different people and learn about different places ... I've been to Paris and London and would love to hear from you, down the street or around the world... "

ALL OTHER NOTABLE WORLDWIDE KIDNAPPINGS AND SKYJACKINGS IN THE 20TH CENTURY

Note: The following entries profile kidnappings and skyjackings for ransom payment or abductions committed on the part of sexual predators, and do not include the politically-motivated terrorist skyjackings and kidnappings (such as the Patty Hearst case and the abductions of Aldo Moro, James R. Cross, Pierre Laporte and others), which can be found in the chapter on Terrorism. The many kidnappings associated with serial killers can be found in the lengthy chapter on Murder, Serial Killers or Unsolved Murders. The almost routine skyjackings of the 1960s-1970s earmarked for Cuba are too numerous to cite here.

June 12, 1906: Frederick Muth, the 7-year-old son of a wealthy jeweler, was kidnapped from his school in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, by a man claiming that he had been sent to retrieve the child on behalf of the boy's mother. A ransom note demanding $500 for the boy's return was received the next day by Muth family members. Six days later, the boy was recognized by citizens when he was seen walking along a street with a man named John Keene, the spoiled son of a wealthy New York family, who had earlier embezzled $20,000 from the bank, where he had once been employed as an auditor. Keene was arrested and confessed to the Muth abduction. On June 18, 1906, he was indicted by a Philadelphia grand jury following an arraignment. He was later sentenced to prison for twenty years at hard labor.

March 7, 1907: Horace Marvin, Jr., the small child of a wealthy physician in Kitts Hummock, Delaware, southeast of Dover in Kent County, vanished from his home and was never seen again. Officials presumed that the boy had been kidnapped, although no ransom was ever demanded for his return. On March 23, 1907, President Theodore Roosevelt offered federal aid in tracking down the kidnapper, but since no federal investigating agency then existed for such purposes, little could be done. This case, as well as others prompted U.S. Attorney General Charles J. Bonaparte to establish a permanent investigative force answerable only to the U.S. Department of Justice on July 26, 1908. This force, which consisted mostly of former U.S. Secret Service agents, some freelance detectives and banking examiners, was christened the "Bureau of Investigation" (forerunner to the Federal Bureau of Investigation/FBI) by U.S. Attorney General George W. Wickersham on March 16, 1909. Long before that time, Delaware's governor had offered a reward of $2,000 for information that might lead to the whereabouts of Horace Marvin, Jr., but no one responded. Years later, ambiguous sightings of the missing Marvin boy were reported in Iowa, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Utah and even in England. Ransom demands finally surfaced but all proved to be hoaxes.

President Theodore Roosevelt offered help in finding the Marvin boy.

June 8, 1907: A Black Hand gang abducted 7-year-old Walter Lamana outside his father's funeral home in New Orleans, Louisiana. Peter Lamana, the boy's father, received a ransom note three days later in which the kidnappers demanded $6,000 for the safe return of his son. It was not learned if the father ever attempted to pay the ransom, but, on June 12, 1907, a large group of Italian residents gathered in a public square to denounce the Black Hand and then conducted a widespread search for the missing boy. A witness came forward to identify Anthony Costa as the man last seen with the boy. Costa was arrested on June 14, 1907. Meanwhile, Frank Gendusa was apprehended, along with letters he was carrying that had been written by his brother, Anthony Gendusa., handwriting that was matched to the writing on that ransom note. Leonardo Gebbia, another member of the Black Hand extortion gang, was also arrested and he led officials to the farm of Ignazio Campisciano, where the boy's body was found buried in a shallow grave. In two long trials, Gebbia, and his sister, Nicolina, were convicted of the kidnapping and murder of Walter Lamana and both were sentenced to death. The 20-year-old Gebbia was executed on July 16, 1909. His sister's sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. The remaining members of the Black Hand ring drew long prison terms.

February 8, 1909: Tony Reddes, age ten, was reportedly kidnapped from his father's meat store in New York City. No ransom was demanded and the boy was never seen again.

May 25, 1913: Peter Kurten abducted and murdered an 8-year-old girl in Dusseldorf, Germany (he was later known as the Monster of Dusseldorf). Kurten would go on to kidnap and kill at least fifteen more children before his capture in 1930 (see Serial Killers).

August 7, 1914: Teenager Catherine C. Larkin was abducted at her Bronx, New York, school by George Webb, the school's custodian. The girl was later located and identified her kidnapper. Webb was given a long prison term.

December 17, 1915: Cordelia Stevenson, an attractive, young black woman, who had openly criticized the brutal activities of the Ku Klux Klan, was abducted from her home in Columbus, Mississippi. She was repeatedly raped and then lynched, her body left to dangle for days, until the corpse was discovered by a farmer. Her kidnappers were never identified.

May 30, 1917: Lloyd Keet, the 14-month-old son of a wealthy banker in Springfield, Missouri, was reportedly abducted by several kidnappers, who overpowered the servant taking care of the child and fled with the boy, sending a ransom note to the Keet family the next day, which demanded a $6,000 payment. On June 1, 1917, the boy's body was found at the bottom of a well on a deserted farm. Three suspects were later arrested and tried for the abduction-murder. Claude Piersol was convicted and sent to prison for thirty-five years. Taylor Adams was given a fifteen-year sentence and his son, Maxie Adams, went to prison for twenty-five years.

October 19, 1919: William O. Jenkins, a U.S. consulate officer and cotton mill operator in Puebla, Mexico, was kidnapped by five heavily-armed Mexican bandits after they had looted his office. Jenkins was held in a mountainous cave while his captors demanded a ransom of 300,000 pesos. The Mexican government first refused, then, on October 26, agreed to pay the kidnappers 30,000 gold pesos, with promissory notes covering the balance of the ransom money. Jenkins was released that day in Cordoba.

June 2, 1920: In a predawn home invasion, 13-month-old Blakeley Coughlin of Norristown, Pennsylvania, was abducted from his crib in the mansion of his wealthy family. The Coughlins were inundated with ransom notes coming from cranks, but finally made contact by phone with the actual kidnapper, who was described as a man "with a foreign accent, probably Italian." A ransom payment of $12,000 was made, but the child was not returned. Some weeks later, August Pascal, a Frenchman, was charged with the kidnapping. He admitted to kidnapping the Coughlin child, but refused to disclose the boy's whereabouts, unless he was granted immunity from prosecution. Officials refused the offer and Pascal played a waiting game. The boy's badly decomposed body was found in a small Pennsylvania town, where Pascal reportedly mailed the ransom note, but the Coughlin family could not or would not identify the remains. Plea-bargaining for his life, Pascal was convicted of second-degree murder and kidnapping for extortion (then not a capital offense). He was sent to prison for life.

May 27, 1921: Giuseppe Verotta, the 5-year-old son of a New York City pushcart peddler, was kidnapped while outside a candy store, his abductors demanding a $2,500 ransom payment. The kidnappers believed that the boy's father had collected a large insurance payment after his son had been struck and crippled by a truck. The father had not received any such payment, and pleaded with the kidnappers to take $500, an amount loaned to him by a relative. When the go-between accepted the money, he was trailed by officers to the group of Black Hand kidnappers, arresting Antonio Moreno, Santo Cusamano, James Ruggiere and Roberto Raffaelo. While the Black Handers were jailed, police, on June 11, 1921, found the Verotta boy dead along the Hudson shoreline below Nyack, New York. He had been strangled to death. The culprits were all condemned to death, but their sentences were later commuted to life terms.

June 24, 1922: Alexander Bruce Bielaski (1883-1964), the former chief of the Bureau of Investigation (appointed on April 30, 1912 to head this organization, which was the precursor to the FBI), was kidnapped by bandits near Cuernevaca, Mexico. The bandits demanded a ransom of $10,000 for Bielaski's safe return, but the captive escaped three days later and just before the ransom was to be delivered. Bielaski at the time had retired from the U.S. Department of Justice and had become a businessman. (One report held that Bielaski was still associated with the Department and was conducting secret investigations in Mexico at the time he was seized.) He rejoined the Justice Department in the 1920s, busying himself with capturing bootleggers. Bielaski permanently retired in 1927.

Alexander Bruce Bielaski, abducted by Mexican bandits; he escaped his captors.

October 14, 1922: Gordon Duffield, who was the heir of a Chicago fortune, was kidnapped from his private school in New Jersey. He was never seen again and his abductors were never identified.

January 21, 1924: Chinese pirates boarded a small British steamer outside of Hong Kong, killed the captain and held the passengers hostage until an unspecified ransom payment was made for their release.

March 15, 1924: Madge Oberholtzer, an attractive, young woman, who worked for the Indiana State Department of Public Instruction, was kidnapped by David Curtis Stephenson, head of the Indiana Ku Klux Klan, and two other Klansmen, Earl Klinck and Earl Gentry. Stephenson had invited Oberholtzer to his home, and, after he got her intoxicated, the three men abducted her, taking her to a train and placing her in a compartment, where Stephenson repeatedly raped her, biting her severely and leaving open wounds that later became infected. She was returned to her parents' home in Irvington, Indiana, where she later died from blood poisoning as a result of the wounds inflicted by Stephenson, who had a criminal record of similar assaults in other states. He was charged with kidnapping and murder and convicted, then sent to prison for life. Klinck and Gentry were acquitted, but Gentry was later murdered by a girl friend.

Klan leader David Stephenson, who kidnapped Madge Oberholtzer.

May 21, 1924: Robert "Bobby" Franks, the 14-year-old son of millionaire Robert Franks, was abducted near his home in the Kenwood area, on the South Side of Chicago, by Richard Loeb and Nathan Leopold, who brutally murdered him. Both killers were later identified, convicted and sent to prison. Technically, this was a kidnapping, but the arrogant killers had no real expectation of receiving the $10,000 ransom payment they demanded through a typewritten note and had committed the murder as an "experiment" in completing "the perfect crime." Franks was not selected as the victim until the last minute in a random abduction. The killers employed the use of kidnapping as a ruse in an attempt to make the abduction appear to be the work of a professional criminal. Neither killer, the scions of families with great wealth, needed money. (See: Murder, Celebrity Slayings.)

August 8, 1924: Aaron A. Graff, a wealthy businessman, was reportedly kidnapped from his home in Manhattan, New York. His body was later discovered, but no trace of his abductors could be found.

September 20, 1925: Mary Daly, the 6-year-old daughter of a prominent businessman in Montclair, New Jersey, was kidnapped and murdered by Harrison Noel, son of a wealthy lawyer. Convicted and sentenced to death, Noel's attorneys appealed on an insanity plea, which was upheld. Noel was sent to an asylum for the criminally insane.

March 9, 1927: Virginia Jo Frazier, the daughter of a city commissioner at Chattanooga, Tennessee, was kidnapped and held for a ransom of $3,000. The child was released some hours after the ransom was paid. A black teenager was then identified as the abductor. He confessed to the kidnapping and was sent to prison for twenty years.

March 10, 1928: Walter Collins, a 9-year-old New England resident, was kidnapped, his remains found the following year. Before that gruesome discovery, officers in Lee, Massachusetts, picked up a boy wandering about the streets. The runaway bore an amazing resemblance to the missing Collins boy. He told police that he was Collins and while talking with officers, the clever boy collected considerable information about the missing youth. He was returned to Collins' mother, who initially believed her son had been restored to her. The youth convinced family members that he was, indeed, Walter Collins, rattling off the details he had learned about the boy from the police. Mrs. Collins then grew suspicious and, after measuring the boy, discovered that he was almost two inches shorter than her own son. She disavowed him, but other family members thought she had suffered a mental collapse in denying her own son. She was placed in an institution and held for psychiatric observation. When she was released, she filed a suit against those who had institutionalized her against her will and won a settlement of more than $10,000. Her convictions were upheld when her son's remains were later discovered. By then, the impersonator had vanished from the Collins' home.

May 23, 1928: Four members of the notorious Fleagle gang, William Harrison "Jake" Fleagle, Ralph Emerson Fleagle, George Johnson Abshier and Howard Royston, robbed the First National Bank of Lamar, Colorado, of $218,000, killing two bank officials before fleeing with two bank employees held hostage. Royston was wounded and the Fleagles abducted Dr. W. W. Wineiger from his office-home in Dighton, Kansas, taking him to their Kansas ranch to treat Royston. Wineiger was then shot and killed, his body left in a gully. The kidnappers were later tracked down, Jake Fleagle being shot to death in a gunfight with lawmen and the other three hanged. (See: "The Fleagle Gang," in the chapter on Robbery.)

August 25, 1928: E. J. Bumstead, the American manager of a silver mine in Mexico, was abducted by bandits near Ixtlan and held for a ransom of 20,000 pesos (about $1,500 in today's currency). The payment was made on September 15, 1928 and Bumstead was released unharmed.

November 19, 1928: Dr. Charles Brancati was abducted from a subway in New York City. Brancati, one of the wealthiest Italian immigrants in the city, was reportedly associated with gambler and racketeer Arnold Rothstein and was head of a vast counterfeiting ring operating under Rothstein's orders. A short time after his disappearance, $225,000 was withdrawn from one of Brancati's accounts and transferred to the account of an associate, Luigi Romano, who, like Brancati, had also vanished. A little less than the amount drawn from Brancati's account was found to have been taken from Romano's account. Police concluded that this cash was used as a ransom payment to free the two missing men and that both had been kidnapped and murdered in the wake of the Arnold Rothstein killing on November 4, 1928. Their bodies were never found. (See: "The Murder of Arnold Rothstein," Unsolved Murders, in the chapter on Murder.)

Dr. Charles Brancati, abducted in a New York subway.

October 17, 1929: Charles "Lucky" Luciano (Salvatore Lucania), a rising New York gangster working for Joe "The Boss" Masseria, was kidnapped by rival gangsters, beaten and his face slashed. He was left for dead by his attackers on a pier in Staten Island, but he recovered and later became the leading figure in establishing the U.S. crime syndicate. His survival from this abduction earned him the sobriquet of "Lucky." (See: Chapter Seven, Gangs, Gangsters and Organized Crime.)

February 17, 1930: Charles Pershall, a wealthy banker living in Granite City, Illinois, was abducted and held for a $40,000 ransom. After collecting the payment, the kidnappers released the banker unharmed. They were never apprehended.

March 18, 1930: The son of a prominent family in St. Louis, Missouri, Michael Katz was abducted and held for a $100,000 ransom. He was released after payment was made. The kidnappers were never found.

July 5, 1930: Reginald Arthur Lee, the British acting counsel-general in Marseilles, France, was reported kidnapped, but no ransom demand was ever made and Lee was never seen again.

December 16, 1930: Nell Quinlan Donnelly, the wife of a wealthy St. Louis, Missouri, manufacturer, was kidnapped, along with her chauffeur, and held for a $75,000 ransom, according to a note written by the abducted woman and dictated at gunpoint by her kidnappers. She and her chauffeur were later found unharmed and her abductors captured and sent to prison.

April 20, 1931: Fred J. Blumer, owner of a brewery in Monroe, Wisconsin, was kidnapped and held for a ransom of $150,000. Family members negotiated for a smaller amount and when the ransom was paid, Blumer was released unharmed. His kidnappers, who had held Blumer captive in a remote house outside of Freeport, Illinois, were never apprehended.

June 15, 1931: George J. "Big Frenchy," DeMange, an underworld lieutenant for New York bootlegger and racketeer Owen "Owney" Madden, was kidnapped by rival gangster Vincent "Mad Dog" Coll, who received a ransom payment of $35,000 (some claimed it was $50,000) before he released DeMange. Coll was later shot to death in a phone booth by rival gangsters.

August 12, 1931: John J. "Jack" Lynch, owner of a news service in Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, was abducted and later released, after a $50,000 ransom had reportedly been paid.

December 15, 1931: Vera Page, a 10-year-girl living in Kensington, England, was abducted. Her body was found by a milkman the next morning, hidden in some bushes along the Addison Road. She had been raped and strangled to death. A woman later claimed to have seen a man trundling along the road with a wheelbarrow containing a bundle wrapped in a red blanket, but she could not identify the man. Police surmised that the girl, whose clothes had not been dampened by recent rains, had been held overnight in an unlocked basement, where her hat was found. Percy Orlando Rush, a laundryman, was held for questioning. His clothing bore soot, coal dust and candle grease similar to that found on the girl's clothes. The bandage with remnants of ammonia found in the crook of the girl's arm fit one of Rush's fingers, where he had a cut. A coroner's jury, however, determined that there was not enough evidence to indict Rush and he was released. The Page kidnapping and murder remained unsolved.

December 17, 1931: Charles Bischoff kidnapped and murdered Marian McLean of Cincinnati, Ohio. Bischoff was later identified, judged insane, and sent to an asylum.

December 21, 1931: Murray "The Camel" Humphreys and other members of the Capone gang, kidnapped Robert G. Fitchie, president of the Chicago's Milk Wagon Drivers Association, holding Fitchie for a ransom payment of $50,000. The ransom was paid and Fitchie was released unharmed. Humphreys, though identified as the ringleader of the kidnappers, was never charged with the kidnapping. He later rose high in the ranks of the Chicago crime syndicate (called The Outfit) and became a top lieutenant to crime boss Anthony "Big Tuna" Accardo.

Gangster-kidnapper Murray "The Camel" Humphreys.

January 19, 1932: Benjamin Bower, a Denver, Colorado, banker, was abducted and held for a $50,000 ransom payment. He was released following the payment and his kidnappers were never found.

January 27, 1932: Howard Wolverton, a manufacturer in South Bend, Indiana, was reportedly kidnapped by George "Machine Gun" Kelly, Eddie Doll and others, who demanded a $50,000 ransom payment for his safe return. When the kidnappers learned that Wolverton's relatives could not raise any money, they released their victim.

March 2, 1932: James DeJute, Jr., age eleven, was kidnapped by two young men as the boy was walking to school in Niles, Ohio. Two classmates saw the kidnappers put the boy into their car and wrote down the license plate of the auto. No ransom demand was made, but police officers were able to track down the abductors to their hideout outside of Cleveland, where they rescued the boy and arrested 27-year-old Dowell Hargraves and 30-year-old John Demarco. Both were convicted and each given a twenty-year prison sentence, the maximum term for those then convicted of a kidnapping, where no ransom was demanded.

March 14, 1932: Chinese bandits kidnapped Charles Baker, the captain of a U.S. steamship operating on the Yangtze River, demanding a ransom of $5 million. Such a demand in this worldwide Depression era could not be met and the abductors settled for about $7,500, releasing Baker some weeks later.

June 17, 1932: Three female bank employees were abducted from the bank in Fort Scott, Kansas, where they worked and which had been robbed by the Barker-Karpis gang. They were used as hostages, forced to hold on to the running boards of the gang's escaping cars, and were later released. Harvey John Bailey, a reported member of the gang, was later convicted of this kidnapping and sent to prison.

June 30, 1932: Bank robber Verne Sankey (1890-1934), along with Gordon Alcorn, kidnapped 20-year-old Haskell Bohen in St. Paul, Minnesota. Bohn was the son of a wealthy refrigerator manufacturer and was held for a $35,000 ransom. The payment was negotiated down to $12,000 and after Sankey received the money, he released his captive unharmed.

July 6, 1932: Joseph Myda was abducted from his home in Elyria, Ohio. His kidnappers, Myda later claimed were intent on murdering him (for reasons never given), but in their flight, they took the wrong turn and drove into a golf course area, where Myda called out for help and was rescued by members wielding golf clubs, pulling the victim from the kidnap car and driving off the abductors, who were never apprehended.

February 12, 1933: Verne Sankey and others kidnapped millionaire Charles Boettcher II, when the victim and his wife drove into the driveway of their home in Denver, Colorado. Sankey gave Mrs. Boettcher a note that demanded $60,000 for the return of her husband, adding: "Remember, the Lindbergh baby would still be alive if the ransom had been paid." The Boettcher family agreed to pay the ransom, but only after the victim had been released. Sankey released Boettcher on March 2, 1933 and received the ransom payment. Several gang members involved in this kidnapping were tracked down by FBI agents and sent to prison. Sankey was captured by FBI agents in a Chicago barbershop on January 31, 1934. Gordon Alcorn was arrested two days later and was later sent to prison for life for the Boettcher abduction and the kidnapping of Haskell Bohen on June 30, 1932. Sankey was not immediately tried for kidnapping, but was, instead, sent to the state prison at Great Falls, South Dakota, where he was held for trial on a bank robbery charge. He did not wait. Sankey hanged himself with his necktie in his cell on February 8, 1934.

May 2, 1933: Margaret McMath was kidnapped from her home in Harwich Port, Massachusetts, by Kenneth Buck, who later released the child after receiving a ransom payment of $60,000. Buck was tracked down, convicted and imprisoned.

June 15, 1933: William A. Hamm, Jr., the wealthy 39-year-old owner of the Hamm Brewery Co., was abducted by two gunmen outside the home of Hamm's mother in St. Paul, Minnesota. A hood was placed over the victim's head and he was placed in the back seat of a car, which drove off. At that time, the hood was briefly removed and Hamm was ordered to sign four notes authorizing a ransom payment of $100,000. When his kidnappers asked the name of the family contact to arrange the payment, the brewer identified William Dunn, the sales manager of his brewery. The ransom was paid and Hamm was released three days later. At first, police believed the kidnapping had been the work of bank robber and kidnapper Verne Sankey, then shifted their suspicions to Chicago area bootlegger Roger Touhy. Through underworld informants in St. Paul, however, investigators realized that the Hamm abduction had been committed by the notorious Barker gang, which included Arthur and Fred Barker, Alvin Karpis, Fred "Shotgun Ziegler" Goetz (one of the machine gun killers at the 1929 St. Valentine's Day Massacre in Chicago—see Gangs, Gangsters and Organized Crime), Monty Bolton and Charles J. Fitzgerald. Arthur Barker was later arrested in Chicago and sent to Alcatraz for life for this crime. Fred and Ma Barker were trapped at a resort house in Lake Weir, Florida, and killed in a wild shootout with FBI agents in 1935. Karpis was apprehended in 1936 and also sent to Alcatraz to serve a life term. He was paroled in 1969 and later left the country, dying in Spain in 1979. (See "The Barker-Karpis Gang" in the chapter on Robbery).

Millionaire brewer William A. Hamm, Jr., shown at right in white shirt outside of his home while press photographers record his safe return. His kidnapping imitated the abduction of brewery heir Adolphus Busch on December 31, 1930.

Chicago bootlegger Roger "The Terrible" Touhy, who was framed for the Factor "kidnapping."

June 30, 1933: John "Jake the Barber" Factor, an underworld associate of Chicago crime boss Al Capone and a notorious stock swindler (who had been accused of masterminding a $7 million stock swindle), was reportedly kidnapped by members of the Roger Touhy bootlegging gang, releasing him after receiving a $70,000 ransom payment. Touhy and others were sent to prison, but evidence later unearthed revealed that Touhy had been framed for this fabricated kidnapping in an effort to eliminate his gang, which competed with Capone's bootlegging operations in the northwest suburbs of Chicago. It was later learned that Captain Daniel "Tubbo" Gilbert, chief investigator for the Cook County state's attorney (and who was on Capone's payroll), had manufactured evidence that—coupled to the perjured testimony of Factor, his crony, Charles Connors, and others—convicted Touhy and sent him to prison. Federal Judge John Barnes later declared that Touhy was innocent of the kidnapping and had been railroaded by Factor and other Capone associates. Touhy was paroled on December 16, 1959, and, sixteen days later, was killed by shotgun blasts fired by syndicate members reportedly under the command of old-time Capone ally Murray "The Camel" Humphreys, who had originally brainstormed the Touhy frame.

Mortally wounded, Roger Touhy is shown dying on the porch of his sister's home in Chicago, following a 1959 shotgun attack by syndicate assassins.

July 7, 1933: John J. "Butch" O'Connor, Jr., whose relatives were powerful Democratic leaders in Albany, New York, was kidnapped in Albany, and later released after his abductors received a ransom payment of $42,500. The kidnappers were later apprehended and imprisoned.

January 6, 1934: Theodore "Handsome Jack" Klutas (c.1900-1934), who led the College Kidnappers gang, was surprised by Chicago policemen waiting at his hideout in Bellwood, Illinois. When Klutas appeared at the door, he was ordered to surrender, but drew a gun and was shot to death by machine gun bullets. Two of Klutas' confederates, Walter Dietrich (a one-time associate of bank robber, John Dillinger) and Earl McMahon, had been captured at the same hideout only a few hours earlier. Klutas and many of his henchmen had reportedly graduated from several universities, thus the sobriquet for the gang, which specialized in abducting wealthy gangsters and holding them for large ransom payments. James Hackett, a wealthy Chicago gambler, was kidnapped by this gang in May 1933, while playing golf on a Cook County course and was held until Klutas received a $75,000 ransom payment from Hackett's wife. The gang snatched Hackett again the following year and this time collected a $150,000 ransom before releasing their hostage.

January 17, 1934: President of the Commercial State Bank in St. Paul, Minnesota, Edward George Bremer was kidnapped by gunmen after driving his daughter to her school. He was held for a $200,000 ransom and released on February 7, 1934, after the gangsters received payment. The kidnappers were identified as members of the notorious Barker gang after the fingerprints of bank robber Arthur "Dock" (or "Doc") Barker, were matched with prints on a flashlight dropped at the site of the abduction. This clue and others eventually led to the arrest and/or shootout deaths of the chief members of this gang (see chapter on Robbery).

George Edward Bremer, a banker in St. Paul, Minnesota, was kidnapped by the Barker-Karpis gang and held for a $200,000 ransom.

April 25, 1934: June Robles, the child of a rich rancher in Tucson, Arizona, was abducted and held for a $15,000 ransom. The payment was never made, but the child was recovered unharmed.

May 9, 1934: William F. Gettle, a wealthy oil man living in Arcadia, California, was abducted from his home and held for a ransom payment of $80,000. Gettle was located and rescued before the payment was made. Three kidnappers were sent to prison.

June 16, 1934: William Killingworth, the sheriff of Polk County, Missouri, entered the Bolivar, Missouri, garage operated by Ernest Bitzer, surprising notorious bank robbers Charles Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd and Adam Richetti. The bandits, who were waiting for repairs on their own car, disarmed Killingworth and placed him in the back of their car, driving out of the town with their captive. They later stopped another car driven by Walter Griffith, and commandeered this car, taking Killingworth and Griffith as hostages. Once the bandits arrived at the outskirts of Kansas City, they released their captives. Killingworth later told newsman that Floyd, one of the most wanted men in America, believed himself doomed, and had told Killingworth: "There's no turning back for me now. Too many policemen want me. I haven't got a chance except to fight it out. I don't aim to let anybody take me alive." (See chapter on Robbery.)

October 26, 1934: William Weiss, a gambler and underworld figure, was kidnapped in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, by bank robbers Walter Legurenza and Robert Howard Mais, who killed their victim after receiving only $8,000 in ransom money. Weiss' body was discovered in a creek near Doylestown, Pennsylvania, on January 22, 1935. Legurenza and Mais were by that time imprisoned and on death row, awaiting execution for the murder of a bank messenger in a 1934 holdup. Both went to the electric chair on February 2, 1935, in Richmond, Virginia.

November 26, 1934: Two escaped convicts, Arthur Gooch and Ambrose Nix, were stopped by two police officers for routine questioning in a store in Paradise, Texas, causing a fight in which one officer was wounded. Gooch and Nix ordered the policemen at gunpoint into their own squad car and drove the auto across the state line into Oklahoma, where they released the officers. FBI agents later cornered the convicts, killing Nix and capturing Gooch following a gunfight. Gooch was charged with kidnapping under the newly-established Lindbergh law, which mandated a death sentence upon conviction, particularly when the victim was taken across a state line and if law enforcement officers were abducted. Gooch was convicted and sentenced to death. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the conviction and death sentence, and, after President Franklin D. Roosevelt refused to intervene, Gooch was hanged at the state prison in McAlester, Oklahoma, on June 19, 1936.

November 3, 1935: Vivian Chase, a member of the kidnapping gang that had abducted 78-year-old August Luer, a banker and meat packer in Alton, Illinois, on July 10, 1933 (he had been released without a ransom payment), was found bound by ropes and shot to death in a car outside of Kansas City's St. Luke's Hospital. Police concluded that this female bandit and kidnapper had herself been kidnapped and murdered to silence her from providing police with more details on the Luer case, one in which six others were captured and sent to prison.

President Franklin Delano Roosevelt personally condemned the Mattson kidnappers.

December 27, 1936: Charles Mattson, the 10-year-son of a wealthy surgeon, was kidnapped in Tacoma, Washington (where George Weyerhaeuser had been kidnapped in 1935, see "The Weyerhaeuser Snatch," this chapter). A masked gunman entered the Mattson home, interrupting a children's party and dragged the Mattson boy from his home, leaving a ransom note that demanded $28,000 for his safe return. Dozens of FBI agents were assigned to the case, but their efforts produced no results. Although the family was in contact with the kidnapper, final arrangements for the delivery of the ransom money were never completed. Widespread publicity on the case may have caused the abductor to panic. Nothing more was heard from the kidnapper. The frozen body of the Mattson child was found near Everett, Washington, on January 11, 1937. President Franklin D. Roosevelt expressed the national outrage at this kidnapping by stating: "The murder of the little Mattson boy has shocked the nation. Every means at our command must be enlisted to capture and punish the perpetrator of this ghastly crime." The kidnapping-killer, however, was never apprehended.

November 3, 1937: Dr. James Seder, a 79-year-old doctor living in Huntington, West Virginia, was abducted from his home by three gunmen, who demanded a $50,000 ransom for their captive's safe return. FBI agents tracked down the kidnappers to an abandoned mine, where, on November 15, 1937, Seder was rescued. His kidnappers—Orville Adkins, Arnett Booth, and John Travis—were arrested and charged with kidnapping. When the elderly Seder died from pneumonia as a result of exposure in the coal mine, the charge of murder was added to the counts against the three abductors. All three were convicted and sentenced to death, being hanged on March 31, 1938.

February 24, 1938: David Peter Levine was kidnapped while walking to school in New Rochelle, New York. His kidnappers demanded a ransom payment of $30,000, but the payment was not made and the body of the 12-year-old boy later washed ashore on Long Island Sound, his head decapitated and his corpse bound by wire. His kidnapper-killer was never found.

May 28, 1938: James Bailey Cash, Jr., the 5-year-old son of a grocer and gas station operator in Princeton, Florida, was kidnapped from his bed by 21-year-old Franklin Pierce McCall, who left a ransom note demanding $10,000 for the boy's return. The grocer delivered the money in a shoebox to McCall on a lonely road outside of town on the night of June 1, 1938. McCall, who trained a flashlight on Cash to obscure his vision in identifying him, promised the father that his son would be returned safely within a short time. The boy was not returned. A massive search ensued with more than 2,000 volunteers scouring the area. FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover flew from Washington to Florida to personally supervise the search. One of the searchers was none other than the kidnapper himself. McCall, the married son of a local minister, eagerly participated in looking for the boy he had abducted, finding another ransom note on the Cash premises—he knew the family well and had, at one time, roomed with the Cash family, learning that they had saved a little more than $10,000, which is why he specified that amount in his ransom demand. During the search, McCall made a chance remark, stating how easily it would be to break into the Cash residence and abduct the boy. This comment drew the suspicions of FBI agents and he was placed under arrest. Hoover stated on June 8, 1938, that his agents had found the victim's body in some brush a few blocks from his home. Three days later the FBI director stated that McCall was in federal custody, charged with the kidnapping-murder of the Cash boy. McCall admitted abducting the boy, but said he had killed his victim accidentally when he covered the boy's mouth with a handkerchief while taking him from his home and the child was unintentionally smothered to death. Hoover turned the case over to Florida authorities, who placed McCall on trial. He was convicted and sentenced to death by Miami Circuit Court Judge H. F. Atkinson on June 16, 1938. Jack Kehoe, McCall's defense attorney, did not file any appeals, following his client's request that none be made. McCall was executed in Florida's electric chair on February 24, 1939.

August 7, 1939: Thomas Ashwell, the 29-year-old son of a minister in Eustis, Florida, who had served time for sexual assault, abducted 17-year-old Frances Dunn and 19-year-old Jean Bolton, driving them toward West Palm Beach, Florida, on the promise to give them roles in an experimental play he had written. Near Boca Raton, Ashwell tied Bolton to a tree, then raped and murdered Dunn. Bolton, who had not witnessed the killing, persuaded Ashwell to allow her to make a call to her family to provide a second car so that the kidnapper could flee to California. Instead of calling a family member, Bolton called police, officers arriving minutes later to arrest Ashwell. He was quickly tried, convicted and sentenced to death, being electrocuted on July 29, 1940.

September 20, 1940: While playing with his nurse at his home in Hillsborough, California, 3-year-old Marc de Tristan, Jr., the son of wealthy aristocrats, was kidnapped by an abductor with a distinctive foreign accent, who dropped a ransom note as he ran off with the child. He demanded a $100,000 payment in exchange for the boy. Two days later, Cecil Wetzel, a lumberman, was stopped by a man who asked for directions. In the car next to the man sat a crying little boy. Wetzel began to question the driver, who suddenly produced a revolver, but Wetzel and a friend overpowered the driver, who proved to be Wilhelm Jacob Mulenbroich, the kidnapper. The Tristan boy was returned to his parents and Mulenbroich, a German immigrant in the U.S. for five years, was tried and convicted in Redwood City, California and, on October 4, 1940, was sentenced to life imprisonment.

October 12, 1942: Daniel Joseph Scanlon, an infant, was kidnapped from the nursery of a hospital in Columbus, Ohio. His abductor was later apprehended, along with the child, police arresting Ruby Evelyn Cremans, who had attempted to pass off the Scanlon child as her own. She was convicted of kidnapping and sent to prison.

April 1, 1943: Lee A. Burton, a suspect in several abduction-rapes occurring in Alhambra, Los Angeles and Pasadena, California, confessed to these crimes. He was later convicted of kidnapping and rape and sent to prison.

January 7, 1946: Six-year-old Suzanne Degnan was abducted from her bed in her Chicago, Illinois, home by burglar William George Heirens, who dismembered her body, placing the piecemeal remains in various street sewers throughout the city. Heirens left a ransom note demanding $20,000 for the return of the child, but the payment was never made. Heirens was later apprehended and sent to prison for life (see "Catch Me Before I Kill More," in the chapter dealing with Burglary).

William Heirens, kidnapper-killer.

June 10, 1947: Ralph W. Lobaugh entered the Kokomo, Indiana, police station to confess to three kidnapping-murders in the Fort Wayne area, these attacks involving 38-year-old Billie Haaga, who stumbled beaten and bleeding to a farm house on February 2, 1944, dying three days later; 19-year-old Anna Kuzeff, who was found strangled on August 6, 1944; and 30-year-old Mrs. Dorothea Howard, who was found severely beaten on March 7, 1945, and died nineteen days later. Lobaugh denied he had killed 19-year-old Phyllis Conine, who had suffered the same fate as the other three women in the same area and about the same time period. On June 11, 1947, Lobaugh was charged with the Kuzeff kidnapping-murder. He was tried, convicted and sentenced to death. On August 17, 1949, a 19-year-old housewife was kidnapped from her home in Fort Wayne, Indiana, her abductor raping her, but later releasing her on her promise that she would not inform police. The woman recalled the abductor's license number on his car and officers easily apprehended 30-year-old Franklin Click, a driver for a celery grower. Under intense interrogation, Click finally confessed to the abduction-murders of Haaga, Kuzeff, and Conine, but denied having attacked Dorothea Howard. Lobaugh's execution for these killings was stayed after Click's confession, which was supported in a detailed written statement he had given to his wife, who vainly attempted to collect more than $16,000 in reward money posted earlier for the perpetrator of these crimes. Click was convicted of the Conine killing and sentenced to death on March 27, 1950, receiving two stays of execution, one based on Lobaugh's new admission that he had abducted and killed Conine, even though he had originally denied commiting this crime. Lobaugh's confessions, by that time, had been dismissed as false and Click was executed in the electric chair at the Indiana State Prison in Michigan City, Indiana, on December 30, 1950. The outstanding abduction-murder for Dorothea Howard, which had kept Lobaugh on death row, was then attributed to Robert Christen, who confessed to kidnapping and killing Mrs. Howard and was sent to prison for life. Lobaugh nevertheless remained behind bars, wrongly-convicted out of his own mouth in one of the most bizarre cases in Indiana jurisprudence. Governor Henry Frederick Schricker (1883-1966) commuted Lobaugh's death sentence to a life term in 1949, but refused to pardon him on the grounds that he was "a degenerate and a homosexual, not a fit person to be free on the streets of any city, but not guilty of killing any of these three women [for which he had been convicted]." Indiana Governor Otis Bowen learned that two men had been convicted of the same kidnapping-murders, and ordered an investigation, realizing that the state had no legal grounds on which to keep Lobaugh behind bars. Bowen pardoned Lobaugh in 1977. The 60-year-old Lobaugh was moved to a halfway house, but returned to live out his life at the state prison at his own request.

May 15, 1948: June Devaney was kidnapped from her bed at Queens Park Hospital in Blackburn, Lancashire, England. The body of the 4-year-old girl was found by staff members near a wall on the hospital grounds. She had been raped and beaten to death. Scotland Yard fingerprint experts found a set of fingerprints on a water bottle next to the victim's bed, as well as fibers from the socks of the kidnapper (who had apparently taken off his shoes and walked in his socks while abducting the child). All of the staff members and patients of the hospital were fingerprinted and one set matched those of 22-year-old Peter Griffiths, a former Irish guardsman. The sock fibers were also matched to those worn by Griffiths. It was discovered that he had pawned a bloodstained suit after the kidnapping and the blood matched that of the victim. Convicted, Griffiths was hanged at Walton Prison on November 19, 1948.

July 16, 1948: Four Chinese gunmen led by Wong Io, skyjacked a Cathay Pacific Catalina flying from Macau to Hong Kong, with twenty-five persons on board. When the pilots refused to turn over the controls of the plane, a shootout ensued, and pilots Dale Cramer and K. S. McDuff were killed. One of the skyjackers attempted to fly the plane, but crashed it about ten miles outside of Macau. All in the plane were killed, except the ringleader, Wong Io—he had intended to make ransom demands, but never got the chance. Portuguese and British authorities could not agree on jurisdiction in the case and the skyjacker, incredibly, was not prosecuted.

November 9, 1950: Dr. Nancy Campbell kidnapped Linda Stram from her home in Santa Fe, New Mexico, demanding a ransom payment of $20,000. She was arrested when she attempted to collect the ransom money and was later sent to prison.

July 10, 1951: The body of 7-year-old Christine Butcher, of Windsor, England, was discovered by police. The girl had been strangled to death, but her abductor-killer went undetected. On July 15, 1951, 5-year-old Brenda Goddard disappeared in the same area, her body later found strangled. Police visited John Thomas Straffen, who had a long history of mental problems and who had been institutionalized in 1947 for burglary. Straffen, who had an IQ of 58, was fired on July 31, 1951, after his employer learned that police had questioned him about the kidnapping-murders of the two children. Straffen, who later confessed to these killings, took his revenge on the police by kidnapping yet another girl, 9-year-old Cicely Batstone, on August 8, 1951, when she was leaving a movie theater. He strangled her in a field, leaving her corpse behind a hedge. Police soon arrested and charged him with this abduction-murder after eye-witnesses came forward to state that they had seen Straffen with the girl. Judged incompetent to stand trial in all three cases involving the abducted and strangled girls, Straffen was sent to Broadmoor, an asylum for the criminally insane. He escaped six months later, walking seven miles distant to the village of Farley Hill, where he abducted 5-year-old Linda Bowyer, strangling her. He was recaptured five hours later. Straffen was convicted of this murder on July 25, 1952, and was sentenced to death, but his hanging was later commuted to life imprisonment.

January 16, 1954: Leonard Moskovitz was kidnapped in San Francisco by Harold Jackson and Joseph Lear. The abductors demanded a ransom payment of $500,000, then reduced the amount to $300,000, but before the payment was made the victim was rescued. Both Jackson and Lear were convicted and sent to prison.

June 9, 1954: Evelyn Ann Smith, the wife of Herbert Smith, an executive with a pipe and steel company, was abducted in Phoenix, Arizona. Her kidnapper demanded a ransom payment of $75,000, which was paid. Mrs. Smith was released unharmed and her abductor, Daniel Joseph Marsin was later arrested and imprisoned.

June 20, 1955: Patricia Ann Waters, accepted a ride to a swimming pool near her home outside of Rome, Georgia. The driver, however, went to a small store in Stilesboro, where he stopped to buy cigarettes. Waters waved frantically to the storeowners from the car, but her gestures were dismissed as the antics of a teenager. The driver then took the 15-year-old girl to a nearby woods and raped and strangled her to death, weighting her body and tossing the corpse into the Etowah River. A widespread search ensued and several suspects were picked up, including Willie Grady Cochran (1919-1956), who had, by the time he was twenty-one, been convicted of fogery, robbery and rape, had escaped from a Georgia chain gang and had been sent to prison in 1940 to serve twenty years. Police learned that Cochran, who had been paroled only six months earlier, had been missing from work on the day of the Waters disappearance. He was taken to the store in Stilesboro, where the owners identified him as the man driving a car in which the Waters girl sat. Cochran quickly confessed, saying: "I knew that I was either going to kill that girl or myself, and then I decided that she was going to be the one to go." Cochran led officers to the location where he had dumped the victim's body and it was retrieved from the river bottom. Tried at Cartersville, Georgia, Cochran was convicted of kidnapping and murder, on July 15, 1955. He was sentenced to death and his execution was conducted on April 13, 1956 at the state prison at Reidsville, Georgia.

August 4, 1955: A prominent socialite in Kansas City, Missouri, Mrs. Wilma Frances Allen, whose husband operated a successful car dealership, was abducted as she got into her Chevrolet convertible outside of a beauty parlor, her kidnapper robbing her and then driving to a remote area outside the city, where he may have raped her before killing her by firing two bullets into her head, then dumping her naked body into a reed-covered gulley. Police later found the missing woman's abandoned car, with her blood-stained clothes in the trunk. On August 7, 1955, a Kansas farmer found the victim's body. Since the victim had been driven across a state line in an obvious kidnapping, FBI agents immediately addressed the case, suspecting Arthur Ross Brown (1925-1956) as being the abductor of Mrs. Allen. The suspect had a long criminal career and was a parole violator from California, having been on a robbery spree through Florida, Texas, Indiana and Wyoming. Brown was already wanted for wounding a sheriff in Wyoming. On August 31, 1955, a Kansas City resident called police to say that his neighbor, Mrs. Arthur Ross Brown had been abducted at gunpoint by her estranged husband and was incoherent when she was returned to her home. Her husband had by then disappeared. FBI agents staked out all of the residences where the suspect had relatives, including his mother's home in San Jose, California. When interviewed by agents, the woman appeared terrified, telling them that "my son is mad." Agents tapped Mrs. Brown's phone and recorded a call from Brown to his mother on November 13, 1955, one in which the escaped felon stated he had tried to visit her, but thought he saw a police trap and fled. He then told his mother that he was thinking of killing himself. That night, officers picked up Brown sleeping in his car outside his aunt's house in San Francisco. He confessed to shooting the sheriff in Wyoming and then added: "But where I'm really wanted is Kansas City." He then confessed to kidnapping and murdering Mrs. Allen, saying that he did not originally intend to kill her, stating: "I was looking for someone to rob. She looked wealthy." Though he attempted to plead insanity, court-appointed psychiatrists determined Brown sane. He was convicted in a jury trial, sentenced to death, and was executed in the gas chamber at the Missouri State Prison on February 24, 1956.

August 27, 1955: Chicagoan Emmett Louis Till, a 14-year-old black boy visiting his great uncle, Moses Wright, was kidnapped by two young white men, Roy Bryant and Bryant's half-brother, J. W. Milam, from Wright's house outside of Money, Mississippi. Three days earlier, according to later reports, Till had entered the Bryant store and tried to sexually molest 21-year-old Carolyn Bryant, the storeowner's wife, grabbing her, wolf-whistling and telling her, as she later claimed: "Don't be afraid of me, baby. I ain't gonna hurt you. I been with white girls before." In retaliation, Roy Bryant and Milam abducted Till, and reportedly shot the boy dead near Glendora, Mississippi, tied a 100-pound fan to his neck with barbed wire and dropped his body into the Tallahatchie River. Following a widespread hunt for Till, Moses Wright identified Bryant and Milam as his nephew's kidnappers. Both were arrested, the defendants tried in Tallahatchie County, Mississippi. They admitted abducting and beating Till, but insisted that they had not killed him. Sheriff Harold Strider reported that the body of the black boy recovered from the Tallahatchie River could not be identified as that of Till, and then told an all-white jury that Till was probably alive and living in Chicago and that the body found in the river was undoubtedly the corpse of some other black boy and that it had been placed in the river by the NAACP to stage a phony murder that could be blamed on innocent white people. The jury agreed and shocked the nation by acquitting Bryant and Milam in a little more than an hour on September 23, 1955. Sheriff Strider had reportedly told jury members to take their time in their deliberation in order to make their decision "look good." Strider then publicly stated to TV news crews: "I hope the Chicago niggers and the NAACP are satisfied."

September 19, 1955: Robert Marcus, a 2-day-old child of Dr. Sanford Marcus, was kidnapped from the fourth floor of the maternity ward at San Francisco's Mt. Zion Hospital. Before the duty nurse in the ward was called away on an emergency, she noticed a heavyset blonde woman standing at the nursery window and holding a folded pink blanket. When the nurse returned to her post, the woman was gone, and, upon checking, discovered that the Marcus baby was no longer in his crib. Dr. Marcus went public with the story, saying through the press to the abductor that he would not press charges against the kidnapper if his child was safely returned. He and hospital officials offered a reward of $6,000 for information that would lead to the discovery of the Marcus child. The San Francisco Police Department launched a massive search for the baby, with more than 600 of its officers (more than one third of the entire force) searching more than 260,000 homes in the Bay area. No results were forthcoming until September 27, 1955, when a deputy sheriff attending a boxing match in Stockton, California, spotted an obese blonde woman holding a baby, as she watched the fights with a dark-skinned male companion. The deputy thought that the woman matched the rough police sketch modeled after the nurse's description of the kidnapper. Following the boxing match, the deputy detained the couple and demanded a birth certificate for the child. The couple, Mark and Betty Jean Benedicto, produced a birth certificate stating that the child had been born to them in Lynwood's St. Francis Hospital. He allowed the couple to go free, but then called the hospital to verify the birth certificate. By then, realizing that she had been identified, Betty Jean Benedicto, on September 28, 1955, appeared at St. Mary's Church in Stockton, California, with the child. Church officials called the police and the Marcus family. Within minutes, detectives arrived to retrieve the child, who was in good health, and placed Benedicto under arrest. Dr. Marcus and his wife arrived minutes later and were reunited with their child. Betty Jean Benedicto, married to a Filipino twice her age, had concealed in their marriage her inability to have children, having earlier had a hysterectomy. She convinced him, she said, that she had become pregnant and purposely put on weight to make herself appear to be pregnant. She then kidnapped the Marcus child (picked at random) and remained apart from her husband, who thought she had given birth to the baby while in the care of Jean's mother. Mark Benedicto was not arrested, later telling officials that his wife was an alcoholic. The kidnapper's own mother called her a "psychotic liar," and that she warranted "no sympathy" for her crime. Psychiatrists examining the woman, reported that she suffered from paranoid schizophrenia—she told them that the Marcus child had been delivered to her by none other than the Virgin Mary—and their recommendations that she be institutionalized at the Mendocino State Hospital for treatment were accepted and officially enacted.

October 15-16, 1955: Three boys, John Schuessler, thirteen, his 11-year-old brother, Anton Schuessler, and 14-year-old Robert Peterson, disappeared in the evening on Chicago's Milwaukee Avenue, near a bowling alley, telling friends, Bruce and Glen Carter, that they were going horse riding at the Idle Hour Stable (a horse farm owned by Silas Jayne, later notorious in a sensational case where he was accused of murdering his own brother, George Jayne, a rival in the horse breeding business). The boys also told friends, while they shared a bottle of Green River soda, that they were to be picked up by a man named "Hansen." The naked bodies of the three boys, all strangled to death, were found in a ditch in a forest preserve on October 18, 1955. Police investigators and mobs of reporters trampled the crime scene and obliterated any clues, except one. Found impressed upon one of John Schuessler's thighs was the word "Bear," which served only to add another perplexing wrinkle in the baffling case, which was not solved until 1994, when informant William "Red" Wemette, told police that then 61-year-old Kenneth Hansen, a homosexual predator and child molester, who worked at the Idle Hour Stable, had admitted the abduction-murders of Robert Peterson and the Schuessler brothers. About the same time, the Carter brothers testified in signed statements that the three boys had been waiting for a man named "Hansen," saying that they had not given police any information at the time of the kidnap-ping-murders because their mother forbade them to tell what they knew, fearing that her sons might also be abducted and murdered. Then Roger Spry, who had been one of Hansen's lovers, testified that Hansen had also told him that he had murdered the three boys. Further, Spry told police that Hansen admitted torching the Idle Hour stables in 1956, when he thought detectives were closing in on him. One of the horses dying in that fire was named "Bear," and Hansen explained to Spry that while John Schuessler's body briefly lay in the stable, the boy's thigh rested on a saddle bearing the horse's name and this left the impression on the skin. (Hansen was a suspect in several subsequent fires at horse ranches, where animals were reportedly killed to collect insurance money.) Herbert Hollatz, another one of Hansen's homosexual lovers, also told police that Hansen had admitted killing the three boys, but warned him that if he said a word about it, he would be killed by his brother, Curt Hansen, an enforcer for the Chicago Mafia/syndicate (he died in 1993). Thus, the brutal Hansen, through threat and intimidation, had silenced all who knew of his crime for four decades, until Wemette began talking to police. Hansen was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment in 1995.

Three Chicago kidnap-murder victims, left to right, Robert Peterson, John Schuessler and Anton Schuessler.

National guardsmen and police officers sweeping a field in search of the missing boys.

Mr. and Mrs. Anton Schuessler, shown at the time they received news that their abducted sons had been slain.

Imprisoned for the murders of Peterson and the Schuessler boys, Kenneth Hansen's conviction was overturned in 2000.

October 2, 1956: Teenager Myrna Aken was kidnapped by Clarence G. Van Buuren in Durban, South Africa. Buuren, who had a long criminal record, borrowed his employer's car, a Ford Anglia, to drive Aken sixty miles south of the city, where he raped and murdered her, stuffing her corpse into a culvert. Nelson Palmer, a medium, reportedly "envisioned" the murder site and accompanied Aken's parents to the spot, where the girl's body was recovered. Buuren was tracked to Pinetown, where he was arrested. He was identified by eyewitnesses as being the man who drove off with the victim. He was convicted and later executed, denying his guilt to the end.

September 22, 1957: Lee Crary was kidnapped from his home in Everett, Washington, his abductor demanding a $10,000 ransom payment for his safe return. The plucky 8-year-old boy, however, managed to escape three days later. He then led police officers back to the kidnapper's hideout, where George Edward Collins, Jr., was arrested. Collins was convicted of kidnapping and sent to prison for life.

December 28, 1956: Chicago sisters, Barbara Grimes, a 15-year-old sophomore at Kelly High School, and Patricia Grimes, a 13-year-old seventh-grade student at St. Maurice School, vanished after seeing a movie. Their naked bodies were found in a remote south side area on January 23, 1957. Presumed by police to have been kidnapped, the girls had been sexually molested and then killed, their abductor-murderer never apprehended. (See Murder, Unsolved Murders.)

April 15, 1958: Luring 7-year-old Joachim Goehner into a woods outside of Stuttgart, Germany, 40-year-old Emil Tilman, a gardener, asked the boy about his family, and, when learning that he came from substantial wealth, strangled Goehner and hid his body in the forest. Tilman then demanded a ransom of 15,000 marks from the Goehner family, but before the money was collected by the kidnapper, Tilman's voice was recognized on police tape recordings of his phone calls to Goehner family members. He was arrested and confessed to the abduction and murder, stating that he had sought money in order to persuade his married mistress to abandon her husband and live with him. Tilman avoided trial by hanging himself with a bed sheet in his cell on May 26, 1958.

January 2, 1959: Lisa Rose Chionchio, a newborn child, was kidnapped from a hospital nursery in Brooklyn, New York, by Jean Iavarone, who thought to pass the child off as her own. The baby was located and returned to her family. Iavarone was convicted of kidnapping and sent to prison.

June 4, 1959: Becky Holt, a 3-year-old girl living in Philadelphia, was kidnapped by her neighbor, 15-year-old Edward J. Cooney, Jr., who took her to the basement of his own home and, when she resisted his sexual advances, strangled the girl to death. Cooney confessed to the abduction-murder only hours after committing the crime. An honor student, who had been described as "well-adjusted," Cooney was tried as a juvenile after psychiatrists determined that he was "emotionally troubled." He was sent to the State Industrial School at Camp Hill, Pennsylvania, and was released on his twenty-first birthday.

February 9, 1960: Millionaire brewer Adolph Coors III, chairman of the board for the Adolph Coors Company, vanished while driving to a business meeting at Golden from his home in Morrison, Colorado. His abandoned car, the motor running and the radio playing, was found on a narrow bridge spanning Turkey Creek. There was no trace of Coors, although police believed he had been kidnapped. A ransom note demanding a $500,000 payment was received by Coors family members the following day. The payment was made, but Coors was not returned. FBI agents, meanwhile, learned that the typewriter used to write the ransom note had been purchased in a Denver, Colorado, store on October 8, 1959, and identified a car that had been seen near the Turkey Creek bridge as having been purchased in Denver on January 8, 1960. The identities given for the purchases of the typewriter and the car were aliases belonging to the same man, the kidnapper, agents concluded. One of the aliases, "Walter Osborne," was identified as an employee of a Denver paint company, who had worked under that name for three years. The company file containing information on "Osborne," however had been emptied. Agents then learned that the firm had industrial insurance records for "Osborne," which listed only one beneficiary, a man named Joseph Corbett, Jr. Fingerprints taken from "Osborne's" apartment in Denver matched those of Corbett, an escaped convict with a long criminal record. On March 5, 1960, Corbett was placed on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list. Corbett's car was found abandoned, gutted by fire, on March 14, 1960, in Atlantic City, New Jersey. Soil found beneath the fenders of the car matched the dirt found near the Turkey Creek bridge. On September 11, 1960, the remains of Adolph Coors were found by hikers. A resident in Toronto, Canada, reading a magazine that published Corbett's photo, contacted police, telling officers that the wanted man was a former worker at a Toronto warehouse. A widespread search through Canada unearthed several identities used by Corbett. He was finally tracked down at a rooming house in Vancouver, British Columbia, on October 29, 1960, where Corbett was using the alias of "Thomas Wainwright." Corbett was extradited to Colorado, where he was convicted of the kidnapping-murder of Adolph Coors III on March 29, 1961. He was sent to prison for life without parole.

Joseph Corbett, Jr., the evasive, clever kidnapper of Adolph Coors III.

July 4, 1960: Pietro Crasta, a wealthy cheese seller, was kidnapped while driving toward Nuoro, Italy. His abductors demanded a ransom payment of $6,000, but when this amount was not forthcoming, Crasta's body was found on August 16, 1960. Three men were later arrested and sent to prison for the kidnapping.

August 16, 1960: The son of Graeme Thorne, winner of a lottery in Sydney, Australia, was found dead after having been kidnapped by Stephen Leslie and Magda Bradley, who demanded a ransom payment of £25,000. Both were apprehended and sent to prison for life.

August 16, 1960: Avil Terry, eleven, was abducted in downtown Boonville, Indiana, while shopping for birthday gifts for her younger sister. Following a massive search for the missing girl, police arrested Emmett Oliver Hashfield (1907-1974), who had a long record of child molestation, rape and abduction. Hashfield's shack was found to be covered in blood, which he had attempted to disguise by spreading about catsup. After he was questioned, Hashfield admitted abducting the Terry girl and led police to the banks of the Ohio River, where officers found pieces of her body over a widespread area. Hashfield confessed to kidnapping the girl, taking her to the riverbank and raping her, then disemboweling and dissecting her body, decapitating her head and strewing the remains. He later claimed that he had eaten her intestines, but this self-proclaimed cannibalism was dismissed as an attempt to fake insanity. Hashfield was convicted of kidnapping and murder and was sentenced to death on November 5, 1962. His death sentence was commuted when the U.S. Surpreme Court abolished capital punishment in 1972. Hashfield died in prison on February 1, 1974, from complications following a tonsillectomy.

June 5, 1961: Joan Rae Caudle, a housewife in Portland, Oregon, disappeared, her husband filing a missing report. Boys playing in a vacant lot on the southeast side of Portland discovered the dismembered remains of a woman three days later. Nine days after that gruesome discovery, fingerprint experts matched those of the corpse to that of the missing Mrs. Caudle. Informers told police that the murdered woman had been seen drinking in a bar with Richard Lawrence Marquette, a Portland native with a long criminal career, including charges of rape and robbery. On June 29, 1961, Marquette, thought to be a dangerous predator, was placed on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list. He was identified as a repairman of used furniture in Santa Maria, California, and was arrested, admitting to FBI agents that he had kidnapped and murdered Mrs. Caudle, then led them to more remains of her body which had not yet been discovered. He was convicted and sent to prison for life, but, like so many similar recidivists, he was paroled twelve years later, only to kill again. Betty Wilson was abducted and dismembered by Marquette in April 1975. He was again tracked down and sent back to prison to serve a life term.

March 9, 1963: At about 10 p.m., LAPD officers Ian Campbell and Karl Hettinger, while on their Hollywood patrol, stopped a 1946 Ford coupe with Nevada license plates. The reason the officers had stopped the car was because the small light over the rear license plate was burned out. The officers were surprised by the two occupants of the car, Gregory Ulas Powell and Jimmy Lee Smith, a black who used the alias of Youngblood. Both were convicted felons. Powell trained a gun on the officers, disarming them and taking them with his car to a remote onion field near Bakersfield, while Smith held a gun on the officers. Powell ordered the officers from his car and then shot Campbell five times, killing him. Hettinger raced away into the darkness and managed to escape; he was picked up later by a farm worker. Both Powell and Smith were later apprehended and convicted of kidnapping and murder on September 4, 1963, being sentenced to death eight days later. California's supreme court decided in July 1967, that there had been enough irregularities in the arrest and interrogations of the two killers to warrant a second trial. Both were again convicted, Powell again sentenced to death, but Smith receiving a life term. The state supreme court ruled in 1972 that any official execution was "cruel and unusual" punishment and Powell's execution was commuted to life imprisonment. Smith was paroled in 1982, but several more offenses sent him back to prison. Powell has repeatedly attempted to obtain a parole, but these requests have been routinely denied. Joseph Wambaugh's best-selling novel, The Onion Field, made this kidnapping-murder case famous.

June 12, 1963: Obsessed with Nazism and pornography, 25-year-old Ian Brady, of Manchester, England, along with his girlfriend, 21-year-old Myra Hindley kidnapped and killed 16-year-old Pauline Reade, the first of five known murders committed by the pair. The Reade girl, sexually attacked, her throat slashed, was buried in nearby moors (which later earned the killers the sobriquet of the "Moors Murderers"). On November 23, 1963, the couple abducted and killed 12-year-old John Kilbride, who was reported missing from Ashton-under-Lyne. Keith Bennett, a 12-year-old boy who was last seen near the home of Brady's mother, was reported missing on June 16, 1964, murdered by Brady and Hindley. On December 26, 1964, 10-year-old Lesley Ann Downey was abducted and murdered by Brady and Hindley. Emboldened by their many kidnapping-murders, Brady and Hindley permitted Hindley's brother-in-law, David Smith, to witness their next killing, that of 17-year-old Edward Evans, on October 6, 1965. Smith notified police and the murderous pair were arrested. On May 6, 1966, they were convicted of the abduction-murders of Downey, Evans and Kilbride. In the Downey case, officials retrieved the bloody hatchet used by Brady to kill the girl, along with a tape of her last moments sadistically recorded by the thrill-seeking Hindley and one in which the tragic girl vainly pleaded for her life. The killers were sent to prison for life. In 1987, Brady and Hindley confessed to kidnapping and killing Reade and Bennett. Reade's body was found on Saddleworth Moor, but the corpse of the Bennett boy was never located. In that same year, Brady notified officials by mail that he had been responsible for another five killings. Though Brady insisted that he would never seek parole, Hindley campaigned for her freedom for many years. In 1998, an appeals court decided that she would remain in prison until she died. Myra Hindley died in a hospital prison on November 15, 2002, from a chest infection. She was sixty.

Killer Ian Brady.

Killer Myra Hindley.

December 8, 1963: While preparing to have dinner in his room at Harrah's Lodge next to Lake Tahoe in Stateline, Nevada, Frank Sinatra, Jr., the son of one of America's most famous singers, was kidnapped by two gunmen posing as room service waiters. The two men burst through the door to tie up musician Joe Foss, Sinatra's dinner companion, then dragged the 19-year-old Sinatra from the room. As the abductors drove their captive to Los Angeles, where he would be held in a hideout for ransom, Foss broke free of his bounds and called police. Frank Sinatra, Sr. called Peter Lawford, a member of the "Rat Pack," and the brother-in-law of President John F. Kennedy, who, in turn, contacted U.S. Attorney General Robert Kennedy. A small army of FBI agents immediately began the search for the abducted Sinatra youth. Sinatra Sr. received the first call from the kidnappers on December 9, and, before hearing any demand, offered $1 million in cash for the safe return of his son. The kidnappers, however, followed their own previously scripted demand of only $240,000. Sinatra Sr. agreed and then flew to Los Angeles. The ransom money was counted out at the City National Bank of Beverly Hills and Sinatra Sr., accompanied by a lone FBI agent, delivered the ransom money. A few hours later, the victim was released, a policeman recognizing Sinatra Jr. walking along a dark street in Bel Air and driving him to his mother's nearby home. On December 13, FBI agents tracked down and arrested Barry Worthington Keenan and Joseph Clyde Amsler, both twenty-three, who had performed the kidnapping and 42-year-old John Irwin, who had placed the call to Sinatra Sr. At his trial, Keenan insisted that there was no kidnapping, that Sinatra Jr. had been part of a hoax, a trumped-up abduction aimed at bolstering publicity for his failing singing career. The jury rejected this explanation and convicted all three men. Keenan and Amsler received life terms for kidnapping, plus seventy-five years for additional, lesser charges. Irwin was sentenced to sixteen years and eight months. Keenan spent less than five years in prison. He was declared legally insane at the time of the kidnapping and his sentence was reduced. He was paroled in 1968. He later cut a deal to sell his side of the story on the abduction to Columbia Pictures for $485,000, but, in 1998, Sinatra Jr. filed a suit to prevent Keenan from receiving the money, his attorneys citing a law that prevents convicted felons from profiting by telling the stories of their crimes. On February 2, 2002, the California Supreme Court struck down the state's so-called "Son of Sam" law (based on the New York law that prohibited David Berkowitz of the "Son of Sam" murders from gleaning book or film profits by telling his story about the crimes, that 1977 New York law struck down by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1991).

Frank Sinatra, Jr., nineteen, is shown with his sister Tina and mother, Nancy, after his release from kidnappers, who had held him for fifty-four hours.

March 31, 1964: The body of David Robinson, a child kidnapped in Mount Pleasant, South Carolina, was discovered. His abductor and killer, Joseph Francis, Jr., was later arrested, convicted of the crime and sent to prison.

May 23, 1964: Madeleine Dessault, wife of an airplane manufacturer, was kidnapped in Paris, France, but was released unharmed the next day. Three suspects were later arrested.

July 20, 1965: Frances Johnson, a 58-year-old door-to-door cosmetic sales woman, disappeared from her Tampa, Florida, home. The following day, a Dade County gas station attendant noticed blood dripping from the trunk of a car at one of his pumps. The attendant wrote down the license plate of the car and called the police. The car was later found abandoned and was identified as belonging to the missing Johnson. Fingerprints found on the car matched the prints of Hoyt Budd Cobb, who had broken out of the state prison at Jesup, Georgia, the previous April. The gas station attendant identified Cobb's prison photo as the man who had gassed up Johnson's car at his station. Cobb had been serving a life term for murdering a holdup victim. On September 26, 1965, Johnson's badly decomposed body was found on a footpath northeast of Tampa, Florida. On January 6, 1966, Cobb's name was placed on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list. FBI agents received a tip five months later and located Cobb in Hialeah, Florida, where he had been living under the alias of "Robert Jones." The fugitive surrendered without a fight and was tried and convicted of kidnapping and murdering Johnson. He was returned to prison to serve out two life terms which ran concurrently. In December 1989, Cobb was released on parole.

May 17, 1966: Joseph "Joe Bananas" Bonnano, head of a New York City Mafia family, turned himself into police authorities, who had been searching for him after Bonnano had reportedly been kidnapped and held hostage for nineteen months by rival Mafia members (see "Columbo Goes Public," in chapter on Gangs, Gangsters and Organized Crime).

January 6, 1967: Betty Hill, a 42-year-old housewife, was held hostage in her own home by an intruder in Boulder, Colorado, a $50,000 ransom demanded for her release. Her husband paid the ransom and the woman was released unharmed several days later. This victim is not to be confused with the Betty Hill of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, who, along with her husband, Barney Hill, claimed to have been abducted, examined and brainwashed in September 1961 by aliens while being held captive on their space ship!

April 3, 1967: Taken from his Beverly Hills, California, home, 11-year-old John Kenneth Young was held for a $250,000 ransom, which was paid. The boy was released unharmed on April 6, 1967, found blindfolded and bound in a car parked in a garage in Santa Monica, California. The boy was the son of Herbert J. Young, president of the Gibraltar Savings & Loan Association. A two-year FBI search resulted in the arrest of 38-year-old Ronald Lee Miller, a former IRS agent, who was indicted for the Young abduction on March 31, 1970, only three days before the statute of limitations ran out. Miller was convicted of kidnapping and was sentenced to a life term without the possibility of parole on November 2, 1970. Agents did not recover the ransom money.

John Kenneth Young, eleven, is shown reunited with his parents after they paid abductors $250,000.

June 30, 1967: A British-owned and operated HS125 air taxi was skyjacked by gun-wielding Francois-Joseph Bodenan, who had ostensibly chartered the plane to fly from Palma de Mallorca to Ibiza, Spain, for a business trip, which included fellow passenger Moise Tshombe, former prime minister of Zaire and the secessionist Katanga Province. Bodenan had lured Tshombe on board in order to deliver him to authorities in Algiers, where he believed Tshombe would be extradited to Zaire for his participation in the assassination of his political rival, Patrice Lumumba in 1961. The plane landed in Algiers, where Tshombe was detained, while Zaire officials sought Tshombe's extradition; he had been sentenced to death in absentia on March 13, 1967 for ordering Lumumba's murder. Tshombe was held under house arrest while the case slowly proceeded through the Algerian supreme court, but Tshombe died of a heart attack on June 29, 1969, before he could be extradited. Bodenan, meanwhile, was released. He was later arrested in Switzerland, where Spanish officials sought his extradition on charges of air piracy and kidnapping. Swiss officials granted the extradition on August 13, 1973, but Bodenan, free on bond, had fled and was never apprehended.

August 19, 1967: Christine Anne Darby was kidnapped in Walsall, England, by Raymond Leslie Morris, who sexually assaulted the 7-year-old child, then suffocated her to death. Morris was apprehended and sent to prison for life.

March 26, 1968: Graziano Mesina, a Sardinian outlaw, was arrested, confessing to the kidnappings of Nino Petretto, son of an auto dealer, and Giovanni Campus, a wealthy landholder, both victims from Ozieri, Italy. The abductions had occurred not long before Mesina's capture. He was imprisoned.

August 28, 1968: Robert L. Dacy, a 39-year-old former convict, kidnapped 4-year-old Stanley Stalford, Jr., from his home in Beverly Hills, California. A short time later, Dacy called the boy's father, who was chairman of the Fidelity Bank in Beverly Hills, and demanded a ransom payment of $250,000. When the ransom payment was to be made on August 30, 1968, Dacy, believing he was driving into a police trap, drove off, but an FBI agent pursued and rammed his car into the auto driven by the kidnapper, capturing him and retrieving unharmed the Stalford boy, who was in the car at the time. Dacy was later convicted and imprisoned.

April 10, 1969: Camelia Jo Hand was abducted from her home in Ocoee, Florida, by Kenneth Ray Wright, who attacked and murdered the child. Wright was sent to prison for life.

May 10, 1969: Anne Katherine Jenkins was kidnapped from her apartment in Baltimore, Maryland, her father paying a $10,000 ransom for the safe return of the young woman. Police suspected Edward Lee Hull and Marie Calvert as being the perpetrators.

September 7, 1969: Mary Nelles was abducted near Toronto, Ontario, her captors demanding and receiving a ransom payment of $200,000. The victim was released unharmed and the kidnappers later caught and imprisoned.

October 24, 1969: Michel Fauqueux abducted Sophie Duguet, the daughter of a wealthy farmer outside of Soissons, France, demanding a ransom payment of £75,000. When the payment was made, the girl was released. Fauqueux later went to prison.

November 5, 1969: The body of Patrick Dolan was found outside of Sao Paulo, Brazil. Dolan, the teenage son of a U.S. businessman, had been kidnapped and a ransom of $12,500 had been paid. His killers were never located.

December 29, 1969: Peggy Rahn and Wendy Brown Stevenson, two children living in Pompano Beach, Florida, disappeared and were not seen again. Police concluded that both children had been abducted.

January 8, 1970: Mared Malarik and Karen Ferrell, both 19-year-old students at the state university in Morgantown, West Virginia, vanished and a widespread search for the girls produced no results. A medium later contacted a newspaper and described the site where the bodies of the girls could be found. Police located the corpses, both decapitated, by following the medium's directions, on April 16, 1970. Six years later, prison inmate Eugene Clawson confessed to the double kidnapping-murders. He was convicted and given life sentences, but immediately recanted his confession and most believe he was innocent of the murders. The missing heads of the girls were never found. The medium involved in the case, said the real killers were two men, a black man and a white man with blue eyes. They were never located.

August 7, 1970: The black militant movement was at its height in the U.S., when 17-year-old Jonathan Jackson invaded a Marin County courtroom in San Rafael, to abduct a presiding judge and jurors in an effort to release three black prisoners. Jackson was a black militant and bodyguard for black activist Angela Yvonne Davis, who was the lover of Jonathan's older brother, George Jackson, a Black Panther leader and inmate at Soledad Prison, who had, along with others, been charged with murdering a prison guard on January 16, 1970. Jonathan Jackson, armed with four weapons owned by Angela Davis, entered the courtroom of 65-year-old Superior Court Judge Harold Haley, producing an M1 Carbine and stating: "I'm taking over now." He gave guns to three black San Quentin prisoners—37-year-old James McClain, 27-year-old Arthur Christmas, and 31-year-old Ruchell Magee. At the time, McClain was being tried for stabbing a San Quentin guard and Christmas and Magee were present as witnesses in that case. The four blacks trained their weapons on Judge Haley—taping a sawed-off shotgun to Haley's neck—Deputy District Attorney Gary Thomas and three female jurors, forcing them to march in front of them as they left the court building and using them as shields to enter Jonathan Jackson's rented van, which was parked outside the courthouse. When the kidnappers and their hostages got into the van, more than 100 armed officers swarmed about the vehicle, training their weapons on the van. Blazing gunfire suddenly erupted—it was never determined who opened fire first, the kidnappers or the lawmen—the fusillade killing Judge Haley, Jonathan Jackson, James McClain and Arthur Christmas. Gary Thomas was paralyzed after being shot in the spine. Kidnapper Ruchell Magee was slightly wounded as was juror Maria Graham. Two other jurors went unscathed. Angela Davis was then vainly hunted, charged with masterminding the Marin County massacre and placed on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list. She was captured two months later hiding out in a New York motel and placed on trial, charged with murder, kidnapping and conspiracy. She explained in court that Jonathan Jackson had acted on his own, that she had no part in the courthouse kidnapping and that Jackson had stolen the four legally registered guns from her without her knowledge. Jurors believed her story and acquitted her of all charges on June 4, 1972.

Angela Davis, center, is escorted to her trial for the kidnap-killings in Marin County, California; she was acquitted.

April 5, 1971: Renate Putz, the 16-year-old daughter of wealthy parents, was kidnapped from her home in Munich, Germany. Her parents did not return from a vacation until sixteen days later to discover the ransom note left by her abductors, in which DM 300,000 had been demanded. By that time, the girl had been slain.

May 12, 1971: The manager of a U.S.-operated gold mine in Bolivia, was kidnapped by the impoverished natives of a small village, who demanded the ransom of a tractor in order to build a vital road. The tractor was delivered and the manager was released. None of the kidnappers were prosecuted.

June 7, 1971: Alfred Kuser, the Swiss manager of Volcan, a metallurgical firm, was abducted in Bolivia and released after a ransom of $40,000 was paid.

June 12, 1971: Threatening crew members with a pistol, Gregory White, a 22-year-old Chicagoan, skyjacked TWA Flight 358m en route from Chicago to Albuquerque, New Mexico. While airborne, Howard Franks, a 65-year-old passenger, was shot and killed by White, when Franks tried to subdue the skyjacker. White demanded, after the plane flew from Albuquerque to New York City, that he receive a ransom payment of $75,000 and a machine gun, as well as a safe flight to North Vietnam. FBI agents boarded the plane and captured White in a shootout in which one agent was wounded. White was later judged mentally unfit for trial and was sent to an insane asylum on October 7, 1971.

July 2, 1971: Robert Lee Jackson, a 36-year-old native of Townsend, Tennessee, along with his 23-year-old Guatemalan girlfriend, Lydia Sanchez, skyjacked Braniff Flight 14, while it was en route from Acapulco, Mexico, to San Antonio, Texas, with 102 passengers aboard. Jackson demanded a ransom of $100,000 and had the pilot land the plane at Monterrey, Mexico. Getting little response, Jackson ordered the plane airborne, which then flew to Lima, Peru, and then on to Rio de Janeiro. Police in Rio tried to board the plane and arrest the skyjackers, but Jackson ordered the pilot to take off once more, this time flying to Buenos Aires. Argentinian officials rejected any notions of negotiations and more than 300 policemen surrounded the plane in a 16-hour siege. Jackson and Sanchez then surrendered and were jailed for trial. They were convicted in a Buenos Aires court, Jackson being sentenced to five years in prison. Sanchez was given a three-year prison term.

November 3, 1971: Linda Sutherlin, a resident of Houston, Texas, was reported missing and the same day the body of 16-year-old Adele Crabtree was discovered outside Conroe, Texas. Sutherlin's corpse was discovered near Pearland on November 8, 1971. Detectives learned that Sutherlin had been seen in a bar with truck driver Harry Lanham, who was picked up and interrogated. At first, Lanham would tell investigators nothing, but after repeated questioning in April 1972, he implicated a friend and fellow truck driver, 24-year-old Anthony Knoppa, in the Sutherlin and Crabtree cases, saying that he and Knoppa had been routinely kidnapping and raping girls and young women in the Houston area for some time, and that Knoppa was a killer, "having his own graveyard." Knoppa was arrested and he and Lanham were charged in the two killings. Knoppa insisted that Lanham was the killer of the two girls. Both men had criminal records involving prior rapes. Two earlier rape-murders—13-year-old Colette Wilson of Alvin, Texas, and Gloria Gonzalez of Houston—were then attributed to Lanham. Both Lanham and Knoppa were convicted in the kidnappings and murders of Crabtree and Sutherlin and were given life sentences.

December 24, 1971: After firing a bullet into the bulkhead of Northwest Airlines Flight 734 and telling an attendant to inform the pilot that he had killed a passenger, Everett Leary Holt, a 24-year-old resident of Indianapolis, Indiana, held twenty-nine passengers hostage while the plane, en route from Minneapolis to Chicago, was still airborne. Holt demanded a ransom payment of $300,000 and two parachutes. Holt received the payment when the plane landed at Chicago. He released the passengers, but held onto the crew, who, through ruses, escaped. Disgusted with his failure, Holt threw the money out of the plane, bills blowing every which way and causing scores of officials to scurry after the billowing money. Holt then surrendered. Indicted for air piracy on December 29, 1971, psychiatrists insisted that the skyjacker was mentally incompetent. He was sent to a mental institution.

December 26, 1971: Waving a gun that later proved to be plastic, Donald L. Coleman, a 24-year-old Chicagoan, skyjacked American Airlines Flight 47, en route from Toronto, Canada, to San Francisco, and carrying ninety passengers. Coleman told crew members that he had a pressure-sensitive bomb that would explode if the plane descended to below 2,500 feet and that only he could disarm the mechanism. He next demanded a ransom of $200,000, but his kidnapping came to an abrupt end when passengers and attendants overpowered him. At his trial, Coleman employed an unusual defense, claiming that he had simply been conducting a civic-minded experiment to prove that "anyone could skyjack an airplane," an argument quickly dismissed by a jury, which convicted him of air piracy on June 5, 1972. Coleman was sentenced to two concurrent ten-year prison terms on July 28, 1973, his sentencing delayed by elaborate legal motions by his attorneys. On September 16, 1974, the skyjacker was released on five years' probation.

January 12, 1972: Claiming to be armed with a briefcase packed with dynamite, 22-year-old Billy Eugene Hurst, Jr., from Walters, Oklahoma, skyjacked Braniff Flight 38, flying from Houston to Dallas, Texas. Hurst held seven crew members hostage, while he demanded a $1 million ransom, ten parachutes, a pistol and a safe flight to an unspecified country in South America. When the plane landed, it was dismantled by a ground crew and, upon learning that the craft could not take off, Hurst surrendered. Convicted of air piracy, he was sentenced to prison for twenty years on February 2, 1973.

January 20, 1972: Richard LaPoint, a 23-year-old salesman in Denver, Colorado and a native of Boston, Massachusetts, apparently planned to emulate the 1971 exploits of skyjacker "D. B. Cooper," when he skyjacked Hughes Airwest Flight 800, en route from Las Vegas to Reno, Nevada, with seventy-one people aboard. A Vietnam war veteran, LaPoint demanded and received a $50,000 ransom and two parachutes. He later leaped from the plane as it neared Denver, but sprained an ankle when landing, which slowed down his escape plan. He was spotted and tracked by a search plane that directed ground police to LaPoint's location. The skyjacker was arrested and later convicted of air piracy. On May 25, he was sentenced to forty years in prison.

January 26, 1972: Using a simulated bomb and a starter's pistol, Merlyn L. St. George (AKA: Heinrick vonGeorge, 1926-1972), skyjacked Mohawk Flight 452, en route from Albany, New York to New York City, with forty-five persons on board. St. George, a native of St. Paul, Minnesota, demanded a ransom payment of $200,000 and four parachutes. He received this money and parachutes, but changed his mind about later jumping from the plane and next demanded a getaway car to be parked next to the airplane. Using a flight attendant as a shield, he attempted to get into the car with the cash, but was shot and killed by one of the FBI agents stationed near the plane.

January 29, 1972: Garrett Brock Trapnell, thirty-three, a former mental patient and native of Boston, Massachusetts, skyjacked TWA Flight 2, en route from Los Angeles to New York City, with 101 people on board. Trapnell, who had secreted a pistol on his person and later brandished the weapon when airborne, demanded a ransom payment of $306,800 and safe passage to Dallas, Texas (he later changed his mind, saying he wanted to fly to Europe). Upon the plane's arrival in New York, an FBI agent disguised as an airplane employee, disarmed the skyjacker after wounding him. Trapnell was convicted of air piracy and was sentenced to prison for life on July 20, 1973.

April 7, 1972: Richard Floyd McCoy (1942-1974), of Kingston, North Carolina, armed with two pistols, a hand grenade and plastic explosives, skyjacked United Airlines Flight 885, flying from Denver to New York, and carrying 95 people. The 29-year-old McCoy had the pilot land at San Francisco, where he released the passengers, holding the crew for a $500,000 ransom and asking that six parachutes be delivered to him along with the payment. The plane next flew to Salt Lake City, where McCoy received the ransom payment and parachutes. When the plane again took off, McCoy leaped into space over Provo, Utah. The skyjacker landed safely and vanished, only to be tracked down three days later by FBI agents, who arrested him in his home. During his trial, McCoy faked illness and was allowed to go to the washroom in the courthouse, where he escaped through a small window. He was nevertheless recaptured three blocks away. McCoy was convicted of air piracy and, on July 10, 1972, sentenced to forty-five years in prison. On August 10, 1974, McCoy escaped from the federal prison at Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, but was cornered by FBI agents in Virginia Beach, Virginia, on November 10, 1974. The skyjacker elected to shoot it out with agents and was shot and killed in the firefight.

April 7, 1972: Jose Carrion, a Puerto Rican banker, was kidnapped at gunpoint in San Juan by abductor Jose Luis Lugo, who then seized a commuter plane and flew with his hostage and the plane's crew to Camaguey, after demanding and receiving a ransom of $290,000. The plane then flew to Havana, Cuba, at Lugo's orders, where he was given asylum by the Fidel Castro regime. Carrion and the plane were returned to San Juan, but Castro refused to surrender the kidnapper to Puerto Rican officials.

April 9, 1972: Claiming to be armed with a grenade and a pistol, 32-year-old Stanley H. Speck, a resident of Glendale, California, skyjacked Pacific Southwest Airlines Flight 942, en route from Oakland to San Diego, California, with ninety-two people on board. He demanded a ransom payment of $500,000, four parachutes and safe passage to Miami, Florida, but he inexplicably left the plane at San Diego to retrieve some flight charts and was immediately seized by FBI agents. Judged unfit to stand trial, Speck was institutionalized at a California asylum, being released on June 14, 1974, after doctors pronounced him mentally stable.

April 13, 1972: Having a long record of psychiatric problems, Ricardo Chavez-Ortiz, a 34-year-old Mexican, skyjacked Frontier Airlines Flight 91, carrying thirty-three people from Albuquerque to Phoenix. The abductor's ransom demand was in the form of publicity. Upon arrival at Phoenix, he was allowed to broadcast a speech in Spanish which called for world peace and better education for underprivileged children. Following his two-hour diatribe, Chavez-Ortiz surrendered to FBI agents, turning over an unloaded gun. During his trial, the skyjacker wrote a letter to President Richard Nixon, asking that he be put to death if he was convicted. He was instead sentenced to life in prison, but the sentence was later reduced to twenty years.

April 17, 1972: William Greene, a 29-year-old resident of Berea, Ohio, after boarding Delta Airlines Flight 952, en route from Miami to Chicago, sent a note to the pilot in which he said he would destroy the plane unless he received a ransom payment of $500,000 and safe transportation to the Bahamas. The plane landed in Chicago and the pilot persuaded Greene to release the passengers. After an hour of negotiations, officers rushed Greene and subdued him, placing him under arrest. On September 20, 1972, Greene was tried for air piracy and convicted, then sentenced to prison for twenty years. At his trial, defense attorneys attempted to prove that their client was insane, that he had had a mental breakdown following his divorce and believed that God was talking to him through songs he heard on the radio and advertising messages on television. He believed, his lawyers stated, that he was battling Satan on behalf of God, but the attorneys were compelled to admit that their client's acts were not in keeping with the Good Book, in that, prior to the skyjacking, he had gone on a shoplifting spree and had inexplicably adorned himself in female clothing. Greene had skyjacked the plane, his attorneys said, after hearing and seeing a TV ad which stated: "Delta is ready when you are."

May 6, 1972: Brandishing a pistol, 49-year-old Frederick Hahneman, a native of Honduras, skyjacked Eastern Airlines Flight 175, en route from Allentown, Pennsylvania, to Washington, D.C., with 52 people aboard. Upon landing at Dulles Airport, Hahneman allowed all but six persons to deplane and then demanded a ransom of $300,000, several parachutes, jumpsuits and crash helmets, knives and two cartons of cigarettes. Officials met his demands and the plane flew on to New Orleans, Louisiana, where, using his six hostages as human shields, Hahneman reached a waiting airplane and then flew south, parachuting over a jungle in Honduras and near the village of Yoro. Eastern Airlines offered a $25,000 reward for Hahneman's capture and this led Honduran authorities to locate and arrest him. FBI agents showed Honduran officials an arrest warrant on June 1, 1972, and the skyjacker was turned over to them at the American Embassy at Tegucigalpa, Honduras. Hahneman was returned to the U.S. to stand trial, stating that the ransom money had been sent to a "contact" in Panama, who had banked the cash in Hong Kong. Hahneman was convicted of air piracy, kidnapping and extortion and was sentenced to life imprisonment. The ransom money was recouped in May 1973.

May 30, 1972: Nelson Mesquita (AKA: G. D. J. Silva, 1947-1972), a native of Brazil, skyjacked a Varig Airlines flight en route from Sao Paulo to Porto Alegre, with 96 people on board. He brandished a pistol when the plane made a stopover at Curitiba, making a demand for a $260,000 ransom and several parachutes. Before these arrangements were completed, a ground crew dismantled the plane, preventing it from making a take-off. Heavily armed troops then got into the plane, but before they could capture Mesquita, the skyjacker put the pistol to his head and blew out his brains.

June 3, 1972: Waving a pistol at crew members, Robb D. Heady, a 22-year-old resident of Laramie, Wyoming, and a former paratrooper, who had served in Vietnam, skyjacked United Airlines Flight 239, while it was about to take off at Reno, Nevada, en route to San Francisco. Heady allowed the twenty-nine passengers to deplane, but held the crew members hostage, demanding $200,000 ransom. The money was delivered and the plane took off, the skyjacker parachuting from the plane in darkness over the desert in Wahoe County. He had left $40,000 behind on the plane simply because he could not carry all of the ransom money. Landing safely, Heady made his way to a car he had earlier hidden, but was surprised by FBI agents waiting next to the auto, which they had located and staked out hours before Heady jumped from the plane. Heady was convicted of air piracy and, on August 25, given a 30-year prison sentence.

June 23, 1972: Secreting a submachine gun and a smoke grenade in his carry-on luggage, 28-year-old Martin Joseph McNally, a native of Trenton, Michigan, skyjacked American Airlines Flight 119, en route from St. Louis to Tulsa, Oklahoma, with 101 people aboard. Brandishing the submachine gun, McNally ordered the pilot to return to St. Louis, where some of the hostages were released and where he demanded a ransom of $502,200, several parachutes and a shovel. Before the ransom and the items McNally demanded were delivered, a man drove a Cadillac through a police line and onto the landing area, where he crashed the car into the skyjacked plane, dismantling it. The driver was injured and sent to a hospital; his actions were thought to be that of an over-reacting citizen incensed at McNally's air piracy. The skyjacker, by that time, received the ransom money and the parachutes. He used the hostages to move from the dismantled plane to another jetliner, ordering the pilot to fly to Toronto, Canada. McNally, however, was unsure as to how to use a parachute, naively asking the pilot for instructions on what air speeds allowed a safe jump from the plane. The pilot gave him false information and when McNally jumped, the suitcase carrying the ransom money was swept out of his hand by the airstream left by the jet. The money was later found in a farm field. His submachine gun was found several miles further, that, too, having been torn from McNally's clutches by the airstream. The skyjacker nevertheless parachuted to the ground safely and made his escape, only to be located and arrested in Detroit on June 28, 1972. Two days later, police arrested and jailed Walter J. Petlikowsky, a 31-year-old Polish immigrant, who had helped McNally organize the skyjacking. He was convicted of aiding and assisting a federal fugitive and sent to prison for ten years. McNally was convicted of aircraft piracy and, on December 14, 1972, was sentenced to two concurrent life terms in a federal prison.

June 30, 1972: Ernanno Barca, president of the Buenos Aires branch of the Italian Banco di Napoli, was abducted by four armed kidnappers, who demanded a $200,000 ransom for his return. The ransom was paid by the bank and Barca was returned safely to his family.

July 12, 1972: Melvin Fisher, a 49-year-old Oklahoman, brandished an empty revolver when skyjacking American Airlines Flight 633, with seventy-seven persons on board and while the plane was in flight from Oklahoma City to Dallas. Fisher, apparently aping the 1971 skyjacking of "D. B. Cooper," demanded a ransom of $550,000 and a parachute before releasing his hostages. He reduced the amount in his rambling negotiations, and then inexplicably surrendered his useless weapon to a flight attendant. Fisher was tried and convicted of air piracy and, on September 28, 1972, sentenced to life imprisonment.

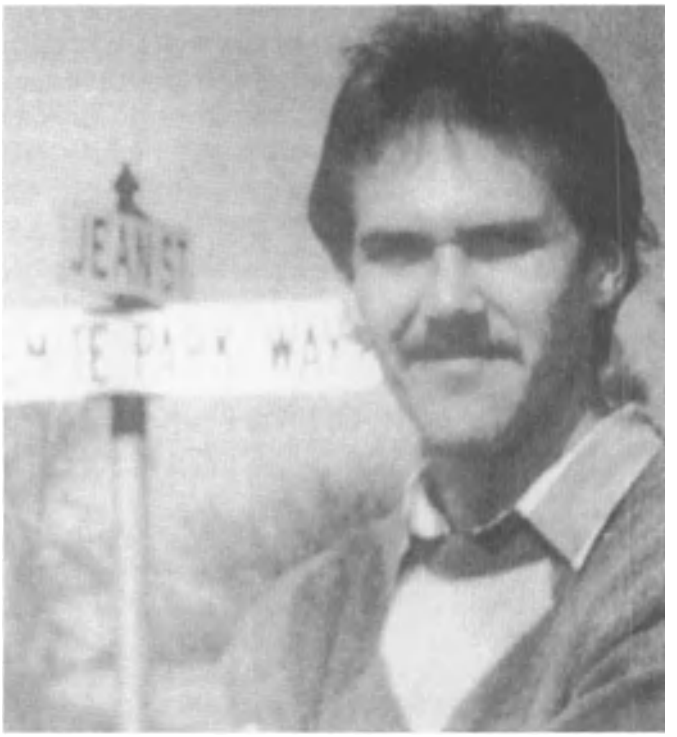
July 27, 1972: Virginia Piper, the wife of a wealthy Minnesota businessman, was kidnapped from her home in Minneapolis. After her abductors received a $1 million ransom, the woman was found alive, tied to a tree in a remote area.

August 18, 1972: Frank Sibley, Jr. smuggled a rifle on board United Airlines Flight 877, en route from Reno, Nevada, to San Francisco, California, with twenty-two passengers on board. While the plane was in flight, the 43-year-old Sibley, a resident of Baltimore, Maryland, retrieved and brandished the rifle, skyjacking the plane and demanding a ransom payment of $2 million, fifteen pounds of gold, and safe passage to Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada. He ordered the plane to land at Seattle, Washington, where the ransom was paid, but when Sibley left the plane, FBI agents wounded him in a gunfight and captured him. He was convicted of air piracy and was sentenced to a federal prison for thirty years on October 18, 1972.

October 11, 1972: Friedrich Shutz (AKA: Friedhelm Schuetz), who claimed to have a bomb, skyjacked a Lufthansa Boeing 727, en route from Lisbon, Portugal to Frankfurt, Germany, with fifty-eight persons on board. He demanded a startling small ransom of $650. He received the payment when the plane arrived in Frankfurt, but was shot to death by police when he attempted to flee the airport in a car.

November 7, 1972: Enrico Barrella, an Italian industrialist, was kidnapped in Buenos Aires, Argentina. He was released after his abductors collected a ransom payment of $500,000.

December 4, 1972: Kenneth Eugene Parnell, a 41-year-old native of Amarillo, Texas, who worked as an auditor in a lodge in Yosemite National Park, and who had a long criminal record, teamed up with a fellow employee, 31-year-old Ervin Edward Murphy, to kidnap 7-year-old Steven Gregory Stayner, in Merced, California. Parnell kept the boy in sexual captivity for more than seven years, moving about with the boy through several western states. Parnell, with accomplice Sean Poorman, then kidnapped 5-year-old Timothy White in Ukiah, California, on February 14, 1980, keeping him in a remote cabin. Stayner, then fifteen, helped White escape on March 1, 1980.



Steven Gregory Stayner, who was held by his abductor for seven years.

going to the Ukiah police station. Parnell, Murphy and Poorman were then tracked down and arrested. Poorman turned state's evidence, testifying against Parnell, who was convicted of second-degree kidnapping in the White case and he received a seven-year prison sentence. Parnell and Murphy were then tried for the Stayner abduction, charged with kidnapping and conspiracy. Both men were convicted, Murphy receiving two five-year sentences on each count. Parnell, the chief architect in the Stayner kidnapping, however, received only a two-year sentence for kidnapping and five years for conspiracy, his sentences to run concurrently, including that meted out to him in the White case, a sentence thought so lenient that widespread public opinion turned against California politicians, who had fashioned laws that allowed only the maximum sentences given to Parnell. This kidnapper was paroled on April 5, 1985. Stayner's older brother, Cary Anthony Stayner, accused of kidnapping and murdering four women in 1999, was sent to prison for life. (See entry for July 21, 1999.)

December 6, 1972: Felix Azpiazu, a Spanish businessman, was kidnapped in Argentina and a ransom demand of $180,000 was made for his return. The abductors agreed to take a negotiated $100,000 payment and Azpiazu was released on December 8.

December 19, 1972: Amanda Dealey, the 22-year-old daughter-in-law of a newspaper magnate (after whom Dealey Plaza is named and where the assassination of President John F. Kennedy occurred in 1963) was kidnapped in Dallas, Texas. She was released after a $250,000 ransom was paid to brothers Franklin and Woodrow Ransonette, who were tracked down a short time later after their van was identified at the ransom pickup site. Both were sent to prison for terms of 5,005 years, the longest sentences ever meted out by a U.S. jury.

December 27, 1972: Vicente Russo, director-general of a subsidiary of ITT Corp., was abducted in Buenos Aires, Argentina, and was released after his kidnappers reportedly received a ransom payment of between $500,000 and $1 million.

February 3, 1973: Norman Lee, manager of a Coca-Cola plant in Buenos Aires, Argentina, was kidnapped and was later released after an undisclosed ransom payment was made.

April 8, 1973: Francis Victor Brimicombe, president of Nobleza Tabaco Co., a subsidiary of the British-American Tobacco Company, was kidnapped in Buenos Aires, Argentina. He was released unharmed after his abductors received a ransom payment of between $1.5 and $1.8 million.

May 21, 1973: Oscar Castel, president of a Coca-Cola bottling plant in Cordoba, Argentina, was abducted and later released after his kidnappers received a ransom payment of $100,000.

June 6, 1973: Charles Lockwood, a British executive of an Acrow Steel division in Argentina, was kidnapped. A ransom payment of $2 million was paid and Lockwood was released unharmed.

June 19, 1973: Hans Kurt Gebhardt, the 61-year-old manager of a hosiery plant owned and operated by Silvania, S.A., in Buenos Aires, was kidnapped and held for a $1 million ransom. Gebhardt was released unharmed after the abductors reportedly received a payment of $100,000. The kidnappers were not apprehended.

June 25, 1973: Mario Baratella, vice president of the Italian-owned Bank of Rio de la Plata in Buenos Aires, Argentina, was abducted and released after his kidnappers, who had made a $2 million ransom demand, were paid an undisclosed sum.

July 2, 1973: Raul Bornancini, the assistant manager and chief of banking operations for a branch of the First National Bank of New York in Cordoba, Argentina, was abducted while on his way to his office. His kidnappers, who disavowed any political connections, demanded a ransom payment of $1 million. The ransom was paid, and Bornancini was released on July 13, 1973. His kidnappers were not apprehended.

July 14, 1973: Mark Matson, a 16-year-old drifter from Ohio, and his 15-year-old girlfriend, hitchhiked a ride outside of Fort Lauderdale, Florida, with 44-year-old Albert Brust, a burly psychopath, who drove them to his suburban Miami home, where he kept them prisoner, killing Matson and burying his body in his back yard. Brust then subjected the girl to sexual attacks and injuries in a torture chamber he had constructed in one of his rooms. He later drove her to a beach and released her, telling her that if she informed police, he would kill her entire family in Kentucky. She immediately told police, but her story was discounted by her own parents, who told officers that their runaway daughter was "a pathological liar who is continually making up fantastic stories." Police did nothing until they received a report on July 22, 1973, the caller saying that a dead man was sitting in the back yard of his home. A neighbor had gotten suspicious when seeing that the man remained motionless in a lawn chair throughout a violent thunderstorm. Dade County officers investigated to find Albert Brust dead, a coroner's report stating that he had taken a fatal dose of strychnine.

August 27, 1973: Ian Martin, the British manager of a meat firm, was abducted in Asuncion, Paraguay. Before any ransom could be paid, police located the hideout of the abductors, killing two in a firefight and capturing the others. Martin was rescued unharmed.

September 21, 1973: Accountant David George Heywood, an employee of the Nobleza Tobacco Co., a subsidiary of the British-American Tobacco Company, was kidnapped in Buenos Aires by six gunmen, who demanded a $300,000 ransom payment, which was paid by Heywood's family. The victim was not released, however, until Argentine police located the hideout of the abductors on October 20, 1973, rescuing Heywood and arresting his kidnappers. Officers recovered $260,000 of the ransom money and the culprits were soon convicted and given long prison terms.

October 23, 1973: David Wilkie, Jr., president of an Amoco International Oil Company subsidiary, was abducted in Buenos Aires, Argentina. He was released after a reported ransom of $3.5 million was paid to his abductors.

December 1, 1973: After appearing on a TV commercial in which they were shown eating fried chicken, 6-year-old Keith Arnold and 8-year-old Gerald Craft were kidnapped, while playing football outside the home of Craft's grandmother in Detroit, Michigan. The two black boys were held for a $53,000 ransom, but family members told the kidnappers that they had not received any substantial payments for the TV commercial in which the boys had appeared and were able to negotiate the ransom down to $15,000. Family members agreed to work with police in trapping the kidnappers, leaving a dummy ransom package at a remote site that was staked out by hidden police officers. The abductors, however, evaded police, who were reportedly slow to move in on them. The kidnappers, apparently in response to the bogus ransom payment, killed both boys and dumped their bodies in a field near the Detroit Metropolitan Airport. A week after the Detroit News posted a $5,000 reward for the capture of the kidnappers, informants provided police with the identity of a teenage girl, who was arrested and who turned state's evidence that led to the arrest and conviction of the kidnappers—Jerome Holloway, Geary Gilmore and Byron Smith, all twenty-one. The three men were sent to prison for life.

December 21, 1973: Charles Robert Hayes, a superintendent for McKee-Tesca, a construction company operating in La Plata, Argentina, was kidnapped while driving to work. He was held for a $1 million ransom and an undisclosed payment was later made by his firm. Hayes was released on January 31, 1974.

January 3, 1974: Douglas Roberts, an executive with the Pepsi-Cola Co., was abducted in Buenos Aires, Argentina. He was released after his kidnappers were paid an undisclosed sum.

March 6, 1974: Betty Van Balen, a real estate broker, was kidnapped in Roanoke, Virginia, by Larry Gene Cole, while showing him a house for sale. Cole held the woman for a ransom payment of $25,000, which was paid by the woman's husband, Frank Van Balen, a wealthy businessman. Following the victim's safe release in Ansted, West Virginia, the following day, FBI agents pursued the kidnapper, and his wife, Bonnie Ann Cole, stating that Larry Cole had once been a Van Balen employee. He was placed on the Bureau's "Most Wanted" list and a short time later New York State troopers stopped and arrested the Coles as they were driving outside of Buffalo, New York. Both were convicted and sent to prison.

Kidnapper Larry Gene Cole, captured by FBI agents.

March 12, 1974: A Japan Airlines flight carrying 426 passengers from Tokyo to Okinawa, was skyjacked by Katsuhito Owaki, a youth demanding a whopping ransom of $55 million, 200 million yen, fifteen parachutes and mountain-climbing gear. Officials disbelieved Katsuhito's claim that he had a bomb and, when officers boarded the plane disguised as food handlers distributing lunch to the hostages, he was quickly overpowered. Convicted of air piracy, Katsuhito was sent to prison.

March 20, 1974: Described as shy by neighbors and friends, 26-year-old Ian Ball attempted to kidnap England's Princess Anne, planning to demand a £3 million ransom for her return. Ball drove his Ford Escort through a London intersection, blocking the path of the royal limousine in which Princess Anne and her husband, Mark Phillips were riding and which was en route to Buckingham Palace. Brandishing a .38-caliber pistol and a .22-caliber revolver, Ball tried to remove Princess Anne from the limousine, but several male riders in the car intervened. Ball shot down Inspector James Beaton, her bodyguard; Alex Callender, her chauffeur; and reporter Brian McConnell. Constable Michael Hill, who was at the scene, was also shot by Ball before he fled on foot into nearby St. James' Park, where Constable Peter Edmunds later captured him. Judged mentally unfit for trial, Ball was sent to the high security institution of Rampton Hospital for the Criminally Insane.

May 11, 1974: Three skyjackers—Carlos A. Tabares, Jorge Campos, and Pedro Rodriguez Hernandez—seized a Colombian Avianca airlplane with ninety-four people aboard while flying from Pereira to Bogota. Armed with pistols, hand grenades and a parcel they claimed to contain a bomb, the skyjackers demanded a ransom of 8 million pesos (about $315,000). Landings at Pereira and Cali were refused by ground control officials and the plane landed at Bogota, where police officers disguised as mechanics stormed the plane, killing one of the skyjackers and capturing the other two, who were later sent to prison.

August 6, 1974: Maurice Kember, president of Inti, a subsidiary of Coca-Cola, was kidnapped by gunmen outside of his home at Cordoba, Argentina. The $1.5 million ransom demanded by the abductors was never paid. On October 8, 1974, police raided the hideout of the kidnappers and rescued Kember, killing one of the kidnappers and capturing three others, two of whom were wounded. The surviving abductors received long prison terms.

October 17, 1974: Fabrizio Mosna, the child of a wealthy furniture manufacturer, was abducted as he was going to school in Trento, Italy. Before the kidnappers could deliver a ransom demand for $130,000, the boy escaped and the culprits were later arrested and imprisoned.

October 19, 1974: Emmanuele "Lele" Riboli, the teenage son of a wealthy family, was kidnapped in Varese, Italy. The family paid 200 million lire and then raised another 97 million lire to make an additional payment, but the boy was not returned. Niccolo Floris, Ugo Schirra, and Giuseppe Vitzizai, were later arrested and imprisoned for the abduction.

November 10, 1974: James Otis Baker robbed the pharmacy owned and operated by Bernard Grossman in St. Louis, Missouri, then kidnapped Grossman and his 18-year-old clerk, Susan Psaris, taking both to a remote area, where he forced them to kneel while he shot them both in the head. Baker was later apprehended and explained that he had abducted and murdered Grossman and Psaris after becoming incensed when Grossman told him that he had no narcotics to give him at the time of the robbery (which was then a newly-established policy among pharmacists in avoiding drug heists). Baker was convicted of kidnapping, robbery and murder and given two concurrent life sentences, which made him eligible for parole in twelve years, a parole repeatedly denied due to the protesting efforts of the victims' families.

November 12, 1974: Jack I. Teich, a steel industry executive, was kidnapped from his home at Kings Point, Long Island, New York. He was released after his abductor, Richard W. Williams, received a ransom payment of $750,000. Williams was tracked down, convicted and imprisoned.

November 27, 1974: Vonnie Struth, a young housewife living in Seattle, Washington, was kidnapped and killed by Gary Addison Taylor, who had a criminal career for sexual assaults. Police tracked him down in Enumclaw, Washington, charging him with the Struth slaying. He admitted abducting and murdering Struth, and then confessed to kidnapping and murdering several other women, including 23-year-old Deborah Heneman and 25-year-old Lee Fletcher, both from Ohio, and whose bodies were later unearthed in the back yard of Taylor's abandoned home in Onsted, Michigan. Taylor also admitted many other unsolved sexual attacks and at least one other abduction-murder, that of 21-year-old Susan Jackson, who had been kidnapped and slain by Taylor in Houston, Texas. He was convicted and sent to prison for life.

January 13, 1975: Lesley Whittle, the 17-year-old girl from a wealthy family living in Kidderminster, England, was kidnapped from her home by Donald Neilson, who had demanded a ransom payment of £50,000 for her safe return. Neilson had for several years been robbing postal clerks and shooting several of his victims when they resisted his robberies and was dubbed the "Black Panther," because of the black hood he wore during his robberies. Neilson got the idea to abduct the Whittle girl after reading a newspaper account that reported the wealth of the girl's father. After several bungled attempts to collect the ransom (he shot one intermediary six times before fleeing, his victim later recovering), Neilson left a note telling go-betweens to "drop suitcase [containing the ransom money] into hole," which was located near Bathpool Park. On March 7, 1974, officers climbed down a drainage shaft to find the naked body of Lesley Whittle hanging from a wire. Neilson later claimed that the girl had fallen from a ledge, where he had tied her up and was accidentally strangled to death. On December 11, 1975, two officers, Tony White and Stuart Mackenzie spotted a suspicious man loitering near a post office in Nottinghamshire. When they approached the man, he turned a shotgun on them and then forced them back into their car, ordering them to drive to Blidworth. In the process, Neilson was distracted and White, with the help of some local residents, overpowered the kidnapper. Neilson was later tried and convicted on four counts of murder, including the kidnap-killing of Whittle, and sent to prison for life.

February 22, 1975: Joel Siqueira, Jr., brandishing a pistol, invaded the cockpit of a VASP Boeing 737, en route from Sao Paulo to Brasilia, Brazil. He demanded a ransom payment of $1.3 million, as well as parachutes. When landing at Brasilia, police stormed the plane, wounding and capturing Siqueira in a shootout. He was later imprisoned.

March 25, 1975: Sheila and Katherine Lyon, ages ten and twelve, from Kensington, Illinois, were last seen at a shopping mall. It was concluded that both had been kidnapped.

June 6, 1975: Morris Eugene Colosky, a Michigan native and associate of imprisoned con artist Dale Otto Remling, hired a helicopter to fly him from Plymouth, Michigan, to Lansing, in order to attend a business meeting. While in flight, Colosky produced a five-inch knife and ordered pilot Richard Jackson to fly to the Southern Michigan State Prison at Jackson. Following Colosky's directions, Jackson landed the helicopter on a grassy clearing inside the walls of the prison recreation area, setting down near a spot marked with a red handkerchief. Remling, who was then taking his lunch break, ran to the helicopter, which shot skyward and over the wall in one of the most spectacular U.S. prison breaks on record. As Remling knew, the area where the copter landed was under electronic surveillance and there were no guards present to thwart his escape. Jackson, the knife still held to his throat, was ordered to fly in a northeasterly direction along highway M-106, landing the chopper at a spot where two cars, a red Plymouth and a yellow Volkswagen, were parked. Remling and Colosky sprayed mace in Jackson's face, blinding him, before they alighted from the copter and raced to the cars, which sped down the roadway. Jackson regained his sight and, while airborne, radioed a report of his abduction and the prison break to police, while searching for the perpetrators. He became suspicious of a slow-moving car and directed police to its location. The occupant, Mrs. Jolyne Lou Conn, admitted that she had helped in the escape, but that she was nothing more than a decoy. Remling was apprehended on June 7, at a tavern in Leslie, Michigan. He surrendered to state police without a fight and was returned to prison. Colosky was captured ten days later near Howell in Livingston County. He was indicted by a grand jury on charges of air piracy on June 27, 1975. Convicted, he was sentenced to twenty years in prison. The idea for the escape had been hatched by Remling, who had twice escaped from Soledad Prison in California years earlier. While watching TV in the prison recreation room at the state Forger and confidence man Dale Otto Remling, who engineered his spectacular prison break in 1975.

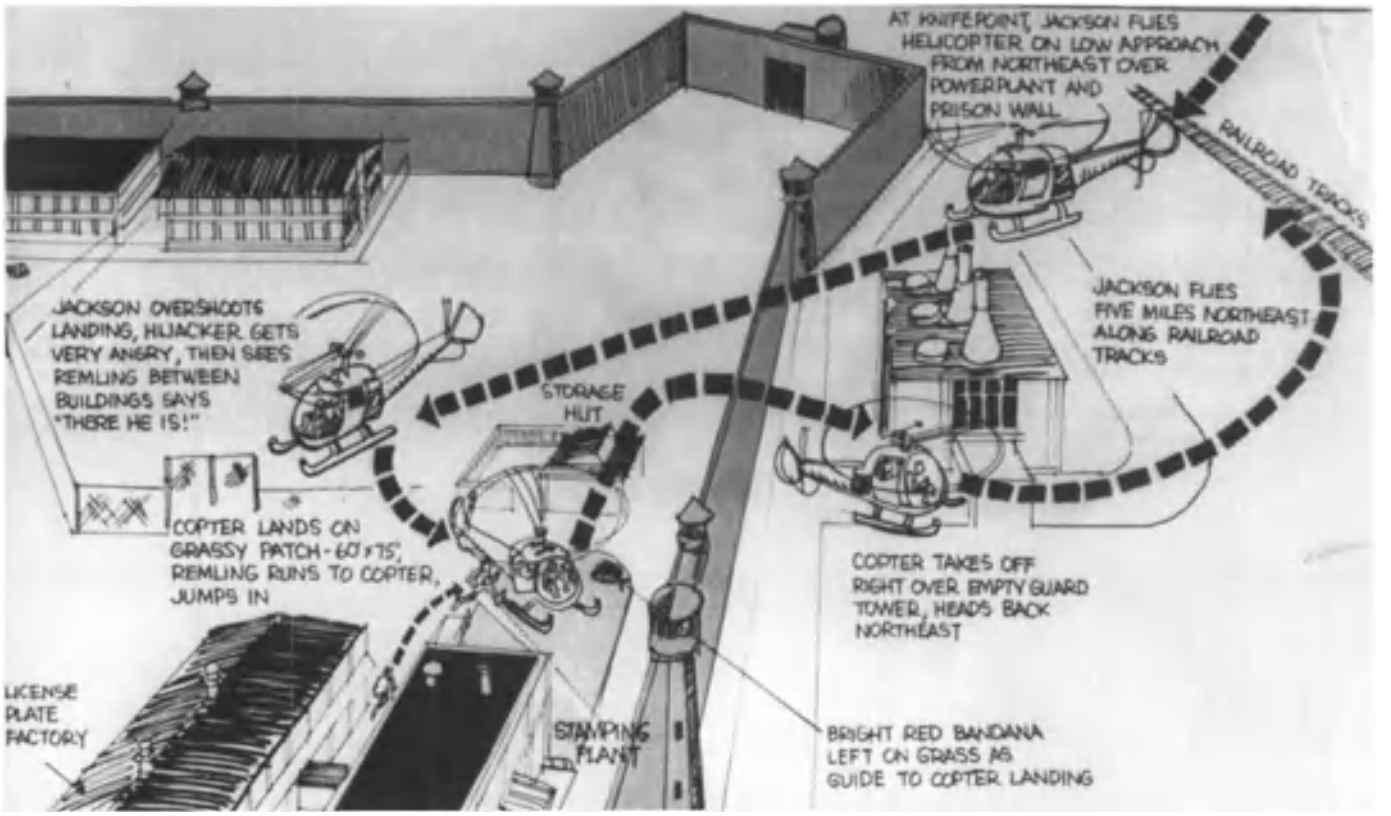
Kidnapped helicopter pilot Richard Jackson explains to police how he was abducted by Remling's confederate, Morris Eugene Colosky, and forced to rescue Remling.



AT KNIFEPOINT, JACKSON FLIES HELICOPTER ON LOW APPROACH FROM NORTHEAST OVER POWERPLANT AND PRISON WALL
RAILROAD TRACKS
JACKSON FLIES FIVE MILES NORTHEAST ALONG RAILROAD TRACKS
JACKSON OVERSHOOTS LANDING, HIJACKER GETS VERY ANGRY, THEN SEES REMLING BETWEEN BUILDINGS SAYS "THERE HE IS!"
STORAGE HUT
COPTER LANDS ON GRASSY PATCH - 60' x 75', REMLING RUNS TO COPTER, JUMPS IN COPTER TAKES OFF RIGHT OVER EMPTY GUARD TOWER, HEADS BACK NORTHEAST LICENSE PLATE FACTORY
STAMPING PLANT
BRIGHT RED BANDANA LEFT ON GRASS AS GUIDE TO COPTER LANDING

This diagram/sketch depicts how the helicopter escape of Dale Remling from the world's largest walled prison was executed while the kidnapped pilot was held at knifepoint.

A scene from the movie Breakout, showing a helicopter rescuing a prison inmate, which inspired Remling's own escape after he viewed this scene on TV in the recreation room of the Southern Michigan State Prison at Jackson.

prison in Jackson, Remling spotted a commercial for a movie entitled Breakout, starring Charles Bronson, a film that portrayed a convict airlifted out of a Mexican prison by a helicopter.

July 30, 1975: Former Teamsters president James Riddle Hoffa, sixty-two, left his rural home at Orion Lake, Michigan at 2 p.m., telling his wife Josephine that he would return by 4 p.m., and to grill steaks for their supper. He drove to Machus Red Fox Restaurant in Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, where he parked his green Pontiac Granville car in the lot, sitting in it for some time while he waited for three men he expected to meet. Hoffa stated that two of the men were Anthony "Tony Jack" Giacalone, reputed Mafia capo in New Jersey, and Anthony "Tony Pro" Provenzano, one-time Teamsters vice president, and a reported Mafia capo in the Genovese family in New Jersey. After waiting twenty minutes, Hoffa called his wife to tell her that he was still waiting for these men. He was never heard from or seen again. The following day, family members contacted officials to report Hoffa's disappearance and a widespread search for him ensued. A long-time labor leader and one of the most controversial union chiefs in American history, Hoffa had a long record of criminal associations, which brought him under the investigating focus of Senator Robert Kennedy, with whom Hoffa feuded. (Hoffa was linked to Kennedy's 1968 assassination, but no real evidence substantiated that claim.) Federal officials later believed that Provenzano and Giacalone ordered Hoffa kidnapped and killed. Provenzano and Hoffa had been close friends until Hoffa went to prison on a jury tampering conviction. Hoffa reportedly said to Provenzano: "It's because of people like you that I got into trouble in the first place." Provenzano also harbored resentment against Hoffa, thinking that the former Teamsters boss was instrumental in cutting off his $57,000-a-year pension. When the two later had a chance meeting at an airport, they got into a fistfight and Hoffa broke a bottle over Provenzano's head, causing Provenzano to shout: "I'll tear your heart out!" When Hoffa was released from prison and began to make plans to take back control of the Teamsters union, Provenzano reportedly warned him: "Stay out of union politics or else!" In 1982, self-acclaimed Mafia killer Charles Allen told a U.S. Senate committee that Provenzano had ordered Hoffa murdered. Provenzano, while serving a prison term, contacted this author through an intermediary in late 1988, asking if I might be interested in writing a book with Provenzano, one which would "give all the details in the Hoffa case." A second call from the same intermediary informed me that Provenzano had changed his mind and to "forget the book idea." A few months later, on December 12, 1988, Provenzano died from a heart attack while still in prison. After talking with his wife on the day of his disappearance, Hoffa was seen to get into a car that contained several unidentified men. His own locked car was found empty at the restaurant parking lot some hours later. FBI agents later stated their belief that Charles "Chuckie" O'Brien, a close friend of Hoffa's had driven the union boss away from the restaurant in his own car, where he was garroted and his body taken to a mob-controlled fat-rendering plant (later burned down), and where the corpse was utterly destroyed. O'Brien, who suffered from diabetes, retired to Boca Raton, Florida, where he denied all allegations against him. In 2000, FBI officials reported that a single hair from Hoffa's head (matched from Hoffa's hairbrush) was found in O'Brien's car, but Michigan officials stated on August 29, 2002 that this evidence was insufficient in bringing any criminal charges. The kidnapping and killing of Hoffa, according to Mafia informer Jimmy "The Weasel" Frattiano, had been decreed by Detroit Mafia bosses Anthony Zerilli and Michael Polizzi, and others claimed that the actual killers were Thomas Andretta, and the brothers Gabriel and Salvatore Briguglio. Salvatore Briguglio, who was believed to have contacted FBI agents and was about to provide details on the Hoffa murder, was himself shot to death in New York's Little Italy on March 21, 1978. Theories and outlandish claims continued to surface in this nagging unsolved case. In 1989, a mob informer insisted that Hoffa's body had been encased in cement and was buried under the Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, New Jersey. On July 16, 2003, officials in Oakland County, Michigan reported that an informer had told them that Hoffa's body was buried beneath an underground pool located in the back yard of a Michigan home, but that they had declined to initiate an investigation into this claim.

Volatile union leader James Riddle Hoffa, who disappeared and was presumed kidnapped and murdered by underworld associates.

August 9, 1975: Samuel Bronfman II, the 21-year-old son of the president of Seagram Company, Ltd., was abducted from the driveway of his mother's home in Purchase, New York. His kidnappers demanded a ransom payment of $4.6 million, the money being paid on August 16, 1975. FBI agents tracked the driver picking up the ransom and later identified him as Mel Patrick Lynch, a 37-year-old New York fireman. They raided Lynch's apartment, where they found Bronfman alive, arresting Lynch, as well as Dominic Byrne, Bronfman's 53-year-old chauffeur, who had inexplicably tipped the agents as to the whereabouts of the victim. Lynch and Byrne were charged with kidnapping and extortion, but they surprised prosecutors by saying that Bronfman had staged his own kidnapping in order to extort money from his family. Their story was believed by a jury that convicted them of extortion only. Both were sent to prison.

December 24, 1975: Filiberto Fraccari, a gold dealer, was abducted while going to his home in Verona, Italy, his kidnappers demanding a $3 million ransom. This sum was reduced to $600,000 and the victim was released when the ransom payment was made.

January 24, 1976: Alan Bortnick, a trucking executive in Miami, Florida, was kidnapped and held for a $250,000 ransom, which was paid five days later when the victim was released unharmed. FBI agents identified the abductor as Thomas Edward Bethea, a 38-year-old South Carolinian. Bethea had a long criminal record and was known as a violent felon. His name was added to the FBI's "Most Wanted" list on March Kidnapper Thomas Edward Berthea, who collected a $250,000 ransom before he was captured in the Bahamas.

5, 1976, but by that time Bethea had fled to Nassau, Bahamas. He was identified and arrested by Bahamian police and then returned to the U.S., where he was placed under arrest by FBI agents, when he landed at the Miami Airport on May 5, 1976. They found three $100 bills on Bethea, all of these bills matching the recorded ransom money. Bethea was convicted of kidnapping and sent to prison.

February 29, 1976: Armed with a pistol, Jose Cardona seized a Columbian Aces Airline plane carrying twenty people, while en route from Medellin to Apartado. He demanded a ransom of $300,000, allowing fifteen persons to disembark at Chiogordo. When the skyjacker saw police closing in on the plane, he opened fire and was fatally shot in the throat by return fire.

March 10, 1976: Abby Drover was kidnapped by Donald Alexander Hay, and confined for six months in an underground chamber beneath Hay's garage in Port Moody, British Columbia, Canada, where she was repreatedly raped. Police found the teenager alive and Hay was given a life sentence.

July 15, 1976: Three masked kidnappers stopped a school bus near the town of Chowchilla, California, which was carrying the driver and twenty-six children, ages ranging from six to fourteen. The driver and children were put into waiting vans and the schoolbus was hidden in a dry creek bed. The hostages were taken to a moving van, which had been buried and accessed, as would an underground bunker, through a ladder descending through a hole. Once the driver and children were inside this underground tomb, the 25-foot van was covered with earth. The kidnappers had taken the name of each child and an article of clothing from each to prove they held the hostages they claimed to have in their custody. Provided inside the buried van was food, water, a portable toilet and mattresses. Air was pumped into the van through rubber

The buried van in which a driver and twenty-six children were held captive by abductors near Chowchilla, California.

Interior of the buried van where the kidnapped children were trapped and given little air, food and water.

Some of the abducted children who escaped from the buried van at Chowchilla.

Chowchilla kidnappers (left to right) James Schoenfeld, Frederick Newhall Woods IV, and Richard Allen Shoenfeld, shown at their trial; all received life sentences.

tubes by two electric fans. Police found the abandoned school bus on the same day of the kidnapping. Within twenty-four hours, the bus driver and the older children managed to escape and then retrieved the younger children. The kidnappers reportedly demanded a $5 million ransom for the safe return of the children, but by then their captives had fled and police were on the trail of the abductors, having obtained license plate numbers for the vans used to transport the hostages to the underground van, which had been buried at a rock quarry near Livermore, California. The license plate numbers soon led to the arrest of Frederick Newhall Woods IV, who was the 24-year-old son of the owner of the rock quarry. The other two kidnappers, 25-year-old Richard Allen Schoenfeld, and his 22-year-old brother, James Schoenfeld, were also apprehended. They all pleaded guilty to kidnapping and were convicted in a bench trial, all three sentenced by Judge Leo Deegan to life in prison.

September 1, 1976: Five kidnappers abducted the two-year-old son of David Kraiselburg, an Argentine newspaper publisher. The boy was never returned, but the following year, police jailed the five suspected kidnappers, who admitted taking the boy and later abandoning their plan to ransom him when they could not find a safe place to hide the child. They also admitted murdering the child and disposing of his body. On September 27, 1977, four of the kidnappers were shot and killed by guards when they attempted to escape the prison at La Plata.

December 13, 1976: Unknown kidnappers abducted 17-year-old Emanuela Trapani in Milan, Italy, while she was being driven to school by one of her father's employees, her father being an executive for the Helene Curtis cosmetic company. Following the delivery of an undisclosed ransom payment, the girl was released on January 27, 1977. It was believed that the abduction had been conducted by members of the Mafia, who routinely kidnapped the children of wealthy Italian businessmen.

January 29, 1977: Mary L. Treadway, of Galesburg, Illinois, was kidnapped from a shopping mall. Her body was later found and two suspects were arrested.

February 8, 1977: Richard O. Hall was abducted in Indianapolis, Indiana, by Anthony Kirtiss, who later released his captive. Kirtiss was sent to prison.

February 11, 1977: Eight hostages were taken at a home for unwed mothers in Cincinnati, Ohio, by Jesse Coulter and his former wife, Rita Gibbeon of Detroit, Michigan. The abductors demanded information about a son Coulter had given up for adoption in 1957. The kidnappers were arrested by a police officer posing as that son and were later imprisoned.

February 14, 1977: Edwin John Eastwood, of Melbourne, Australia, began a kidnapping spree in which he seized sixteen persons. He was later sent to prison.

February 17, 1977: Ernesto Marin, Jr., thirty-nine, abducted 13-year-old Connie Francis Ostos and 12-year-old Belinda Louise Hernandez, taking them to his one-story house on Effie Street in downtown Fresno, California, where he raped them, then stabbed them to death and then dumped the bodies off a path near Trimmer Road in the Fresno foothills. Detectives suspected Marin, a coarse, cretinous person with weightlifter arms, a big beer gut and a thick, black mustache that curled over scowling lips as having been the kidnapper-killer, but they could not establish enough evidence to arrest him. Marin worked as a laborer and barely made enough money to pay the rent for his tiny house, in which he, his wife and ten children lived. It was later learned that Marin abused his children, raping his sons and daughters at will. Investigators interviewed two of the sons, Adam and David Marin, but they appeared terrified and refused to say anything about their brutal father. Adam Marin committed a murder and was sent to prison for life in 1982. David Marin got into a knife fight and was killed in 1988. Detectives all but gave up on solving the Ostos-Hernandez slayings with the death of David Marin, the one person they believed might provide information that would convict his father. Family members, however, contacted police in 1994, telling them that Ernesto Marin had pressured his son David to "set him up" with the Ostos girl, one of David's classmates. Further, police were led to a bodyshop worker, a friend of David's, who admitted that he had helped Ernesto Marin dump the bodies of the girls after Ernesto Marin had raped and murdered them. When asked why he had not then contacted police, the bodyshop worker replied: "I was scared. Marin would have killed me just like he killed those girls." Arrested at the packing plant where he worked in Kingsburg, California, Marin first denied his involvement in the Ostos-Hernandez kidnapping-killings, but one month before his trial in September 1996, he confessed, and in a plea-bargain, received two concurrent life sentences from Judge Gene Gomes.

February 26, 1977: Beverly Capone, a native of Mount Vernon, New York, and an IBM computer programmer, was reported missing by family members. Four days later, police in Toronto, Canada, seized 30-year-old Alex Mengel, an immigrant from Guyana, who had entered the U.S. in 1976 and worked as a tool and dye maker. Mengel led Toronto police in a wild car chase that ended when he crashed his auto and was trapped and arrested on a dead-end street. The auto belonged to the missing Beverly Capone. Inside the car, police found two pistols and what they first thought to be a woman's wig. Upon closer inspection, the item was identified as the scalp of a woman. Mengel, who was wanted for murdering Gary Stymiloski, a police officer in Yonkers, New York, on February 24, 1977. (Stymiloski had stopped Mengel's car and called for backup; he was later found fatally shot in the head as he sat in his squad car.) While Mengel fought extradition from Canada on March 4, 1977, police officers inspected a summer cabin in the Catskills, near Durham, New York, discovering several personal items belonging to the missing Beverly Capone. A search of the area resulted in the discovery of her remains. She had been killed by a knife wound in the chest. Her scalp and facial tissue had been cut off. Police then learned that on February 27, 1977, one day after Capone had disappeared, a man fitting Mengel's description had attempted to kidnap a 13-year-old girl in Skaneateles, New York. The girl told police that a weird-looking man wearing lipstick and wearing a strange wig (Capone's scalp) tried to pull her into his car while she was delivering newspapers, but she managed to escape. On March 26, 1977, Canadian officials extradited Mengel to New York, where he was charged with the murder of Patrolman Stymiloski and the kidnapping-murder of Beverly Capone. While returning from a Greene County arraignment on April 26, 1977, Mengel struggled with a state trooper, trying to seize his gun, and was shot dead by another trooper, who was driving the car.

March 14, 1977: Armed with a rifle and handgun, Luciano Porcari, an Italian auto mechanic, skyjacked an Iberian Airlines flight en route from Barcelona to Palma de Mallorca, Spain, with thirty-six persons on board. He demanded a ransom of $140,000 and the return of his 3-year-old daughter (who was released from the custody of Porcari's former African mistress), which he received when the plane landed at Abidjan, Ivory Coast. The Boeing 727 then flew back to Spain, refueling at Seville before flying on to Turin, Italy, where Porcari then demanded the return of another daughter, a 5-year-old girl, who was in the custody of his ex-wife, Isabella Zavoli. Unlike the officials in Africa, Italian authorities refused to turn over the girl to the skyjacker, sending a case of champagne to the kidnapper, who shared it with his captives. He also distributed about $50,000 of the ransom money he had received to passengers, then released a number of hostages. He then had the plane fly to Zurich, Switzerland, then back to Turin, where his demands for the return of his 5-year-old daughter were again refused. The plane then flew to Warsaw, Poland, then back to Zurich. While mechanics worked on the plane, police stormed the plane and overpowered Porcari after he shot one officer in the leg. His 3-year-old daughter was returned to her mother in Africa and Porcari, judged insane, was sent to a mental institution.

March 17, 1977: Michael Guile, a convicted robber, was trapped by police, holding Pauline Gomez, her husband and a neighbor's child hostage for fourteen hours in their San Francisco, California, home. Guile then fatally shot himself.

March 19, 1977: Ismail Jama Ashan and Mohammed Hassan Guzel, two 18-year-old Turks, skyjacked a Turkish airliner with 174 passengers aboard, while it was en route from Dharbakir to Ankara, pointing guns at the pilot and ordering him to fly to Beirut, Lebanon. They demanded a $300,000 ransom for the return of the passengers and the promise of safe passage to the nearest Palestinian refugee camp. After landing in Beirut, the passengers were released and the skyjackers arrested by Lebanese officials. No ransom was paid and the kidnappers were imprisoned.

March 19, 1977: Carlo Colombo, a wealthy businessman, was released in Bornago, Italy, by kidnappers, after they collected a ransom payment of $1.3 million.

March 22, 1977: Paolo Lazzaroni, a wealthy co-director of a biscuit business in Milan, Italy, was kidnapped, his captors demanding a ransom payment of $5 million. They accepted $730,000 and Lazzaroni was released unharmed.

April 3, 1977: Piero Scosta, the son of a rich Italian ship owner, was kidnapped and released, following a ransom payment of $1.6 million in Genoa, Italy.

April 25, 1977: Edgar Herbert Smith, Jr., was sentenced to life in prison for the 1976 kidnapping of Lefteriya Ozbun, a 33-year-old San Diego woman. At the time, Smith attempted to stab the woman to death while he tried to rape her. Wounded, she nevertheless escaped Smith's car and lived to testify against him. Smith had gained fame after being convicted and sentenced to death for the abduction-murder of 15-year-old Victoria Zielinsky in New Jersey. While awaiting execution over a 14-year period, Smith authored three books and, when tried again on the Zielinsky killing, won his freedom in 1971. In the Ozbun case, Smith's attorneys attempted to have their client placed in a mental institution instead of a prison, claiming that he was a mentally disordered sex offender. Judge Gilbert Harelson denied the request.

May 19, 1977: Colleen Stan, a 21-year resident of Eugene, Oregon, was picked up as a hitchhiker in Red Bluff, California, by Cameron and Janice Hooker, who took her to their home and there Cameron Hooker kept her captive as a sex slave for seven years, torturing and molesting her. She finally escaped her abductor with Cameron's wife on August 9, 1984. Cameron Hooker was convicted of rape and kidnapping on October 31, 1985 and sentenced to one to twenty-five years for kidnapping and sixty years on several rape charges. Hooker, a lumber mill hand, had convinced his naïve victim and submissive wife that he was a member of a powerful international society that controlled law enforcement, industry and government and that its male members enslaved women for pleasure, monitoring their every movements with high-tech equipment, and "eliminating" any who attempted to escape their sexual servitude.

Cameron Hooker, who kidnapped Colleen Stan and held her captive for seven years, treating her as a sex slave.

May 24, 1977: Gertrude Resnick Farber, daughter of a wealthy television antenna entrepreneur, was kidnapped from her home in Monticello, New York She was buried alive in a wooden box and her kidnapper, Ronald Harrison Krom, demanded a $1 million ransom for her return. The ransom was not paid and the girl was later found dead, Krom leading police to the girl's body. He was imprisoned.

June 5, 1977: Nasser Mohammed Ali Abu Khaled, a 27-year-old paraplegic and a native of Lebanon, produced a pistol and a bomb when skyjacking Middle East Airlines Flight 322, which was en route from Beirut to Baghdad, with 112 people on board. He ordered the pilot to fly to Kuwait City, Kuwait, but when arriving there at night, air control officials refused to permit a landing. They shut down all runway lights, but the pilot, believing that Khaled was about to detonate a bomb, managed to set down the plane safely. Khaled then began negotiating, demanding a ransom of $1 million from Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Iraq. The plane's air-conditioning unit broke down the following day causing the temperature in the plane to rise to 114 degrees. Many passengers collapsed from the intense heat. Police officers, disguised as mechanics who were to repair the air-conditioning unit then boarded the plane and quickly overpowered the skyjacker. Khaled claimed that he had skyjacked the plane to get money for the treatment of his paralysis, and was later released on "humanitarian reasons."

July 29, 1977: Samir Mohammed Hassan Sharara, a native of Lebanon, displayed a pistol and two hand grenades when skyjacking a Gulf Air VC10 in Dubai, ordering the pilot to fly to Doha International Airport in Qatar, where, upon landing, he demanded a ransom payment of $125,000 and safe passage to an undisclosed destination. He released sixty of the sixty-four passengers in a few hours and while still negotiating with officials, was overwhelmed by security police. He was convicted of air piracy and imprisoned.

August 9, 1977: William Weinkamper, manager of a subsidiary of Gould, Inc., was kidnapped in Mexico City, Mexico, and later released for an undisclosed ransom payment.

September 7, 1977: Andrea Ellirisem, a millionaire from Denmark, was kidnapped at Otumba, Mexico, his abductors demanding a ransom of $40,000. Police located the hideout of the abductors on September 17, 1977, and, following a shootout, Ellirisem was rescued unharmed. His kidnappers were sent to prison.

October 3, 1977: Graziella Ortiz-Patino, the 5-year-old grandniece of a Bolivian millionaire, was abducted outside her home in Geneva, Switzerland. She was returned to her family unharmed on October 13, 1977. It was presumed that the family paid the kidnappers and undisclosed ransom amount. The abductors were not found.

January 23, 1978: One of Europe's wealthiest men, billionaire Baron Edouard-Jean Empain, was kidnapped in Paris, France, by five abductors wearing masks. The 40-year-old industrialist was held for a staggering $8.6 million ransom. His abductors sliced off one of the victim's fingers and mailed this to family members to convince them that Empain was, indeed, their hostage and to expedite the payment of the ransom. The payment was about to be made at a secluded spot south of Paris on March 24, 1978, when police interrupted the proceedings by stopping a car containing five suspects, causing a gunfight. Alain Caillol, the ringleader of the kidnapping gang, was captured and one of the other abductors was killed. Three others escaped. Caillol publicly asked his henchmen to release the hostage and Empain was returned to his family alive. Caillol and others were later sent to prison.

February 17, 1978: Jose Bartolini Berlini, a wealthy Italian toy manufacturer, was kidnapped in Medellin, Colombia, taken from his car by abductors, who, on February 20, demanded a ransom of 40 million pesos (about $1,400,000). Security forces were able, however, to identify the kidnapping car and traced the abductors to an upscale home outside of Medellin. The officers rushed the house, rescued Berlini and arrested three of the kidnappers, Guillermo Zapata Velez, Hernando Lopez Quintero, and Rodrigo Alberto Yepes. All three received long prison sentences.

March 7-8, 1978: Baron Charles Bracht, a Belgian millionaire, was abducted by unidentified kidnappers in Antwerp, detectives finding his abandoned car in a parking lot, where they believed Bracht had been seized. No ransom for his return was made and the victim's body was found at a garbage dump on March 10, 1978. He had been shot to death by abductors who, according to police, had no political motives.

April 10, 1978: Linda Goldstone, wife of a well-known doctor, was kidnapped, raped and murdered in Chicago, Illinois, by Hernando Williams, who was later convicted and sent to prison for life.

September 30, 1978: Aarno Laminparras, a 37-year-old building contractor and resident of Oulu, Finland, skyjacked a Finnair airliner en route from Oulu to Helsinki, with fifty persons on board. Brandishing a loaded pistol, Laminparras demanded ransoms of $170, 750 from the airline and $37,500 from Helsingin Sanomat, a Finnish newspaper, for the return of his hostages. The skyjacker had the pilot fly back and forth between Oulu and Helsinki for some time, then ordered the plane to fly to Amsterdam, then back to Finland, where the plane finally landed at Oulu. There Laminparras met with his wife, giving her $125,000 of the ransom money. Police agreed to let the skyjacker go home if he released the hostages, which he did. Detectives followed the skyjacker to his home on the night of October 2, 1978, arresting him at his house and recovering the remaining ransom money. He was later imprisoned.

October 4, 1978: Country singer Tammy Wynette, was kidnapped in Nashville, Tennessee, held for two hours and then released. Her abductor was never apprehended.

January 28, 1979: Irene McKinney, a 49-year-old divorced woman with mental problems, skyjacked United Airlines Flight 8, en route from Los Angeles to New York, with 131 people aboard, claiming that she had a vial of nitroglycerin in her handbag, which she would explode, unless her demands were met. Those demands were ambiguous, at best, as expressed in the note she sent to the pilot, which stated that she was "willing to die for a cause, but I don't know what the cause is." Then she demanded that one of three Hollywood celebrities—Jack Lemmon, Charlton Heston, or Lindsay Wagner—go to the TWA ticket counter at the Los Angeles International Airport and read a statement she had earlier hidden there. Heston went to the designated area, but no one could find the message he was willing to read. Mrs. McKinney then found the message in her own purse, having forgotten to leave it at the TWA counter. When the plane arrived in New York, McKinney released some of the hostages, who told FBI agents that the woman was mentally disturbed. When McKinney later fell asleep, agents quietly put her under arrest, finding a wad of sheets that made up her rambling manifesto in which she envisioned a solar explosion that would alter the world, bringing about a new religion based on technological wonders. Thought to be unfit for trial, Mrs. McKinney, who had recently lost custody of her two children, was institutionalized.

March 8, 1979: Frank and Tammy Galleshaw, the children of a wealthy restaurant owner in Burrillville, Rhode Island, were kidnapped by three of their father's golfing companions and held for a $500,000 ransom. The children convinced one of the abductors to release them before the ransom payment was made. The culprits were imprisoned.

April 28, 1979: Two men looking for mushrooms near White Lick Creek, Indiana, discovered the naked body of Terry Lee Chasteen, a 21-year-old mother of three children, from Indianapolis, Indiana. Downstream, the men found the bodies of the children, 5-year-old Misty Ann, 4-year-old Stephen Michael, and 2-year-old Mark Lewis. A red and silver pickup truck had been seen in the area that morning and it was later traced to Steven T. Judy, a 22-year-old bricklayer. Judy was arrested and confessed to the kidnapping-murders, saying that he pulled alongside Chasteen's car on Interstate 465, indicating that there was something wrong with her auto. When she pulled over, Judy opened up the hood of Chasteen's car and secretly disabled the engine. He then offered to drive Chasteen and her children to a gas station. While driving, he turned to Chasteen and said: "I guess you know what's going to happen now?" He then drove to White Lick Creek, where he gagged, tied and raped Chasteen, before strangling her to death. He then drowned her screaming children. Judy, who was from a violence-prone home, had a long record for burglary, robbery and rape. In one instance, he had attacked a woman in Indianapolis, Indiana, stabbing her forty times, cutting off her thumb and burying a hatchet in her skull (she miraculously survived to testify against him in that case). He was out on bond and awaiting trial for a robbery at the time he murdered Chasteen and her children. At his trial in 1980, Judy boasted to juries that he had committed thirteen rapes, 200 home burglaries and fifty armed robberies. On February 25, 1980, Judy appeared in the Morgan County Superior Court in Martinsville, Indiana, where he told Judge Jeffrey Boles: "I honestly want you to give me the death penalty because one day I may get out." He turned to the jury and said: "You'd better vote for the death penalty, or it might be one of you or your family next." His wish was granted. Judy was executed in the electric chair at the Indiana State Prison in Michigan City, Indiana, on March 9, 1981, but not before photos of the killer were taken at his request so that he could send to friends these pictures of his newly-shaved head (prepared for the electrodes on the electric chair).

Steven T. Judy, the brutal kidnapper and killer of Terry Lee Chasteen; he asked for the death penalty and got it.

May 7, 1979: Mrs. Harry Chaddick, wife of a wealthy Chicago real estate developer, was kidnapped in Palm Springs, California. FBI agents rescued her and killed her abductors.

May 25, 1979: Etan Patz, six, disappeared after going to a school bus stop in the SoHo district of Manhattan, New York. He was never seen again, police concluding that he had been abducted. Several extortion demands for ransom payments were later made, but these proved to be the actions of cruel hoaxers.

July 20, 1979: Joan Dedrick, wife of a bank official, was kidnapped in Paterson, New Jersey, and held for a ransom of $300,000. After William Dedrick paid the ransom, the victim was released two days later. The kidnappers were apprehended a short time later, were convicted and sent to prison.

July 25, 1979: Nazrul Islam used a knife and toy pistol to skyjack a Bangladesh airliner, which was en route from Jessore to Dacca. Islam ordered the pilot to land a Calcutta's Dum Dum Airport, where some of the passengers were permitted to deplane. Islam then demanded a $1 million ransom, but he was unsure of his ultimate destination. After a fire broke out on the plane and ten-hours of negotiation failed to produce any results, the skyjacker surrendered to police. He was later imprisoned.

August 2, 1979: Michele Sindona (1920-1986), one of the richest men on earth, was reportedly kidnapped from his lavish apartment in the swanky Pierre Hotel on Fifth Avenue in New York City. Sindona, then fifty-nine, was one of the world's most celebrated financiers, one-time consultant to the Vatican and reportedly a manipulator of its vast funds, which he commingled with the illegal revenues from Mafia-controlled rackets in the U.S. and in Europe. At the time of his so-called abduction, Sindona was under indictment on ninety-nine counts of fraud in connection with the collapse of the Franklin National Bank (the worst financial calamity in the U.S. prior to the Enron-Arthur Anderson scandal in the early 2000s). Sindona had been accused of looting more than $45 million from Franklin National, using that institution's money in wild stock speculations. The Italian news agency, Ansa, received a call that announced Sindona's imminent execution, that the financier would be murdered on August 11, 1979, but this did not occur. Instead, Sindona's attorneys in Italy reported that they had received a letter showing a photo of their client, his abductors demanding information about his finances. The kidnappers, however, provided no means by which the lawyers could contact them. The abductors also promised to put Sindona on trial. On October 16, 1979, Sindona, with a gunshot wound in his leg, hobbled into a New York hospital, where he reported that his kidnappers had set him free, based on his promise to pay them an undisclosed amount of money. Sindona was at that time free on a $3 million bond in connection with fraud charges against him. Sindona claimed that he had been kidnapped by a 60-year-old Greek, who spoke halting Italian and had blonde hair. He said that he had been moved about from one hideout to another and had been shot by his abductor after he had attempted an escape. New York officials branded the kidnapping a hoax, stating that Sindona staged his own abduction to obfuscate the criminal indictments against him. When Italian prosecutor Giorgio Ambrosoli was assassinated by Mafia killers, Sindona was implicated in the killing and returned to Italy, where he was held in Voghera Prison, undergoing incessant interrogation into his myriad financial affairs. Sindona offered prosecutors nothing but his own demise. He was found dead in his cell on March 22, 1986, his death attributed to cyanide poisoning. Whether he was murdered or committed suicide is still under debate at this date.

September 12, 1979: German writer Rafael Kappel skyjacked a Luthansa airliner en route from Frankfurt to Cologne, Germany, waving a pistol which later proved to be a toy and demanding that he be granted an interview with German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, one that was to be nationally televised. Negotiators at Cologne agreed and Kappel released four crew members and 121 passengers. He taped a rambling diatribe about the development of nuclear weapons, poor maternity benefits for working women and shabby treatment of psychiatric patients. Kappel then surrendered and was later imprisoned.

October 30, 1979: Alfredo Battaglia, son of a rich jeweler, was abducted in Bovalino, Italy. The kidnappers demanded and received a ransom payment of $300,000 and then released their teenage captive.

April 27, 1980: Jack Miller, Jr. was kidnapped from his father's home in Schaumburg, Illinois. When he was rescued, he was found to be in the company of his mother, Lillian Miller, and Charles Lurie, who were later charged with kidnapping.

May 29, 1980: Edward Kvali, a wealthy Chicago-area real estate investor, was kidnapped and held for a ransom payment of $600,000. His kidnappers, Leo Bonuini and Trenton Nelson, were caught when they attempted to retrieve the ransom money, and were later sent to prison.

June 8, 1980: Oron Yarden, a youth from an upscale suburb of Tel Aviv, Israel, was abducted and slain by kidnappers, who received a $40,000 ransom payment. The killers were never apprehended.

November 27, 1980: Carmen Ortiz, a first-grader, was abducted, sexually assaulted and then murdered in Chicago, Illinois, by Jose Davis, a man who lived in her building. He later confessed and went to prison.

December 2, 1980: Gianluca Grimaldi, the son of a shipping magnate, was kidnapped in Naples, Italy, and was later released after an undisclosed ransom payment was made.

December 7, 1980: Clifford Bevens, the American manager of Ginsa Tire, a Goodyear subsidiary, was kidnapped from his home in Guatemala City, Guatemala and a $10 million ransom was demanded for his return. Bevens and five kidnappers later died when troops attacked the hideout of the abductors.

February 3, 1981: Lori Hocum was kidnapped from her home in Mataire, Louisiana, and later found in a shopping mall. Her father, Ronald Hocum, was later convicted and sent to prison for masterminding the abduction.

May 19, 1981: Three teenage girls were kidnapped and murdered in an area encompassing Vancouver, British Colombia, Canada. The disappearances and killings occurred between May 19 and July 30, 1981. The abductor was never apprehended.

July 17, 1981: Mirta Corsetti, the daughter of a millionaire restaurant owner, was kidnapped from one of her father's restaurants in Torvaianica, Italy. Police tracked down the abductors and freed the girl, retrieving $250,000 ransom money. Six men were later convicted of the crime and sent to prison.

July 21, 1981: Adam Walsh, six, was abducted from a shopping mall in Hollywood, Florida. The boy's severed head was found in a canal by fishermen near Vero Beach, Florida, more than 100 miles north of Hollywood, on August 10, 1981. The torso of the kidnapped boy was never recovered. Ottis Elwood Toole, an illiterate and savage homosexual serial killer, later reportedly wrote to the boy's father, John Walsh, who had established the popular TV show, "America's Most Wanted," saying that he would tell him where to find the remains of his son if he received some money. Toole, at that time, was a condemned prisoner at the state prison in Starke, Florida. The obscene letter was later attributed to Toole's fellow prisoner, Gerard John Schaefer, who allegedly wanted to further torment the Walsh family. Florida officials came to believe that Toole, indeed, had kidnapped, raped and murdered the Walsh boy, based upon specific details in the crime that they believed only the murderer would know, but FBI agents dismissed Toole as a suspect in the case. Toole died in prison on September 15, 1996, and the debate concerning his involvement in the Walsh kidnapping-murder continues to this day. (See chapter on Murder, Serial Killers.)

Adam Walsh, who was kidnapped and murdered; his father, John Walsh, established the popular TV show, "America's Most Wanted."

September 26, 1981: Two 13-year-old girls, Cinda Pallett and Charlotte Kinsey, disappeared while attending the fairgrounds in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. Both girls had informed their parents that they had been offered jobs unloading stuffed animals at a midway concession at the fairgrounds. Investigators learned that the girls had been seen in the company of a man before their disappearances. On September 29, 1981, two more girls, Susan Thompson and Sheryl Vaughn, both sixteen, also disappeared after visiting the fairgrounds. No trace of any of the four girls ever surfaced and all were presumed kidnapped and murdered.

January 26, 1982: Jacobo Ramon Larach, general manager of the Pepsi-Cola bottling company in San Pedro Sula, Honduras, was fatally shot when he resisted kidnappers attempting to abduct him.

February 8, 1982: Thomas Monotoc, son-in-law of Ferdinand Marcos, president of the Philippines, was found alive in an area about fifty-five miles east of Manila, after having been kidnapped.

April 3, 1982: Wanda Faye Reddick was found dead in rural Stewart County, Georgia. The 16-year-old girl had been kidnapped on March 28, 1982 from her home in Richland, Georgia. Her abductor had broken into her home and removed all of the bulbs from the light sockets to cover his movements in the house before kidnapping the girl. Two other girls—14-year-old Tanya Nix and 17-year-old Marie Sellers—had been kidnapped and murdered in 1981 in Richland. No one was ever apprehended for these crimes.

April 26, 1982: Four persons were kidnapped by James B. Moran in Akron, Ohio, and forced to travel with him to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where he then kidnapped a woman and drove her and her car to Aurora, Colorado. Moran was apprehended and was sent to prison.

April 27, 1982: Heiress Frances Julia Slater was kidnapped during a robbery in Stuart, Florida. The teenager was slain and four persons, including J. B. Parker and Alphonso Cave, were arrested, tried, convicted and sent to prison.

May 15, 1982: Lorraine Borowski, an attractive 21-year-old secretary, was abducted as she unlocked the door of the office where she worked in Elmhurst, Illinois, her kidnappers later killing her. Her body was found five months later and Andrew Kokoraleis (1964-1999), a native of Villa Park, Illinois, was arrested for the crime. He confessed to kidnapping and murdering Borowski, saying that he was a member of a sex-and-murder cult that had committed this abduction and was responsible for eighteen other kidnapping-murders of women in the early 1980s, but he did not name his accomplices. Kokoraleis was convicted and sentenced to death for the Borowski kidnapping-murder. He filed endless appeals to prolong his life and, after exhausting these avenues of escape from the death penalty, was executed on March 17, 1999.

June 22, 1982: Victor Kaire Bassin, a member of a well-known banking family, was kidnapped in Guatemala City, Guatemala. He was released after an undisclosed ransom was paid.

August 7, 1982: Father Renaldo Rivera, pastor of St. Francis Church in Santa Fe, New Mexico, disappeared after responding to a phone call that asked him to rush to the nearby small town of Waldo to administer the last rites to a dying person. He was to meet the caller at a roadway rest stop and from there would be taken to the rural home of the dying person. Rivera's body was found three miles from the rest stop on August 9, 1982. He had been shot to death and his abandoned car was found four miles from the site of the desert murder scene. His kidnapper-killer was never apprehended.

October 3, 1982: Gaby Kiss Mareth, the teenage daughter of a prominent British businessman, was released by her kidnappers in Como, Italy, after they reportedly received $119,000 of the demanded $3.5 million ransom payment.

December 12, 1982: Dino Titone, twenty-two, of Elgin, Illinois, accompanied by Joseph Sorrentino and Robert Gacho, kidnapped and murdered 39-year-old Aldo Fratto and his 26-year-old nephew Tulio Infelise. After receiving a shipment of cocaine from Fratto, Titone and his two accomplices abducted the drug dealer and Infelise, taking them to a rural spot in Lemont Township and fatally shooting them. Police later found Fratto dead and Infelise dying, the latter telling police the identities of his murderers. Investigators tracked down Kathryn DeWulf, the girl friend of Gacho, and she quickly informed on the trio, thus avoiding being charged as an accessory. Arrested, all three men were tried and convicted of kidnapping and murder. Gacho and Sorrentino were sent to prison for life and Titone, the shootist, was condemned to death by Cook County Circuit Court Judge Thomas Maloney in November 1984. On August 12, 1989, Titone signed an affidavit in which he stated: "I am not sure why Judge Maloney convicted me after the case had been fixed, but Roth [Bruce Roth, his attorney] indicated to me that a deal had been made." Roth had received $10,000 from Titone's father to use in bribing Maloney, but the judge nevertheless imposed the death penalty on Titone, thus betraying his agreement with Roth, apparently being frightened off by the then on-going "Graylord" investigations into corrupt figures in the Chicago judiciary. Roth was convicted of bribery and sent to prison for ten years in 1987. Judge Maloney was removed from the bench, and in 1994, sentenced to fifteen years and nine months in prison and ordered to pay a fine of $200,000. In light of this scandal, Titone won a new trial in 1990. Judge Earl Strayhorn vacated Titone's death sentence and Titone was not brought to trial until 1998, Criminal Court Judge Daniel Locallo then resentenced Titone, sending him to prison for life on October 13, 1998.

January 7, 1983: Robert S. Hester, a police officer in Memphis, Tennessee, was taken hostage by seven religious cult members, commanded by Lindberg Sanders, who called himself the "black Jesus." Sanders had called the police department to report a burglar and when Hester and another officer responded, Sanders and others shot and wounded the two officers, dragging Hester into the house in suburban Hollywood, where he was tortured. Police attempted to negotiate with the abductors and managed to place an eavesdropping device in the house. On January 12, 1983, when officers learned over this secreted line that Hester had been murdered, a SWAT team stormed the house. Sanders and his six followers were found dead after the firefight, some of the fanatics having committed suicide.

January 19, 1983: Eleanor M. Mitchell was arrested in Baltimore, Maryland, on charges of kidnapping several elderly men, drugging them and then robbing them. She was imprisoned.

November 19, 1983: Angela Bugay was abducted from her Antioch, California, home. The body of the 5-year-old girl was found seven days later, police stating that the child had been sexually assaulted and then smothered to death by her kidnapper. The killer was never apprehended. This was the first of what later became known as the Bay Area Child Abductions.

December 23, 1983: David Tomassi, twenty-nine, kidnapped his two young sons from their mother's Michigan home, later claiming that the boys were being abused by their mother, whom he had recently divorced. For eleven years, Tomassi moved through five states and Canada, raising his sons. He was finally arrested in upstate New York and, on October 4, 1994, charged with kidnapping. The two boys were attending a college preparatory school when their father was tried in a Pontiac, Michigan, court. The sons both pleaded with Judge David Beck not to send their father to prison, saying that he was a good and loving father. Beck, however, thought to set an example of Tomassi and send a message to all those guilty of parental kidnapping by sentencing Tomassi to the maximum term of one year in prison.

June 12, 1984: Kelly Morrisey, a 15-year-old girl from Long Island, New York, was abducted and not seen again. Another teenage girl from the same area, Theresa Fusco, was forced into a van, taken to a remote area and was raped and murdered by three young men, her battered body found on December 5, 1984. A third teenager, 19-year-old Jacqueline Martarella, was reported missing from Oceanside on March 26, 1985. On that day, police had arrested John Kogut, a 21-year-old unemployed landscaper. He and two others, 26-year-old John Restivo and 30-year-old Dennis Halstead, were charged in all three kidnapping murders. They were all convicted and sent to prison for life. The trio reportedly belonged to a Satanic cult that practiced ritual human sacrifice.

July 15, 1984: While jogging near Big Sky, Montana, Kari A. Swenson, a 23-year-old athlete training for the Olympics, was kidnapped by 50-year-old mountain man Don Nichols and his 19-year-old son, Dan Nichols, who took her to their remote camp and chained her to a tree. The elderly Nichols had decided to abduct the young woman so that she would become his son's common-law wife. Two men, Jim Schwalbe and Alan Goldstein, who had been searching for Swenson, stumbled upon the camp of the bearded mountain men and in a struggle, Don Nichols shot and killed Goldstein. Swenson was wounded in the fight by Don Nichols, while Schwalbe escaped to notify authorities. The Nichols, after unchaining their captive, left her at their camp, then fled into the wilds. Searchers rescued Swenson some hours later. Her kidnappers were not tracked down until December 13, 1984, when a sheriff's posse discovered their camp and arrested the father and son. Don Nicholas was convicted of kidnapping and Goldstein's murder on July 12, 1985, and was given an 85-year prison sentence. His son, Dan Nichols, went to prison for twenty years.

January 7, 1985: Saed Madjid, armed with fake weapons—a pistol and a hand grenade—skyjacked a British Airways plane en route from Manchester to London, England, with fifty-one people on board. Upon landing at London, the skyjacker allowed forty-six persons to disembark, then demanded a £100,000 ransom payment, threatening to kill the five crew members he still held hostage. Madjid also demanded a parachute and a safe plane ride to Paris, France. The money and parachute were delivered and the plane took off, but instead of flying to Paris, the pilot landed the plane at Essex, a short distance from London, where the skyjacker fled the plane and, while using a hostage as a shield, was captured. He was convicted of air piracy and sent to prison.

February 7, 1985: Enrique Camarena Salazar, a U.S. drug enforcement agent, and Alfredo Zavala Avelar, his pilot, were kidnapped in Mexico, tortured and then slain by Raul Lopez Alvarez, Rene Martin Verdugo-Urquidez and Jesus Felix Guiterrez, all acting on the orders of drug king Rafael Caro Quintero. The bodies of the two DEA agents were found in Guadalajara, Mexico on March 6, 1985. Caro Quintero had ordered the abduction murders after Salazar had been instrumental in working with Mexican officials to seize large drug caches scheduled for distribution by Caro Quintero's operatives. Alvarez, who was a 26-year-old ex-police officer at the time of the kidnappings, was later identified as the perpetrator and extradited to the U.S., tried in Los Angeles, where a jury convicted him after viewing a videotape of him confessing to the killings and explaining the torture methods used on the two men. On October 29, 1988, Alvarez was sentenced by Federal District Judge Edward Rafeedie to serve one life term, four consecutive sixty-year terms and one ten-year term to run concurrently. Rafeedie ordered that Alvarez be ineligible for parole until after he served at least sixty years of his 240-year sentence. Caro Quintero, who had ordered the kidnapping-murders, was captured in San Jose, Costa Rica on April 4, 1985, and returned to Mexico City, where he was convicted of arms smuggling and impressing local peasants into forced labor on his marijuana plantation. He was given a 34-year prison sentence.

April 31, 1985: Shawn Moore, a 13-year-old native of Green Oak Township, Michigan, vanished after leaving home to buy some soda pop at a neighborhood store. His naked body was found near a fishing cabin in Caseville, Michigan, on September 13, 1985. Long before that time, officers had interrogated 26-year-old Ronald Lloyd Bailey, who had a long record as a pedophile. Bailey denied having seen the Moore boy, but later fled to Florida, where he was tracked down and arrested for kidnapping and murdering Moore. The victim's decomposing body had been found only a short distance from Bailey's cabin in Caseville. Bailey admitted abducting Moore at knifepoint, then taking him to his cabin, where he repeatedly raped him and then strangled him to death. He also confessed to kidnapping and murdering another boy in 1984. Though he pled insanity at his trial, claiming that his mind had been warped by a therapist who raped him, Bailey was found guilty of kidnapping and murder and sent to prison for life.

May 31, 1985: Sharon Faye Smith, seventeen, disappeared from her home in Red Bank, South Carolina. Her body was later found behind the Masonic Lodge in Saluda County, South Carolina. She had been suffocated to death. In June, Smith's abductor-killer, Larry Gene Bell, called the Smith home nine times to torment the Smith family with vivid descriptions of the rape-murder. He claimed to have given his victim the choice of death by gunshot, drug overdose or suffocation. In Bell's last call, on June 22, 1985, made to the victim's sister, Dawn Smith, the killer alluded to the disappearance of 9-year-old Debra May Helmick, who had been kidnapped from her Richland County home and found murdered in nearby Lexington County. A few days after Bell had told Dawn Smith that "God has chosen you to join your sister in death," he was traced through a phone tap and arrested. On February 23, 1986, Bell was found guilty by a Berkeley County jury after only fifty-five minutes of deliberation. He was sentenced to death. On April 2, 1987, Bell was convicted for the kidnapping-murder of the Helmick girl and sentenced to die in South Carolina's electric chair. Bell, born in 1948, had had a long criminal career before kidnapping the Helmick and Smith girls. In 1975, he had attempted to kidnap and rape two young women in South Carolina and was confined in a state hospital for twenty months, doctors warning state officials not to release him. He was nevertheless released in 1979. While awaiting execution, Bell used every legal loophole to prolong his life on appeals, but after exhausting such motions, he was executed in the electric chair on October 4, 1996. Unlike the grim alternatives he reportedly offered the Smith girl, the state gave Larry Gene Bell no options on the method of his execution.

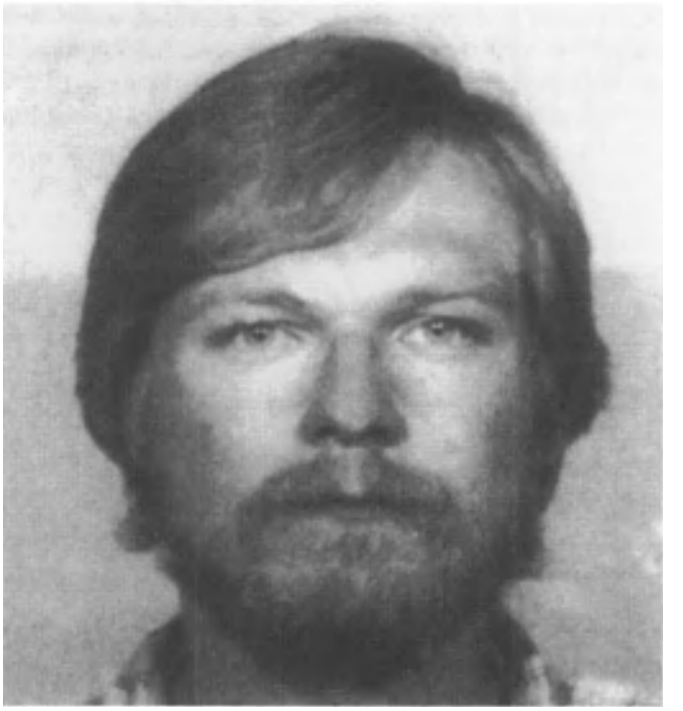
October 14, 1985: Gail Smith, a 20-year-old waitress, began hitchhiking from Fort Worth, Texas, en route to her mother's home at Lake Meredith. Her body was later found by a truck driver alongside a road near Amarillo. Her beaten body was bound with duct tape. Witnesses told detectives that Smith got into a red "Ruger Freight" truck, which was traced to Mangum, Oklahoma. The driver, 42-year-old Benjamin Boyle, his driving schedule showed, had been driving the route where Smith had been picked up. Further, Boyle had earlier been convicted of attempting to kidnap and rape a woman in Colorado Springs, Colorado on November 20, 1979, and, following his guilty plea, had been placed on a five-year probation. Boyle was tried for the Smith case and was convicted of kidnapping and murder by a jury after a three-hour deliberation on October 29, 1986. The jury recommended the death penalty and Boyle, after losing several appeals, was executed on April 29, 1997 by lethal injection. Boyle had also been the prime suspect in the kidnapping-murder of an unidentified woman, whose body was found near Truckee, California, on June 21, 1985.

November 22, 1985: An engineer and a native of Bridgeport, West Virginia, 38-year-old John Crutchley picked up a 19-year-old hitchhiker from California and took her to his home in Melbourne, Florida, where he repeatedly raped the girl. Then, using surgical instruments, he drained half of his victim's blood from her, drinking this over a 22-hour period. Kept handcuffed and manacled in the bathroom of Crutchley's home, the girl nevertheless managed to escape through the bathroom window, leading police back to the home of her attacker on November 23, 1985. Crutchley, dubbed the "Vampire Rapist," was convicted of kidnapping and rape and sent to prison for twenty years. He was later believed to be the killer of two others, Debbie Fitzjohn, who was last seen alive entering Crutchley's trailer in Fairfax County, Virginia, on January 27, 1978 (Crutchley was then a Virginia resident). Her remains were found eleven months later, close to where Crutchley lived. Police at that time, however, did not have enough evidence to convict Crutchley of that murder. Patti Volanski, who had been missing since March 1985, was also thought by police to be another Crutchley victim. Following Crutchley's November arrest for his attack on the hitchhiker, Volanski's identification card was found in Cruthley's office desk. Crutchley said the girl had accidentally left the card in his car after he had given her a ride. Again, police did not have enough evidence to convict Crutchley in the Volanski case. Crutchley was paroled on August 8, 1996, and sent to a halfway house in Orlando, Florida. Two days later, he was arrested on a drug violation, having admitted that he had obtained and used marijuana, which violated his parole. He had obtained the drug on the last day of his incarceration at the Union Correctional Institution in Raiford, Florida. Crutchley was convicted of parole violation and returned to prison to serve out his complete prison term.

October 27, 1986: Two children in Harper City, Liberia, 6-year-old Samuel Johnson and 7-year-old Emmanuel Dalieh, were seized during a parade by politician Joshua Bedell and five others, taken to the home of Alfred T. Davies and beaten to death by Gbassie Toe, their bodies tossed into the Hoffman River after certain body parts had been removed. The internal organs of the victims were then burned as sacrificial juju offerings in order that Bedell might win the upcoming mayoral election in Harper City. The subsequent arrests of the cultists caused widespread rioting in Harper City, causing a change of venue for their trials, which were held in Monrovia, the capital. Bedell, Davies, Toe, Samuel Cummings, David K. Clarke, and Faikai Gardiner were all found guilty of murder and sentenced to death.

December 4, 1986: William Scott Day, thirty-five, who had committed his first kidnapping at age seventeen, escaped the Center for Forensic Psychiatry in Ypsilanti, Michigan, with the help of a guard, who hid Day in a laundry cart. Day and the guard went to Louisville, Kentucky, where Day stole $5,000 of the guard's money and fled. The guard later surrendered to police and was sentenced to two-and-a-half years to seven years in prison for helping a convict to escape. Day then embarked on a kidnapping-murder spree, abducting 78-year-old Mary Catherine Strobel with her own car in Nashville, Tennessee, on December 9, 1986, robbing her of $30, then stabbing and strangling her to death, placing her body in the trunk of the car, which he later abandoned. On January 5, 1987, Day surfaced at Billie's Lounge in Fort Stockton, Texas, where he kidnapped 56-year-old Billie Taylor after she was leaving the lounge to bank the day's receipts. Day robbed and murdered her, the victim's body found on January 6, 1987, about four miles from the town. On January 12, 1987, a policeman stopped a car for speeding about 100 miles west of Fort Stockton. The driver flashed rolls of bills in large denominations and the officer arrested the man, who proved to be Day. The car Day was driving at the time belonged to 53-year-old Stanley Robertson, a retired railroad employee. Day had fatally beaten Robertson that day with a hammer before cutting the victim's throat. Day admitted to police that he had kidnapped and murdered eight persons in Alabama, Arizona, Florida, Louisiana, Tennessee and Texas. He was charged with Taylor's murder on January 14, 1987, and with Robertson's murder on January 22, 1987. He was returned, however, to Tennessee, to stand trial for the murder of Mary Strobel, going to trial in Nashville on September 11, 1989, before Circuit Court Judge Walter Kurtz. Day was convicted of armed robbery, kidnapping and murder, but the jury, unaware of his other murder confessions, debated the death penalty, then recommended life imprisonment. On September 24, 1989, Judge Kurtz sentenced Day to three life terms.

March 28, 1987: Robin Smith, twenty-two, disappeared after leaving a tavern in Puyallup, Washington, with a blond-haired young man named "Herb Johnson." On April 29, 1987, Wendy Aughe, twenty-nine, vanished after leaving a beauty school night class in Bellingham, Washington. Officials looking into these two disappearances got their first break on May 31, 1987, when a car reportedly belonging to "Herb Johnson," was found abandoned near Marysville, north of Seattle. The car had been stolen in Nampa, Idaho, two months earlier. Inside the trunk of the car, detectives discovered a blood-stained jacket that belonged to Robin Smith, along with some human teeth. Smith's decomposing body was found on May 25, 1987, outside of Greenwater, Washington, north of towering Mount Rainier. Investigators working on the Aughe disappearance learned that the woman had disappeared while going on a date with a bartender, who had quit his job the following day. He was identified through fingerprints as 27-year-old Darren Dee O'Neall, a drifter who had deserted his wife and child and was sought for non-support.



Kidnapper Darren Dee O'Neall, who operated in Washington, Oregon and Idaho.

O'Neall bore the word "JUNE" tattooed across the fingers of his left hand, a memorable mark recalled by his tavern employer, as well as a trucker, who gave him a lift near the site where Smith had disappeared. Then officials located the abandoned car of Wendy Aughe outside of Eugene, Oregon. A widespread manhunt ensued for O'Neall, but he reportedly struck again on June 9, 1987, kidnapping and murdering Liza Szubett, near a truck stop in Mountain Home, Idaho. Her body was found near La Grande, Oregon, on June 13, 1987. O'Neall was placed on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list on June 25, 1987. By that time, O'Neall was suspected in kidnapping and murdering three women in Salt Lake City, Utah. He was tracked down and arrested on February 13, 1988, in Florida, and was returned to Washington, where he was convicted and sent to prison.

May 17, 1987: Herbert James Coddington, born in 1959, a gambler who thought himself an expert in playing the odds, and who had written several pamphlets on the subject, abducted Maybelle "Mabs" Martin, her friend Dorothy Walsh, both age seventy, and two young models, ages twelve and fourteen, who worked in Martin's modeling agency from Reno, Nevada, driving them to Lake Tahoe, where he said he was going to use the two girls in a video for an anti-drug campaign. He took the women to his mobile home and locked up Martin and Walsh, strangling them to death, then sexually abused the two girls for three days. Reno police by then had been searching for the women and FBI agents were called into the case, who received information from a part-time model working for Martin. The girl had written down the license number on the car driven by a suspicious man claiming to be the producer of film commercials. FBI agents traced the car to Coddington and located his trailer in Lake Tahoe, agent Terry Knowles breaking down the door and arresting the kidnapper. At the time, Coddington had shaved off his mustache and had dyed his hair orange in a futile attempt to disguise himself. He was tried in Placerville, California, on June 20, 1988, and despite his claims that he was insane at the time of the kidnapping-murders (insisting that God had told him to murder Martin and Walsh through changing streetlights), he was convicted and sentenced to death on January 20, 1989. Coddington was also linked to the kidnapping murder of 12-year-old Sheila Keister in Nevada, but was not convicted in that case. Coddington awaits execution at this writing, fighting through appeals to prolong his life. Also at this writing, 594 convicted males and twelve females await execution in California. Some prisoners have managed to preserve their lives as long as twenty-one years through the antiquated appeals system in that state.

June 8, 1987: Julie Magliulo, a toddler, was abducted, her body later found in a remote area of Broward Country, Florida.

July 3, 1987: Sandra Chamberlain disappeared in Palm Beach County, Florida, her body later found floating in a small lake. She had been raped and strangled, her corpse mutilated with a broken piece of glass. Witnesses reported seeing Chamberlain leaving a singles bar with an unidentified man. Investigating officers received a call from Terry Armstrong, who told them that he had seen his neighbor with the victim on the night of her disappearance. Armstrong, however, became the chief suspect after police learned that he had a history of violence, including a conviction for assault in the 1970s. He was charged with the Chamberlain murder and, in January 1989, pleaded guilty to kidnapping and second degree murder. He was given consecutive sentences of forty years for murder and thirty-five years for sexual battery by Palm Beach Circuit Court Judge Thomas Johnson.

July 9, 1987: A victim of Down's syndrome, Jennifer Schweiger, twelve, disappeared from her home in Staten Island, New York. Andre Rand (born Andre Rashan; AKA: Bruchette), a 44-year-old drifter who lived in a makeshift shelter on the deserted grounds of the Staten Island Development Center, was reported to have been with the girl on the day she vanished. He was arrested and charged with her kidnapping on August 4, 1987. The girl's body was found about a week later close to Rand's dilapidated dwelling and he was charged with the girl's murder. Convicted, he was sent to prison for life. Rand was also suspected of having kidnapped and murdered 10-year-old Tiahese Jackson, who had also disappeared on Staten Island. Rand had been imprisoned for the rape and attempted kidnapping of a 9-year-girl in the South Bronx in 1969. He had been released in 1972, and was arrested several times thereafter on kidnapping charges.

July 20, 1987: Ngoc Van Dang, a 25-year-old businessman, was kidnapped south of Orlando, Florida, and thrown into the trunk of a car, then later removed and, with his mouth, arms and legs taped, was shot seven times, a cross carved into his abdomen. Through informants Elizabeth Rebecca Towne and Daniel Paul Bowen, two drifters, police learned of this abduction-murder and later tracked down and arrested 25-year-old Anthony Alan Hall and 17-year-old Bunny Nicole Dixon, who had long criminal records and had served prison time. They, along with the informants, reportedly belonged to a Satanic cult. Hall and Bowen were tried and convicted of kidnapping and murder and given life sentences. Dixon was sentenced to fifty years imprisonment and Towne drew a seventeen-year prison term.

Police photos of Anthony Alan Hall, kidnapper and killer of a Florida businessman.

September 2, 1987: Stephen B. Small, one of the leading businessmen in Kankakee, Illinois, received a phone call at 12:30 a.m. from someone identifying himself as a Kankakee police officer, who told Small that his offices had been burglarized and asked him to come to the offices to check anything that might have been stolen. Small left his house and two hours later his wife received a call from Small's kidnapper, saying: "We have your husband!" The caller told Mrs. Small not to contact the police and await instructions for the delivery of a $1 million ransom payment. Meanwhile, the kidnapper took Small to a remote area near the Indiana state line and placed him in a plywood box under three feet of dirt, providing him with a battery-powered light, a water container and some candy bars, allowing him to breathe through a small plastic tube that led from the box, and to the surface. Police were nevertheless contacted and began to monitor the kidnapper's subsequent calls to Small family members through wiretaps, learning that the abductor had made a call from a phone booth outside a gas station in Aroma Park, Illinois. The gas station attendant gave police enough information to identify 30-year-old Daniel J. Edwards and his blonde girlfriend, 26-year-old Nancy Rish. Both were arrested in Bourbonnais, Illinois, at their residence. By that time, Small was dead, having suffocated about three hours after being placed in the underground box. Edwards was convicted of kidnapping and murder and sentenced to death. Rish received a long prison term. Investigators later pointed out that had Small called the Kankakee Police Department to confirm the kidnapper's report of the burglary, the police would have undoubtedly arrested Edwards, who was waiting near Small's office, and that Stephen Small would have escaped his terrible death. "People are too trusting," said one official. "In a world occupied by many murderous persons, it is important not to take anyone's word at face value."

November 4, 1987: Tawana Brawley, a 15-year-old black girl living in Wappingers Falls, New York, disappeared from her home and was found four days later near a housing project from which her family had been evicted. Covered with a plastic garbage bag and smeared with human excrement, Brawley told a story of being kidnapped by six white men, who repeatedly raped and abused her, writing racial slurs on her abdomen. Further, she said that one of her assailants had shown her a police badge. Black personalities and activists, such as comedian Bill Cosby, fight promoter Don King, boxer Mike Tyson (who, ironically, had been convicted and imprisoned for rape), and Rev. Al Sharpton, who used the case as a political platform from which to attack white officials, supported the girl and embraced her claims wholeheartedly. Edward Lewis, publisher of Essence Magazine, posted a $25,000 reward for the apprehension of the perpetrators. A grand jury, impaneled on February 29, 1988, determined through witnesses and other evidence that Brawley had invented the "attack" in order to disguise her own runaway activities.

Tawana Brawley, who reportedly faked her own rape-kidnapping to cover up her run-away exploits in 1987, which ignited a black racist campaign against whites.

November 4, 1987: Frankie Barnes, nine, vanished after going for a bike ride in Providence, Rhode Island. His bicycle was found two weeks later near an abandoned brewery, but the boy was still listed as missing. On December 14, 6-year-old Jason Wolf disappeared from his home in Providence. His body was found a week later near Mashapaug Pond. He had been killed by blows to the head. Some days later, police received a note telling them where to find the body of the Barnes child, and found the corpse near Tongue Pond. The note bore the faint name of a Providence resident, who was questioned and who told police that his name was most probably being used by 21-year-old William Sarmento, who had recently and vainly tried to win his girlfriend's affections. Sarmento had a long record of violent assaults and was identified as having been seen in the areas where the Barnes and Wolf boys vanished. He was arrested and charged with the two kidnapping-murders, but was judged mentally unfit for trial and was sent to an asylum for the criminally insane.

January 25, 1988: Carlos Hoyos, attorney general of Colombia, was abducted and killed outside of Medellin, Colombia, by drug traffickers. Two of his bodyguards were also slain.

March 6, 1988: Despite repeated warnings from their father to never open a locked freezer in the basement of their North Tampa, Florida, home, teenagers Diane and James Bailey used a screwdriver to pry open the freezer. They discovered to their horror the severed head and torso of a woman. Police were summoned and 45-year-old James Warren Bailey was arrested, along with two of his drug-trafficking confederates, 27-year-old Irvin George Riley and 28-year-old James Albert Whyte. Under questioning, Whyte turned state's evidence, stating that the body was that of prostitute Kimberly Ann Hanlon, who had been part of the drug ring and, after being suspected of holding out profits, was abducted and taken to Bailey's home, where she was raped, shot in the head, dissected with a power tool and then placed in the locked freezer. Bailey, a divorced man who lived with a girlfriend and his three teenage children, was convicted and given three life terms, avoiding Florida's death sentence because the state could not establish aggravating circumstances supporting the death penalty. On January 28, 1989, Riley was given the same sentence. Whyte received a 25-year probation for testifying against his co-defendants.

June 3, 1988: Amber Swartz, age seven, vanished from her Pinole, California, home, and was presumed kidnapped. She was never recovered. Her disappearance was thought to be part of the Bay Area Child Abductions.

June 20, 1988: Posing as a nurse, a middle-aged woman entered the hospital room of Renee McClure in the maternity wing of the High Point Regional Hospital at High Point, North Carolina, telling McClure that she needed to weigh her newborn son, Jason McClure, at the nursery. Only minutes after the woman carried the child from the room, the duty nurse arrived to realize that the child had been kidnapped. FBI agents entered the case that afternoon. The following day, a tipster called local police, sending officers and FBI agents to the home of Brenda Joyce Nobles, which she shared with Sharon Leigh Slayton, her daughter. A search of the home resulted in the discovery of the missing child, located hidden in a closet. The kidnapper had cut off all his hair in a futile effort to disguise his appearance. Nobles admitted taking the boy, stating that she had faked a pregnancy for her 70-year-old boyfriend, who had refused to marry her unless they had a child together. Nobles purposely gained weight months before the kidnapping so that she would appear pregnant, snatched the McClure child, and then presented the infant to her boyfriend as their own that afternoon, saying that she had given birth that day. Her own daughter had recently given birth, Nobles said, which sparked her idea of kidnapping the McClure boy. Nobles was convicted of kidnapping and sent to prison for twelve years. (See: September 19, 1955, Robert Marcus kidnapping.)

July 7, 1988: Linda Lou German (AKA: Jackie Moore), a 26-year-old woman with a prison record for writing bad checks, called a new mother at the Cabell Huntington Hospital in Huntington, West Virginia, arranging to meet her and her family and newborn child the next day. Claiming to be a hospital official, she arrived at the home of 18-year-old Emma Messer and her husband, Bennie Sturgell, and, while holding the child and brandishing a knife, stated that she had to have the baby and if anyone tried to stop her, she would drop the child on its head. Sturgell bit German and retrieved his child safely, while German fled. German appeared at the same hospital in Huntington, West Virginia, on July 12, and, while wearing a nurse's uniform, attempted to steal a newborn child from Dallas Davis, but she was stopped by a supervising nurse. German then went into the room of another new mother, Linda Manns, and told her that she had to take her child's photo. Mrs. Manns turned over little Lindsay Regan Manns and German fled the hospital with the child, going to the home of her mother, Edith Bowman, in Piketon, Ohio. Bowman had read about the abduction in West Virginia, and was suspicious of her daughter, who had in the past faked several pregnancies and claimed to have had four miscarriages. After Bowman insisted that her daughter prove that the child she had brought home was legally hers, German called FBI officials and returned the child, confessing the kidnapping. At her trial, her attorney, W. Michael Frazier, argued that German was legally insane and was afflicted with pseudocyesis, a mental ailment in which women think they are pregnant. German was nevertheless convicted of kidnapping and sentenced to prison for eight-and-a-half years. (See September 19, 1955, Robert Marcus kidnapping.)

August 5, 1988: Robert Biddings, thirty-four, attempted to kidnap and rape the mother of a June 1987 rape victim in the same Columbus, Ohio, area where he raped the woman's daughter. The young woman's parents had staked out the spot for nearly a year in trying to catch Biddings if he struck again. In the second attack, the woman's husband drew a gun on Biddings, who was holding a gun to his wife's head, and yelled "Freeze! Police!" Biddings fled, but not before the couple recorded the license plate number of his car. He was tracked down and arrested, then found guilty by a jury on May 26, 1989, on forty counts of rape, kidnapping and robbery. Biddings was known as the "handcuff rapist," in that he handcuffed his victims before abducting them. On May 31, 1989, Biddings, who had bragged of raping at least sixty women, was sentenced to 484 to 955 years in prison.

August 17, 1988: Samuel Andrew Petit, twenty-six, kidnapped two assistant state's attorneys in a parking lot at Punta Gorda, Florida, south of Tampa. After taking his hostages to a remote area in southern Charlotte County, Petit robbed the pair, then shot and killed 27-year-old Norman Langston and wounded 29-year-old Kathy Finnegan, before he fled. He was later apprehended and convicted of kidnapping and murder. Since he reportedly suffered from a terminal disease, Huntington's chorea, Petit asked for capital punishment and was sentenced to death. He awaits execution at this writing.

September 24, 1988: Gerald Bunny, a 23-year-old security guard, kidnapped 5-year-old Tonya McGrew from her trailer home in Tampa, Florida, after the child's baby-sitter refused his advances. Bunny drove the girl to a deserted area, where he strangled her to death and then placed the body in the trunk of his car. The next day, while sleeping in his parents' home, Bunny heard the sound of his car being started. Running outside, he failed to stop the men who were repossessing the auto for late payments. The body was discovered a short time later and Bunny was arrested. Bunny was tried in Tampa in May 1989 in the courtroom of Judge M. William Graybill. Prosecutor Michael Benito sought the death penalty, stating that it takes a minute to strangle a person, thus making the murder of Tonya McGrew premeditated. Public defender Craig Alldredge undoubtedly saved Bunny from the death penalty by convincingly arguing that his client had committed the kidnapping murder on impulse and added that Bunny was slightly retarded, hyperactive and an epileptic, pointing out that he had not gone to the trailer park looking for the victim. Bunny was convicted of kidnapping and first-degree murder on September 25, 1989. He was later given two consecutive life sentences.

November 30, 1988: Lottie Margaret "Maggie" Rhodes, a 5-year-old child from Arlington, Texas, was kidnapped from her home, raped and murdered. Jackie Barron Wilson was tried, and convicted of the abduction-murder on September 22, 1989, and sentenced to death by lethal injection by a Dallas County jury five days later. The 22-year-old truckdriver had once lived in the same apartment complex as the victim and knew her babysitter. Evidence in this case was more than "circumstantial," as later claimed by Wilson. Police found his fingerprints on shards of glass from the broken window in the victim's room. Further, car tire tread marks on the child's back and legs—she had been beaten, asphyxiated and run over by a car—were matched to the tires on Wilson's car. Wilson awaits execution at this writing.

December 28, 1988: Marzio Perrini, a 64-year-old wealthy landowner, was kidnapped outside of Rome, Italy, his abductors demanding a ransom payment of $1.5 million. When the payment was slow in coming, the kidnappers sliced off one of their victim's ears and sent it to a Rome newspaper. Perrini was released otherwise unharmed on July 12, 1989, a week after his mutilation and following the payment to the abductors, who were not apprehended.

January 7, 1989: Father Francis Leslie Craven, whose parish was in Guntersville, Alabama, northeast of Birmingham, disappeared after arriving at the airport in Birmingham. Two days later, Father Craven's body was found burning in a trash dump near Tuscaloosa, Alabama, by a passing motorist. An autopsy later revealed that he had been severely beaten but it was unknown whether or not he was alive when his kidnapper set him afire. An attendant at a gas station near the dump reported that a shaggy-haired white man in his mid-twenties had arrived on foot at his station to purchase a gallon of gasoline and headed back in the direction of the dump. The priest's van was later found burned out, expensive cameras and equipment melted down, which ruled out robbery as a motive for this unsolved kidnapping-murder.

January 20, 1989: Ilene Mischeloff disappeared from her home in Dublin, California. The 13-year-old girl was never seen again and believed to have been part of the Bay Area Child Abductions.

February 7, 1989: Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Ernest Hiroshige sentenced 36-year-old Somesha Shinda (AKA: John Coleman) to 127 years in prison, after Shinda had been convicted on twenty-two counts of rape, kidnapping and child molestation. Shinda had abducted and sexually attacked eleven school girls in South Central Los Angeles between September 1987 and February 1988. He was apprehended after an alert mother saw him tinkering with his car, while watching her daughter going to school. She followed him down the street as he jogged after her daughter, frightening him away when she cried out to her child. The woman had written down the license plate number of Shinda's car, which led to his arrest.

March 23, 1989: Seven-year-old Sara Hodges was reported missing from her home in Newhall, California, and among those conducting a widespread search for her was 15-year-old Curtis Cooper, a next-door-neighbor. Three days later, the landlady of the building where the Cooper family lived, noticed a foul-smelling odor and investigated, finding the decomposing body of Sara Hodges hidden behind the headboard of Curtis Cooper's waterbed. A coroner's report later stated that the girl had been raped and then strangled with a dog leash. Cooper, who had a long record of theft and burglary in Florida, before his family moved to California, was institutionalized. Sara Hodges' father committed suicide at his daughter's gravesite four months later.

June 22, 1989: Karel Van de Hieft, fifty-six, was killed in a shootout between his captor, 33-year-old Stefan Krueger, a West German who had kidnapped Hieft, and Dutch police, who had located the abductor's hideout in Arnhem, Netherlands. Krueger was convicted of kidnapping and sent to prison.

August 10, 1989: Suzanne Jacobs, a 16-year-old high school baseball pitcher, was kidnapped by her coach, Jesse Aguilar, in Loomis, California. The girl attempted to escape by jumping from the moving truck Aguilar was driving, and was injured. A sheriff's deputy stopped his car to assist the injured girl and Aguilar, in front of witnesses, got out of his truck and shot Jacobs behind the ear, severely wounding her. Before the deputy could arrest him, the 42-year-old Aguilar fired a bullet into his own head, committing suicide.

August 14, 1989: Victor Cracknell, the 32-year-old son of a well-to-do businessman, was kidnapped in London, England, and held for five days, while his abductors negotiated a ransom payment of £142,000 (they had originally demanded £1 million). Cracknell was released and police later arrested the kidnappers, who were sent to prison. Most of the ransom money was recovered.

September 16, 1989: Philippe Delaire, thirty-eight, one of Belgium's most notorious criminals, attempted with others to rob a bank in Tilff, Belgium, holding the bank manager, Guy Jeuris, Marie-Madeleine Bolland and her two children hostage. Jeuris escaped so the gunmen held Bolland and her children hostage for six days and demanded a $720,000 ransom and a getaway car for their safe return. The ransom was paid and the car provided, In their attempt to escape, the gunmen were cornered by police. Delaire, who had escaped from a French prison in April 1989, was shot to death and the others captured and imprisoned.

October 5, 1989: Ronald Shelton, twenty-seven, was sentenced to 1,149 to 3,195 years in prison, the longest sentence in the history of Ohio, following his conviction on 220 counts of rape, assault, kidnapping and robbery. Shelton was found guilty of having abducted and raped thirty females in the Cleveland, Ohio, area between 1983 and 1988.

October 22, 1989: Jacob Wetterling, the 11-year-old son of a NAACP leader in St. Joseph, Missouri, was kidnapped at gunpoint by a man wearing a ski mask at a convenience store about a mile from the boy's home. Despite a widespread search and rewards of more than $125,000 for the boy's safe return, Wetterling was never seen again.

October 23, 1989: After stabbing his sister, Ethel Cooper, to death in Chester, Pennsylvania, 34-year-old Steven G. Davis, kidnapped his two sons, 3-year-old Steven Tyson, and 18-month-old Brandon Richard, taking them to the home of his estranged wife, Joan Davis, near Claymont, Delaware. He drowned the two boys in a bathtub, then waited for Joan Davis to appear, sitting in the living room with a shotgun trained on the front door. Police arrived instead, arresting him. Davis awaited trial at the Gander Hill Prison, where he was severely beaten by other inmates, who traditionally single out child abusers for special punishment. He was moved to a special cell and kept under protective custody, his movements monitored every fifteen minutes. On November 5, 1989, however, Davis managed to commit suicide in his cell by hanging himself with a strip of bedsheet affixed to a fire sprinkler nozzle.

November 10, 1989: Craig Allen Mrozowski, a 30-year-old prisoner escaped from the correctional work release unit in Bradenton, Florida, stopping a car and kidnapping a couple. He later tied up the man and raped the woman before driving the car to Tennessee, where, in a police pursuit, he crashed the auto and fled on foot. He was arrested nine days later in Tulsa, Oklahoma. He was returned to Bradenton to serve out his former term of thirty years—he had served eight at the time of his prison break—and was given an additional sentence for his escape, kidnapping and rape.

January 9, 1990: Olivier Groues, president of Rank Xerox-France, was held hostage in his office in Paris, France, for seven hours by a disgruntled employee, who was overwhelmed by police and arrested after a shootout that resulted in the wounding of Groues. The abductor was sent to prison.

January 30, 1990: A group calling itself the Anonymous Kidnappers, released Cesare Casella in Careri, Italy, after they had held their victim hostage for two years. An undisclosed ransom payment was reportedly made.

February 7, 1990: Newton Alfred Winn, a Florida lawyer, was convicted in Hattiesburg, Mississippi, of extortion, conspiracy to kidnap, and perjury in connection with the 1988 disappearance of 74-year-old Annie Laurie Hearin. He was imprisoned.

February 13, 1990: Arthur Curry, former part-owner of two Michigan hotels, was convicted in Bloomington, Indiana, on four of five counts connected with the kidnapping of millionaire Gayle Cook.

February 23, 1990: Alan Rees, a native of England, was sentenced in Wiesbaden, Germany, to 13 years in prison for kidnapping and extortion in the 1983 abduction of a Lufthansa manager in Bolivia. He had been sentenced in absentia in Bolivia to a prison term of twenty-two years and was to serve out that sentence after serving his sentence in Germany.

June 13, 1990: Given $10 by their father to have dinner at a shopping mall in Oak Ridge North, Texas (fifteen miles north of Houston, Texas), 16-year-old Grace Purkhagen and her 9-year-old sister, Tiffany Purkhagen, vanished, their disappearance reported early the following morning by their parents. Police learned that Grace Purkhagen had told friends that she was planning to meet classmate and sometimes boyfriend, Delton Dowthitt, sixteen. The girls were last seen, officers also learned, talking to two men in a blue-and-white pickup truck outside of a bowling alley. Two days later, police stopped that very truck and arrested its driver, 20-year-old Ben Fulton, for previous traffic violations. Delton Dowthitt was then a passenger in the truck, but neither was linked to the disappearances of the Purkhagen girls. On June 16, 1990, however, police got a tip from Peter Brown, a construction worker, who said that Fulton and Dowthitt had bragged of raping and killing a girl named "Casey." Brown had misunderstood the nickname "Gracie," which was used by the older Purkhagen girl. Brown then led police to an undeveloped subdivision, where the bodies of the two girls were found. Grace Purkhagen had been raped, sodomized, repeatedly stabbed and her throat slit, while Tiffany Purkhagen had been strangled to death by a rope that was still about her neck. Fulton was arrested, but proved he was not at the scene of the crime, though he admitted he was with Dowthitt when police arrested him for traffic violations and was at that time going with Dowthitt to move the bodies. Texas had no law in place that punished accessories after the fact, so Fulton was not charged. He later became a witness for the prosecution. Police by then were searching for Dowthitt, finding that he and his 45-year-old father, Dennis Dowthitt. Both men were later arrested. Delton Dowthitt admitted raping and killing the girls, but later insisted that his father, who had brutally attacked the female members of his family for years, had raped the older girl, sodomized her with a bottle, then stabbed her and cut her throat. His father also ordered him to murder the younger girl, Delton Dowthitt told police, or be killed himself by his father. Delton Dowthitt testified against his father in court and received a 45-year prison sentence. Dennis Dowthitt was convicted of kidnapping and murder and sentenced to death. He was executed at the state prison in Huntsville, Texas, on March 7, 2001.

August 7, 1990: Mauro Goncalves de Oliveira, the suspected leader of a kidnapping ring responsible for more than thirty abductions, was killed in a shootout with police in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

September 15, 1990: Melissa Benoit, age thirteen, vanished after leaving a friend's home in Kingston, Massachusetts. Some days later, FBI agents arrested Henry Meinholz, a 52-year-old Bible school teacher, who was a next-door neighbor of the Benoit family. Meinholz confessed to luring the girl into his garage, then raping and smothering her to death. The body of the kidnapped girl was found buried beneath a coal pile in Meinholz's basement. Tried on November 15, 1991, Meinholz was found guilty of kidnapping and murder by a jury eight days later. He was sentenced to life in prison by Judge Cortland Mathers, who told Meinholz: "It is said that my predecessors in colonial times had a gallows erected on the green in front of this courthouse and summarily sent defendants convicted, as you have been, to be hung. I truly regret that option is not open to me in this case."

March 4, 1991: Two small boys, 7-year-old Christopher Weaver and 9-year-old Daniel Geier, disappeared after riding their bikes to a small lake near Virginia Beach, Virginia. Police later discovered the brutally slashed bodies and charged 16-year-old Shawn Novak with the abduction-killings. He confessed and was tried as an adult. Novak's attorneys stated that a psychiatrist examining Novak had learned that the boy was obsessed with the game Dungeons & Dragons, which had inspired him to kidnap and murder the two boys. Novak was nevertheless convicted, but Judge John Moore ignored the pleas of prosecutors demanding the death penalty and sentenced Novak to life imprisonment (making him eligible for parole within twenty years).

May 13, 1991: A South African judge in Johannesburg, South Africa, branded as a terrorist Winnie Mandela, wife of Nelson Mendela, leader of the then outlawed African National Congress. The judge found Winnie Mandela guilty of kidnapping four youths, who had been reportedly taken to her home and beaten for not supporting her political cause. She was sentenced to six years in prison the following day, but never served an hour behind bars, being fined and put on probation.

August 10, 1991: Angela Flaherty, a 7-year-old child living in Rawthorpe, England, was reported missing, her body later found in some woods close to her home. She had been raped and strangled, her skull crushed. Anthony Craven, a 17-year-old friend of the Flaherty family, who had condemned the crime to the press, was later arrested and he quickly confessed to kidnapping and murdering the girl, in order, he said, to impress his friends with a sexual conquest, meaning the rape of the little girl. He stated that he had not intended to kill Flaherty, but she continued to scream following the sexual attack and vowed that she would tell everyone about the attack. Craven panicked, he told police, and strangled the girl to death, then used a rock to crush her head and hid the body in a thicket. He was quickly convicted in Leeds Crown Court in May 1992, and sentenced to prison for life.

November 17, 1991: Two hunters found the corpse of a young woman near Glass Hill, Horry County, South Carolina, the remains later identified as that of 17-year-old Crystal Todd, a high school student who had been reported missing a short time earlier. She had been sexually molested and stabbed thirty-five times. Police interviewed forty-eight suspects, asking them to provide semen samples. One of these, 17-year-old Kenneth Register, a classmate of Todd's and a pallbearer at her funeral on November 20, 1991, tested positive through DNA identification. Register was arrested and jailed on February 17, 1992. He was convicted, chiefly on the DNA evidence, on January 22, 1993, and sentenced to life imprisonment.

December 27, 1991: Amanda "Nikki" Campbell disappeared from her Fairfield, California, home and was not seen again. The 14-year-old girl was thought to be part of the Bay Area Child Abductions.

January 11, 1992: Shanda Renee Sharer was abducted from her home in New Albany, Indiana by four teenage girls, who practiced black witchcraft, taking the girl to a rural area where she was stabbed repeatedly and then doused with gasoline and burned alive. Melinda Loveless and Mary Laurine Tackett were sentenced to sixty years in prison. Toni Lawrence was sent to prison for twenty years and Hope Rippey received a fifty-year prison sentence. Loveless had been the ringleader, planning to eliminate Sharer as a lesbian rival for the affections of another girl at Hazelwood Junior High School, the school attended by all of the girls.

April 29, 1992: Sidney Reso, millionaire president of Exxon International, was abducted from his suburban home in Morris Township, New Jersey. His abandoned car was found at the end of the driveway leading from his home and it was concluded by police that his kidnappers had seized him while he was driving to work. A widespread search for the businessman ensued, but without producing any results. In early May, the Exxon company and the Reso family began receiving phone calls and notes, demanding $18.5 million as a ransom payment for the return of Reso. The kidnapper used public phones in northern New Jersey and more than 250 FBI agents staked out these booths, several agents arresting 45-year-old Arthur D. Searle in one of these booths as he was talking to Reso family members and trying to negotiate the ransom payment. Searle, a former New Jersey policeman and a security guard for Exxon, was arrested, along with his 45-year-old wife Irene. At first, the couple refused to cooperate, but Irene Searle admitted her part in the kidnapping, leading officers to Reso's grave in the Bass River State Forest in Burlington, County, New Jersey, on June 27, 1992. She said that her husband had shot Reso in the arm when he resisted Searle's attempt to abduct him and that the victim was later placed in a box and put into a self-storage shed near the Searle home. When the abductors learned that he had bled to death from his wound, they moved his corpse to the forest preserve and buried it in a shallow grave. Searle had sent kidnap notes signed by the "Rainbow Warriors," to mislead police into thinking that members of Greenpeace were behind the kidnapping. That organization had once owned a ship called the Rainbow Warrior. Mrs. Searle was convicted and given two concurrent 20-year prison terms and a fine of $500,000 (which she could never pay), her sentence thought to be lenient in exchange for her turning state's evidence against her husband. Searle was given a 95-year prison term in federal court. A New Jersey court sentenced him to life for murder, plus fifteen to thirty years for kidnapping.

May 20, 1992: Amanda Dee-Ann Craig, eleven, vanished in Van Buren, Arkansas, while walking home from school. State police and FBI agents worked on this case for two years before an informant told officers that he had seen a man acting suspiciously with a girl in Van Buren on the day of Craig's disappearance and that he had written down the license plate of the man's car. FBI agents tracked the car to its owner, Vernon Lynn "Buddy" Hopper, a New Mexico drifter with a long criminal career, having kidnapped and raped two women in Texas, and for which he was convicted on December 15, 1992, and on January 27, 1993. He was serving two 99-year sentences in a Texas prison when agents identified him as the kidnapper of the Craig child. He was then linked to the disappearance of 11-year-old Roxie Moser, who had vanished in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on June 1, 1992. Hopper was convicted of kidnapping and murdering the Craig girl on May 5, 1994. He cooperated with police and led them to a remote spot in the Lincoln National Forest in Roswell, New Mexico, where the remains of the Moser girl were unearthed. Hopper received two life sentences for the Craig and Moser abduction-murders.

July 23, 1992: Terri Edwards, an attractive 21-year-old health care director at the Baylor University Medical Center in Dallas, Texas, failed to arrive at a restaurant to meet her sister and was reported missing. She was last seen driving away from the medical center in her Chevy Blazer. A gas station attendant in Irving, Texas, called police the next day to report the driver of a Chevrolet Blazer stopping at his station and then driving away without paying for gas. That night, police stopped the car and arrested the occupant, Roy Glen Harris, Jr. The 24-year-old Harris admitted that he had stolen the car but that he had nothing to do with the missing girl. Some of Edwards' personal effects, including her Rolex watch, were found in Harris' pockets. A widespread hunt for the girl ensued and, on August 22, 1992, a fisherman found a human head in the Trinity River Bottoms beneath the Jefferson Street viaduct. It proved to be that of the missing Edwards. The rest of her remains were found scattered over a fifty-foot area, the corpse apparently having been savaged by wild animals. Harris, charged with first-degree murder, went to trial on November 2, 1992 and his lawyers cut a deal with prosecutors, allowing him to plead to murder so that he would receive a life sentence, instead of the death penalty.

October 3, 1992: A blackmailer and extortionist, who had been calling and mailing threats to New York socialite, Joan Silverman, called once more, threatening to kidnap Silverman's 14-year-old daughter, Jessica, unless the woman paid him $20,000. Police later identified the caller as the esteemed Chief Justice of the New York's Court of Appeals, Judge Sol Wachtler. He was arrested and held for trial, police learning that Wachtler was the executor of a $24 million estate owned by Silverman's stepfather and that he had, at one time, been having an affair with Silverman, who was a stepcousin to Joan Wachtler, the judge's wife of forty-one years. Wachtler was convicted of blackmail, extortion and attempted kidnapping. He was sent to prison, serving only thirteen months behind bars. During his trial, Wachtler's attorneys had argued that their client was not really responsible for his actions in that he was suffering a mental breakdown at the time he was attempting to blackmail, extort and threaten to kidnap the child of his former mistress. Though thoroughly discredited and removed from the bench, Wachtler continues to this day to make appearances, lecturing on his evil ways.

New York Judge Sol Wachtler (second from left) was convicted and imprisoned for extortion and planning a kidnapping involving the child of a Manhattan socialite.

December 17, 1992: Kristin Huggins, a recently graduated 22-year-old artist, was kidnapped and murdered in Trenton, New Jersey. Police found the girl's abandoned red Toyota the next day, but could find no trace of the missing Huggins. In February 1993, a "psychic" led officers to an area beneath the Southard State Bridge, where the girl's body was unearthed. She had been shot twice in the head. The "psychic" proved, under intense interrogation, that she had had no vision concerning the body and that her information had come from her 29-year-old sister, Gloria Lynn Dunn. When police confronted Dunn, she said that she and her boyfriend, 40-year-old Ambrose Harris, had abducted Huggins as she was getting out of her car on West State Street, going to her first painting assignment, a mural for the Trenton Club. They abducted her and robbed her, then Harris raped and sodomized her before shooting her to death. Dunn plea-bargained a thirty-year prison term for robbery and kidnapping in exchange for her testimony against Harris, who was convicted of robbery, kidnapping and murder on February 20, 1996, and later sentenced to death.

March 4, 1993: Wayne Taira, thirty-three, who was known as the "imposter rapist," because he often impersonated a police officer when kidnapping and raping his victims, was sentenced in Los Angeles, California, to 322 years in prison for nine kidnapping-rapes occurring in southern California in 1986-1987.

June 20, 1993: Charlotte Schmoyer, thirteen, disappeared while working her newspaper route in Allentown, Pennsylvania. Her body was found later that day near a reservoir. She had been stabbed twenty-two times. A widespread search for her kidnapper-killer was conducted without results, but this abduction was later attributed to serial rapist-killer Harvey Robinson, nineteen, who was convicted on DNA and other evidence of two rapes and three murders in Allentown, and who was condemned to death.

July 11, 1993: Joel Souza, thirty-five, despondent over his recent divorce, barricaded himself inside his Antioch, California, home with his two small children and, after a nine-hour standoff with police, killed himself and his children.

June 30, 1993: Stephanie Schmidt, the 19-year-old daughter of a well-to-do family in Leawood, Kansas, and a sophomore at Pittsburg State, disappeared in Pittsburgh, Kansas, at about midnight after leaving friends in a bar and telling them that she had a headache. Calls to her home in the next two days got no response and her locked car was found outside her apartment. Police were then told that she had been seeing Donald Ray Gibson, who, police learned, had been convicted and imprisoned for sexually assaulting a coed in Parsons, Kansas, in 1983. Gibson, who had been paroled in 1992, was missing, his parole officer stating that he had not made an appearance at a meeting on July 6, 1992. Police began to hunt for Gibson, tracing him to California, then Oregon, where, at Coos Bay, he had abandoned his pickup truck after being refused entrance into Canada, as a convicted felon. Pittsburgh police then received a report that Gibson had abducted and raped a woman in Crawford County, Kansas, in April 1993. A nationwide manhunt for Gibson ensued, but the fugitive did not wait to be captured. On July 17, 1993, he called police, surrendering to lawmen, who arrested him in a motel at Ormond Beach, Volusia County, Florida. He admitted kidnapping, raping and murdering Stephanie Schmidt, telling police where to find her body. Officers located her corpse—she had been strangled to death by Gibson—in a rural area ten miles southwest of Pittsburgh, in Cherokee County. Gibson was convicted and sentenced to a life term. In 1994, Kansas state legislators passed the Stephanie Schmidt Sexual Predator Act, which stipulates that sexual predators can be confined in mental institutions for life, even after they have served out their prison terms.

September 1, 1993: Cissy Pamela Foster, fourteen, who had disappeared in Byers, Colorado, was found strangled to death. Her abductor-slayer, Kenyon Battles Tolerton, a paroled murderer, would later be sentenced to life in prison for this crime.

September 3, 1993: Police in Riverside, California, stopped a blue sedan for a routine traffic violation, discovering that its driver, Nicholas Charles Argante, fit the description of a kidnapper who had committed a recent series of abductions and rapes in the area. The blue sedan also fit the description of the car used by the kidnapper-rapist, who had molested five children and a 32-year-old woman. Argante confessed to the crimes and was given a 100-year prison sentence. Police noted that when two of Argante's victims were raped, he was serving a 180-day jail sentence at the Benning Rehabilitation Center, but was released on weekends, the very times when the victims had been attacked.

October 1, 1993: Polly Klass, a 12-year-old girl living in Petaluma, California, was kidnapped from her home by Richard Allen Davis, who raped and murdered her. Davis, who had a long criminal record, was sentenced to death in 1996 (see "A Human Monster," in the chapter dealing with Burglary).

April 27, 1994: Richard Eugene Hamilton, thirty-one, and Anthony Floyd Wainwright, twenty-three, kidnapped Carmen Gabriella Gayheart, a 23-year-old housewife, after she was getting into her 1987 blue Ford Bronco in a parking lot of a shopping area in Lake City, Florida. The car was identified as a stolen vehicle by officers in Brookhaven, Mississippi and they gave chase, which resulted in a shootout and the capture of Hamilton and Wainwright, two hardened criminals, who had escaped from the minimum security prison Carteret Correctional Institution at Newport, North Carolina, on April 23, 1994. Hamilton confessed, stating that he and Wainwright had taken Mrs. Gayheart to a remote area, where she was shot to death. Both men were convicted of kidnapping and murder and were sentenced to death on June 12, 1995.

May 22, 1994: Deborah L. Emerey, thirty-nine, a resident of Quantico, Virginia, was abducted, robbed and strangled to death, her body later found in the Potomac River. Her abductor and killer was identified as Melvin Irving Shifflett, who had a long criminal record that included robbery, rape and abduction. He was suspected of kidnapping and strangling to death 20-year-old Patricia E. Smith, who vanished after leaving a bar in Tysons Corner, Virginia, with Shifflett on the night of November 30, 1978. Her body was later found near Leesburg, Virginia. In 1979, Shifflett was convicted of abducting, sodomizing and stabbing a Woodbridge, Virginia, woman and served ten years in prison for this crime before his release. In November 1994, Shifflett abducted a woman from her home in Prince William County, taking her to a nearby parking lot, where he sexually attacked her, and was in the process of smothering her to death when he was stopped by passersby. He was convicted of rape and assault and given an 85-year prison sentence. It was while Shifflett was serving this term that police linked him with the Emerey slaying, for which he was tried and convicted in 1996, receiving a life sentence.

Kidnapper-killer Melvin Irving Shifflett, who had been abducting and sexually attacking women since 1978.

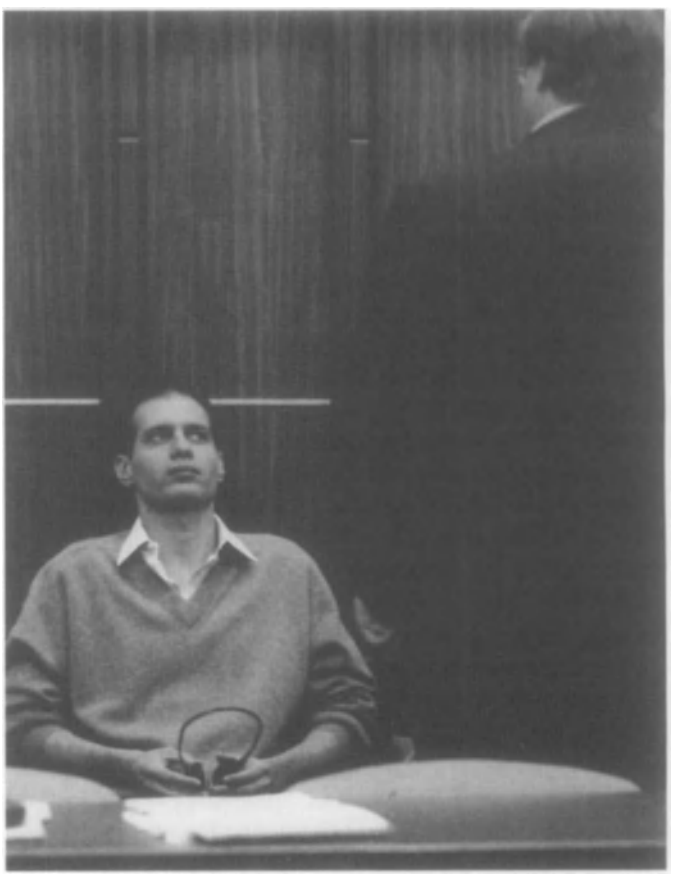
September 13, 1994: Three British soldiers stationed at Dhekelia on Cyprus, after guzzling beer all night, forced a motorcycle carrying Louise Jensen, a pretty, young Danish tour guide, and her boyfriend, to the side of the road. They beat the boyfriend and grabbed Jensen, and drove off. The three soldiers took the girl to a secluded spot and repeatedly raped her, then killed her. Police, called by the boyfriend, tracked down and captured the three men, 24-year-old Allan Ford, 28-year-old Justin Fowler, and 24-year-old Geoff Pernell. All three were convicted of assault, kidnapping and murder and given life sentences.

September 24, 1994: Lisa Rene, a 16-year-old high school student, was abducted from her home in Arlington, Texas, by a group of drug traffickers, out to punish the girl's two older brothers, who had taken $5,000 from the ring and had not delivered the promised drugs. The brothers identified ringleader Orlando Cordia Hall, twenty-three, his 19-year-old brother, Demetrius Kenyon Hall, 23-year-old Marvin T. Holloway, 21-year-old Bruce C. Webster and 22-year-old Steven Christopher Beckley. All were arrested but refused to say anything about the missing Rene girl. Beckley then broke down and led FBI agents to a 144-acre state nature preserve near Pine Bluff, Arkansas, where the girl's remains were unearthed from a shallow grave. An autopsy later reported that the girl had been repeatedly raped, then buried alive in a four-foot grave in which she suffocated to death. The victim and her kidnapping killers were all blacks. Orlando Hall was convicted of kidnapping and murder and sentenced to death on November 6, 1995. In a separate trial, Webster was also convicted of the same crimes and received the death penalty. Beckley received a 30-year prison term (for turning state's evidence, even though he was one of the three gang members who raped and murdered the girl). Demetrius Hall got a 25-year prison term (he also testified against his older brother), and Holloway, who was not present at the murder site, received a 15-year prison sentence.

February 28, 1995: Roy Andrew Johnson, a 58-year-old music professor at the University of Arizona, was kidnapped in Tucson, Arizona, while en route to a church music program, where he, a master organist, was to perform. Johnson's 1993 silver Ford Taurus was later found in a remote spot in Pima County. A witness told police that she and her boyfriend, had been passed by that very car, driven by a former boyfriend, 28-year-old Beau John Green, a drifter, thief and drug abuser. Green was located at a desert campsite, where he was living in a tent, and arrested, charged with kidnapping, robbery and murder. He was identified as having used Johnson's credit card to buy expensive clothing in Tucson and his fingerprints were found on the victim's car. Johnson's body was then found in a mountainous area. He was still wearing the tuxedo he had worn for the organist program. Half the side of his head had been beaten to a pulp. Police theorized that Green had jumped into the professor's car and forced him to drive to the mountains, where Green robbed and killed him. Green was convicted of kidnapping, robbery and murder and, on July 29, 1996, was sentenced to death by Superior Court Judge Bernardo Velasco.

June 29, 1995: Aurelina Leonor, the mastermind in the abduction of 68-year-old Harvey Weinstein, a wealthy clothes manufacturer, in August 1993, was convicted of kidnapping and was sentenced to twenty-five years to life. Two of her henchmen, Fermin Rodriguez and William Rivera, who testified against their leader, received shorter prison sentences. Weinstein had been abducted outside of a nightclub in Queens, New York and then buried in a pit in an abandoned rail yard near the Hudson River in upper Manhattan. He was rescued when one of Leonor's goons was arrested and led police to the site.



Cuban migrant worker, Juan Carlos Chavez, shown at his trial, who was convicted and sentenced to death for kidnapping and killing a 9-year-old boy.

Abduction-killers Lavern Ward (sentenced to life in prison), Jacqueline Annette Williams (sentenced to death), and Fedell Caffey (sentenced to death).

September 11, 1995: Jimmy Ryce, age nine, got off a school bus wearing a backpack and going to his home, a few blocks distant, in the Redland area south of Miami, Florida. He was not seen again. A widespread search for the brown-haired, blue-eyed boy was conducted with no results. His disappearance was featured on the TV Show, "America's Most Wanted," and a $100,000 reward was posted for the boy's safe return. Still, no leads were forthcoming. On December 6, 1995, a ranch owner in southern Florida became suspicious of one of her workers after some of her jewelry and a gun disappeared from her home. She personally searched the trailer occupied by Cuban migrant worker, Juan Carlos Chavez. She found the jewelry and gun, as well as the backpack containing Jimmy Ryce's schoolbooks. She called police and Chavez was arrested, being charged with the Ryce kidnapping. At first, Chavez said he had found the backpack in a field. Then, under lengthy interrogation, admitted that he had kidnapped the boy, taken him to the trailer (provided to him by the rancher as part of his pay), and sodomized the boy, then shot and killed him when the boy tried to escape. He said he then dismembered the body and hid the body parts in plastic containers on the ranch, filling these with concrete to hide the remains. Chavez was not brought to trial until September 1998. He then recanted his confession and insisted that Edward Scheinhaus, the son of the ranch owner, had actually murdered the Ryce boy and had framed him for the killing, a charge proved to be unsupportable. Chavez said that his confession had been coerced on the threat of deportation back to Cuba, where, he claimed, he had been a counter-revolutionary fighting against the Communist dictatorship of Fidel Castro, and that if sent back to Cuba he would have been summarily executed. Prosecutors quickly exposed this excuse as being the standard ploy used by most Cuban immigrants committing crimes in the U.S. A jury convicted Chavez of kidnapping and murder on September 18, 1998. He was later sentenced to death.

October 26, 1995: Wearing ski masks and brandishing weapons, three men—24-year-old Kenneth Johnson, 23-year-old James Alexander Hopson, and 20-year-old Noel Raul Cordoba—robbed a young couple returning to their home in north Dallas, Texas. The three men forced the couple into their car and drove to a remote area, where they were repeatedly raped. The hysterical couple arrived naked at a rural house four hours later to report the attack. The perpetrators were apprehended and tried separately. Johnson was given two life terms for kidnapping and rape and 99 years for robbery. Hopson was sentenced to five concurrent life terms and Cordoba received a 99-year term for robbery.

November 16, 1995: Three blacks, Jacqueline Annette Williams, accompanied by Fedell Caffey and Lavern Ward, invaded the Addison, Illinois, home of Debra Evans, a white woman who had been married to Ward and was pregnant with his second child. The trio killed Evans, the cut her full-term baby from her womb. They also brutally killed Evans' 10-year-old daughter, Samantha, and kidnapped her 7-year-old son Joshua, whose body was later found in an alley in Maywood, Illinois. These two children were white and from a previous marriage. A fourth child, 2-year-old Jordan, who was also Ward's child, was left alive with the bodies of his mother and sister, after the savage killers fled. Police soon tracked down the slayers in Williams' home in Wheaton, Illinois, arresting all three and charging them with kidnapping and murder. Williams explained that she had been living with Ward and, since she could not give birth, wanted a child of her own, Evans' unborn baby. Williams, who displayed a calculating and cold-blooded personality throughout her trial, had hatched the plan to steal Evan's child. She was convicted of first-degree murder on March 20, 1998, and sentenced to death. Williams, who blatantly used the race issue to defend herself (as had attorneys defending O. J. Simpson in a sensational murder trial that same year—see Murder, Celebrity Slayings), stated at that time: "There was not one black juror on my side. It's not fair. I got screwed around. They just want to see three blacks die for killing three whites." Ward was also convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment. Caffey, a resident of Schaumburg, Illinois, the person who actually murdered Evans and cut her baby from her womb, was convicted of first-degree murder on November 10, 1998. Described by a prosecutor as "a cold-blooded murderer of defenseless women and children," Caffey was sentenced to death in January 1999. The death sentences of Caffey and Williams were commuted to life terms in Governor George Ryan's blanket clemency order, issued forty-eight hours before he left office on January 11, 2003. The abduction-killings of the Evans family by Williams, Ward and Caffey remained one of the most heinous and vile crimes on record, until it was duplicated less than three years later in Chicago, by three other kidnapping murderers. (See: March 28, 1998, Grabriel Solache.)

April 9, 1996: Police broke into the home of 66-year-old Claude Vitrey and his 60-year-old living companion, Denise Bouchard, in Paris, France. Known for their generosity to poor people, the couple had, in 1995, taken in 32-year-old Mohammed Meroue and 30-year-old Mahmoud Benchaiba, who then took over the couple's small apartment, using it as a center for their drug trafficking. They locked Vitrey and Bouchard in a small room, keeping them prisoner for more than a year and allowing only one of them to leave the room for short periods to go to the bathroom, stealing their $1,200-a-month pension and feeding the starving couple only a few scraps of food each day. Police finally identified the apartment as an outlet for illegal drugs, which caused their raid. They found syringes littering the floor and the kidnappers in stupors—they had become drug addicts themselves. The elderly couple was released and both kidnappers were convicted and sent to prison.

April 24, 1996: Zaho Ming and three of his gang members were sentenced to death in Anhui Province, China, for abducting and selling 119 women from 1989 to 1994, the victims being sold to farmers seeking to have sons.

August 10, 1996: Mamoru Konno, the 57-year-old president of Sanyo Video Component Corp. USA, was kidnapped after a company baseball game in Tijuana, Mexico, and held for a $2 million ransom payment. The cash payment was delivered to the kidnappers by a state police officer driving a Sanyo company car on August 19, 1996, the abductors telling the policeman where Konno could be found. The victim was found unharmed a short time later in an abandoned building. Police stated that they knew the kidnappers, saying that six men were operating a kidnapping ring in Tijuana, but none were ever apprehended and it was later claimed that the state police were working with the abductors in this and other kidnappings. This was at a time when Mexico was considered a lawless "narco country," controlled by drug lords.

August 28, 1996: Kimmi Hardy, thirty-five, lured 34-year-old Theresa Lynn Lund to her home in Keokuk, Iowa, and shot her twice in the head, killing her and stealing the dead woman's baby, Paul Lund, which she later passed off as her own. Hardy's irrational scheme was exposed when the victim's body was discovered. Hardy was convicted of kidnapping, child-stealing and first-degree murder. On March 6, 1997, Judge David Hendrickson sentenced Hardy to life in prison without parole for murder and twenty-five years for kidnapping.

September 7, 1996: Richard Paul Elliott, age forty-seven, picked up a 32-year-old prostitute on Pulaski Highway, a popular open-air sex market in the Baltimore, Maryland, area, one that was seldom patrolled by police. Elliott drove her to his home, knocked her to the floor and dragged her to a dungeon-like chamber he had constructed in his basement apartment and there stripped her and repeatedly raped her while she was chained to the wall and ceiling of the room. He kept the woman prisoner for six days, torturing and abusing her. On September 12, 1996, Elliott abducted another prostitute, a 29-year-old woman, from the Pulaski Highway area, taking her to his dungeon, where he chained her to the wall next to his other captive and subjected her to the same treatment as the other woman, threatening both females with "slow death." A short time later, Elliott left the apartment "on business," and one of the captives managed to free herself and the other woman. Both victims fled naked across the street to a neighbor's house, where they called police. Officers could not find Elliott, however, and then learned that he had been shot to death on September 15, 1996, by 45-year-old Robert Webster, in the small upstate New York town of Andes in Delaware County. Elliott had gone to Andes to confront Webster about a real estate deal that had gone sour some years earlier. Webster was not charged.

September 23, 1996: Thomas Loveless, Jr., and Michael Foldenauer, both sixteen, were charged with the abduction, rape and murder of their classmate, 15-year-old Tiffany Rebecca Tull. After her kidnapping in Little Axe, Oklahoma, the boys raped her and then Loveless reportedly shot her to death with a .12-gauge shotgun. Both youths were convicted and sent to prison for life.

October 3, 1996: Lance Sterling Alexander, who was wanted for the molestation of a 4-year-old girl in June 1996, and the October 1, 1996 murder of William Jason Mowdy, burst into a child center in Salem, Oregon, and, apparently at random, grabbed 7-year-old Kristina Jacobson, fleeing with her in a stolen car. Police pursued the kidnapper along Interstate 5, as the abductor fired at ten following police cars, alternately reloading and firing and then holding the gun against the head of the terrified child. Traveling at fast speeds, Alexander crashed the car, which overturned. He and his victim were still alive, but the kidnapper held a gun to the child's head while he sat in the car and waited for police to close in. A police sharpshooter then shot Alexander dead, while other officers retrieved Jacobson, who suffered only minor injuries.

October 4, 1996: Two girls, 16-year-old Sarah Hajney and 16-year-old Jennifer Bolduc, disappeared while apparently going to school in McLean, New York. Hajney's abandoned 1992 Chevy Lumina was found later that night near Courtlandville, New York. The back seat of the car had been smeared with motor oil and forensic examiners found beneath this coating chunks of human flesh, the same kind of remains also found in the trunk. Witnesses, described a man coated with motor oil leaving the scene of the abandoned car that day and a mechanic later said that he had given a ride to 31-year-old John Andrews, whose car had reportedly broken down that day near the site of the abandoned Chevy. Moreover, fingerprints taken from the car matched that of Andrews. Andrews, who worked in Courtla0ndville as an electrician and was a next-door neighbor of Hajney's, was charged with the murders of Bolduc and Hajney. Officers then searched an area about a remote cabin Andrews had in rural Chenango County, and there unearthed bloody rags, bone fragments and chunks of human torsos—the remains of the two missing girls. These human artifacts had been spread and dumped over a large area, the suspect hoping, it was concluded, that wild animals would consume these savaged body parts and thereby eliminate any possibility of authorities later finding the evidence. Police by then had learned that Andrews, a loner from Dryden, New York, had been sentenced to eight years imprisonment at the disciplinary barracks at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas in 1990. This sentence was imposed after Andrews was convicted for the attempted rape of a woman living next door to his apartment at the U.S. Air Force base at Spangdahlem, Germany, where Andrews served as a sergeant. Andrews was released early from Leavenworth for good behavior in 1995. Tight-lipped about the Hajney and Bolduc abduction-murders, Andrews refused to tell police how he kidnapped the girls and then murdered them and reduced their bodies to small pieces. While Andrews was awaiting trial at the Tompkins County Jail, a guard passing Andrews' cell on the night of November 2, 1996, found the prisoner dead. Andrews had hanged himself from a noose made from shoestrings and affixed to a hook on the wall of his cell.

November 20, 1996: Marshall Wais, a 79-year-old industrialist, was abducted from his home in San Francisco, California, by kidnappers holding a gun on the victim. A ransom payment of $500,000 was demanded and paid the same day at a drop-off site in the Golden Gate Park. After the kidnappers received the money, they released Wais, giving him $20 cab fare. Police, hiding nearby, then captured and arrested 35-year-old Michael K. Roberts and 64-year-old Thomas William Taylor. Both were convicted of kidnapping and were sent to prison.

December 1, 1996: Brian Steven Ramirez Ortiz, a 4-year-old boy, was kidnapped in Pereira, Colombia, and held for a $5,000 ransom payment, but the abductors killed the boy by bundling him inside a large plastic bag and locking him in a closet, causing him to suffocate. Two suspects were later arrested. Colombia had to this time the highest abduction/kidnapping rate in the world with more than 900 persons kidnapped in 1996, 110 of these victims being minors.

December 26, 1996: JonBenet Ramsey, the precocious, talented 6-year-old daughter of millionaire John Ramsey and his wife Patsy, was reported missing by her parents, who had found a ransom note on a staircase in their mansion at Boulder, Colorado. A short time later, Ramsey, accompanied by a police woman, found his daughter dead in the wine room of the house. She had been strangled to death with a cord. Despite a massive hunt for the kidnapper-killer, the culprit was never identified, although many suspects were scrutinized, including the parents themselves. (See, Murder, Unsolved Killings.)

March 29, 1997: Working as a $7-an-hour security guard, Philip Noel Johnson (AKA: Roger D. Lawter, Michael D. Gray), pulled a gun on two of his fellow guards at the Loomis, Fargo & Co., headquarters in Jacksonville, Florida, forcing them into a truck, which he loaded with more than $20 million in cash. He handcuffed one of the guards, James Brown, to a radiator at his home, then later drove off with the second guard, Dan Smith, and the cash, driving all night and stopping only once to drop off many of the money-stuffed bags. The following day, Johnson took Smith from the truck and handcuffed him to a tree near the Blue Ridge Parkway outside of Asheville, North Carolina, before continuing his flight. The FBI placed Johnson on its "Most Wanted" list and offered $500,000 for his capture and conviction. Agents tracked him to Mexico, then waited for him to return by bus to the U.S., arresting him on August 30, 1997, when the bus he was riding (en route from Mexico City to Houston, Texas) crossed the U.S. border. Agents by then had located the loot, finding more than $18 million in a storage facility rented by Johnson in Mountain Home, North Carolina. Johnson, who had lived a loner's life, told agents that he had committed the robbery (one of the largest on record) to punish his employer for paying him "slave wages," and that he intended to give twenty percent of the money to poor people in Central America, then return the rest to the company. He was convicted of kidnapping the two guards, money-laundering and robbery and was sentenced to twenty-five years in prison on January 20, 1999.

June 2, 1997: Jason Stephens and Horace Cummings, both twenty-three, broke into a home in Jacksonville, Florida, robbing the place and kidnapping 3-year-old Robert Sparrow III. After brutally killing the boy, the kidnappers fled, but were later caught separately in a statewide manhunt. Both were found guilty of kidnapping, robbery and murder and sentenced to death.

October 8, 1997: Yaacov Schwartz, a 63-year-old Israeli, who had been missing for two days, was found tied up in an abandoned building in Jerusalem, Israel. Schwartz later admitted that he had faked his kidnapping during a state visit by U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to "unite the Israeli people."

November 17, 1997: Officials in San Juan, Puerto Rico, announced that Crystal Leann Anzaldi, who had been kidnapped in San Diego, California, on December 8, 1990, had been found and Nilza Gierbolini Guzman, thirty-five, had been arrested for abducting the child. The abductor had falsely claimed to be the girl's mother and had been investigated earlier on charges that she had abused the child. After checking more than 500 photos on the Internet site, The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, San Juan police found a match, identifying Anzaldi from a photo and posted information describing the missing girl with a tiny birthmark to the left of her nose. The girl was restored to her parents and Gierbolini Guzman was convicted and imprisoned.

December 4, 1997: Jerry Scott Heidler, twenty, was arrested and charged with the murders of Danny and Kim Daniels and two of their seven children, 16-year-old Jessica Daniels and 8-year-old Bryant Daniels, all found shotgunned to death in their home at Santa Claus, Georgia. Heidler, who had developed a relationship with Jessica Daniels, apparently killed the family members after he was interrupted while burglarizing the Daniels house. He then kidnapped three more Daniels children, all girls, fleeing in his van. He raped the ten-year-old girl and later released the three children before driving off in his van. The girls were found wandering about in their nightclothes by Bacon County police officers. All three girls later identified Heidler in a photographic police lineup. Heidler was later convicted of kidnapping and murder and sentenced to death.

December 5, 1997: Jack Volgares, forty-two, was sentenced to life imprisonment for violently abusing and abducting the body of his 7-year-old stepdaughter, Seleana. Earlier that year, Volgares, a resident of Ironton, Ohio, had yelled at the girl and shoved her about so that he caused her to go into convulsions, lose consciousness and die some hours later. Volgares and his 28-year-old wife, Mona Volgares, then dumped the body in a trash can and buried the can in the back yard of their home, before leaving town. Neighbors and relatives unearthed the body after discovering a strong odor in the back yard of the Volgares home. The parents were tracked down and arrested, Mona Volgares receiving a prison sentence after her husband was sent behind bars for life.

December 11, 1997: John E. Armstrong, thirty-nine, attempted to escape pursuing police attempting to arrest him for the murder of a man in Winter Park, Florida two days earlier. He invaded a home and drove the adult occupants outside at gunpoint, then held two small children hostage while SWAT teams prepared to storm the building. A 57-hour siege ensued, with Armstrong's relatives arriving to beg him to surrender and release the children. Finally, police were able to drop a microphone no larger than a button through the window of the house to hear the children laughing as they watched cartoons on TV. They also heard the loud snoring of the kidnapper and suddenly burst into the house. Officer Scott Perkins leaped upon Armstrong just as he awakened and was reaching for his gun, which went off, killing the kidnapper. Armstrong had had a long criminal career, having served three years and nine months for robbery, being released early from a twelve-year sentence through a new Florida program designed to disgorge convicts from the state's overpopulated prison system.

December 19, 1997: Donald Nichols (1964-1997), of Moreno Valley, California, kidnapped 24-year-old Angel Zingarelli, a woman who had worked with him at a Sam's Club store. They had been dating for about three years, but had broken up some months earlier. Nichols tied up his parents in their home, and then drove off with Zingarelli in her red Pontiac Firebird. Police tracked down the couple on December 22, 1997, in Riverside, California, when the Pontiac drove through the Canyon Crest area. They located the car in a parking lot of an apartment complex and spotted Nichols walking along a third-floor balcony, wrapped in a blanket. When an officer approached him, Nichols put a gun to his head and blew out his brains, his body toppling into a jacuzzi below. Police then found Zingarelli's body in the trunk of the Pontiac. Nichols had apparently shot and killed her.

March 28, 1998: At about 7 a.m., two men, 23-year-old Gabriel Solache and 25-year-old Arturo DeLeon-Reyes, broke into the apartment of Jacinta and Mariano Sota on North Leavitt Street in Chicago. The invaders repeatedly stabbed the couple as they slept, as many as sixty times, killing them, and then abducting their children, 2-month-old Maria and 3-year-old Santiago Soto. Present at the killing and kidnappings was 22-year-old Adriana Mejia, who took the children to her own home, presenting her husband Rosario Mejia, with Maria as their own child. She had faked a pregnancy by putting on weight and claimed that she had given birth to the kidnapped child. Rosario Mejia was suspicious because of the size of the little girl and when he saw photos of her on television reports relating to her parents' murder, he went to the police. Adriana Mejia was arrested, along with Solache and DeLeon-Reyes, who lived in the Mejia building. Police learned that Mejia had, for five days, scouted several Chicago hospitals and clinics, looking over newborn children and their mothers, and selected Jacinta Soto, after seeing her with her children, as her victim. She paid $600 to Solache and DeLeon-Reyes to murder the Sotos and kidnap their children. Convicted of kidnapping and murder, Adriana Mejia and DeLeon-Reyes were sentenced to life terms and Solache was sentenced to death, but was reprieved when Illinois Governor George Ryan, forty-eight hours before leaving office on January 11, 2003, issued an across-the-board clemency order to 167 death row inmates in the state, reducing the death penalty punishment for 163 men and four women to life imprisonment without parole. Ryan's act was widely criticized as being politically motivated. The Mejia case was alarmingly similar to another Illinois kidnapping-murder involving Jacqueline Williams, who had also faked a pregnancy and who, with the help of confederates, had cut a nearly full-term fetus from the womb of an Addison woman, murdering her and stealing her child. (See November 16, 1995, Jacqueline Annette Williams.)

April 16, 1998: Stephen Fagan (AKA: Dr. William Martin), was arrested at his million-dollar home in Palm Beach, Florida, and charged with the kidnapping of his two daughters, abducted by Fagan in 1979, when the girls were ages five and two. Fagan's ex-wife, Barbara Kurth, a one-time hatcheck girl who had become a microbiologist, had been searching for her daughters for twenty years, as had Massachusetts authorities, who had listed Fagan as a "Most Wanted" person for abducting his children. At that time, Fagan, a former nightclub bouncer who earned a law degree, took his children to Florida, where he married two wealthy women under an assumed name, raising his daughters in luxury. Returned to Boston, Massachusetts, Fagan posted a $250,000 bond and insisted, as he had at the time of his divorce from Kurth, that his ex-spouse was an unfit mother and an alcoholic, who had allowed her children to go hungry and run around dirty and naked. The daughters, now grown, completely supported their father and told Massachusetts authorities that they wanted nothing to do with their mother. Believing prosecution would be futile, officials cut a deal with Fagan, who admitted to the charge, but spent no time in prison.

April 14, 1998: Lawrence Singleton, seventy, was sentenced to death by Florida Judge Bob Mitcham, following his conviction for abducting and murdering 31-year-old Roxanne Hayes in his Orient Park, Florida, home on February 19, 1997. Singleton was by then nationally known as a human monster. He had kidnapped Mary Vincent, a 15-year-old runaway from Las Vegas, Nevada, while she was hitchhiking outside of San Francisco in 1978. Singleton, a truck driver at the time, promised to drive Vincent to Los Angeles, but he raped her and then used an ax to chop off her forearms, leaving her for dead in a culvert outside of Modesto, California. She miraculously survived to testify against him in a trial that resulted in his conviction and a fourteen-year prison sentence. Singleton was released in 1987, and, when no California community would allow him residence, moved back to his home town of Tampa, Florida. In the Hayes murder, Singleton blatantly admitted his guilt, stating: "They framed me for the first time [the Vincent case], but this time I did it." He awaits execution at this writing.

Kidnapper-killer Lawrence Singleton, seventy, is shown at his Florida trial; he received a death sentence.

April 20, 1998: Donald A. Flagg, a 48-year-old body shop worker in Newark, Delaware, spotted 49-year-old Debra Puglisi planting roses in the front yard of her home at Academy Hills. Smoking crack cocaine, Flagg suddenly decided to rape Mrs. Puglisi, parking his car on a side street and slipping into her house. The woman's husband, according to later police reports, arrived home unexpectedly, and Flagg shot and killed 50-year-old Anthony Puglisi, Jr., a funeral director, the shot unheard by Debra Puglisi, who was still working on the front lawn, with sounds of nearby construction and lawn mowers drowning out the shot. Flagg then dragged Puglisi's body into a bedroom, went to the kitchen and took several beers from the refrigerator, drinking them as he waited for Mrs. Puglisi to reenter her home. When she came into the kitchen to wash her hands, Flagg struck her on the head, dragged her into the basement and raped her. He then backed his car up to the front of the house and put Mrs. Puglisi into the trunk, driving to his own home, a house that sat on a cul-de-sac in Wellington Woods. When the always punctual Mr. Puglisi did not appear at his office, employees called police. Officers went to his home to find his body and first suspected the missing Mrs. Puglisi as having a hand in her husband's demise. At that time, the unfortunate woman was being sexually assaulted and tortured in one room after another in Flagg's house. Flagg kept her a prisoner, gagged and bound, for five days. On April 24, 1998, when Flagg left for work, the woman managed to chew through a rope binding her, loosening it so that she eventually freed herself. She called police, screaming over the phone: "Please come and get me! Help me! Help me!...He killed my husband!...He said he saw me in the yard and wanted me! He was waiting in my house for me!" The hysterical woman was rescued by police a short time later and taken to a hospital. Officers later that day arrested Flagg at his work in Newark, charging him with rape, kidnapping and murder. After a three-week trial in 1999, Flagg was convicted of the murder of Anthony "Nino" Puglisi, and the abduction, rape and imprisonment of his wife. The jury voted 7-5 to recommend life imprisonment for Flagg. He was given ten life sentences, plus 209 years, and sent to the Delaware Correctional Center in Smyrna. Mrs. Puglisi later remarried and wrote a book about her nightmare experience.

June 27, 1998: While playing outside her home in New Philadelphia, Ohio, 5-year-old Devan Duniver suddenly disappeared. Following a widespread search, her body, suffering many knife wounds, was found in a wooded area near her house. One of the searchers, 12-year-old Anthony Harris, who had reportedly threatened the Duniver child on several previous occasions, but who had participated in the search for her (after the victim's mother paid him $5 to hunt for the child), came under suspicion and was arrested. Harris confessed to killing the girl, but later recanted his story. He was tried as a juvenile and given an eight-year sentence in a reformatory.

August 26, 1998: Lawrence Wallace, twenty-eight, and Taki Peacock, two black thugs living on Chicago's South Side, were convicted of kidnapping and murdering black businessman Rufus Taylor, sixty, in August 1995, robbing him in his garage and then forcing him into the trunk of his Jaguar and driving off with him. The kidnappers took Taylor to Riverdale, Illinois, where Wallace shot him to death. Peacock was later sent to prison to eighty years and Wallace was given a life term.

September 8, 1998: Sherilee Nicholas was kidnapped from her home in Belize City, Belize. The remains of the 13-year-old girl were found on October 9, examiners reporting that she had been raped and then stabbed to death (more than forty times). Her abductor and killer was never located. This was the first of several unsolved kidnapping murders occurring in Belize (formerly British Honduras, becoming an independent country in 1981). These disappearances and murders were labeled the Belize Child Abductions.

October 5, 1998: Christopher and Kyndra Fink, both twenty-three, were arrested in a remote Montana area, and charged with kidnapping. They had reportedly abducted their 21-month-old son David from the Primary Children's Hospital in Salt Lake City, Utah. David Fink had been placed in this institution after officials found him in a malnourished condition in the Fink home. Charged with aggravated assault and kidnapping, Chistopher Fink was said by officials to believe that his son was a prophet and that he fed the infant only fruit and vegetables, a claim Fink later denied.

October 7, 1998: Jay Blades, a 9-year-old girl, was kidnapped from her home in Belize City, Belize. The child's body was found nine months later in what was the second of the Belize Child Abductions.

November 3, 1998: After leaving her home in Jacksonville, Florida, to play with friends, 8-year-old Madlyn "Maddie" Rae Clifton disappeared. Hundreds of volunteers aided police in searching for the girl, going from door-to-door distributing leaflets bearing the image of the vanished girl. Her parents begged for the girl's safe return through the media and more than 70,000 leaflets showing the girl's picture were distributed to those attending a Jacksonville Jaguars football game. Although police had searched the blue-collar neighborhood where the Cliftons lived, they again made a thorough sweep and at the home of Joshua Phillips, officers detected a strong odor. Mrs. Phillips attributed the smell to family pets, but she nevertheless began a search of her own house, smelling an overpowering odor in the room of her son, Joshua Earl Patrick Phillips, fourteen. The odor came from the boy's waterbed and, pulling aside the frame, she saw the feet of the Clifton girl. Melissa Phillips immediately called police who retrieved the body, which was found bound in tape in a fetal position. She had been stabbed nine times and struck in the head. There was no evidence of sexual molestation. The Phillips boy was arrested and charged with the kidnapping and murder of the girl. Because of the widespread publicity on the case in Jacksonville, Phillips' trial was held in Bartow, Florida, where, on July 8, 1999, Phillips, tried as an adult at age fifteen, was convicted by a jury after deliberating less than two hours. His conviction carried an automatic prison sentence of life. The death penalty is prohibited in Florida for anyone under the age of sixteen. Phillips, through his attorney, Richard Nichols, admitted kidnapping the girl, but had not intended to murder her and that her death was the result of "panic that bordered on madness." Nichols sought to avoid a conviction of murder in the first degree, asking that the boy be convicted of manslaughter. Prosecutor Harry Shorstein said that the boy's statements to police indicated that the murder was premeditated and his argument convinced the jury. About a month before the abduction-murder, Maddie Clifton and her 12-year-old sister were warned not to play any more with the Phillips boy after he talked about sex in front of the girls.

November 8, 1998: The naked body of 15-year-old Samantha Gordon was found floating offshore of Belize City, Belize, by a government patrol boat. She had been stabbed and slashed several times, one of her hands cut off. She was the third victim in the Belize Child Abductions.

December 15, 1998: Kuan Nan Chen, the son of a wealthy Los Angeles developer, was kidnapped from the garage of his home in San Marino, California, and held in a Los Angeles hideout, his abductors demanding a ransom payment of $1.5 million. The money was to be delivered to confederates in Fujian Province, China. On January 4, 1999, Fu Shun Chen, the victim's father, delivered a ransom payment of $500,000 to two men in Fujian Province, who were promptly arrested by Chinese authorities. At the time his father was delivering the ransom money, Kuan Nan Chen was rescued by Los Angeles police officers, who had located the hideout of the kidnappers through phone taps and a tip from a neighbor. Xu Lin Wang, a 26-year-old resident of Temple City, California, and 27-year-old Xue Nan Wang, of New York City, were arrested and later convicted and imprisoned for the crime.

January 1, 1999: U.S. Immigrant officials stopped a car at the Rainbow Bridge in Niagara Falls, New York, ordering the driver, 37-year-old Jamal Nasser Aziz, who appeared unduly nervous, to open the car's trunk. Inside the trunk, officials found a young woman, Mine Betoor, who was bound and gagged, along with 29-year-old Wahid Nader, who was holding her captive. Betoor told officials that her parents had arranged a marriage with Nader, but when she refused, Nader and his uncle, Aziz, both natives of Afghanistan, kidnapped her and attempted to smuggle her into the U.S. from Canada. Betoor told officials that Aziz had threatened to kill her if she made any noise or tried to escape. Nader and Aziz were convicted of kidnapping and imprisoned.

January 15, 1999: Alabama Governor Fob James, in one of the last acts of his term, commuted the death sentence of convicted kidnapper-killer Judith Ann Neeley, who had committed one of the most savage acts of murder in the state's history. In September 1982, Neeley had abducted 13-year-old Lisa Ann Millican from a shopping mall in Rome, Georgia, taking the girl to her home, where she forced her into sex with her husband, Alvin Neeley. After sexually abusing the child for three days, Judith Ann Neeley drove the girl to Little River Canyon, Alabama. She gave the girl six injections of drain cleaner, but when this failed to kill the child, Neeley shot the girl in the head and pushed her body off a cliff. Though she claimed at her trial that her husband had ordered the murder, Neeley was convicted of the killing and sentenced to death. Alvin Neeley was conficted of kidnapping and child sexual abuse and received a life sentence. Governor James, who went duck hunting immediately after commuting Neeley's sentence, gave no reason for his action.

March 22, 1999: Jackie Malic, age twelve, vanished from her school in Belize City, Belize, during a recess. Her mutilated body was found two days later. This kidnapping-murder was attributed to the fiend committing the Belize Child Abductions.

June 26, 1999: Erica Wills, age nine, vanished from her home and her mutilated body was discovered on July 28, 1999, near Gracie Rock, Belize. She was presumed to have been another victim of the Belize Child Abductions.

July 21, 1999: Joie Armstrong, a 26-year-old teacher and naturalist who worked for the Yosemite Institute, was reported missing from her home in Yosemite Valley, California. Police found her car parked outside her home and the door to her cabin open, music playing on a stereo. That afternoon, police found her decapitated torso in a nearby drainage ditch, her head missing. On the following day, officers identified a blue-and-white SUV parked on a rural road, its owner, Cary Anthony Stayner, thirty-seven, sitting naked by a river and smoking a joint of marijuana. Tire tracks from his SUV matched those found near the Armstrong cabin and his fingerprints were found in Armstrong's house. Stayner quickly admitted abducting and murdering Armstrong and then told police that he had also kidnapped and murdered three other women in the Yosemite National Park. Stayner worked as a handyman at the Cedar Lodge in El Portal, near Yosemite. Three females who were registered at this lodge—42-year-old Carole Sund, her 15-year-old daughter Julie and 16-year-old Silvina Pelosso, a family friend—had been reported missing from the lodge on February 13, 1999. On March 18, 1999, the bodies of Carole Sund and Silvina Pelosso were found in the trunk of Sund's burned-out car, discovered at Sonora Pass, about 100 miles north of El Portal. Both victims had been strangled to death. Police then received a note from the kidnapper, directing them to the corpse of Julie Sund, her decomposing body found on March 25, 1999, near the Don Pedro Reservoir. The girl was found bound at the ankes with rope and her throat slit so deeply that her head was almost decapitated. After pleading guilty in the Armstrong case, Stayner was sent to prison for life. Stayner, with a long history for violence, was suspected of murdering his uncle, Jesse Stayner, in 1990, as well as possibly kidnapping and murdering several other women. Stayner's younger brother, Steven Gregory Stayner, was kidnapped by Kenneth Eugene Parnell in 1972, and held captive for seven years. (See entry for December 4, 1972.)

Cary Stayner was sent to prison for life following his conviction for the 1999 abduction-murder of teacher Joie Armstrong in California.

February 15, 2000: Naomi Hernandez, fourteen, disappeared after being sent by her grandmother to collect rent on a family-owned property in Belize City. The body of the child, her head decapitated and her left arm cut off, was found floating by a patrol boat cruising the waters off Belize City, Belize. The slain child was another victim in the Belize Child Abductions.

March 29, 2000: A young woman appeared in San Jose, California, claiming to be Amber Swartz, reportedly kidnapped on June 3, 1988, from her Pinole, California, home. The claimant gave police information about the Swartz abduction and was fingerprinted. She was identified days later as 21-year-old Amber Marie Pattee, who was exposed and charged with perpetrating a hoax.

CHAPTER NINE:
MURDER/CELEBRITY SLAYINGS

The act of murder, man's most heinous crime, has been practiced throughout history by all manner of celebrities in the highest social stratas. These headline-capturing killers—members of the aristocracy and the wealthy class, bankers, physicians, attorneys, politicians and modern-day media creatures—have riveted the attention of the public, turning their bright fame to dark infamy. Such slayers loomed large in the collective imagination of their times, their lethal acts expanding their images and enhancing their legends through the ploys of publicity, which even the stark reality of homicide could not easily destroy. These uncommon humans all committed the common crime of murder and yet, for many, their fame ironically increased through such reprehensible acts.

In many such murders, the celebrity was the victim, the killer often seeking the fame held by his prey, as if to make it his own, as if to don his victim's mantle of fame by taking that life. Such was the traditional reason for many murders in the Old West, where the novice gunfighter aspired to attain the notoriety of his victim, the established gunslinger, by killing him with a faster draw and thus earn himself a niche, no matter how infamous, in the annals of history. Jack McCall, a cowardly roustabout in Deadwood, had no thought of slapping leather with the "Prince of Pistoleers," James Butler "Wild Bill" Hickok. He simply shot his victim in the back, while the famed gunfighter sat in a saloon playing poker. After shooting "Wild Bill," McCall was no longer a seedy drunk, but the famed killer of a famous gunman.

In more modern days, killers like David Mark Chapman, the slayer of Beatle John Lennon, became so attached to his singing idol that he assumed his victim's personality, this mentally disturbed but ardent fan imitating his victim in almost every physical detail, even marrying a woman of Japanese extraction, as had Lennon. Only days before murdering Lennon, Chapman took his victim's name to add to his adopted personality. Such personality envy had long been translated into a murderous mania. It took the life of 51-year-old political activist Allard Lowenstein on March 14, 1980, when his protégé, Dennis Sweeney, lethally shot the political activist five times in his Rockefeller Plaza offices in New York. Sweeney, later sent to an insane asylum, stated that Lowenstein had "been controlling my life for years. I've put an end to it." A similar identity problem existed in the troubled mind of 22-year-old Paul DeWitt, who, on September 9, 1980, stabbed to death Everett Clarke, his drama coach and the voice of "The Whistler," of radio fame, in Clarke's offices at Chicago's Fine Arts Building.

The motives had sharper definitions in many other celebrity slayings. Even among the rich, money was often a prime motive, as was the case of Dr. Bennett Clarke Hyde, who, in

New York political activist Allard Lowenstein, killed in 1980 by a deranged man, who once followed his radical chic cause.

Dennis Sweeney murdered Allard Lowenstein because "he was controlling my life"; Sweeney was sent to an asylum.

Chicago's Everett Clarke, the radio voice of "The Whistler," who was murdered by one of his own drama students.

1909, embarked upon the wholesale murders of his in-laws, so that his wife and he could inherit a fortune. The same ambition motivated Dr. Arthur Warren Waite, who also attempted to eliminate his in-laws in 1916. The fiery Candace "Candy" Mossler, stood trial with her 24-year-old nephew, Melvin Lane Powers, for the June 30, 1964 murder of her tycoon husband, Jacques Mossler, in their lavish home in Key Biscayne, Florida. Again, prosecutors insisted, the motive was money—Candy wanted to obtain Mossler's $7 million fortune and, to achieve this end, she sent her burly nephew to fatally stab her oil-rich husband thirty-nine times. Such classic murder-for-profit cases was epitomized by the icy entrepreneur Claus von Bulow, who reportedly overdosed his wealthy wife with insulin injections in 1979-1980 to obtain the millions she had left him in her will. Obsessed in obtaining wealth at any cost, rich socialite, Patrizia Reggiani Martinelli—called Italy's "Black Widow"—simply hired a hit man to murder her ex-spouse and fashion tycoon, Maurizio Gucci, in 1995.

In some instances, murder by a celebrity was due to overwhelming debt, as was the case of Charles Chapin, the famed editor of the New York Evening World. While drowning in debt from his wild stock speculations, and unable to bear the thought that his beloved wife of thirty years would go through life as a pauper, Chapin shot Nellie Chapin to death on the night of September 16, 1918, while both were in bed in their suite at New York's Hotel Cumberland. Chapin went to prison for life, allowed to cultivate the prison's gardens and gleaning Actor Paul Kelly, who shot a man to death in a Hollywood triangle; he served a short prison term before returning to the cameras and the crime he committed was almost forgotten by Hollywood producers and the public alike.

One-time child actor Robert Blake (right), with Scott Wilson, appearing in the 1967 film, In Cold Blood, a movie that reportedly proved prophetic in that Blake was charged with murdering his wife in 2001 (tried in February 2004).

another type of fame as the "Rose Man of Sing Sing," until his death in 1930.

Money brought about the killing of actor Sal Mineo in 1976, and money stimulated the gruesome, homosexual murders of silent screen star Ramon Novarro in 1968 and media tycoon John S. Knight III in 1975. Burglars in search of money brought about the deaths of scores of distinguished citizens. Typical was the case of Henry C. Heinz, the leading banker in Atlanta, Georgia, who interrupted burglar Horace Blalock as the intruder was rummaging through Mrs. Heinz's sewing bag, thinking it to be a purse, while in the darkened library of the Heinz mansion on the night of September 29, 1943. Heinz, in a wild struggle that overturned furniture and lamps, was shot to death by Blalock, before the burglar fled. He was later identified, convicted and sent to prison, being paroled on May 18, 1955. An almost identical crime occurred when millionaire burglar Bernard C. Welch, Jr., invaded the posh home of Michael J. Halberstam, one of the most distinguished physicians in Washington, D.C., and fatally shot Halberstam during a burglary on the night of December 5, 1980 (see chapter on Burglary).

Some celebrities not only committed murder, but received little or no punishment for their crimes. Sherman Billingsley, the famed owner of New York's Stork Club, reportedly shot and killed a bootlegger in the early 1920s, but was never brought to trial. Paul Kelly, the taciturn tough-sounding actor of the 1920s-1940s, shot and killed a man in a love triangle and did only a brief prison stint before returning to the cameras. The same fate befell football star and movie actor O. J. Simpson, who narrowly escaped conviction in his wife's 1994 murder, although his guilt was so blatantly evident that he was not again invited to go before the cameras.

Oddly, Simpson came to the defense of fellow actor and aging child star Robert Blake, after Blake was charged with the shooting murder of his wife Bonny Lee Bakley, outside an Italian restaurant in Studio City, California, on May 4, 2001 (he awaits trial at this writing). Irrespective of Blake's possible guilt in this homicide, his money, influence and image, as has been the case in too many celebrity killings, may assure his acquittal, typically and unequally tipping the scales of justice in favor of the powerful. Such inequitable results were prosaically summed up by none other than William Barclay "Bat" Masterson (1853-1921), the intrepid peace officer of the frontier, who became a celebrated sports writer for the New York Morning Telegraph. He was found dead at his desk in the city room, his head resting on an open-carriage cast-iron Underwood typewriter. Found rolled into the typewriter was a sheet of copy paper on which Masterson had written his last words: "I have found that things break about even in this old world of ours. For instance, ice—the poor get it in the winter and the rich in the summer."

Opposite page at left: A policeman itemizes the debris in the ransacked Philadelphia home of media tycoon John S. Knight III, who was murdered by three homosexual hustlers in 1975.

A CUCKOLDING KILLER/February 15, 1551

Though born into British bluebloods, Alice Arden (1516-1551) conducted her private life like a common street-walker. Arden was the stepdaughter of Sir Edward North whose father had won world renown as the translator of Plutarch. Her husband, Thomas Arden was wealthy and of the gentleman class who gave his wife every comfort, moving her into a large mansion in Faversham, England, in 1544. Alice, however, betrayed his trust at every opportunity to see her lover, Richard Mosby (or Mosbie), a rakish tailor who had once been a servant in the North household and who had maintained a sexual liaison with Alice since seducing her when she was but a teenager. Arden, on the other hand, was a man twice her age, one who was retiring and considerably less passionate than the interloper, Mosby. Tiring of her pretended marriage, Alice, a practical schemer, made plans to kill her husband so that she could spend the rest of her days with the ardent Mosby.

Unlike most wives with murder on their minds, Alice Arden made no secret of her desire to get rid of her husband. She solicited ideas from known enemies of Thomas Arden. There were many. One such was a painter named Clark who proposed that he paint Alice on a large canvas, this portrait to hang in Arden's bedroom. He would temper the oil with poison and when Arden retired he would breath in the poison fumes emanating from the canvas and die in his sleep. The fumes would be gone by morning, Clark promised, and thus the murder weapon would vanish along with the unwanted spouse.

Alice told Clark that such a plan was too risky. A servant might enter the room and breathe the fumes or she herself might die of the deadly oils while sitting for the portrait. No, Clark's plan would not do. She preferred a more direct approach. Alice went to a man named Green who hated Thomas Arden since having been bested by Arden in a land dispute. Alice offered him £10 if he would provide two men, who would kill her husband. Green, in turn, hired two local Faversham ruffians named Shakebag and Black Will to perform the deed.

On February 15, 1551, Mosby invited Thomas Arden to a game of backgammon, making sure that the victim's back was to a large closet. (Shakebag and Black Will had been hiding in Arden's huge mansion for some time with Alice providing them with food and drink until the opportunity to kill her husband presented itself.) As Arden and Mosby began playing, Mosby suddenly shouted, "And now, sir, I may take you if I will!"

"Take me which way?" replied Arden, puzzled at the sudden outburst, not realizing that this was the signal to the assassins to strike. Black Will leaped from the closet and began to strangle Arden with a towel. Mosby grabbed a heavy pressing iron and brought this down upon Arden's head several times. He fell apparently dead to the floor and the killers, aided by a servant named Michael, dragged the body into the counting room. The resilient Arden, however, came to life again and Black Will smashed him on the head, a killing blow.

Alice Arden wanted to make sure. She rushed into the room with a long knife and plunged this several times into her husband's chest. The body was then taken to a nearby field and left there. Alice then sent out word by some servants to the local townspeople that her husband had not returned to dinner and that she was worried that he might have been attacked by highwaymen, who were then plaguing the area. Villagers carrying torches conducted a search of the fields and Arden's body was discovered hacked to pieces.

A contemporary print shows the murder of Thomas Arden in 1551 by his wife Alice, her lover and several servants.

Alice was confident that the local authorities would conclude that Arden had been the victim of highwaymen. She neglected to see, however, that her plan was impossible from the beginning due to its inept execution. Bloody carpet hairs covered the shoes of the victim and a trail of blood led from the mansion to the garden. It was obvious to the local mayor that Arden had not been killed on a lonely road, but inside his own house and his body then dragged outside. A search of the grounds around the mansion unearthed the bloody towel and knife used to murder Arden. The Mayor bluntly told Alice that he suspected her of having a hand in her husband's demise. Alice became indignant, replying archly, "I would you should know that I am no such woman!"

The Mayor showed her the bloody towel and the gore-coated knife. Alice Arden trembled for a moment in silence, then confessed to the murder, dramatically taking the bloody towel and pressing it to her face, moaning, "Oh, the blood of God, help for this blood that I shed!" Mosby was found in his room, pretending to be asleep. He was awakened and accused of the killing. Boldly he denied committing the crime which was equally stupid in that his hose and purse were still covered with his victim's blood. Green, the man who had supplied the killers, fled with Black Will and Shakebag. Black Will was captured near Flushing and hanged. Shakebag, who had only stood by as a lookout during the murder, was hunted down near Southwark and run through by swords in the hands of his pursuers.

The killing of any high born person in England at that time unleashed savage retribution on the part of the authorities, who ordered wholesale arrests and executions, a sweeping revenge that encompassed the innocent as well as the guilty. One of Alice Arden's maidservants, who knew nothing of the murder, was burned at the stake. George Bradshaw, who had carried messages between Alice and Mosby, unaware of their contents, was seized and instantly hanged. Adam Fowl, who ran a local inn, the Fleur de Lys, was strapped to the underside of a horse and taken to London where he was thrown into the darkest dungeon of Marshalsea Prison. His crime had been serving two tankards of ale to Alice and Mosby when they stopped at his inn during one of their clandestine meetings.

The servant Michael was hanged in chains at Faversham, while Mosby and his sister Susan, who had helped in the murder plot, were taken to Smithfield, where they were hanged at the same time. Alice Arden found no quick relief at the end of a rope. She was made into a public spectacle and served as a warning to any other rebellious wives, who thought to murder their husbands. She was taken to Canterbury and, after thousands of spectators had been assembled, rode to the stake in an open cart on March 14, 1551. She was tied to a stake and then slowly burned to death while the great throng dinned catcalls and insults into her ears throughout her prolonged and torturous death.

THE MURDER OF SIR THOMAS OVERBURY/ September 15, 1613

Lady Frances Howard (1593-1632) was at the center of one of England's most famous Royalist intrigues of the Seventeenth Century. Jealousy, passion, and greed were at the heart of the matter, and, in the end, one of the court's most learned men paid with his life.

Frances Howard, at the time she joined the royal court of James I.

Frances Howard was only fifteen when she was introduced to Robert Carr, the homosexual lover of King James I. By currying the favor of the king, Carr had become the second-most powerful figure in the land. His sexual favors were rewarded with a peerage. James, a bloated and petulant monarch, had made his dandy the Viscount Rochester.

Carr had made the acquaintance of Sir Thomas Overbury, a knight of high intellectual capacities, but one who showed slavish devotion to those considered favorites of the King. It was Overbury who introduced Carr to Frances Howard, the daughter of the Earl of Suffolk. The 15-year-old charmer turned the head of Viscount Carr. He temporarily forgot about his royal obligations in his obsessive pursuit of the teenager. Carr, who was unable to read or write, engaged Overbury to write his love letters. At first Overbury was a willing participant to the intrigue and eager to please Carr. When Frances Howard's husband, the 14-year-old Earl of Essex, returned from his travels, Overbury condemned the relationship as immoral.

Angered with Overbury and fearing that he might make her reckless sexual liaisons public, Howard enlisted Anne Turner, a reputed witch and alchemist, to help her prepare a poison to be administered to the truculent Overbury. Meanwhile, Carr inveigled the King to imprison Overbury in the Tower of London on a petty charge. The guards who stood watch over Sir Thomas were replaced with men sympathetic to the scheming Carr and his mistress.

Frances Howard, at the time she became Countess of Somerset.

Anne Turner then went about her lethal chores, securing poison from a physician named James Franklin. Tarts and various candied jellies were laced with rose algar, sublimate of mercury, arsenic, and diamond powder, before being fed to Overbury by Sir Gervase Helwys and his assistant Richard Weston. There was enough poison in the delicacies to kill twenty people. Not surprisingly, Overbury died on September 15, 1613. Three days later, Frances' marriage to the Earl of Essex was annulled and King James bestowed on Carr the title of Earl of Somerset. Carr married Frances in a great ceremony, and soon they became the favorites of the court, commanding enormous power and prestige.

Their crime might have been covered up if not for the deathbed confession of Paul de Lobel, an apothecary's assistant who had participated in the poisoning plot. De Lobel named the conspirators, and on October 23, 1615, Richard Weston was hanged at Tyburn. He was followed in death on November 9, 1615 by Mrs. Turner. Sir Gervase Helwys and James Franklin marched to the gallows on Nov. 20, 1615 and Dec. 9, 1615. A great public outcry led to the arrest and conviction of Carr and his wife on May 24, 1616. Lady Somerset was prosecuted by Sir Francis Bacon, who treated her, at the king's behest, with only the greatest respect.

Both were convicted and ordered to hang, but through King James' intervention Carr and his wife were spared the death penalty. The king no doubt feared that he might also be named as a co-conspirator by the vengeful Carr, so he was anxious to placate the culprits. Though they escaped the gallows, it can be said that Carr and Lady Somerset endured a fate perhaps worse than death. They retired to their country estate, where they soon grew tired of each other. The rancor Lady Somerset felt for her husband was such that she did not speak to him for five years. She died in 1632 from a painful uterine disorder.

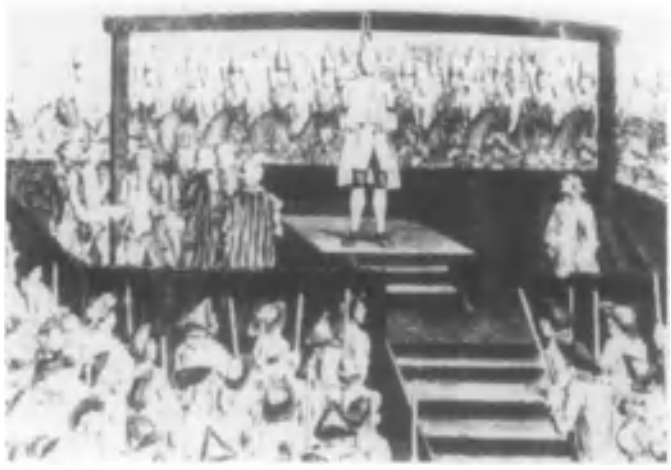
"I HAVE SPARED HIS LIFE"/January 18, 1760

Lawrence Shirley Ferrers (Fourth Earl Ferrers, 1720-1760), a descendent of England's royal Plantagenet family, possessed great wealth and he enjoyed a high social standing. He was also a short-tempered, volatile man, who, through arrogance and pride, put himself above the law. In 1752, Ferrers married the daughter of Sir William Meridith, a union that quickly soured. His cruel treatment caused his wife to petition Parliament for a legal separation, which was granted in 1758, along with an official order that Ferrers pay his aggrieved ex-spouse considerable and protracted payments.

This governmental degree only served to bring Ferrers' lethal personality to the surface. Anyone who offended him, or he thought offended him, became the target of his murderous wrath. On one occasion, armed with a gun, Ferrers threatened his servant and ordered him to kill his own brother. The servant, however, fled and told Ferrers' brother what had happened. The brother and his wife left the estate immediately. Not so lucky was a man named John Johnson, who was named by the courts to act as the receiver of the rents on behalf of Ferrers' estranged wife. Johnson had first refused to accept the task, but Ferrers himself persuaded him to do so.

The relationship between the two men grew strained. Ferrers suspected Johnson and the trustees of his estate of cheating him out of a contract for some coal mines. The charge was unfounded, but Ferrers nevertheless resolved to kill Johnson. At the time, Ferrers was living in the village of Stanton-Harold in Leicestershire, and Johnson was his tenant. On January 18, 1760, Johnson arrived at Ferrers' door as ordered. Ferrers produced a written "confession" of Johnson's imagined villainy and ordered him to sign it. When Johnson refused, Ferrers ordered him to drop to his knees. He shot Johnson in the chest, then summoned a surgeon to attend to his victim's wounds.

The titled Lawrence Ferrers is shown fatally shooting his steward, John Johnson, in 1760.



The public hanging of Lawrence Ferrers drew a large crowd of spectators to Tyburn.

By the time the surgeon arrived, Ferrers had consumed a large quantity of port wine. He told the doctor, "Now I have spared his life, I desire you would do what you can for him." The physician could do nothing for Johnson, who died the next morning. The physician reported the blatant killing to authorities, who ordered Ferrers arrested. Ferrers, however, locked himself in his house and refused to surrender to officials. Meanwhile, a mob gathered outside his home. A collier named Curtis finally helped take Ferrers into custody and accompanied him to the local jail. A charge of willful murder was returned and Ferrers was bound over for trial, arriving in London on February 14, 1760.

Ferrers' body, on public display at Surgeons' Hall, before it was dissected.

After two months' confinement in the Tower of London, Ferrers was brought before the House of Lords on April 16, 1760. There was no question about his guilt, so the issue of his sanity occupied much of the deliberations. Ferrers defended himself, claiming that he had not been in his right mind when he fatally shot Johnson, but his defense arguments failed to persuade his peers. A verdict of guilty was returned, and on May 5, 1760, Ferrers was taken to Tyburn to be executed. After the hanging, the body was removed to Surgeon's Hall for dissection and public display, according to the sentence of the court.

WAS MOZART MURDERED?/December 5, 1791

Almost from the moment of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's untimely demise on December 5, 1791, his death in rumor, gossip, song, poetry, and literature has been attributed to his arch rival, Italian composer Antonio Salieri (1750-1825). Mozart (Johannes Chrysostomus Wolfgangus Theophilus Mozart, 1756-1791) was a boy prodigy who startled the world with his virtuoso playing of the harpsichord, violin, and organ from age four, composing small musical pieces before his fifth birthday. His father, court composer and violinist Johann Georg Leopold Mozart, took his son and daughter, Maria, from their native Salzburg on several tours which saw the children enthrall the crown heads of Europe. When at home, little "Wolferl" mesmerized Austrian emperor Francis I, who would sit at the boy's side while he played, calling him "my little magician."

Mozart as a child, 1763; painting by Pietro Antonio Lorenzoni.

A precocious and outgoing child (he would never lose his mirthful childishness as an adult), Mozart captivated queens and future queens of Europe with his charming personality. As a child, he once slipped on the marbled floor of the Austrian palace housing archduchess Marie Antoinette, later to become the hapless queen of France. She picked up the little boy who abruptly kissed her cheek and said: "You are very kind. When I grow up I will marry you."

At age nine, Mozart astonished the king of England by playing every piece of music put before him, compositions he had never seen until that moment. Later that year, he composed his first symphony (he had already published several sonatas at age seven). In 1769, Mozart was given the honorary title of concertmaster to the Archbishop of Salzburg, a demanding prelate who paid the gifted child very little money.

In 1767, at the age of eleven, Mozart responded to the suggestion of Austrian emperor Joseph II by composing an opera buffa La Finta Semplice, which was then acknowledged to be an "incomparable work," yet it was at this early age that Mozart felt for the first time the seething envy of his musical elders whose deep resentment of his outstanding genius caused his work to be suppressed. When the Archbishop of Salzburg heard of the rejected work, he ordered that it be performed at his palace and was so overwhelmed by the compositions that he made Mozart his maestro di capella, a position that was unfortunately honorary and paid next to nothing.

Seeking funds, Mozart, accompanied by his father, went to Milan, Italy, in 1770, where the boy genius composed his second operatic masterpiece, Mitridate, r di Ponto, which was produced at Teatro Reggio Ducal and won for Mozart instant acknowledgment as one of the great composers of that day or any other. This work was performed on December 26, 1770, and the greatest musical professors of the day earlier scoffed at the idea of a 14-year-old boy orchestrating a full opera for the largest orchestra then in the world at Teatro Reggio Ducal. Further, this boy led that orchestra by playing the harpsichord throughout its twenty performances. Again, jealous and viciously envious competitors denounced the boy, but even their shrieks were drowned out in the overwhelming praise he received. Reportedly, one of those who witnessed the explosive success of Mozart was a 20-year-old impoverished, but musically gifted youth, Antonio Salieri, and, from that moment on, he hated this genius with an insidious and lifelong passion that, some would later claim, evidenced itself in Mozart's murder.

Child prodigy Mozart playing at the piano, November 1763, accompanied by his father, Leopold Mozart, and his sister Nanneri; watercolor by Louis Carrogis de Carmontelle.

Mozart went on creating at a furious pace, producing masterpiece operas including Idomeneo, r e di Creta (1781), Die Entfhurung aus dem Serail (1782), Le nozze di Figaro (1786; English title: The Marriage of Figaro), Don Giovanni (1787), Cosi fan tutte (1790), and Die Zauberflote (1791; English title: (The Magic Flute). He married a beautiful, but capricious soprano, Constanze Weber (1763-1842), who was as financially irresponsible as her inspired husband. Though Mozart received many commissions, he was denied a high musical office in his native Austria. Oddly, this was due to the mortal enemy his music had made, Salieri, who had traveled to Austria with F.L. Gassmann, and who convinced Emperor Joseph to sponsor him. Salieri's own operas, Le Donne Letterate (1770) and Armida (1771), were great successes in Vienna, at the same time that Mozart was taking Italy's musical world by storm.

When Mozart returned to Vienna, he supported himself by teaching and taking occasional commissions, but he was denied any significant court-appointed positions, thanks to Salieri's venomous intrigues. Although highly respected for his own fine work, Salieri saw in Mozart a posthumous threat to that work, one that would overshadow and eclipse almost all the composers of that great musical day so that posterity would remember Mozart and ignore Salieri. This was undoubtedly Salieri's gnawing fear, one that reportedly led to murderous loathing.

There was much in Mozart's background to point to Salieri's bone-marrow resentment of his rival. The Austrian genius had been raised in comfort, encouraged from the cradle to perform and excel, pampered and cuddled in his infant creativity by the kings and queens of Europe. Mozart had been given every opportunity and had taken rich advantage of the stage opened to him. His father had long been recognized as a respected composer. From childhood, the world and the future belonged to Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. To Salieri the world had offered little hope of success or recognition. Born in Legnano, Italy, Salieri's merchant father died bankrupt and the youth had to beg the support of the rich Mocenigo family, who grudgingly secured for the boy a berth in the choir school of St. Mark's in Venice. Here he diligently studied music and inched his way toward musical composition. He did not possess the lightning burst of imagination and dynamic composition of Mozart. He was a meticulous creator of impressive church music. Where the unpredictable Mozart arrested, disturbed, and inspired the spirit, Salieri soothed it.

Mozart (lower left-hand corner at piano) is shown as a child playing for guests at a tea in the residence of Prince Louis-Francois de Conti, in 1766; painting by Michel Barthelemy Olivier.

Salieri worked with and showed respect for Haydn, Beethoven, Gluck, and all the other composers of that illustrious musical era. To only one did he display a fist of malice, a mask of hate—Mozart. This cancerous loathing for Mozart is quite clear to anyone comparing the works of both composers; they both sought to dominate Italian opera. Mozart succeeded and was Salieri's only rival, one he could never dominate. It was easy for Salieri to be on affable terms with all other composers; none but Mozart competed with him for the high honors that Italian opera could bestow. The honors and the kudos went to Mozart. He was the light, Salieri only an interesting reflection.

It was written by the Russian poet Alexander Pushkin that Salieri attended the premiere of Don Giovanni, but so consumed by envy was he that he could not restrain himself from hissing during the performance, causing the startled audience to look in shock to his box. Realizing that he had dropped his guard, Salieri rose and left the opera, his secret hatred for one greater than himself momentarily, blatantly exposed. Pushkin's chilling portrait of Salieri's grotesque envy ends with the poet's conclusion: "The envious man who was capable of hissing at Don Giovanni was capable of poisoning its creator."

Was Pushkin accusing Salieri of murder? When the poet wrote his drama masterpiece Mozart and Salieri in 1826 (adapted as an opera by Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov in 1898), Salieri had been dead less than a year and it was much rumored then, as it had been immediately after Mozart's death in 1791, that, indeed, Salieri had poisoned the Austrian genius to finally rid himself of his tormentor. Pushkin's intent, however, was not to accuse Salieri of actual physical murder, but a murder of spirit, a murder of the soul, since it was Salieri who intrigued against Mozart in his last years, plotting to keep the composer penniless, whispering calumnies about the composer into the ears of patrons and aristocrats, who subsequently declined to sponsor Mozart, and forming a critical cabal that negated and rejected all the work Mozart produced.

The composer's production in his last years was stupendous. (Mozart would die leaving more than 600 musical compositions completed.) To support himself he wrote operettas, arias, duets, tercets, and quartets with orchestral accompaniment. He traveled about Europe writing almost to order as each commission appeared. This furious work exhausted the composer and he soon fell ill, but his impoverished condition demanded that he take on one more work, a commission offered from a mysterious stranger demanding that Mozart hurriedly complete a Requiem. Mozart accepted the commission (some time in July 1791) but he expressed his superstitious fears that this stranger, who would not identify his master, represented not an admiring aristocrat, but death itself, and was a harbinger of his own demise. Mixed with this foreboding was Mozart's illness, diagnosed by some as a form of typhus or "high military fever," a euphemism of the day for a fever accompanied by a rash. Yet this was no more than a misleading rumor. Actually, no real diagnosis was ever made by Mozart's attending physicians.

Mozart at Verona, 1770; oil painting by Saverio della Rosa.

Mozart had just returned from Prague when he began to feel ill. His feet and hands began to swell and he vomited his food. He grew weaker and weaker, but continued to work on the Requiem for the mysterious stranger who made two more furtive visits to the composer with payments. This stranger has been assumed to be, by some, a cloak-wrapped, hat-shrouding figure who was none other than Salieri in disguise, his sinister aim being to drive Mozart to his death, knowing he was ill, but also knowing that the composer would complete his musical task though it meant his death, such was his dedication to his art.

It was later learned that the messenger was a representative of Count Franz von Walsegg, who later stated that he had commissioned the Requiem to honor his late wife and that he had operated so secretly because he intended to pass off Mozart's work as his own. This story in itself is strange in that von Walsegg brands himself a thief after Mozart's death when there is no motivation for such a self-destructive admission. But it is not so strange to consider the commission coming from von Walsegg, friend of Antonio Salieri, if the Salieri murder conspiracy theory is to be accepted.

Mozart with his sister and father (and portrait of his mother), winter, 1780-1781; painting by Johann Nepomuk della Croce.

Salieri was much on Mozart's fever-wracked brain toward the end of his days. He spoke of this powerful enemy, illustrating how Salieri had purposely failed to intervene with the emperor on his behalf and plotting against his receiving commissions and recognition for his work, intriguing with Austrian aristocrats to keep Mozart from being named to any significant musical post that would afford him a reasonable income and some relief against the exhausting, killing routine of his work. Mozart complained that he had "the taste of death" on his tongue and that he sincerely believed he was slowly being murdered. "I shall not last much longer," he told his wife. "I am sure that I have been poisoned. I cannot rid myself of this thought." Constanze related this to Mozart's first biographer, Franz Niemetschek, and repeatedly quoted his remarks to her second husband, Georg Nikolaus von Nissen, who also wrote a biography of the composer. It was this statement, coupled with remarks that implied that Salieri was behind the poisoning, that identified, without direct accusation, charge or trial, Antonio Salieri as the killer of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.

Mozart about a year before his mysterious death, 1789-1790; painting by Joseph Lange.

The room at the Villa Bertramka, in Prague, where Mozart composed most of one of his masterworks, Don Giovanni.

Just how the poisoning was accomplished, if in fact such poison was administered to Mozart, has never been satisfactorily explained, yet the symptoms of Mozart's illness, the swelling of the limbs, the "taste of death" in his mouth, the vomiting, all of this could easily be attributable to arsenic, then the most popular method of murder. The Borgias had used arsenic with great effect during the Renaissance. The French had used arsenic with such regularity to rid themselves of unwanted relatives that it became known as poudre de succession ("inheritance powder"). A clever crone living in Naples, Italy, known as La Toffana or Toffania (1653-1723), sold arsenic wholesale to women wanting to get rid of truculent husbands, disguising the lethal grams by mixing them with the herb Cymbalaria, which gave the powder properties which prevented identification of the usual symptoms of arsenic poisoning, or so it was claimed.

In Mozart's day, such murder methods were still very much in vogue, guns and knives too uncivilized to be employed by any intellectual murderer. Poison was the method of the secret killer. Since arsenic had a distinct taste, it was best administered with strong wine. Some later claimed that Salieri, always mindful that he had enough enemies to fear, protected himself against just such a demise by never drinking anything but water so that his taste buds could detect the presence of arsenic at a sip.

A great deal of this kind of speculation regarding Mozart's death was encouraged by the odd fact that no death certificate was made out which specified the composer's illness. He was casually attended by Dr. Nicholas Closset who thought so little of his distinguished patient that even when he was contacted at the theater and told that Mozart was dying, Closset refused to leave until the drama ended. When he did arrive at Mozart's home, he applied cold compresses to the composer's fever-wracked head, which apparently sent Mozart into shock and caused his death two hours later. He was in a coma for the last few hours of his life and did not speak, according to one account. Yet his wife insisted later that he talked intelligently about the completion of his Requiem with others right up to his last moments, telling several composers gathered at his bedside how he wanted the kettle drums to be used in the Requiem, making the sound of these kettle drums, this being his last utterance.

Following Mozart's painful death on the morning of December 5, 1791, a great deal of speculation ensued. Some claimed the composer died of typhus, tuberculosis, grippe, meningitis, heart failure, dropsy, or rheumatic fever. The arsenic theory blossomed, as did a similar theory about mercury poisoning, but nothing could be proved. The body was never examined, no autopsy was ever performed. And, because of the manner in which Mozart found his lowly grave, no autopsy could ever be made, let alone exhumation made, since the body of this greatest of operatic composers could not be found. He was buried the following afternoon with only five friends to see him interred. One of these faithful mourners was none other than Antonio Salieri.

Mozart's wife, Constanze, having been overcome with grief, was not present to oversee what became a shameless display of disaffection and disregard for the dead genius. Salieri and four others followed the body to a pauper's grave. It was sewn into a sack and thrown into a hole, covered with earth, no gravestone nor marker to signify the resting place of the great composer. This brutal treatment was later explained as merely the practice of a new austere burial system ordered by the practical Emperor Joseph who hated burial pomp and had outlawed for a short time the use of coffins. Moreover, it was later reported that a violent rainstorm drove off the five mourners so that they never even accompanied the body to its final resting place and that two itinerant grave-diggers, unaware of the prestigious corpse they were burying, flung the body into its pit and neglected to erect a marker so that the identification of this lonely grave and its occupier was forever lost to history.

Examining records for the weather of that day, it appears that there was no storm and that the mourners had no reason to abandon Mozart to his oblivion. There was also no earthly reason for Salieri's presence, although his defenders later claimed that because he accompanied his rival to the grave was proof enough that he had nothing to do with Mozart's death and, in fact, made a purposeful display of grief as a sign of regret at having mistreated the genius when he was alive. Yet it could be as easily said that Salieri, if guilty of poisoning his hated superior in art, followed the body to its last resting place to make sure that there would be no marker, no gravestone to which generations of admirers could later come. He, Salieri, would deprive Mozart of this signal honor as he had deprived him of the court honors and positions in life; Salieri's vengeance thus reached beyond death and into posterity.

The presence of Salieri at Mozart's nameless grave, if he indeed had been the instrument of the composer's death, would have been in keeping with a long-standing tradition in which the killer visits the grave of his victim. Dozens of subtle murderers have attended the funerals of their victims, either to allay suspicion their absence would otherwise create or even to gloat over their lethal achievement. In Salieri's instance this would no doubt have been felt a triumph over his artistic foe, one he had never enjoyed in life. If he did attend this miserable funeral out of belated regret or in merely observing the proper decorum, it would stand to reason that Salieri would also never have permitted the disgraceful act of burying Mozart in an unmarked grave. His defenders have never addressed that question. Moreover, if Salieri had had Mozart poisoned with arsenic, he would have known that the body would best be buried in a plot never to be located, that the corpse, if later exhumed and carefully examined, even in that early day, would certainly have revealed the presence of arsenic.

A sensational case, that of Mary Blandy in 1752, almost four decades before Mozart's strange death, involved an exhumed body that had clearly shown evidence of arsenic. Miss Blandy's sensational trial in England featured a crude, but dramatic display by a physician, Dr. Addington, wherein he was able to prove that Miss Blandy's father had been poisoned with arsenic. This poison was long in evidence after death, as anyone employing it in Mozart's day would have known. No, it would have served Antonio Salieri's end to make sure that Mozart's grave was never found and that his body was never exhumed and examined. Salieri, it was also later claimed, after dominating the court and church music of Austria for fifty years, attempted to commit suicide and, failing, lingered long enough to confess his murder of Mozart. No proof exists that such a confession was ever made. Salieri did portray the image of the understanding artist following Mozart's death, befriending the dead composer's wife and securing a music position for his arch rival's son, Wolfgang Xavier. But then such a show of consideration would further remove suspicion from him, it could also be claimed. Years later Constanze wrote a letter to a friend in Germany in which she stated that her son "would not, like his father, have to fear envious men who had designs on his life."

According to another theory, subscribed to by many who have long chronicled the strange rites and customs of secret societies, Mozart was murdered by Salieri and others for violating the secret rites of the Masons. The Masons had had a long and strange history of taking revenge on one of their own, especially any sworn member, who ever dared to reveal the secret rituals of this ancient brotherhood. Not only was Mozart a Mason, as many were later to ruefully point out, but he had blatantly violated the masonic rituals by exposing these cabalistic rites in one of his last works, The Magic Flute. Mozart, like most of his musical contemporaries, including Salieri, was a high-ranking Mason and it was thought that he had betrayed the brotherhood when composing The Magic Flute, which, on the surface, appeared to be pro-Mason but was, in reality, a subtle mockery of its sacred customs and misapplication of The Queen of the Night, the Men of Armor, and other Masonic figures proscribed from public display. There was even one claim that this opera was Mozart's subtle signal to the world that he intended to establish his own version of a Masonic order, a lodge which he intended to call "The Grotto."

Composer Antonio Salieri, Mozart's bitter rival, whose jealousy many claimed caused him to murder the great composer, a claim dismissed by other historians.

Salieri, therefore, according to this theory, easily coupled his personal hatred for Mozart with his Masonic obligation to rid the brotherhood of a mocking violator of all the society held dear and sacred. In the light of Masonic victims of the past and that day and days to come, if one subscribes to this conspiratorial theory, Mozart was not an exceptional victim of the brotherhood's wrath, but a typical choice for elimination. The sect of Masons to which he belonged stemmed from the Knights of Malta, established during the Crusades, a militant, bloody organization that especially selected governmental and social leaders to assassinate. These killings did not constitute random bloodletting, but were carefully selected as a way of controlling the destiny of western civilization. Since most of the original founders of this Masonic sect were noblemen, they sought to protect the aristocracy at all costs, and any king who either diminished their power through liberal concessions to the masses or oppressed them in any way to increase the power of the monarchy became likely candidates for assassination.

Initiates into the brotherhood, upon reaching certain degrees of status, were shown by senior Masons the ritual of murder enacted upon any who betrayed the brotherhood. In Mozart's day, this rite was not figurative, but utterly literal and remained so for some time to come. Among the listed royal victims murdered by the most virulent Masonic sect, those thought to be powerful enemies of Freemasonry, were Leopold II of Austria and Gustavus III, king of Sweden, both dying a year after Mozart, the Swedish sovereign dying of a gunshot wound received at a masked ball in a bizarre plot. It was claimed with some logic that the horrendous 1888 slashing deaths by the anonymous Jack the Ripper in London involved the Masons, and the Masonic presence in the assassination of Abraham Lincoln was real. Those in the performing arts who had demonstrated their hostility towards the Masons, it was said, were murdered by the sect to prevent these influential artists from molding public opinion against the brotherhood. Gotthold Lessing, the renowned German drama critic, and the poet Schiller were claimed to be in this number, as was Mozart, undoubtedly the most influential composer of his era.

Such killings enacted against fellow masons who showed themselves turncoats to the society were reportedly long in evidence after Mozart's death. In the U.S., a Mason named William Morgan, to earn much-needed funds, wrote a pamphlet revealing the secret rituals of his Masonic lodge. Morgan, a Royal Arch Mason, before printing the booklet, sent off a copy of his manuscript to have it copyrighted and it was detected by another Mason who, according to the story, promptly took action. Morgan was abducted and taken to Fort Niagara, New York, sometime in 1826 where he was bound and gagged and thrown into the Niagara River to meet a watery death.

England's Mary Blandy (1719-1752), who poisoned her father to death with arsenic, the same method some claim that was employed in the murder of Mozart; Blandy, with a leg iron on her left foot, was hanged at Oxford.

This river murder was much in keeping with Mozart's shabby and anonymous burial. It was part of the Masonic blood ritual to make sure a condemned member went to rest in "no decent burial ground." This, of course, would explain why Salieri and his fellow Masons, irrespective of their contempt for their fallen brother, accompanied Mozart to his obscure plot of earth, to make sure that the corpse would be interred in a place of unhallowed ground, unmarked, lost forever, finding "no decent burial ground." This conspiracy is a tale unproven, but one that is strung together with the threads of enough historical consistency to warrant attention, if not concern. Mozart's tragic, premature end and the shameful way in which his remains were treated, his own deathbed words of being poisoned, the near-sinister posture of Antonio Salieri, all of this points to no clear indication of murder, but the question of murder is undeniably present, chillingly real. It will be asked again and again, from this century to the next. The evasive answer, sadly, resides within a lost grave under obscure earth.

"TO KILL WITHOUT REMORSE"/ December 14, 1834

Pierre Francois Gaillard Lacenaire (AKA: Mohossier, 1800-1836) was destined to remain a minor literary figure in France's illustrious history of belles lettres. His ruthless dedication to add murder to his criminal pursuits, however, brought him to national attention. Lacenaire had a dark, brooding philosophy that was early on expressed in pamphlet form, these meager writings later transforming this petty swindler and murderer into a kind of anti-hero. "To kill without remorse is the highest of pleasures," Lacenaire wrote in one of his essays. "It is impossible to destroy in me my hatred of mankind. This hatred is the product of a lifetime, the outcome of my every thought. I never pitied any one who suffered, and I don't want to be pitied myself." The famed author Victor Hugo was one who did take pity. So, too, did the Russian novelist Fyodor Dostoyevsky, whose inspiration to write Crime and Punishment, stemmed partly from his deep familiarity with the Lacenaire case.

This literary oddity was born in Francheville, France, the son of a wealthy merchant in the iron trade. According to Lacenaire's memoirs, he was a neglected child who took a back seat to his pampered older brother, a situation that profoundly influenced his thinking. He was a docile but petulant student at the Alix Seminary, where an instructor would later recall that he was "remarkable for his love of work." Upon completion of his studies, Lacenaire—a name he added to the family name of Gaillard—went to Paris to study law, but economic misfortunes made it no longer possible for him to pay for his continuing education. Lacenaire worked at a number of unproductive jobs as a merchant and bank solicitor until, with no other recourse, he decided to join the army. He fought on the side of the rebels in Morea, on the Greek Peloponnesus, then returned to France in 1829 to face yet another family setback. He discovered that his father was bankrupt and his own financial resources were depleted.

France's Pierre Lacenaire, an embittered writer, who was also a thief, forger and cold-blooded killer, was beheaded by the guillotine in 1836.

Russian novelist Fyodor Dostoyevsky, who used Lacenaire as a role model for his book, Crime and Punishment.

Author Victor Hugo visited the condemned Lacenaire in his cell to listen to the killer recite his scathing verses.

During this period, Lacenaire fought a duel with the nephew of the celebrated novelist, orator, and statesman Benjamin Constant. He emerged the victor, but he came away from the experience with an entirely different view of life and death. For the first time he realized that it was possible to kill without feeling any personal remorse.

In 1829 Lacenaire received his first prison sentence on a charge of swindling. Following his release from jail in 1830, he embarked upon his short-lived literary career. In the next three years, he wrote numerous lyric poems, songs, and essays, none of which earned him a living wage. Not satisfied with the artist's life, he once again resorted to fraud, which got him a thirteen-month sentence in the jail at Poissy in 1833. While he was incarcerated awaiting trial, Lacenaire met a man named Vigouroux, the editor of Bon Sens, a radical political journal that attacked the structure of government and the French monarchy. Vigouroux found a willing advocate in Lacenaire, an early-day existentialist bored with the normal values of that day. He agreed to write an essay, On the Prisons and the Penitentiary System in France, for the news supplement.

Lacenaire's riveting article described the horrors of the French penal system. "In this atmosphere of licentiousness, of cynicism in act and speech, of hideous and revolting stories of crime, for the first time the wretched youth finds himself blushing at the last remnant of innocence and decency, which he had still preserved when he entered the prison; he begins to feel ashamed that he is less of a scoundrel than those about him, he dreads their mockery and their contempt; for, make no mistake, there are such things as respect and contempt even in the galleys, a fact that explains why certain convicts are better off in jail than in a society, which has nothing for them but contempt ..."

Despite his new fame as an essayist, Lacenaire was resigned to being a professional cheat and thief. Following his release from prison in 1834, Lacenaire took on a partner, Pierre Victor Avril, a former carpenter, who had also turned to crime. "I was the intelligence, Avril the arm," Lacenaire would say. They contrived a plot to decoy a bank messenger to their lodging on the pretense of cashing a forged bill and killing him, as bank messengers in those days carried large amounts of cash to complete their transactions.

Lacenaire selected a man familiar to him. The bank messenger Chardon had served time in the same jail as Lacenaire five years earlier, where the two men developed a mutual dislike for each other. Lacenaire explained later, "I have overcome all my passions, save one, revenge." On the morning of December 14, 1834, the two thieves called on Chardon at his residence on the Rue Martin. Chardon invited them to an outer room, where the two men attacked him. As Chardon struggled to free himself from Avril's vise-like grip, Lacenaire stabbed him with a dagger, then Avril used a hatchet to kill him. Hearing Chardon's infirm mother stirring in a bedroom, Lacenaire entered the room and struck her with a file, then removed the bed mattress and used it to suffocate her. Avril then looted the place, taking several dish covers, a soup ladle, and a black silk cap. The value of the items the thieves took barely exceeded 500 francs, far less than what they had intended when they planned the robbery. Still, Lacenaire and Avril appeared satisfied. They celebrated "the perfect crime" over cognac at the Reaped Ear pub, and then went to the theater.

The commissary of police found the bodies two days later. Two weeks after the murders, Lacenaire, posing as "Monsieur Mahossier," appeared before a teller at a bank on the Rue Montorgueil. He said he wanted to negotiate a bill drawn by one of his debtors and that he wanted the matter settled by December 31, 1834. When Lacenaire left, the teller instructed a messenger to take 3,000 francs to the address Lacenaire had given him after the messenger completed his appointed rounds. The 18-year-old messenger, whose name was Genevay, complied. He appeared at Lacenaire's residence late in the day on December 31. Upon being admitted, the messenger placed the money on the table and was about to leave when he was struck from behind by a Lacenaire henchman named Francois

A page from Lacenaire's memoirs which depicts the author as being controlled by the Devil.

(also known as "Red Whiskers"), an ex-soldier Lacenaire had hired for the job. Genevay, his shoulder ripped open by the same bloody file used on Chardon, cried out in pain. His screams could be heard on the street, and Francois, an amateur criminal, fled in panic.

Genevay survived to report the matter to the police. Inspector Canler of the Surete believed the attack was nothing more than a simple case of robbery and assault. He diligently traced the gang's movements to the Faubourg du Temple, an inn in the country where Francois was hiding out. A check of the registry showed the name of "Mahossier." The landlady recalled this person also went by the name of "Monsieur Bton." Francois was brought before Genevay, who had accompanied investigating officers and he promptly identified Francois as the assailant. Then a hunt for Bton or Mahossier ensued.

Inspector Canler interviewed 500 suspects before locating Bton in a Paris jail. The inspector loosened Bton's tongue by plying him with wine and promising him his freedom if he cooperated. Bton told Canler that an associate named Gaillard, which literally means the "gay one," was the man police sought, admitting that he had introduced Francois to Gaillard (Lacenaire). But Canler had little success finding the "gay one." Lacenaire was by then covering his tracks. He had betrayed his partner, Avril, who had been imprisoned, along with Francois, in the Poissy jail, after authorities received a tip from Lacenaire that Avril had committed a forgery.

Reflecting on their partner's betrayal, the prisoners decided to inform on Lacenaire, identifying him to Chief Inspector Pierre Allard of the Surete. When police officers arrived at his residence, Lacenaire merely shrugged at their accusations and confessed to the Chardon murders, the Genevay assault, and a dozen lesser crimes. "You realize, of course, that it will finish you," Canler interjected. "I know that. It doesn't matter so long as it finishes them too," Lacenaire smirked, intending to have his associates march to the guillotine with him.

During his incarceration Lacenaire was visited often by Victor Hugo and Theophile Gautier, France's most celebrated writers, who listened attentively as the killer recited passages of original verse. From an adjacent cell Francois roared his disapproval. "Here's a pretty orator! Gabbler! Gabbler! How they all listen to Lacenaire. They'll be applauding him soon!" The trial of the three felons began at the Court d'Assizes of the Seine Department on November 12, 1835. Lacenaire was defended by a former schoolmate, who had attended the Alix Seminary with him, but the lawyer died in the middle of the trial. "I wash my hands of it," Lacenaire said, quoting the words of Pontius Pilate. He was reconciled to his fate.

A four-day trial ended in conviction. Francois received a life sentence. Avril and Lacenaire were condemned to death. On January 9, 1836, the two men walked to the guillotine at the St. Jacques barrier on the south side of Paris. Lacenaire looked his executioner square in the eye and said: "Nothing simpler. I am not afraid!" The blade was dropped at 8:33 a.m. This would-be literary lion of France went to his death gripping hatred for society. He had longed for death, his self-pitying memoirs showed, at one point writing: "All night I strode along the quay. I lived ten years in an hour. I wanted to kill myself and I sat on the parapet at the Pont des Arts, opposite the graves of those stupid heroes of July [the French Revolution] ... Henceforth my life was a drawn-out suicide; I belonged no longer to myself, but to cold steel [the guillotine] ... Society will have my blood, but I, in my turn, shall have the blood of Society." Only seconds after his decapitation by the guillotine's rushing blade, the executioner held high the severed head of Lacenaire, a grisly gesture greeted by roaring cheers and applause from blood-lusting spectators, a crowd of thousands, numbering far in excess the few readers who had purchased the scant writings of this lonely, lethal essayist.

A MURDEROUS FRENCH DUKE/ August 18, 1847

The Duke de Praslin (Theobald Charles Laure Hugues, Duc de Choiseul-Praslin, 1810-1848) was the scion of a distinguished noble French family that was directly related to the line of the reigning King Louis Philippe. In 1829, at the age of nineteen, Duke de Praslin married Fanny Sebastiani, who also came from a noble line and was the niece of the Duke of Coigny.

Petite and pretty, de Praslin's bride brought with her a huge dowry, which enriched the dwindling de Praslin coffers. The union produced ten children and the couple seemed relatively happy, spending their days in a comfortable Paris house on the Rue St. Honor, which belonged to the Sebastiani family. They also spent time in a gloomy, dank castle in Melun, the ancestral de Praslin estate.

The many de Praslin children needed considerable supervision and, in 1841, an attractive, intelligent, and utterly desirable housekeeper and governess arrived. Her name was Henriette Deluzy-Desportes, but the de Praslin family referred to her as Mademoiselle Deluzy. The duke, by then tired of his wife, who had worn herself out in twenty years of childbirth and maintaining a staggering household, slowly attached his affections to the reliant, strong-willed governess.

For six years, de Praslin carried on a cautious affair with Deluzy, who actually became the female head of the house and the woman the de Praslin children turned to for emotional support. The duchess was all but ignored in this strange atmosphere. Finally, unable to endure the impossible situation anymore, she asked the duke to break off the affair and send Deluzy away. He refused, curtly informing his wife, "My dear, if she goes, so do I."

The duchess then played her last card, threatening to divorce her husband unless he gave up his mistress. Fearing the loss of his wife's considerable income, de Praslin promised that he would set matters straight and call a halt to his unfaithful practices. He suggested that his wife take the children to the Melun estate, while he made final arrangements to send Deluzy away.

In July 1847, the duchess and the children went to the country but de Praslin, instead of dismissing the voluptuous governess, rented a luxurious apartment for her in Paris and spent almost a whole month in Deluzy's bed. The duchess returned to her Paris house to find her husband absent. Fanny de Praslin went to bed with nervous apprehension. She noticed that the hinges of the door leading to her bedroom had been removed. She consoled herself that she was safe, nevertheless, since the house was full of servants and her husband's bed chambers were close by. A cord was close to the duchess' bed which, when pulled, would ring bells in the servants' quarters, summoning them.

About 4 a.m., on August 18, 1847, the still house was suddenly filled with the piercing shrieks of a woman, screams so loud that they could be heard in the street outside by passersby. This was followed by choking and coughing sounds and then ominous silence. Responding to these cries inside the house were two servants, August Charpentier, de Praslin's

The Duke de Praslin, one of France's wealthiest men, who murdered his wife in 1847 for the love of another woman.

Fanny Sebastiani, the goddaughter of Emperor Napoleon I, married the Duke de Praslin and suffered death at his hands.

The magnificent chateau, where the de Praslins dwelled and where Fanny was murdered.

valet, and Emma Leclerc, the personal maid to the duchess. The doors to the duchess' bedroom were bolted and the entrance to her bathroom was jammed shut with a wedge. The valet found that the exit from the bedroom to the garden was also locked and he broke a panel of glass, getting inside a passageway that connected the bedrooms of the duke and duchess. The door between the bedrooms was unlocked.

Inside the dark bedroom of the duchess, the valet could smell gunsmoke and blood. He was joined by another servant and the two of them investigated the bedroom, finding Fanny de Praslin lying on the floor, her head against a sofa. Her nightgown was covered with blood and more than forty savage wounds had pierced her flesh.

Charpentier looked through the window of the bedroom and saw for a fleeting moment a tall, gaunt figure wearing a red brocaded nightgown, a vision he later described, "like a red devil!" Charpentier turned to another servant named Merville and gasped, "The duke."

"Then why doesn't he give the alarm?" asked Emma Leclerc, who stood now holding a guttering candle over the grisly scene. Examining the duchess, the servants grimaced in horror as they discovered sword cuts slashed across the small woman's breasts. Furniture was toppled everywhere and a trail of blood indicated that the duchess had tried to escape by running madly about the room, chased by a monster, who savagely slashed at her. There was a discernible trail of blood leading from the bedroom to the door that led to the duke's bedroom. Suddenly, the duke strode into the room, standing before his slain wife and servants and then exclaimed in a calm voice, "Oh, my God in Heaven! Some monster has murdered Fanny! Get a doctor!"

August Charpentier knew it was too late to call a doctor. He went into the street and stopped a policeman. Chief Inspector Pierre Allard of the Surete, the very man who had supervised the investigation in the notorious Lacenaire case thirteen years earlier, arrived a short time later. He examined the bedroom and found a pistol under a divan. He sniffed its muzzle but realized it had not been fired. The duchess' head had been crushed with a heavy instrument and Allard believed that the pistol had been the murder weapon. Allard asked the duke if he knew the owner of the pistol. "Yes," replied the duke in a rather off-handed way, "It is mine." He then said he had grabbed the pistol in his bedroom when he heard his wife's screams and had run into her bedroom, where he found her lying on the floor. When he lifted her, he said, his clothes became coated with blood. He did not want to frighten the children, he said, so he went to his bedroom to change, then returned to his wife's bedroom to find the servants bending over his wife's body.

Servants are shown entering the duchess' bedroom to find Fanny de Praslin dead, stabbed more than forty times.

The many murder weapons used by de Praslin to rid himself of an unwanted wife.

King Louis-Philippe of France was reluctant to sign the order for de Praslin's execution; he sent the duke a bottle of poison, with a note telling him to commit suicide to preserve the image of the French aristocracy.

Allard checked all of the duke's swords and knives and found them to be spotless and in their wall mounts. The duke sat in a chair implacably staring back at his inquisitor. Allard pointed out the trail of blood that led from the duchess' bedroom to that of the duke's. De Praslin reminded the inspector that he had already admitted lifting his wife's bleeding body and that her blood had soaked his clothes and caused the trail when he went to his room to change. Allard then pointed out that the butt of the Duke's pistol was coated with blood and that hairs obviously from his wife's head still clung to it. The gun, Allard pointed out, had not been seized to ward off a murderous home invader, but had been employed as a murder weapon.

The Luxembourg jail, where de Praslin swallowed poison and broken glass, suffering a painful death.

Moreover, Allard had noticed that the duke was limping and he asked de Praslin to explain this injury. The aloof De Praslin assumed an injured and offended air. He finally responded airily, "I have no further explanations to make. I am a peer of France. I do not account for myself to police officers." With that, he dismissed Allard, but the inspector had already decided that the duke was, indeed, the murderer. He concluded that it would be dangerous to place such a distinguished personage in custody, that to do so was to risk his career, but he believed he had no choice. Armed with considerable evidence, Allard went to ministers of the king some days later and accused the duke of murdering his wife. He had obtained the diary kept by the duchess, along with her letters, all of which were filled with descriptions of her husband's infidelities with Deluzy. Here, of course, was the motive for the murder. De Praslim killed his wife so that he could be with his sensual mistress. King Louis Philippe reluctantly signed the order for de Praslin's arrest.

The de Praslin murder case was profiled in the moody 1940 film, All This, and Heaven Too, with Charles Boyer (shown in bed at left) as the duke and Bette Davis, right, portraying the governess (Henriette Deluzy-Desportes).

Inspector Allard first came under heavy criticism for arresting a nobleman. But the intrepid Allard prepared a meticulous report, describing in detail how he had inspected the butt of the pistol with a magnifying glass and found the hairs affixed to it, mingled with blood. Moreover, he had taken some hairs from the murder victim's head and matched these to those on the gun. This proof, coupled with the duchess' letters and diary, convinced the king that de Praslin would have to face a trial that would certainly prove sensational and embarrassing to the crown. To avoid a scandal that might also taint the aristocracy, the king reportedly sent de Praslin a small bottle of poison and a message that he should do the honorable thing and preserve the good image of his peers by committing suicide. De Praslin not only drank the poison, but broke up the bottle and swallowed the small shards of glass in an attempt to hide the evidence causing his demise.

There were some bizarre sequels to this murder. Before her death, the duchess had had a recurring nightmare, one which she had described to friends and servants. She had dreamed of awakening to see the Devil standing over her, dressed in a shiny bright red costume, moving ominously toward her and then retreating until disappearing into a wall. Years after the duke and duchess were dead, one of their children found a bright red brocaded bal-masque costume of Mephistopheles. The duke had apparently worn this on several occasions, appearing before his wife at night in an attempt to drive her insane, a condition which would have allowed him to divorce her.

Henriette Deluzy was also arrested and jailed for three months while Allard and other officers incessantly interviewed her. She repeatedly stated that she had had nothing to do with the murder of her employer the duchess, and Allard was finally convinced of her innocence and released her. Deluzy migrated to the U.S., settling in New York, where she later became the principal of the Female Art School. She married the Reverend Henry M. Field in 1851 and moved in high literary circles, becoming one of the most distinguished women in New York, although her past, on rare occasions, emerged to haunt her. At one high-society gathering at the Century Club, a Count Goureski, familiar with the de Praslin scandal, hissed repeatedly through his false teeth at Henriette Field, "Mur-der-ess! Mur-der-ess!" The elderly count was finally asked to leave or be thrown through a window.

Nathaniel Hawthorne, who lived near the Fields, learned of Deluzy's scarlet past and, used her as the role model for his mysterious character Miriam in The Marble Faun. When Henriette Field died in 1875, her funeral was attended by all the literary and high society lights of the city and her casket was borne to its grave by such luminaries as William Cullen Bryant and Peter Cooper. The famous diarist George Templeton Strong marked her passing: "Died. Mrs. Henry Field ... I knew her at one time quite well and she was universally liked, being uncommonly clever and cultivated. Her plainness made it incredible that the Duke de Praslin should have been in love with her."

THE PARKMAN MURDER/November 23, 1849

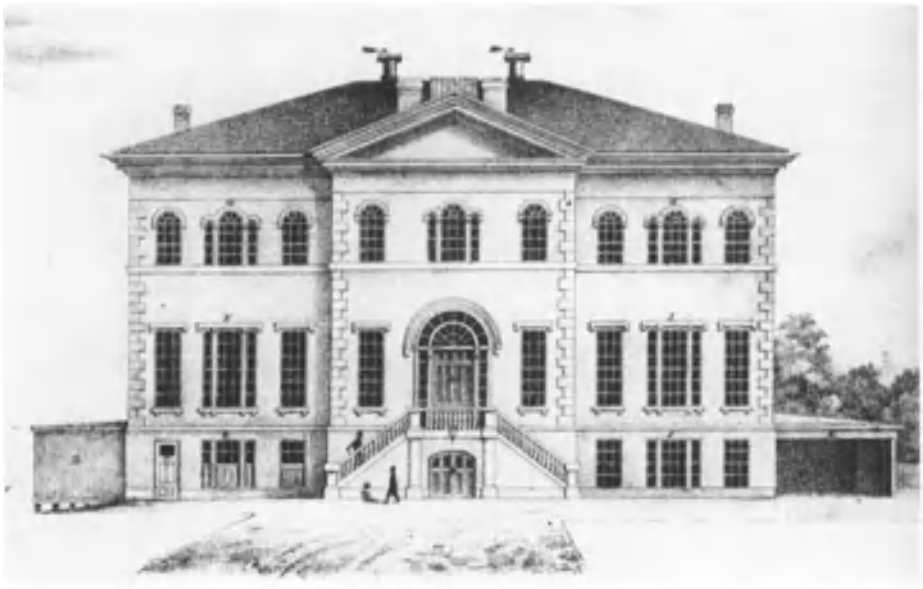
Dr. John White Webster, who earned his medical degree from Harvard and was a professor of chemistry and mineralogy at the Massachusetts Medical College in the 1840s, stepped beyond the halls of the academy to become one of America's most notorious killers. His office was directly below that of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Sr., who would later offer testimony in Webster's sensational murder case, one involving the killing of Dr. George Parkman, a savage crime that shocked that gentler age and providing a grim story that filled the pages of the national press for months.

Dr. John White Webster, an esteemed medical teacher, who murdered his creditor, Dr. George Parkman.

Webster apparently was forced to borrow money from various sources to cover the debts he had incurred from his high living. Far from a reclusive bookworm, the Cambridge physician enjoyed entertaining the cream of the literary set. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was a frequent guest at Webster's table. To remain in good standing with the scions of Boston society, Webster was required to spend money he did not have. With an annual salary of $1,200, Webster could ill afford extravagant parties. He soon found himself borrowing large sums of money from his closest friends.

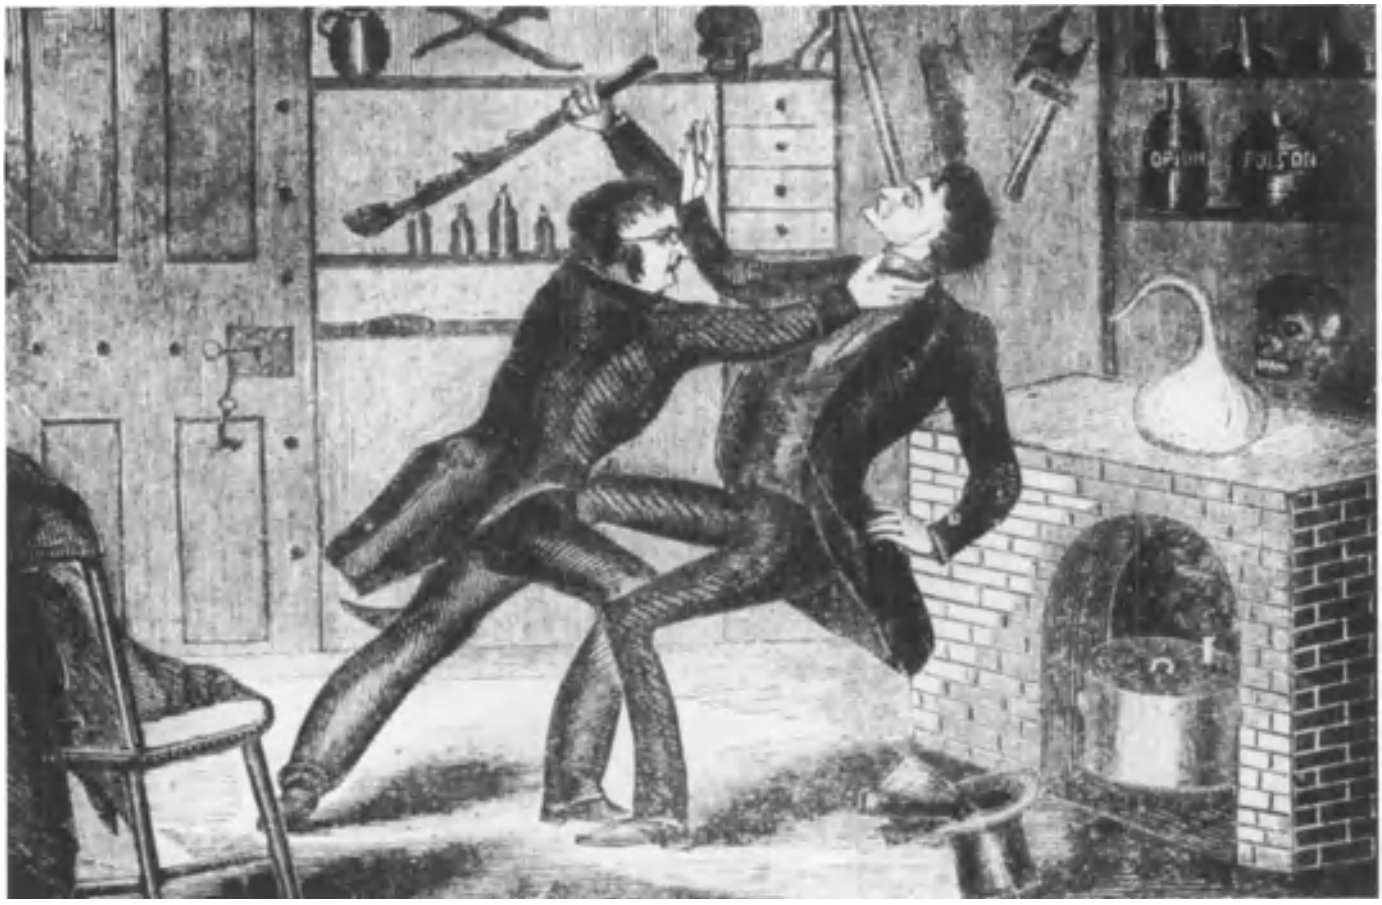
Dr. George Parkman, a money-lending skinflint, who dunned Webster for the return of his $400 loan.

Parkman, a colleague of Webster's who donated the land upon which the Massachusetts Medical School



The Massachusetts Medical College at Harvard University, where Dr. Webster taught and where, in his laboratory, he murdered Dr. Parkman.

nia, but the telling blow had smashed Parkman's skull and killed him. Reflecting on Parkman's angry denunciations months later, Webster wrote: "I was excited by them to the highest degree of passion." Fearful of the consequences, Webster decided to use his medical skills to dispose of the body. After locking the office doors, he hauled the body into his washroom and cut it into pieces. The college janitor, Ephraim Littlefield, had witnessed an earlier argument between the two men and had seen Parkman arrive earlier that afternoon, obviously angry. The door to Webster's office and the door to an adjoining office were locked. Littlefield touched the wall that backed Webster's assay furnace and found it hot. Even as Littlefield stood wondering what Webster was doing, the doctor was busy burning Parkman's severed head.

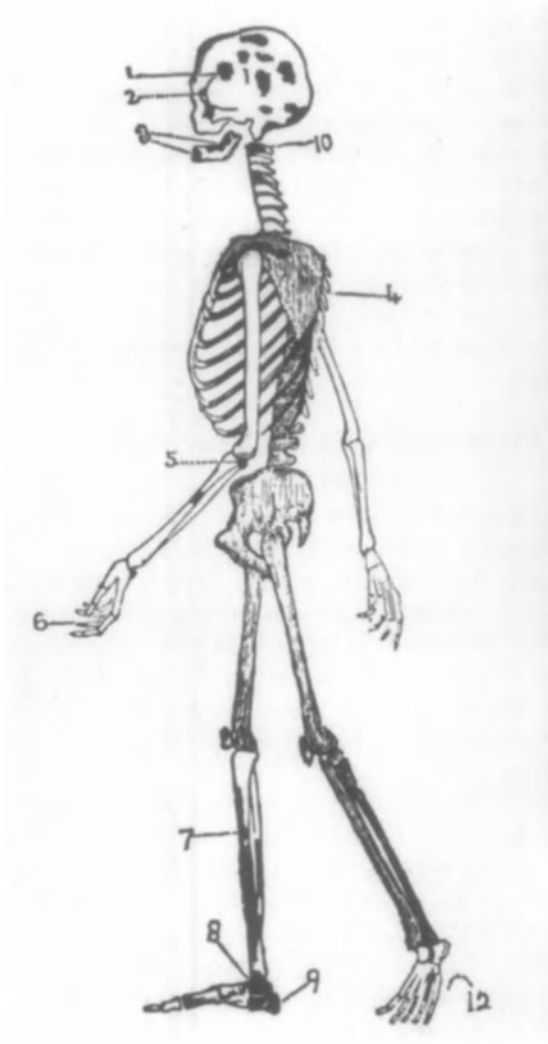


Dr. Webster shown beating Dr. Parkman to death with a piece of kindling in his medical laboratory on November 23, 1849; he then dissected the body and attempted to burn the remains in his furnace.

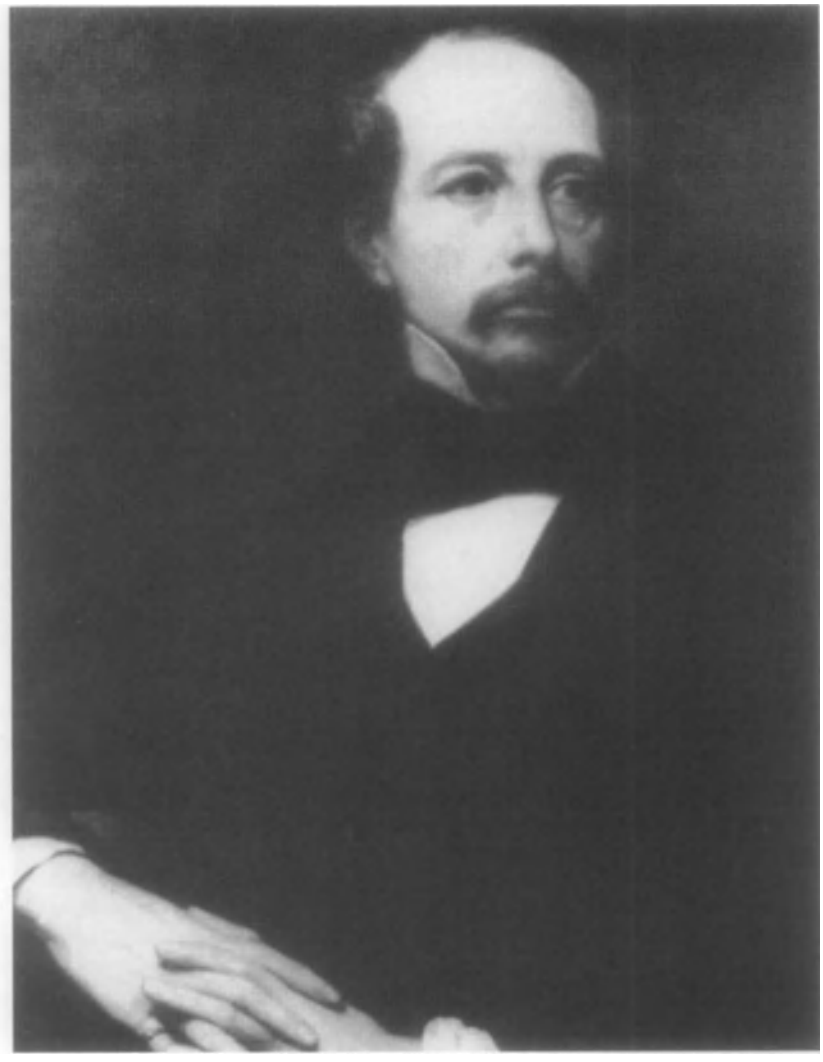
Webster disposed of most of the body parts, but, ever the academic, kept a few bones as specimens for teaching and research, grim artifacts later used in securing his conviction. Three days after Parkman's murder, a $3,000 reward was offered for the safe return of the missing Parkman, the reward posted by Parkman's brother-in-law, Robert Gould Shaw. Rumors to the effect that the good doctor had been abducted by a kidnapping gang and was to be held for ransom circulated through town. Spurred on by the promise of a sizeable reward, most of Boston's inhabitants turned out to search for the missing man. The tenement districts were invaded by search parties, and every suspicious character and drunkard was taken in for questioning.

An Irish immigrant who was found with $20 in his pocket became a suspect, but he was released after some questioning. Littlefield, the snooping janitor, however, conducted his own investigation. He tried to gain access to Webster's dissection vault, but found that the chamber was securely locked. The janitor spent the next two days tearing apart the wall that covered up Webster's bloody deed. Finally, Littlefield broke into the locked vault. He found a bloody pelvis and parts of a leg, and immediately contacted the police.

A diligent police investigation uncovered more of Parkman's body parts and Webster was arrested and charged with the murder. When en route to jail he tried to commit suicide by taking strychnine, but vomited the poison before it had any effect. His trial received tremendous public attention. By not allowing any of the spectators to sit in the gallery longer than five minutes, more than 60,000 spectators witnessed the trial. Many of them had come from as far as New Orleans. Webster, who pleaded that he had not intended to commit the murder, but was only acting from uncontrolled anger, was convicted and sentenced to death. The jury was convinced of his guilt, believing he had committed premeditated murder because he had dissected the body, and then tried to conceal it from view.



A reconstructed skeleton of Parkman's body; numbered bones were retrieved from Webster's furnace.



British author Charles Dickens, who, upon his arrival at Boston, asked to see "the room where Dr. Parkman was murdered."

Webster was hanged in August 1850. A letter written shortly after Webster's execution reveals the extent of the horror that was felt by the residents of this genteel New England community. It read in part: " ... the terrible Cambridge tragedy still seems to darken our sky though it is a great comfort to know the poor doctor seemed to die penitent. He wrote a letter to Dr. Parkhurst (the Reverend) entreating that some softer feelings might at least be recovered towards his family, that his wife and children were wholly innocent, and that she had often expressed her gratitude to him for his (the Reverend's) help in her spiritual culture. I hear she is tranquil, but what their plans are I know not."

The Parkman murder remained a lively topic of discussion for years, much to the embarrassment and chagrin of his socially connected family. Twenty years after the murder the celebrated British novelist Charles Dickens visited the city. When asked which tourist attraction he most wanted to see, Dickens replied: "The room where Dr. Parkman was murdered."

THE MURDERING "COUNT" PRADO/ January 15, 1886

An articulate Frenchman and self-styled nobleman of questionable origins, "Count" Louis Prado (AKA: Linska de Castillon, Pranzini, the American) was known for attracting wildly different types of women. He never divulged his familial background in any detail, though he reportedly was the son of the president of a South American country. Prado's luck as a criminal wore out at the same time as his skills with women. He would have gotten away with murder if he had not offended two mistresses who were arrested in connection with a robbery he committed.

Paris police were unable to catch the killer of Marie Agaetan, found with her head almost severed by a razor in her apartment in the Rue Caumartin on January 15, 1886. Many people were arrested for the murder, but all were released due to lack of evidence. The Agaetan case might have been placed on the permanently unsolved list if not for a robbery committed by Prado on November 28, 1887, one in which he tried to steal diamonds from a room at the Hotel du Palais in Paris, but was thwarted by a hotel employee. He fired two bullets at police chasing him, gravely wounding one, and was arrested for attempted murder.

Murderer Louis Prado was captured by Paris police during a robbery; he was executed in 1888.

Several weeks later, Prado's two mistresses, Eugenie Forestier, twenty-seven, and Mauricette Couronneau, the mother of his child, were arrested for holding some jewelry stolen from a shop at Royan, these jewels having been bestowed upon the unwitting females as gifts from Prado, who had served four months' imprisonment for theft in 1883. The humiliation of her arrest so angered Forestier that she turned state's evidence against her former paramour in connection with the murder of Agaetan.

Like the murderer Dr. Karl Pranzini, with whom he is often compared, and whose last name he even used as an alias, Prado all but confessed his guilt to his mistress the night he committed the murder. Prosecuted from November 5 to November 14, 1888 at the Paris Assizes, Prado's eloquence was ineffective against his mistress' testimony. Forestier recalled how he repeatedly got up to wash his hands during the night of January 14, 1888—the night of the Agaetan murder—to destroy his bloodstained clothing, throw out a razor, and give her a 100-franc note apparently cut with a razor.

"Dr." Karl Pranzini, who murdered a woman and her daughter in Paris during an 1887 robbery (he was guillotined that year); Prado often used Pranzini's name as an alias.

Other witnesses confirmed that Prado, tried under what he said was his real name, Linska de Castillon, was the man seen with Agaetan the night she was slain. Prado's faithful Spanish wife, herself in possession of jewels stolen in Royan, supported her husband even after meeting his mistresses. Her one-sided fidelity was not enough, however, and Prado, thirty-four, was found guilty of murder and executed December 28, 1888. The mistresses were acquitted.

THE KNICKERBOCKER CLUB MURDERS/ 1898

Handsome, debonair playboy Roland Burnham Molineux (1868-1917) was a Yankee blueblood whose father, General Edward Leslie Molineux, distinguished himself in the Civil War. The son frequented the prestigious Knickerbocker Athletic Club on East Forty-Fifth Street, New York City, and was well known to its board of directors as a gadfly. Molineux continually harassed the club managers to cancel memberships of people he didn't like or those he thought to be his social inferiors.

In matters of the heart, Molineux was also persistent. In the fall of 1898, Henry C. Barnet, a wealthy produce broker who was also a member of the Knickerbocker Club, was courting Blanche Cheeseborough, an attractive young woman who had also attracted Molineux's covetous eye. Barnet received a box of Kutnow's Stomach Powder, a popular patent medicine, through the mail. Although he had not ordered it and did not know who the sender was, Barnet ingested the contents of the package and became deathly ill. His physician was of the opinion that something other than the powder had brought on the illness. But before he died, Henry Barnet blamed the powder and called himself a "damned fool" for accepting medicines sent through the postal system. The cause of death was listed as the aftereffects of diphtheria. Eleven days later Blanche Cheeseborough married Molineux.

The handsome New York playboy-killer, Roland Burnham Molineux (shown in work-out clothes), who poisoned rivals and those he thought unfit to be members of his Knickerbocker Athletic Club.

New York's prestigious Knickerbocker Athletic Club, which became the center of a number of poisonings in 1898.

Harry Cornish, the club's athletic director, angered Molineux, who sent him a bottle of "patent medicine," laced with cyanide, but Cornish's aunt took the medicine instead and died.

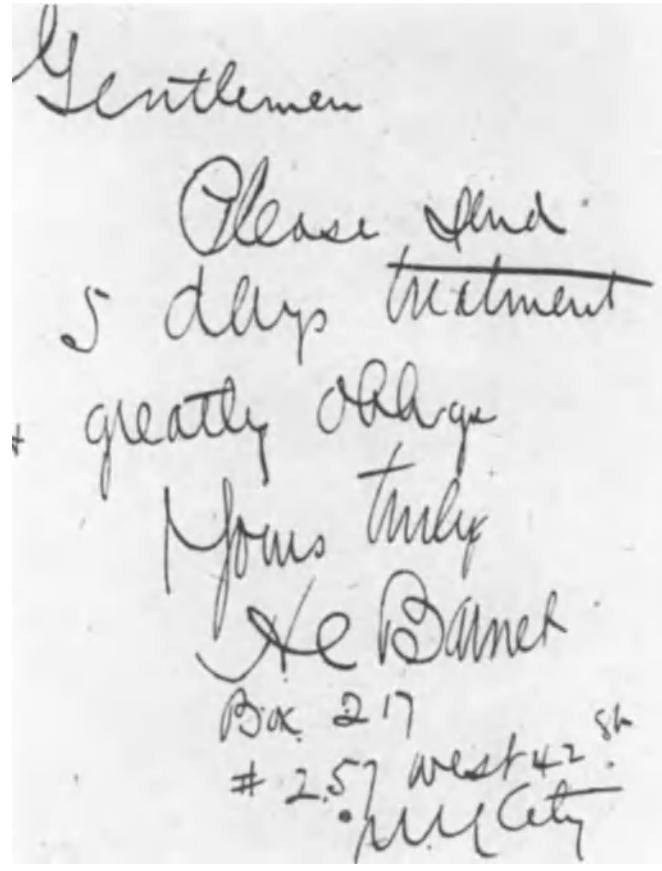
On December 23, 1898, Knickerbocker Club athletic director Harry Cornish received in his mail a small box containing a bottle of headache remedy and a silver toothpick holder. Cornish took it as a practical joke. The bottle was obviously a humorous warning not to overdrink on the holidays. Cornish gave the bottle to his aunt, Katharine Adams, saying he had no use for it. On December 28, 1898, the woman complained of a severe headache. Cornish suggested she try a teaspoon of the remedy mixed with water. Mrs. Adams complained of the medicine's bitterness and within moments fell to the floor in convulsions and died. Cornish, who had sampled the potion, also became sick.

An autopsy report showed that Adams died from cyanide poisoning. The Knickerbocker Club's doctor, having remembered Cornish's story about the gift bottle, went to Cornish's home and analyzed the bottle's contents. It contained a lethal amount of cyanide of mercury. The police were immediately called. The toothpick holder, it was determined, came from Hartdegen's jewelry store in Newark, New Jersey, and had been sold on December 21, 1898 to a man asking for a suitable bottle to add to a lady's dressing table. A wigmaker told police he had sold a red wig on December 21, 1898 to a man bearing a striking resemblance to Molineux. Next, the police found out that the killer had rented two postal boxes, one to receive mail for "H. Cornish," and one for "H.C. Barnet." The press checked the mailing lists of several patent medicine companies. A Cincinnati firm reported that they had sold two boxes of Kutnow's Powder to an "H.C. Barnet" and "H. Cornish" on December 21, 1898. The handwriting was nearly identical to the lettering on the package sent to Cornish. Subsequently, Molineux was identified as the individual who had rented the postal boxes.

Molineux was arrested and charged with poisoning Mrs. Adams. His trial lasted from November 14, 1899, to February 11, 1900. The murder motive, Assistant District Attorney James W. Osborne explained, came from the personal enmity Molineux harbored against Cornish. On more than one occasion he threatened to quit the club unless Cornish was fired as athletic director. The details of Molineux's profligate life-style made sensational reading. A New Jersey woman named Mary Melando told the court that the defendant had seduced her at the age of thirteen, and then shared living quarters with her. Though she did not wish to testify against Molineux in court, Melando admitted that some stationary submitted in evidence against him was the same type she had found in the drawer of his desk.

The jury considered all the evidence and, after an eight-hour deliberation, Molineux was found guilty. Three weeks later, he was sentenced to death and was sent to Sing Sing to await execution. For the next eight months he remained on death row, while his attorneys argued for a new trial. During this time, he wrote a memoir of prison life titled The Room with the Little Door, which became a critical success in the literary world. On October 15, 1901, the higher court set aside



Gentlemen
Please send
5 days treatment
+ greatly oblige
Yours truly
H.C. Barnet
Box 217
257 West 42 St.
City

A forged letter written by Molineux (he used the name of one of his victims, Henry C. Barnet), requesting patent medicine, which the killer dosed with cyanide; this letter and others were later used in court to convict Molineux of the Knickerbocker Club murders.

the judgment and ordered a new trial on the grounds that the testimony concerning Barnet was inadmissible.

The second trial commenced in 1902, and this time Molineux returned to court with a new lawyer and public opinion decidedly in his favor. The long months of incarceration won him much sympathy, and attorney Frank C. Black, a former governor of New York, succeeded in producing handwriting experts who refuted the testimony given in the first trial. Black also contended that Cornish had murdered Mrs. Adams in order to court her daughter. The jury returned a verdict of not guilty. Molineux's celebrity status landed him a job with several newspapers, and theatrical impresario David Belasco produced one of his plays. In 1913, following his divorce from Blanche and subsequent remarriage, Roland Molineux was committed to an insane asylum for what was ostensibly called a "nervous breakdown." He died in the King's Park State Hospital on November 2, 1917. "Couldn't make much sense of him," commented an attendant at the hospital. "He raved a lot about poisons and a 'better class of people.'"

"HE DIED OF BAKED BANANAS"/ September 23, 1900

William Marsh Rice was an enterprising New Englander who left his home in Springfield, Massachusetts in the 1830s to seek his fortune in Houston, Texas, then a raw frontier town, which held great promise for men of vision and destiny. Rice quickly proved that he was such a man. He made a fortune in land speculation, retail merchandising, and oil. He developed large portions of the Southwest, owning entire blocks of real estate in Texas, Georgia, Louisiana, and Oklahoma.

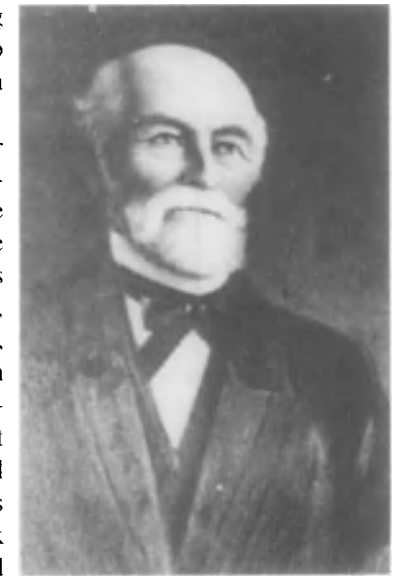
Though he was enormously wealthy, Rice had no children to inherit his great fortune. He lived with his second wife Elizabeth in a pretentious mansion in Dunellen, New Jersey. After she passed away in July 1896, the aging widower moved to New York City, where he took up residence in the Berkshire Apartments, a radical departure from the ostentatious lifestyle he had led in New Jersey. Rice' constant companion during these years was his 23-year-old secretary Charles F. Jones, whom he met at the Capital Hotel in Houston, one of the many properties he owned in the Lone Star state.

Jones, who had worked as a clerk at the hotel store, accompanied Rice to New York in May 1897, serving as secretary, valet, and devoted servant. They lived a simple life, receiving few callers, while going about their business quietly. Seemingly content in old age, Rice was tormented by one major problem. His late wife had left behind a will bequeathing a large chunk of the Rice fortune to her relatives, under the terms of the Texas community law, which stated that the husband and wife were equal partners even though the assets were in the name of the husband. Rice maintained that he had been a resident of New York since 1865, though business concerns drew him back to Texas in 1893.

Shortly before his wife's death, Rice brought a suit against O.T. Holt, executor of the estate in an effort to have the will declared null and void. He was adamant in this matter, for the old man desired to leave behind a legacy "for the good of mankind." In 1891, he incorporated under Texas law the not-for-profit "Rice Institute," which was designed to advance the arts, science, and literature. In 1893 and again in 1896 he drafted wills naming the Rice Institute as residuary legatee, which accounted for about fifteen-sixteenths of his entire estate.

In 1899, with matters at an impasse, Holt enlisted the aid of Albert T. Patrick, a 34-year-old Texas lawyer whose shady dealings nearly resulted in disbarment proceedings brought against him. Patrick moved to New York to avoid any unpleasantness, but in the process he created some of his own. The lawyer interviewed a score of acquaintances in a vain attempt to prove that Rice was actually a New York resident. In the process he hit upon a novel scheme. In November 1899, Patrick dropped by the Berkshire apartments to pay a social call on the impressionable Jones.

Patrick introduced himself as Mr. Smith, a cotton buyer from Texas who was eager to transact some business with Rice. Since it was late at night, Jones informed the stranger that his employer could not be disturbed. Patrick nodded. He wasn't really interested in meeting William Marsh Rice, but was more interested in cultivating Jones, the one man who could help him realize a fortune.



Texas tycoon William Marsh Rice, murdered for his millions in 1900.

Patrick returned later to confess his true identity. He explained that he had been acting on the behest of Elizabeth's heirs. What he proposed, at least on the surface, appeared to be a foolish plan. If the $55-dollar-a-week secretary could draft a letter on Rice's personal stationery admitting his Texas residency, Patrick would then have the old man sign it himself. In return, the gullible Jones was promised a $250 honorarium. Jones agreed and prepared the document to Patrick's specifications. But when the lawyer was slow in handing over the money, Jones slipped it into the drawer. "No money, no letter," Jones told Patrick.

Patrick's greatest skill was persuading people to his way of thinking. He was an effusive, self-assured man who inspired confidence in others. It wasn't long before he had convinced Jones to show him a copy of the 1896 will with the promise of more money yet to come. Patrick then drafted a will suitable to the interests of his clients. By the terms of the new will, Rice would leave half of his estate to Albert Patrick, named as sole executor. The remainder would go to the relatives with only a small portion earmarked for the Rice Institute. "I want you to type this on Mr. Rice's typewriter and using his stationery," Patrick told Jones. "I'll make sure it's witnessed and signed." In return for his agreement to appear on the witness stand and testify to the legitimacy of the will, Jones was promised that he would receive a handsome sum of money. One lingering problem which Patrick was unable to address concerned Rice himself. Why would he sign a document so detrimental to his own interests? Patrick had already answered that question in his own mind: he would murder the millionaire.

Patrick diligently drafted a will that bequeathed $10,000 a year to Rice Institute for as long as the old man should live, and as an added gesture of "good will" it was decided to set aside $5,000 for the construction of a monument to tower above the old man's grave. Albert Patrick used a bottle of ink from Rice's own desk to replicate Rice's signature on several bank drafts, which were then cashed. The new will was completed on June 30, 1900. It was witnessed by two of Patrick's office employees: David L. Short and Morris Meyers. Short was introduced to Rice as the commissioner of deeds for the State of Texas, and very sympathetic to the old man's plight. These two men functioned as "plants" whose sole purpose was to establish Patrick's close ties to Rice.

In August, Patrick dropped by to see Jones. He inquired about the old man's health, adding: "Don't you think Rice is living too long for our interest?"

"It does seem that way," Jones replied, suggesting that Dr. Walter Curry, Patrick's long-time friend might be enlisted to the cause. "He wouldn't do a thing of that kind!" Patrick intoned. "There must be some simple measure we can take." Jones suggested chloroform. He had read in a magazine that it was virtually impossible to detect the drug in an autopsy. Jones agreed to procure the substance. He sent $5 to his brother in Texas for a bottle containing four ounces of chloroform. Patrick instructed his young friend to start administering mercury tablets to Rice in order "to break him down." On Sept. 1, 1900, the trusted valet started giving Rice two mercury tablets a day until he began suffering the ravages of diarrhea. Patrick stepped up the dosage until Rice's condition began to worsen.

Charles F. Jones, the gullible young assistant to Rice, who was manipulated into murder.

About two weeks later a lady friend of Rice's, Mrs. Van Alstyne visited her ailing friend and advised him to eat nine bananas to unclog his stomach. Jones then gave him some more mercury. Albert Patrick would ruefully recall: "It was silly to have given him the mercury pills. If he had been left alone he might have died from eating the bananas."

On September 23, 1900, Jones supplied the coup-de-grace. Slipping into Rice's bedroom late that night, Jones constructed a "cone," which he fashioned from some towels and placed this over the sleeping man's face. He dropped a sponge soaked with chloroform into it, gradually increasing the quantity. A half-hour later he conveyed the news to Patrick by telephone: "Mr. Rice is very ill," meaning that Rice was dead. Dr. Curry was summoned and he signed the death certificate in the following manner: "Cause of death: old age and weak heart; immediate causes indigestion, followed by diarrhea and mental worry." Patrick issued instructions that Rice be cremated right away. A forged cremation letter was handed to John S. Potter, the embalmer.

The letter might have served its purpose if Patrick had shown some discretion. But the next morning he sent David L. Short to the bank to cash a $25,000 check "endorsed" by Rice. The clerk at the banking house of S.M. Swenson and Sons examined the signature on the check and grew suspicious. He couldn't help but noticing that the name of the payee on the face of the check was "Abert T. Patrick." But the endorsement was signed "Albert T. Patrick." A second bank clerk named Walter O. Weatherbee said that the check required a proper endorsement in order to be cashed. Bank Manager Eric T. Swenson attempted to phone Mr. Rice, but Jones explained that the check was good, and was consistent with the old man's instructions. Swenson was still suspicious. Pressed for a further explanation, Jones admitted that his employer had died.

Patrick appeared at the bank to inform Swenson that he held a $65,000 check that had been signed by Rice, and all of his securities and bonds. He curtly informed the bank proprietor that the body was being cremated the next day.

Swenson then asked: "What did Mr. Rice die of?"

Albert T. Patrick (right), the scheming attorney, who arranged through Charles Jones to kill Rice and acquire his millions through a forged will.

Without a moment of hesitation, Patrick replied: "He died of baked bananas."

"What? Bananas? Patrick explained that Rice's friend, Mrs. Van Alstyne had suggested that Rice eat baked bananas to relieve his diarrhea. "He got nine of them and ate them, and I believe that is what killed him."

By now Swenson suspected treachery. He contacted the New York District Attorney and the city Detective Bureau, which launched an immediate investigation. It was only then that the relatives learned about Rice's untimely death. An autopsy revealed that Mr. Rice had expired from congestion, caused by a "gas or vapor." On October 4, 1900, Jones and Patrick were arrested on forgery charges and were incarcerated in the Tombs. Turning to his young henchman Patrick said: "it's over boy."

"What can we do?" Jones asked.

"I suggest that you commit suicide," Patrick replied. Patrick was bailed out three months later, but was rearrested and charged with murder after Jones confessed the plot to the District Attorney.

Charles Jones was offered a deal. In return for his cooperation the prosecution agreed to drop all pending charges against him. Jones readily agreed, supplying all the damaging evidence when the trial convened on January 22, 1902. Patrick entered a not guilty plea, accusing his one-time partner of being "an incredible liar." The balding lawyer conducted his own defense, but he was unable to shake the testimony of the experts, who stated that the signatures on the Rice bank checks were definite forgeries, shown by the "breaks in continuity and pen lifts." The jury retired on March 26, 1902. After a brief deliberation Patrick was convicted of murder and sentenced to death in the electric chair by Judge John William Goff, who later went on to become a justice of the Supreme Court. Jones, the actual killer, was freed. He returned to Texas and dropped out of sight. Patrick however, continued to fight to have his conviction overturned.

Using money supplied by his millionaire brother-in-law John T. Milliken, Patrick succeeded in winning a new trial from members of the state legislature. However the governor vetoed the idea. The matter was taken before the U.S. Supreme Court which denied Patrick's appeal. Before the sentence of death could be carried out, however, Governor Frank Higgins commuted the sentence to life imprisonment. The decision was roundly criticized by the media. Edmund Pearson commented in the New York Tribune that: "if he got out, he would be invaluable as a counselor to tell murderers how to escape." Patrick's legal wranglings continued until November 28, 1912, when Governor John Dix granted him an unconditional pardon on the grounds that "the hostile atmosphere which surrounded the defendant when he was tried precluded a fair trial."

Dix cited a 1910 report issued by the Medico-Legal Society of New York, which concluded that Rice could not have died from chloroform poisoning judging by the condition of the lungs at the time of the autopsy. It was alleged at the time that Milliken offered to deposit $100,000 in any financial institution the governor so desired. He vowed to forfeit the money to charity if his brother-in-law failed to prove his innocence within a year of release. Patrick walked out of Sing Sing a free man about the same time that the Rice Institute opened its doors to its first students. He retired to the Southwest to practice law. Patrick died some years later without making good on his brother-in-law's boastful claim.

The legacy of William Marsh Rice endures on the campus of the liberal arts university in Houston bearing his name. If Albert Patrick's scheme had been carried out to the fullest extent, it is unlikely that the school would have become a reality. Instead, a $5,000 marker would be the only testament to the vision of this great philanthropist, who is remembered in a bronze statue of his likeness that towers in the center of the Academic Court of the Rice Institute.

THE ERRANT COLONEL GRIFFITH/1903

Like William Marsh Rice, Colonel Griffith J. Griffith (1852-1919) was a most generous philanthropist. During his lifetime, he gave Los Angeles, California, two of its greatest landmarks, the 4,100-acre Griffith Park, complete with the copper-roofed Griffith Park Observatory, and the Greek Theater, still one of the most exceptional outdoor amphitheaters in the U.S. But there was a darker side to Griffith, as well, a side shaded by his excessive abuse of alcohol.

His chronic drinking caused Griffith to have delusions, the most prominent of which was that his wife, Christina Griffith, was trying to poison him. This hallucination grew, in part, out of Griffith's hatred for the Roman Catholic Church. Christina Griffith was involved in several community activities associated with the church and in his liquor-damaged mind, Griffith thought that after his wife killed him, the Catholic Church would attempt to take the fortune he had built in real estate. In his mind, Griffith plotted ways to head off this imagined intention.

Griffith's "counter-scheme" was carried out one summer day in 1903 while he and Christina were vacationing at the Arcadia Hotel in Santa Monica, California. In their suite, he handed his wife a prayer book, ordered her to kneel and pray, and took out a pistol. As she pleaded for mercy, he began to read a series of questions regarding her loyalty to him and her alleged plot to poison him.

"Oh Papa, you know I have always been true to you!" she tearfully insisted.

Griffith ignored her pleadings. He placed the gun to his wife's temple, but as he pulled the trigger, she jerked her head away. The bullet destroyed her left eye.

Wounded and fearing for her life, Christina jumped out of the hotel room window and fell two stories onto a veranda.

Colonel Griffith J. Griffith (who donated Griffith Park to Los Angeles), shot out his wife's left eye in an attempt to kill her in 1903.

breaking her leg. She limped away and found help. When Griffith was located, he insisted that she had shot herself with his pistol.

The city of Los Angeles, acknowledging Griffith's high standing and valuable patronage, was prepared to ignore what they determined was simply a "domestic squabble," but Mrs. Griffith's family was bent on pressing charges. These relatives hired a team of accomplished prosecutors, led by former California Governor Henry T. Gage. Griffith's counsel was the famous, highly successful defense attorney, Earl Rogers. Rogers was well-versed in an emerging field called "psychiatry," and his plan was to call for a defense of insanity due to alcohol abuse.

Early in the proceedings, Rogers created an uproar by demanding a continuance to give him time to effectively defend his client. He then suddenly withdrew the continuance on the first day of the trial. The prosecutors were caught off guard; they had devoted all their time to gathering evidence to reject Rogers' continuance plea and had not further organized their strategy.

The jury eventually found Griffith guilty of assault with intent to murder. He was sentenced to two years in prison and released on good behavior after serving one. He died in 1919. Although his defense probably eased Griffith's sentence, Rogers took the loss hard, and was rumored to have flirted with suicide for some time after the trial. He died, destitute and alone, in a Southern California rooming house in 1922.

PERILS OF A FLORADORA GIRL/June 4, 1904

On June 4, 1904, New Yorkers out for a morning stroll on West Broadway near Franklin Street were jarred by the sharp sound of a gunshot coming from a passing hansom cab. Without so much as looking through the trap in the top of the cab to check on his passengers, the driver drove swiftly to the nearest pharmacy. Passersby who rushed to the aid of the cab's occupants found a dying man and a grieving woman inside. Recognizing the gravity of the victim's wound, the driver proceeded to the Hudson Street Hospital, where Francis Thomas "Caesar" Young was declared dead on arrival, the result of a bullet wound in his chest.

As the facts of the shooting were revealed, the public learned that Young, a well-known gambler and man about town, had been conducting a secret affair with attractive Nan Randolph Patterson, the cab's other occupant. The 22-year-old Patterson, was a member of the road company of the popular Floradora review. She came from a well-respected family, her father being the supervising architect at the U.S. Treasury. Following a disastrous marriage to a teenaged beau that ended in divorce, Patterson became a Broadway showgirl, joining the Floradora troupe.

It was not uncommon for the "Floradora Girls" to find wealthy husbands from among the fawning admirers along the "Great White Way" of Broadway. The New York theatre world was a happy escape for many young dandies and rich society gentlemen, who were locked in troubled or mundane Nan Patterson (second from right) when she appeared with the famous Floradora Sextette in New York; these chorus girls were much-sought by social lions and millionaires.

An artist's rendering of how Nan Patterson shot and killed her lover, Caesar Young, a married gambler who jilted her, while the couple rode in a hansom cab on June 4, 1904.

Another artist's rendering shows how Caesar Young awkwardly and improbably shot himself to death (according to the path of the lethal bullet), while Nan Patterson sat next to him.

marriages. Men of financial means often sought an after hours tete-a-tete with winsome chorines, and this was Caesar Young's intention when meeting the fetching Nan Patterson in 1902.

Young was an amateur athlete in his early days in England. After settling in America, he became a racetrack gambler. He had an uncanny ability to pick winning horses, and developed a reputation of being a fair judge of talent in breeding race ponies. Young had been married for ten years when he met Patterson on board a train bound for California. The two carried on their affair publicly, with little regard for the rigid social proprieties of the day.

Caesar Young attempted to placate both his mistress and his wife, sometimes keeping them in separate hotels in New York City. He juggled his social calendar precariously, spending days with his wife and nights with Patterson. Patterson reportedly campaigned hard and long to have Young divorce his wife and marry her, once even feigning pregnancy. Young, however, was unwilling or unable to leave his wife. When the pressure got to be too great for him, he offered to pay Patterson's passage to Europe. She refused, and Young and his wife booked passage instead. The voyage was apparently intended to break Patterson's hold on Young and renew the bonds of his marriage.

On June 3, 1904, the night before the Youngs were to sail to Europe on board the Germanic, Young and Patterson spent the evening together. They drank and argued into the early hours of the morning. Patterson pressed Young to leave his wife. Witnesses to their conversation that evening claimed that Young had called Patterson insulting names and had thrown $100 at her. "I never want to see you again," he was heard to shout in a Manhattan restaurant. Patterson, in turn, warned that Young would not be able to escape her fury.

Despite this threatening encounter, Young met Patterson early the next morning. He left the hotel room he was sharing with his wife around 7 a.m., telling her he was going out to buy a new hat and get a shave, and promising to meet her at the dock before the ship's 9:30 a.m. departure time. He met his estranged lover near Columbus Circle, where they repaired to a tavern for a brandy and whiskey breakfast, then rode together in the hansom cab.

When the hansom arrived at the hospital after the shooting, a gun, still warm from being fired, was found in Young's coat pocket. Patterson claimed that he had shot himself in the chest because he was despondent about leaving her. "Caesar, Caesar, why did you do this?" Nan sobbed. It seemed unlikely to the police that if Young had shot himself, he would have carefully placed the gun back in his pocket. Despite her protestations of innocence, Patterson was formally charged with Young's murder and put on trial in November 1904 at the old Felony Court on Lower Broadway.

Nan Patterson, shown passively responding to a harassing Assistant District Attorney, William Rand, in one of her three grueling trials, emerged victorious, finally being set free in 1905.

Patterson was defended by the pugnacious Abraham Levy, a veteran of more than 300 homicide cases. He was opposed by Assistant District Attorney William Rand, who hammered away at the defense's contention that Young was a suicide victim. The direction of the bullet's entry and the powder burns made it impossible for Caesar Young to have fired the shot, Rand insisted. The canny Levy appealed to the sympathy of the jury, making exaggerated references to Nan's brokenhearted father (who looked and played the part well) throughout the weeks of testimony.

Nan stuck to her story throughout the trial. Attorney Levy implored the jury to believe that Caesar Young had met her in Columbus Circle to beg her forgiveness and shot himself in desperation when she refused to give it. "Do you believe that this empty, frivolous, if you like, pleasure-loving girl could conceive the plot that would permit her at one second to kill and in the next cover this act by a subtle invention?" Levy said to the jury. Rand found it difficult to win a conviction from an all-male jury against so charming a defendant.

When a juror became seriously ill during the deliberations, a mistrial was declared. Undaunted, Rand pursued the matter further. The second trial, which began in December, ended with a hung jury. When the third trial ended on May 3, 1905 with yet another deadlocked jury, the judge ordered all charges against Nan Patterson dropped. The outcome of the case pleased her many admirers, who cheered her as she left the courtroom.

Patterson celebrated her freedom by getting drunk. Her liberation was such a popular cause that a children's ditty grew out of it: "Nan is free, Nan is free,/She escaped the electric chair,/Now she's out in the open air." Nan Patterson was unable to capitalize on her new-found notoriety. She was given star billing in several popular musicals, including a Pennsylvania production of the Lulu Girls, but theatrical offers diminished after it was quickly learned that she had little or no talent for the stage. After remarrying (and later divorcing) her first husband, Nan Patterson faded from public view, remembered as a titillating curiosity of that much-gilded Edwardian era.

Heir to a Pittsburgh coke fortune, playboy Harry K. Thaw was kicked out of Harvard for gambling, then took a suite of rooms in a New York whorehouse.

Evelyn Nesbit in the days when she was a model for artists and photographers.

"THIS MAN RUINED MY WIFE!"/June 25, 1906

Few murders among America's social elite and super rich rivaled the sensational 1906 murder of architect Stanford White by the demented millionaire Harry Kendall Thaw (AKA: John Smith, 1872-1947). The slaying of White was a public affair, committed in front of hundreds of horrified spectators. Thaw performed this deed with arrogance and disdain, as if dismissing an annoying servant or an unwanted party guest. Thaw was used to having his own way since childhood, and as far as he was concerned, his killing of Stanford White, ostensibly over an affair with Thaw's beautiful wife, Evelyn, was merely a nasty chore he was compelled to perform. Ironically, his wife, the former Evelyn Nesbit, had been, like Nan Patterson, a member of the Floradora Sextette.

The pampered Thaw was the son of a Pittsburgh magnate who had cornered the coke market in a short time and had accumulated a then staggering fortune of $40 million. Harry Thaw was the profligate heir to this fortune. Terribly spoiled by an overindulgent mother, Thaw's education was a shambles, although he was sent to the finest schools, including Harvard, where he ignored his studies and spent most of his time conducting high-stake poker games in his suite of rooms off campus. He was finally dismissed for gambling activities. Thaw's father was so vexed at his son's wastrel ways he reduced his allowance to $2,000 a year. Thaw whined and carped until his mother awarded him an additional $8,000 a year. Still the headstrong Thaw complained that this was only pin money for a man of his esteem and standing.

Taking a lavish suite of rooms in Manhattan, Thaw attempted to buy his way into several prominent men's clubs, but he was barred because of his eccentricities. Incensed, Thaw rented a horse and tried to ride it into these clubs, knocking down doormen and porters. He was arrested and escorted home. His mother paid his fine. A short time later, Thaw participated in a marathon poker game with New York sharpers and lost $40,000. His mother paid the gambling debt.

To vent his wild rages and satiate his sexual perversions, Thaw took another apartment inside one of New York's fanciest bordellos. There he brought young, gullible women, promising them careers on Broadway or, at least, in the chorus lines of important musicals. After Thaw inveigled the women to his brothel apartment, he fiendishly attacked them, raping them and beating them with sticks and whips.

The bordello madam, Susan Merrill, later stated that she heard a woman screaming in Thaw's apartment and when she could bear it no longer, forced her way inside. She later testified: "I rushed into his rooms. He had tied the girl to the bed, Evelyn Nesbit as a chorus girl, playing the role of a singing peasant; White spotted her in the chorus and began dating her, making her his mistress and lavishing riches upon her while he kept her in luxurious style.

Famous and wealthy, architect Stanford White was noted for designing many New York monuments and mansions; at night he lived the life of a rajah, taking his pick of Broadway beauties, including the ravishing Evelyn Nesbit.

naked, and was whipping her. She was covered with welts. Thaw's eyes protruded and he looked mad."

Merrill ordered Thaw out of the house, and when he refused, she called the police. The millionaire playboy was escorted from the brothel despite his protests that he had paid rent a year in advance. He was barred from the brothel and Madam Merrill was happy to repay him his advance rent. A short time later, Thaw was ejected from one of the finer Fifth Avenue shops.

The sales manager refused to have his models show the latest gowns to a bevy of Broadway tarts Thaw paraded into the emporium. At this point Thaw had what was later described as a "sort of fit. His eyes bulged and rolled, and he screamed like a child having a tantrum." Police escorted the playboy outside and sent him home; the whores were locked up. In retaliation, Thaw rented a car the next day and drove it through the shop's display window, almost running over the gaping manager. Thaw was again arrested and fined.

Mrs. Thaw advised her son to leave Manhattan and take a European vacation. Thaw sailed for Paris where he scandalized a city that was weaned on scandal. He rented an entire floor of the Georges V Hotel and invited the city's leading prostitutes to a party that lasted several days and cost him $50,000. He was finally asked to leave the hotel after he was discovered whipping naked women down the hotel corridors.

Another product of Pittsburgh at that time was a 16-year-old sultry brunette, Evelyn Nesbit. She came from poverty and had little formal education, but she had singing and dancing talent and, after being a photographer's model for a short period of time, soon won a spot in the prestigious Floradora Sextette. While performing in the Floradora chorus, she caught the lecherous eye of Stanford White, the most distinguished architect in New York. White, who was tall and heavyset, weighing some 250 pounds, wore a sweeping handlebar mustache and was always sartorially dressed, glittering with a diamond stickpin, gold watch chain, an expensive jewel-encrusted watch fob, and rings.

White was many times a millionaire, having made a fortune designing the resplendent Fifth Avenue mansions of New York's wealthiest movers and shakers. He was a high society architect, who catered exclusively to the super rich, although he was known widely for having designed the elegant Washington Square Arch and the Hall of Fame at New York University. He had also designed Madison Square Garden, including its restaurant, arcade, fashionable shops, the amphitheater, where prizefights and horse shows were held, and the magnificent roof garden, where resplendent musicals were performed for open-air audiences, who dined while watching the shows.

Evelyn Nesbit wearing her "gorgeous Japanese kimono," posing in this photo for Stanford White in his posh New York studio in 1902, and where, she later told her husband, Thaw, White seduced her in a mirror-covered room.

Evelyn Nesbit in 1905, when she met and married millionaire Harry K. Thaw, and became his sadomasochistic slave, forced to relate to her husband real and imagined sexual transgressions by her former lover, Stanford White.

The tower of Madison Square Garden was reserved by White for himself. There he maintained a lavish home-away-from-home (he was married but seldom saw his wife). This apartment featured a red velvet swing which hung from the ceiling of the tower. According to Evelyn Nesbit's later statements, White was in the habit of bringing his mistresses and one-night stand show girls to the tower where he would swing them high so that he could lasciviously look beneath their billowing skirts. (The portrait of White as a lewd and lustful old man was painted by Nesbit at her husband's trial, certainly a colored, prejudiced view which was designed to vindicate Thaw's murderous actions, although White's skirt-chasing habits were certainly well known long before he ever met Nesbit.)

For three years, Nesbit carried on a relationship with White. He lavished gowns and jewels on her, paid for her stylish apartment and chauffeured limousine, and took endless photos of her in seductive poses. When he tired of her, he sent her away to a finishing school.

Harry Thaw had also seen Evelyn Nesbit on the stage briefly and knew that she was White's pampered mistress. While she was in boarding school, he contrived to meet her and then pursued her slavishly until she accepted his marriage proposal. Thaw, however, after the nuptials on April 4, 1905, was more concerned with White than he was with his own wife, persecuting Nesbit for her former relationship with the architect. He insisted that she refer to White as "The Beast" or "The Bastard." When she refused, he told her that she must, at least employ the letter "B" whenever she mentioned White. This Nesbit did.

Thaw took his 19-year-old bride to Europe, but it turned out to be a nightmarish honeymoon. Aboard the luxury liner carrying the couple to France, Nesbit later claimed, Thaw tied her to a bed and whipped and beat her until her body was coated with red welts. She finally told her unhinged husband what he wanted to hear or all she could imagine that was vile and rotten about Stanford White.

Nesbit told Thaw that White had tricked her into going to the Madison Square Tower apartment on the promise of marriage, but once there, he stripped and raped her, and then forced her to mount the red velvet swing naked while he took obscene photos of her. This story, following the perverted design of both Thaw and his wife, drove Thaw into blind rages and he forced his wife to repeat this story often so that he could work himself into a frenzy about White, vowing terrible revenge against "The Beast."

The popular rooftop open-air theater of the Madison Square Garden, which White had designed and where, in front of hundreds of horrified spectators, Harry Thaw shot and killed Stanford White on June 25, 1906; while panicking spectators raced for elevators and stairways, Thaw held the murder weapon above his head to indicate that he did not intend to murder anyone else that sultry night.

On the warm night of June 25, 1906, Harry Thaw took his berserk revenge on Stanford White. Harry and Evelyn Thaw were dining in Rector's with two of Thaw's friends, when White and a party of people left one of the private dining areas. Thaw stiffened as Evelyn passed him a handwritten note which read "The B. is here." She had followed his instructions of informing Thaw any time she saw White in public. Thaw crumpled the note and pocketed it, then patted his wife's hand and said: "Yes dear, I know he's here. I saw him. Thank you for telling me."

A few hours later White was sitting at the best table on the Madison Square Garden rooftop to witness a new, frothy musical, "Mamzelle Champagne." White was interested in one of the chorus girls and had arranged for an introduction to the girl through the stage manager following the performance. Harry and Evelyn Thaw, and two of their friends also arrived at the Madison Square Garden rooftop.

When Evelyn saw White sitting alone and watching the show, she asked Thaw to take her home, particularly after noticing her husband's agitated state. She told Thaw that the show bored her and he got up and began to escort her and their friends to the elevator. Suddenly, he was gone. Minutes later he stood glaring down at Stanford White. The architect looked up at Thaw, whom he knew and disliked. "Yes, Thaw, what is it?" White reportedly asked the staring young man. Without a word, Thaw reached into his pocket and withdrew a revolver, pointing it only a few feet from White's head. He fired one shot and then two more. White, his face a mass of blood, collapsed on the table, then fell sideways, taking the table with him. He sprawled dead on the floor with a bullet in his head and two more in his shoulder.

A terrible silence engulfed the crowd. The show stopped, performers frozen on the stage. The band did not play a note. Hundreds of customers present gaped at the bizarre scene of Thaw standing over the fallen White and then piercing screams came from some women and everyone made a mad dash for the exits, knocking over tables and chairs in a panic to escape what they thought was a madman on the loose. Thaw, to signal no further murderous intent, raised the revolver over his head and emptied the remaining three live cartridges from the weapon, which fell to the floor. He said something that was later interpreted to mean: "I did it because this man ruined my wife!" Some claimed that Thaw said: "This man ruined my life."

Within seconds, Thaw, still holding the weapon above his head, made his way to the elevator, where his wife and his friends waited in shock. "My God, Harry," Evelyn said. "What have you done?"

The roof garden was by then in pandemonium with women screaming and men shouting for police officers. The manager leaped upon a table and shouted to the band: "Go on playing!" To the stage manager he cried: "Bring on the chorus!" At this moment, a doctor was leaning over White and saw part of White's face blown away, his entire head was blackened by powder burns from bullets fired at close range. The physician pronounced White dead.

Millionaire murderer Harry K. Thaw in his cell in the Tombs, dining on a catered meal from Delmonico's; his meals were brought to him from the finest restaurants throughout his imprisonment during his trial.

Thaw is shown with his protective and over-indulgent mother, Mrs. William Thaw, who vowed that she was "prepared to spend $1 million to save my son's life"; she spent twice that amount, even, reportedly, bribing jurors.

In the elevator lobby, Thaw, still clutching the weapon, was confronted by an off-duty fireman who said: "You'd better let me have that gun." Thaw meekly turned it over. A policeman then arrived and Thaw submitted to arrest. He was marched to the Center Street Station, where he said his name was John Smith, adding that he was a student living at 18 Lafayette Place, New York City. He was searched and his own identification papers quickly revealed his true identity.

"Why did you do this?" a sergeant asked Thaw.

Thaw stared blankly at the policeman for some moments, then replied: "I can't say." He refused to make any more statements until his lawyer arrived. Thaw was charged with murder and placed in a cell in the New York Tombs to await trial. Fifteen months passed before Thaw was brought into court, a stalling tactic designed by Thaw's brilliant defense attorney, California criminal lawyer, Delphin Delmas, who had defended hundreds of clients in murder trials and claimed never to have lost a case.

Delmas was called "the little Napoleon of the West Coast bar." Hired for an estimated $100,000 by Thaw's mother (the figure was never substantiated and it may have been twice that amount), Delmas told the elderly Mrs. Thaw that because her son chose to execute his victim in public, the best they could hope for would be to keep him out of the electric chair. To that end, Delmas mounted a crusade to blacken the name of the victim, a shameless and brazen technique to win Thaw any kind of sympathy.

Press agent Ben Atwell was hired by Mrs. Thaw to destroy the image of Stanford White and stories soon began to appear in New York newspapers, which detailed White's profligate ways. One story dealt with 15-year-old model, Susan Johnson, who had been inveigled to White's Madison Square Tower apartment, which the Evening Journal described as being "furnished in Oriental splendor." The tale was told how Susan Johnson was plied with liquor, seduced, and soon afterward abandoned by the heartless White to make her way penniless through life. The vilification campaign against White went on day after day, month after month, until, it seemed that Stanford White had seduced half the female population in New York City.

Mrs. Thaw made no excuses for unleashing the dogs of slander and libel against the dead Stanford White. "I am prepared to spend $1 million to save my son's life," she had announced. The publicity campaign and legal fees for her son's defense, it was later estimated, cost Mrs. Thaw more than $2 million.

This photo of a sultry Evelyn Nesbit Thaw was released at the time of her husband's trial, ostensibly by the defense, to show that she had driven her husband to commit murder.

Evelyn Thaw is shown whispering her testimony during her husband's murder trial to District Attorney William Travers Jerome, her testimony too shocking for an open court.

Thaw himself was not spared negative publicity. His sordid exploits with prostitutes and his wife were leaked to the press by the prosecution, which was headed by the famous William Travers Jerome, New York's district attorney. Said Jerome before the trial: "With all his millions, Thaw is a fiend! No matter how rich a man is, he cannot get away with murder, not in New York!" Jerome's aides unearthed a lawsuit filed against Thaw in 1902 that had been brought by Ethel Thomas. Her story was almost identical to the one later told by Evelyn Nesbit. After meeting Thaw, Thomas had been swept off her feet by Thaw who oozed affection and respect. He had given her flowers, jewels, and clothes.

"One day," Thomas stated in her deposition, "I met him by appointment and we were walking toward his apartment at the Bedford, and he stopped at a store and bought a dog whip. I asked him what that was for and he replied laughingly: `That's for you, dear.' I thought he was joking, but no sooner were we in his apartment and the door locked than his entire demeanor changed. A wild expression came into his eyes and he seized me and with his whip beat me until my clothes hung in tatters."

The most bizarre ploys were used by the defense to create hatred for White and glean sympathy for the "befuddled" Thaw. One story related how a medium had conducted a seance on July 5, 1906, and that a "spirit from beyond appeared to insist that he, a long-departed soul named Johnson, had guided Harry Thaw's hand" and the spirit was the true killer of Stanford White, not Thaw!

Famed Los Angeles criminal defense attorney Delphin M. Delmas, called the "Napoleon of the West," was hired for a fortune by Mrs. William Thaw to save her son's life.

Finally, on January 21, 1907, Thaw was brought to trial. Thaw himself took the stand to appear penitent and remorseful, saying: "I never wanted to shoot that man. I never wanted to kill him ... Providence took charge of the situation." Apparently Thaw had read the account of the seance and was now pinning the blame on the spirits. Delmas and his battery of lawyers insisted Thaw was not in his right mind when he killed White, that he suffered from "dementia Americana," a neurosis coined by Thaw's attorneys who explained that such a mental malady was singularly American, one wherein American males believed that every man's wife was sacred and if she were violated, he would become unbalanced, striking out in a murderous rage.

District Attorney Jerome fought back against this psychological gobbledygook, cross-examining Evelyn Nesbit with dogmatic persistence. He asked about the character of her husband and her replies were so explicit that she insisted on whispering her answers to him. Her responses were later whispered for the court reporter recording the trial transcript and then her sordid stories were shown in printed form to the jury members. By then, however, the jury believed that Stanford White was a beast in human form and deserved to die, that he had ruined the lives of dozens of young women and that Thaw, who was unhinged at the time of the shooting, was merely doing what any noble-minded American male would do, taking vengeance for wronged women all over the U.S.

Harry Thaw, right, in 1908, after a jury found him not guilty by reason of insanity; he was sent to the New York State Asylum for the Criminally Insane at Matteawan.

By April 11, 1907, the jury was deadlocked. Its members could not agree, seven holding for conviction, five others insisting on a not guilty vote. Thaw was tried again, and, on February 1, 1908, he was found not guilty "by reason of insanity." This was the verdict Delmas had sought. His client would not face the electric chair. Thaw was sent to the New York State Asylum for the Criminally Insane at Matteawan, New York, ordered to remain there for life.

When Mrs. Thaw's millions could not move the courts to release her son, she reportedly financed Thaw's escape on August 17, 1913. Thaw was escorted through unlocked doors to freedom, where a limousine was waiting for him. He was driven to Canada and a luxury apartment. The U.S. State Department brought heavy pressure against Canadian officials to have Thaw returned to the U.S. and he was finally turned over, but he was placed in a Concord, New Hampshire, jail where, as had been the case in the New York Tombs while he awaited his trials, Thaw dined on catered meals and was offered every convenience and comfort. His lawyers battled extradition to New York until December 1914 when they secured another trial for the murderer.

Evelyn Nesbit with second husband, dancer Jack Clifford in 1915; she attempted to revive her theatrical career, but her star had faded and she was later reduced to sideshow attractions.

Harry Thaw, shown upon his release from an asylum for the criminally insane, sailing for Europe on the Aquatania; he had escaped in 1913 from Matteawan, and was shielded by his mother until he was recaptured.

Thaw and Nesbit are shown at a brief re-union in 1925, but their conversation was strained; Thaw died in 1947 and Nesbit, after struggling with alcohol and drugs and performing small parts in B-movies, died in a Hollywood nursing home in 1967.

Farley Granger, playing Thaw, holds a revolver high above his head after shooting Stanford White (played by Ray Milland, slumped at table) at Madison Square Garden in the 1955 film, The Girl in the Red Velvet Swing.

In the third trial, the same evidence and testimony was examined, but the jury, on July 16, 1915, returned a verdict of not guilty and also stated that Thaw was no longer insane and urged his release. He was set free. In 1916, Thaw was back in the news, accused of kidnapping, beating, and sexually molesting 19-year-old Frederick B. Gump. He was arrested, jailed, and went through another trial, where he was declared insane. Another hearing was held and Thaw was declared sane and the charges were dropped. It was reported that Thaw's mother had bestowed more than $500,000 on the Gump family to convince them to drop the charges. Thaw then resumed his eccentric lifestyle, buying his way through life. He died in February 1947 of a heart attack, a wizened, shrunken creature of seventy-six.

Evelyn Nesbit Thaw had her moment of glory and infamy during the Thaw trial and for some years afterward. She was abandoned by the Thaw family, who reportedly bought her off. She later appeared as a vaudeville attraction, billed as "the girl in the red velvet swing." In 1915, though she had long been divorced by the irresponsible Thaw, Nesbit insisted that her newly born son was Thaw's child, that she had bribed guards at Matteawan to allow her into Thaw's rooms for a night of bliss. Thaw angrily denied this and his parentage. His lawyers reportedly paid her off and she, like Nan Patterson before her, faded from the limelight.

THE MURDERING FORTUNE-HUNTER/1909

Dr. Bennett Clarke Hyde (b.1869) was an opportunistic physician who reportedly tried to wipe out an entire family through systematic poisoning. At age forty, the tall, good-looking Hyde was married to the niece of Thomas Swope, the richest man in Kansas City, Missouri. Hyde was the medical adviser to the Swope family and lived in Swope's huge mansion. Swope, in 1909, was eighty-two and in ill health. He appointed James Hunton, an old family friend, as executor of his will and estate.

Hyde realized that to control the Swope millions, he would have to position himself in Hunton's role. When Hunton fell ill in September 1909, Hyde treated him, or, more specifically, mistreated him by using an ancient cure-all advocated by doctors. He bled Hunton to "purify" his blood. In truth, Hyde simply bled the old man to death and then attributed the cause of his death to apoplexy, signing Hunton's death certificate himself.

Swope was so overwhelmed by the death of his good friend that he himself grew ill and Dr. Hyde tended to him. A nurse attending to Swope later reported that Dr. Hyde took her aside one day and said to her: "Now that Hunton is dead, Mr. Swope will require a new administrator for his estate. I think it would be a good idea if you suggested to Mr. Swope that I take over those duties." The nurse refused, telling Hyde that it was not her place to make such suggestions. Hyde then went into Swope's bedroom and gave him a number of pills. In a few minutes, Swope's pallor turned a marked blue and his skin was cold to the touch, according to the nurse.

"I wish I hadn't taken those pills!" Swope cried out to the nurse.

Hyde told the nurse to leave the millionaire's room, ordering her to boil some water. When she returned with the water about ten minutes later, she saw Hyde covering Swope's face with a bed sheet. "He's gone, poor soul," the doctor told her.

"What? Already?" The nurse checked Swope's pulse. There was none. He was dead and the nurse found it hard to believe that the patient could have died in such a short amount of time, especially from the symptoms he had manifested.

"At that age, they can go quickly." Dr. Hyde told her. He then added that the cause of death was apoplexy, the same malady that had also ended Hunton's life. Swope's millions were then distributed to several nephews and nieces. Mrs. Frances Hyde received more than $250,000, of which her husband immediately took control. Though that was a great fortune for the day, Dr. Hyde meant to obtain the rest of the Swope millions.

Four of the five nephews and nieces were quickly stricken by what their doctor diagnosed as attacks of typhoid. Christian Swope, one of the nephews, died in November 1909, while being tended by Hyde in the old Swope mansion, but the others recovered. Hyde reported the death as a result of typhoid. The family nurse, who had held deep suspicions about Dr. Hyde, went to Frances Hyde and told her: "People are being murdered in this house."

Instead of becoming alarmed, the devoted spouse angrily fired the nurse and then reported the nurse's statements to the

Dr. Bennett Clarke Hyde, who thought to systematically kill all the wealthy Swope family members of Kansas City, Missouri, to gain a huge inheritance; he was charged with murder in 1910.

Frances Swope Hyde was the only member of the Swope family who believed in her husband's innocence and remained at his side through four long trials.

family lawyer, which brought suspicion upon Hyde himself. The lawyer cautioned Mrs. Hyde to employ another doctor to tend to the still-living nieces and nephews. Another doctor was brought in and he consulted with a bacteriologist, who reported that there were no typhoid germs in the family's water supply system. Hyde no longer tended to the sick Swope relatives and they quickly recovered.

While under suspicion, Hyde began taking long walks at night and was followed on one of these nocturnal sojourns. He was seen taking something from his pocket, which he crushed into a mound of snow. The object, a capsule, was retrieved by the person following the doctor; it proved to contain grains of potassium cyanide, a deadly poison. Family members went to the police and a full-scale investigation ensued. The bodies of Hunton and Swope were exhumed and were found to contain strychnine and cyanide. Hyde had cleverly poisoned both men with the two poisons, knowing that each poison would disguise the symptoms of the other.

The physician was charged with murdering Swope and Hunton on February 9, 1910. The resulting trial made headlines coast to coast. Shocked readers learned how Hyde intended to murder off the entire Swope family to gain the family millions. Only Frances Hyde believed her husband innocent and she put up the money to cover the $100,000 bond to free her husband until the conclusion of his trial.

During the trial, a pharmacist testified that Hyde had purchased both strychnine and cyanide from him. At the time, said the pharmacist, Hyde said he needed these deadly poisons to get rid of wild dogs that had been "howling near my house and causing me no end of sleepless nights." Then Dr. L. Stewart, a bacteriologist, testified that Hyde had come to him, stating that he intended to take up the study of bacteriology and, for that purpose, he needed typhoid germs.

Stewart gave these cultures to Hyde but, a short time later, he grew nervous about releasing such dangerous germs to Hyde and went to Hyde's home, asking that the cultures be returned. Hyde told him that, unfortunately, he had dropped the glass slides containing these cultures and that he had thrown them out for fear of contamination. This was only a few days before Christian Swope died of typhoid.

Such damning testimony brought a verdict of guilty after a month-long trial. Dr. Hyde was given a life term but, before leaving for prison, the physician turned to reporters and used his greatest weapon, his wife, who was convinced of his innocence. "This case is not closed," Hyde told members of the press with a smug smile. "My wife Frances will not forsake me. She knows that this is a plot by certain members of the Swope family to get rid of me. They have hated me from the start, thought of me as an interloper. Yes, Frances will know what to do."

Frances Swope Hyde remained loyal to her murderous husband, as he knew she would. She hired the most expensive and talented lawyers available and they bombarded the courts with every known appeal. Mrs. Hyde went so far as to hire a publicist, who spread the news that the Swope family had formed a conspiracy to defame her husband. By that time, Mrs. Hyde had denounced her entire family and had vowed her undying loyalty to her imprisoned husband.

Mrs. Hyde's lawyers found some technical errors in her husband's trial and convinced the Supreme Court of Kansas to order a new trial in 1911. At the end of this trial, one juror grew ill and the proceedings were declared a mistrial. This juror's ailments were never disclosed and it was claimed that he was bribed to feign sickness. A third trial ended in a hung jury. It was again claimed that Mrs. Hyde's money was used to bribe several members of this jury to bring about a hung jury.

Hyde was sent to trial a fourth time in 1917, and this trial, like the two before it, had been the systematic plan of Hyde's clever lawyers. As soon as this trial commenced they moved to have their client released, pointing out a rule of law that stated that their client had gone to trial three times and, according to existing laws, could not be tried a fourth time.

Dr. Bennett Clarke Hyde was released and went to live with his wife. He no longer practiced medicine. Almost a decade later, Mrs. Hyde separated from her husband. She had complained to him one day of a stomach ache and he told her that he would prepare a special medicine for her. At that juncture, Mrs. Hyde thought it was time she left her husband, preferring the treatment of another doctor and, apparently, the preservation of her own life.

THE MURDER OF A CHAMPION/ October 15, 1910

Acting out of jealousy over a woman's affections, Walter Kurtz shot and killed possibly the greatest middleweight boxer in history. Stanley Ketchel, born Stanislaus Kaicel on Sept. 14, 1886, in Grand Rapids, Michigan, earned the nickname of the "Michigan Assassin" early in his career. After running away from home at the age of sixteen, Ketchel worked his way west doing menial labor on the railroad and in mining camps. Before he could accomplish his dream of becoming a cowboy, he discovered a talent for fighting. Ketchel's temper frequently got him into fights which he invariably won.

In Butte, Mont., in 1903, Ketchel got his big chance. The Big Casino saloon management offered a $50 purse to anyone who could defeat the local champion, Kid Tracey. Tracey's reputation was such that Ketchel was the only opponent. Although Tracey and everyone else discounted the slightly built, teenaged opponent, Ketchel knocked Tracey out in the first round.

After this first formal victory, Ketchel traveled throughout Montana racking up victory after victory. He had a particularly vicious style in the ring, which he achieved by imagining that his opponent had insulted his mother, for whom Ketchel bore a deep affection. His "maniacal" style, however, gained him fifty-nine wins in sixty-three fights in his professional career, forty-nine by knockouts. He won the middleweight championship in 1908, by beating Jack Sullivan. He lost this crown in the same year to Billy Papke on a foul, but reclaimed the title in the same year by beating Papke to a pulp.

Within a year, Ketchel fought what many thought was the greatest fight of his career, one arranged by his manager, Wilson Mizner. The only prizefighter of note that Ketchel had not yet fought and beaten was heavyweight champion Tenacious prizefighter Stanley Ketchel became middleweight champion in 1908.

Jack Johnson. Ketchel agreed to fight Johnson even though Johnson outweighed Ketchel by forty pounds. Johnson scoffed at the smaller man and refused to train for the fight, expecting to win easily.

To his surprise, the fight went into the twelfth round before Ketchel finally succumbed to one of Johnson's powerful punches. During that fierce battle, Ketchel's savage onslaught all but devastated the black champion. At one point, Ketchel landed a right cross that rocked Johnson and sent him crashing to the canvas. (Johnson later stated that Ketchel's punch was the hardest he ever received.) He barely managed to evade a ten-count. Johnson stood up and furiously attacked Ketchel, almost cartwheeling (as motion pictures of this classic fight show) across the ring to land his own knockout blow on Ketchel's chin.

Although Ketchel went on to win a few more fights, the Johnson fight had ruined his health. In the fall of 1910, he traveled to Conway, Missouri, to stay at a ranch owned by R. P. Dickerson, a close friend. Once there, Ketchel became involved with Goldie Smith, the buxom, blonde ranch cook. Smith was also involved with one of the ranch hands, Walter Kurtz, actually a Navy deserter whose real name was Walter Dipley. Smith told Ketchel that Kurtz had been her lover before Ketchel had arrived at the ranch and that she was worried he might become violent over their affair.

"I'm not worrying about that stiff," Ketchel said.

Kurtz, however, planned lethal revenge and, on the morning of October 15, 1910, entered the ranch's dining room, where Ketchel was having his breakfast. He pointed a rifle at the champion and shouted: "Throw up your hands!"

Ketchel glared at the ranch hand and then waved him off, saying: "Beat it, you bum!"

"You may be a prizefighter," replied Kurtz, "but you can't come down here and insult my woman without paying for it!"

Ketchel started to rise from his chair when Kurtz fired a single shot from the rifle, the bullet striking the fighter in the back, mortally wounding him. Ketchel fell to the floor and Kurtz went to him, rifling the victim's pockets and taking $2,000 in cash he knew Ketchel always carried. He slipped Ketchel's diamond ring from his finger and then fled. Ketchel was taken to a hospital in Springfield, Missouri, where he died that night.

Kurtz, who had fled on foot to a nearby farmhouse, was captured by a farmer who held a shotgun on him until police arrived. He mounted a weak defense at his trial, saying to a jury: "Well, I told Ketchel to throw up his hands and I had to shoot him when he did not obey." He was convicted and sentenced to prison for life, but was paroled in 1934.

The death of Stanley Ketchel was widely mourned; many thought him to be the greatest fighter who ever entered a boxing ring. His body was taken home to his mother and buried in the family plot outside of Grand Rapids, Michigan. His manager and friend, Wilson Mizner, learned of Ketchel's murder with shock and disbelief. Mizner wept, then said: "That darling kid can't be dead. Start counting over him—he'll get up!"

Ketchel, left, is shown meeting heavyweight champion Jack Johnson, center, before a classic fight in Coloma, California on October 16, 1909; Ketchel was murdered by a jealous ranch hand the following year.

"HERE YOU GO! HERE I GO!"/ JANUARY 23, 1911

Fitzhugh Coyle Goldsborough (1880-1911) was born into a wealthy Philadelphia family and had two interests in life: reading popular sentimental novels and doting on his socially ambitious sister. If Goldsborough ever heard his father chastise his sister for some slight offense, Fitzhugh would rush to her defense, threatening his father with physical harm if he so much as laid a hand on the girl. His father and mother excused these outbursts, believing their high-strung son was simply overprotective of his sister and they interpreted his pathological obsession with his sister's welfare as deep affection. But there was a strain of madness in their volatile son.

In 1911, a novel by David Graham Phillips, The Fashionable Adventures of Joshua Craig, captured Goldsborough's overactive imagination. The story concerned a selfish, egocentric young woman of the leisure class, a character with whom Goldsborough and his sister both believed to be the sister, though they had no reason to believe that Phillips knew her.

Phillips was a rising star in the New York literary world. Born in Indiana, he had attended Princeton before becoming a reporter for the New York World. Phillips once said that, given the choice, he would "rather be a reporter than president." He attained success with such best-sellers as The Great God Success, and had, at age forty-three, just finished another book, Susan Lenox: Her Fall and Rise (published posthumously in 1917 and thought by critics to be a minor masterpiece, which was brought to the screen in a fine 1931 film starring Greta Garbo and Clark Gable) when he encountered Goldsborough in New York's Gramercy Park on January 23, 1911.

Before that fatal moment, Goldsborough had concluded from the Phillips' novel he had been reading that the writer had purposely wronged his sister. He never bothered to learn whether or not Phillips even knew the girl (he had never met her) before he set out to murder the novelist.

Phillips had stepped out of his Gramercy Park apartment to mail a new short story to the Saturday Evening Post when Goldsborough approached him. The withered, poorly-dressed young Goldsborough could have been mistaken for a tramp, and Phillips reached into his pocket for a few pennies to give to Goldsborough.

Goldsborough took a few steps backward, refusing the handout and startling the writer, who noticed a wild look in his blinking eyes. The young man suddenly produced a pistol and shouted: "Here you go!" He moved his arm in an arc, describing a purposefully-made circle in the air, firing a pattern of shots designed to hit the victim in several fatal areas of his body, striking Phillips from the chest to the knees.

Seconds later, without looking at Phillips, who had fallen

Fitzhugh Coyle Goldsborough, the pampered, unbalanced son of a wealthy Philadelphia family, who murdered a man he never knew in 1911 over an insult that he imagined.

Novelist David Graham Phillips, who was fatally shot by Goldsborough in New York's Gramercy Park over an imagined insult he had written in one of his books.

Opposite page left: Greta Garbo and Clark Gable in the 1932 film, Susan Lenox—Her Fall and Rise, based upon the Phillips' novel, which was published six years after he was murdered by Goldsborough.

to the ground and was writhing in pain, Goldsborough turned the gun on himself. To startled passersby, he shouted: "Here I go!" and placed the pistol to his temple, firing a single shot that blew away part of his head.

Phillips was carried to the Princeton Club, where he lay on a sofa only a few feet from where Stanford White's coffin had been placed in an elaborate funeral following White's murder by another social elitist and madman, Harry Thaw. Removed to Bellevue Hospital, doctors at first believed that Phillips would survive his wounds. He could not explain the reason why Goldsborough had shot him, but told police from his sickbed that on the morning of the shooting he had received a strange telegram signed with his own name, one that made no sense to him, but he presumed that it had been sent by the deranged Goldsborough.

Police later learned the real motive for the murder when Goldsborough's parents came forward to explain their son's peculiar obsession with The Fashionable Adventures of Joshua Craig. By then it mattered little, since Phillips was dead, having taken a turn for the worse the day after the shooting. Before he died, the promising and robust author told physicians: "I can fight two wounds, but not six."

THE DENTIST AND THE PECK MILLIONS/ 1916

Like the methodical Dr. Bennett Clarke Hyde before him, Dr. Warren Waite, a practicing dentist, was a patient slayer in eliminating his in-laws in order to obtain their fortune. Born in Grand Rapids, Michigan to struggling farmers, Waite looked covetously upon the richest family in town as his exclusive prey. He dated Clara Louisa Peck through high school and continued his relationship while he was a student at the University of Michigan, where he studied dental surgery. After going to Europe to continue his studies, Waite maintained a prolonged and passionate correspondence with Clara Peck, whose father was John E. Peck, a lumber king and worth millions.

The local papers in Michigan, as was the editorial custom of small-town papers, dutifully reported Waite's progress, noting that he had graduated from the University of Glasgow with honors and had gone on to practice his dentistry on the mouths of the mighty, until he was appointed the chief dentist to the most powerful mining corporation in South Africa. Clara Peck had remained faithful throughout the travels and travails of the wandering dentist and was overjoyed at the news that he would soon be returning home to Grand Rapids.

Waite appeared in town on Christmas Day, 1914. He promptly resumed his love affair with Clara Peck, despite the objections of her wealthy father, who thought the prospective Michigan heiress Clara Louisa Peck, who married the handsome Arthur Warren Waite in 1915, little knowing that her husband intended to murder her parents in order to gain their fortune.

Tall and charming, Dr. Arthur Warren Waite had schemed to marry Clara Peck before embarking on his insidious plan of murder, creating a fake past as a successful dentist in Europe.

Mrs. John E. Peck, Waite's mother-in-law, visited her daughter and son-in-law; Waite administered lethal bacterial doses to the elderly woman, while he sang her favorite tunes at her deathbed.

Lumber tycoon John E. Peck, who also visited his daughter and solicitous son-in-law, and met the same fate as his wife on March 12, 1916, also dosed to death with deadly bacteria.

son-in-law too ambitious. Nevertheless, the couple married on September 9, 1915. Peck gave the newlyweds a lavishly appointed, rent-free apartment on Manhattan's Riverside Drive and an allowance of three hundred dollars a month. Waite appeared to set up his dental practice, but he spent most of his time playing tennis and having little time for his wife. Clara Peck Waite was more than patient. When her parents objected to Waite's time-wasting, Clara sprang to her husband's defense, writing to her father: "But he has his profession and his tennis. He's Metropolitan Amateur champion. Isn't that wonderful?"

The enterprising Waite, however, was not playing that much tennis. He spent most of his time carrying on a torrid affair with Margaret Weaver Horton, the wife of Henry Mack Horton, a distinguished aeronautical engineer. To keep the beauteous, raven-haired Mrs. Horton in style (their trysting was elitist, confined to the uppercrust Plaza Hotel), Waite needed money, much more than his in-laws had bestowed upon him. He had carped about money even on his wedding night, shouting at Clara that the apartment and monthly allowance amounted to a pittance. "I expected fifty thousand dollars outright!" he had roared.

There were other ways than working to obtain the necessary funds to finance his affair with Mrs. Horton, the dentist reasoned. He would murder the Pecks and the inheritance of their fortune would fall to his wife and subsequently come under his control. (In this regard, Waite almost duplicated the modus operandi of Dr. Bennett Clarke Hyde. In fact their cases are so similar as to suggest that Waite had studied the Hyde case in detail and decided to employ Hyde's murder methods, but avoiding the pitfalls that ensnared that 1909 killer.)

Waite suddenly missed the company of his in-laws, and invited Mrs. Peck to visit him and her daughter in New York, staying in their apartment. She arrived on January 10, 1916. Ten days later she was dead. Her sudden death shocked the family, but it was fondly remembered how Waite had shown his mother-in-law every kindness during her brief and fatal illness. He had brought the sick woman flowers every day, and provided footwarmers. He played her favorite tunes on a record machine and crooned to her in his fine tenor voice. His consideration extended to detailed funeral preparations, which included a prompt cremation, in order, Waite compassionately explained, to avoid a drawn-out funeral that might vex grieving family members.

John Peck was appreciative of his son-in-law's kind treatment of his ailing wife and began to tell his associates how considerate his son-in-law had become. So impressed with Waite was the lumber tycoon that he agreed to stay in New York with his daughter and her husband. In less than a month, on March 12, 1916, he, too, was dead. Again, Waite urged cremation, but this time Clara and her brother, Percy Peck, objected, saying that their father's body had to be shipped back to Grand Rapids, where he would be given a funeral befitting one of the state's leaders of industry. The Waites accompanied the body to Michigan, but Waite was too busy to remain long, returning to New York to attend to his burgeoning dental business, which really amounted to no more than a few disgruntled patients.

In Waite's absence, Percy Peck received a telegram from someone named "K. Adams," which read: "Suspicions aroused. Demand autopsy. Examine body." Peck was already suspicious and had for some time believed his brother-in-law was less than an honorable man. He had his father's body examined, doctors discovering that the old man's intestines were loaded with arsenic and chloroform had been found in the dead man's brain tissue. Percy Peck tried in vain to convince his sister that her husband was a plotting murderer whose only aim was to acquire the Peck fortune through eliminating its family members.

"I won't think of it," Mrs. Waite stated emphatically.

"Clara," her brother said, "don't you honestly think Warren killed Mama and Papa?"

"Nonsense," replied Clara. "He wouldn't have poisoned them. He loved them too much."

At this family gathering, Clara's maiden aunt, Mrs. Catherine Peck, rushed to Waite's defense, pointing out that her wonderful nephew-in-law "neither drinks or swears. I like him so well I gave him a three thousand dollar wedding present." She added that she also gave Waite thirty thousand dollars to invest in the stock market. Clara Peck Waite, however, was in for a shock when learning that New York police examiners had discovered an atomizer used by Dr. Waite, one that was filled with typhoid and anthrax germs. Mrs. Elizbeth Hardwicke, a distant Peck relative, then told NYPD detectives that she had seen Waite on several times in the company of the attractive Mrs. Horton. Mrs. Hardwicke had come to believe that Waite intended to murder the entire Peck family in order to gain the Peck fortune so that he could then live in luxury with the beguiling Mrs. Horton. It was Mrs. Hardwicke who had sent the mysterious telegram to Percy Peck. She also detailed her murder theory to the police, who embraced her story and arrested Waite for murder.

Mrs. Elizabeth Hardwicke (left, shown with Clara Peck), a distant Peck relative, sent a telegram under the alias of "K. Adams," urging authorities to examine John Peck's body.

New York police experts are shown examining Waite's test tubes and microscopic slides in the dentist's apartment; they found the deadly typhoid and anthrax germs Waite had used to murder his in-laws.

Embalmer Eugene Oliver Kane (his bowler hat tilted to hide his face from news photographers) is shown with his wife after being arrested for putting arsenic into the veins of John Peck, in order to disguise Waite's lethal germ doses.

Waite laughed uproariously when handcuffed and taken to a police lockup, saying to detectives: "Why, the thing is too absurdly amusing to even discuss it."

It was not amusing to investigators, who then learned that Waite had tried to use his germ-laden atomizer on Clara Peck. She had refused to inhale the atomizer several times at Waite's urging after she contracted a slight cold. Before that time, Waite had convinced her to revise her will, one in which she left her entire estate of a half million dollars "to my beloved Warren." Investigators learning of this quickly concluded that although she never made any statements to the effect, Mrs. Waite had grown suspicious of her overly solicitous husband.

Detectives then detained Oliver Eugene Kane, the timid and frightened embalmer, who had prepared John Peck's body. He broke down immediately, blurting: "Waite told me that the D. A. was going to ask me for a specimen of my embalming fluid. He asked me if I could put some arsenic in it. I said I couldn't because it's against the law to put arsenic in embalming fluid." The quivering and quaking little embalmer then told detectives that Waite had thrust nine thousand dollars into his hand. "I-I—kept the money," Kane said. "I was so scared I buried it out in the sand at Orient Point on the tip of Long Island. But I didn't put any arsenic in the fluid."

Confronted with Kane's statements, Waite confessed, but not before swallowing a handful of sleeping pills in a frantic suicide attempt. A detective stuck his fingers down the dentist's throat, causing him to vomit, then go into a dead faint. When revived, Warren Waite took another tack, claiming insanity. He screamed: "A bad man from Egypt dwells in my body! He makes me do bad things! He struggles for possession of my soul!"

Waite then abandoned this position and gave the police a long and coherent confession. His life had been nothing more than a sham, he said. He had graduated from the University of Michigan by using another student's work. He had forged his postgraduate certificate at Glasgow and had secretly written and mailed reports of his sterling career in Europe, which the local papers printed without challenge. He had done all of this, he said, as part of an elaborate plan to obtain the Peck fortune, one which he coveted since his impoverished boyhood. That plan, Waite admitted, involved the murder of each and every Peck relative.

While working at New York's Flower Hospital, Waite explained, he stole drugs, and collected deadly bacterial slides. He droned in chilling detail: "In November 1915, to test my knowledge and to test the effect of germs, I inoculated myself with cultures of anthrax, typhoid, and pneumonia. By the time

Dr. Arthur Warren Waite (center) is shown under arrest, charged with the murders of his in-laws.

Defiant and smug, Waite, center, stands outside the courtroom where he had been convicted and sentenced to death; he went to the electric chair on May 1, 1917.

Mrs. Peck arrived in January 1916, I was ready for her." He went on to say that he sprayed Mrs. Peck's food with anthrax and typhus germs, and, when she fell ill, pretended to administer curative drugs by spraying her throat with deadly germs—typhoid, influenza, anthrax, diphtheria, and tuberculosis, plus giving her powdered sleeping tablets each night. "It took just ten days," the killer gloated.

The same routine was practiced on John Peck, but he proved too tough. To hurry the old man's demise, Waite put damp sheets on Peck's bed and let him lie in drafts. He burned flypaper and left open containers of chlorine gas in Peck's bedroom. Still, the tycoon did not die. "Finally, I resorted to arsenic," Waite said. "Even that didn't kill the old fellow. On the last night, I tied a rag soaked with chloroform over my father-in-law's face and I held it in place with a pillow until he was dead."

Waite was not finished, adding as if an afterthought: "Oh, yes, Aunt Catherine. I tried to kill her, too." He grinned at the grim-faced detectives—in fact he had been grinning throughout his entire confession—then stated: "I kept her car windows open when I took her riding. I put ground glass in her marmalade, but she thought it was sand and returned it to the grocer."

"Are you crazy?" one of the detectives asked Waite.

"I think not," Waite replied calmly, "unless it is crazy to want money."

Tried and convicted, Waite was sentenced to death. Upon hearing this sentence in court, he sighed, then exclaimed: "What a relief!"

Warren Waite, poor boy gone wrong from the start, sauntered to the electric chair on May 1, 1917. He sat down calmly in the death seat. As electrodes were affixed to the shaved areas of his body, he looked about and with his last words commented: "Is this all there is to it?"

MURDER AT THE SAVOY/July 19, 1923

Frenchwoman Marie-Marguerite Laurient (b. 1891) began her affair with Egyptian Prince Ali Kamel Fahmy Bey in May 1922 in Paris, following her divorce from her first husband. The 23-year-old Prince Ali, attached to the French legation in Cairo, was extravagant and allegedly had a sadistic bent. It was rumored in Egypt that Ali was homosexual, but this was not in evidence when he passionately pursued Laurient, who had years before her marriage called herself Maggie Mellor. He was captivated by the elegant brunette divorcee, who was ten years his senior, and took her back to Cairo where he suggested they live together.

When Laurient balked, the prince proposed marriage, and Laurient accepted, but with conditions. A contract was drawn up that permitted her to wear western-style clothing and to divorce the prince at any time. In return, she would convert to the Muslim faith, thereby ensuring Ali's inheritance. But when the religious ceremony took place, Fahmy ordered the divorcee clause removed, allowing him to take three wives if he pleased.

Marguerite found Fahmy to be an abusive husband. He frequently beat her and assigned a houseboy to follow her throughout her day, even when she undressed. The couple traveled to London on July 10, 1923, and registered at the elegant Savoy Hotel. That night they quarreled bitterly about an operation Marguerite was scheduled to undergo. Prince Ali wanted it performed in London, but Marguerite insisted on travelling to Paris to have it done. While they ate supper in the hotel dining room, a band leader strolled by the table to take requests. "I don't want music," Marguerite told the band leader in French—she did not speak a word of English. "My husband has threatened to kill me tonight!"

The band leader thought the elegant-attired woman was making an amusing remark and suavely replied: "I hope you will still be here tomorrow, madame."

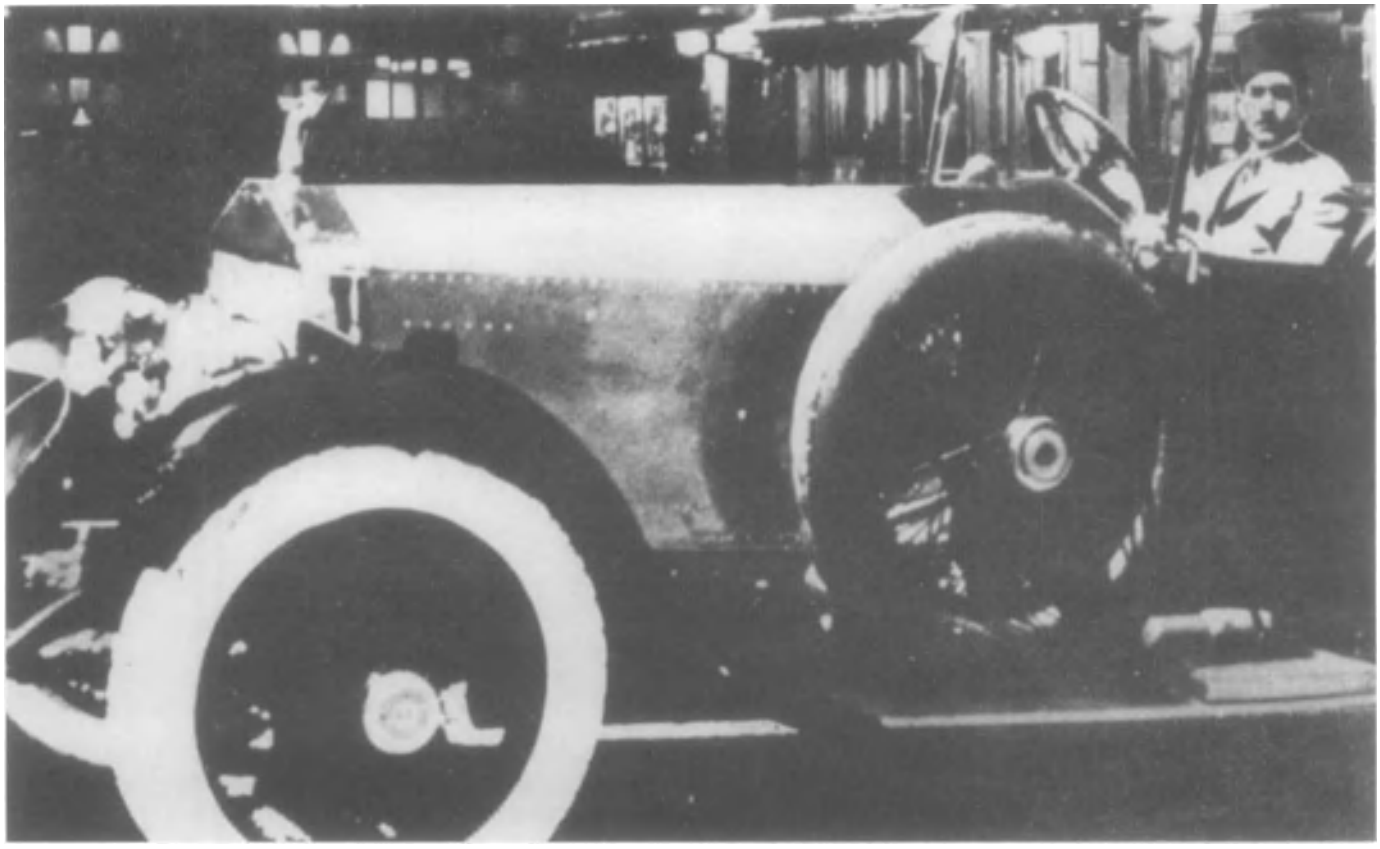
The couple retired to their suite at 1:30 a.m. A luggage porter passing their door a short time later saw Fahmy burst from the room in agitation, his face scratched. "Look at my face!" he shouted to the porter. "Look at what she has done!" But the porter only reminded him to keep quiet. Seconds later three shots rang out. The porter rushed to the room to find the prince lying on the floor of his suite.

The hotel manager was summoned. Princess Fahmy, tears running down her cheeks, had thoughts only for herself. As she stood next to her fallen husband, she said: "Oh, sir, I have been married six months, which has been torture for me. I have suffered terribly."

Wounded, Fahmy was taken to a hospital where he died a short time later. Princess Fahmy was charged with his murder. The lurid trial of Marguérite Fahmy opened in London's Central Criminal Court on September 10, 1923, before 49-year-old Mr. Justice Rigby Swift. The prosecution was headed by the redoubtable Percival Clarke. It was thought that the Fahmy case was open and shut, and that Princess Fahmy would soon be behind bars for life or, worse, go to the hangman. She was, however, represented by two of England's most able lawyers, Sir Edward Marshall Hall and Sir Henry Curtis-Bennett. Hall's defense was brilliant if unorthodox.

Hall portrayed the prince as a stalking brute whose entourage of perverts and degenerates had made Marguérite's life miserable, and who, on the night in question, tried to kill her. Hall had obtained a telling piece of evidence from the prison medical officer at Holloway Prison, where Princess Fahmy had been jailed, following her arrest. The physician stated that he examined the woman at that time and found three abrasions on the back of her neck, apparently caused by a man's hand. Fahmy had tried to strangle his wife on the night of the shooting, Hall said, and she had simply defended her life when her lethal husband advanced toward her with gun in hand, wrestling the gun away from him and then pulling the trigger of the Browning .32-caliber pistol.

In a chilling recreation, Hall took the actual murder weapon and demonstrated the shooting for the benefit of the jury. For an instant he pointed the weapon at the jury, acting out the role of Prince Ali, who had reportedly advanced on his wife in a threatening manner. Hall crouched and snarled and hissed in a convincing imitation of the murderous Fahmy. The hushed courtroom then watched Hall drop the gun to the floor. The lawyer later insisted that that part was an accident, but it had a powerful effect on the jury, which returned a verdict of not guilty after only an hour's deliberation. The jurors all but ignored the fact that Princess Fahmy had shot her husband at point-blank range.



Prince Fahmy Bey, shown in his Rolls Royce outside London's posh Savoy Hotel, where he was shot to death by his attractive wife in 1923.

Princess Marguerite Fahmy, reportedly an abused wife, who stood accused of murdering her sadistic husband in a sensational trial.

The brilliant Sir Edward Marshall Hall, who won an acquittal for Princess Fahmy, a victory that added greatly to his illustrious legal career.

The acquittal of Princess Fahmy created a sensation in England and on throughout Europe. Hall's defense had been laced with prejudice in depicting Egyptian culture as uncivilized and catering to myriad perversions and that the murder victim was a millionaire "Oriental" who preyed upon Western women to degrade them and destroy their values of decency. Criticized for such conduct, Hall defended himself, saying: "The only thing that I remember saying that might be misunderstood was that it was a mistake for Western woman to marry Eastern man, and his idea of his rights toward a wife were those of possession instead of mutual alliance."

Princess Fahmy enjoyed the limelight for the next few years, even appearing in some minor French films. Oddly, the sloe-eyed, sultry woman enacted in one movie the role of an Egyptian wife, the very role model she had resisted in real life to the point of homicide.

"THE CRIME OF THE CENTURY"/ May 21, 1924

Although the calculating and coldblooded murder committed by Nathan F. Leopold, Jr. (1906-1971) and Richard A. Loeb (1907-1936) was labeled a kidnapping, it had little or nothing to do with abducting anyone for ransom or sexual satisfaction. It was merely a devise, a clever ruse to shroud the real but murky intent of the killers, which was murder in its most fiendish conception. Their unconscionable act was heralded by a sensation-hungry press as "the crime of the century," but that grim appellative would later be applied to the 1932 Lindbergh kidnapping (see chapter on Kidnapping), and the perplexing assassination of U.S. President John F. Kennedy in 1963 (see chapter on Assassination). In 1924, however, the crime committed by Leopold and Loeb stunned the nation, shocked the world and resulted in one of the most dramatic criminal trials on record in the worldwide community of man.

Richard Loeb as a boy in his cowboy costume, brandishing a six-shooter, and a fierce image that latter-day psychiatrists interpreted as inherent aggression.

Nathan Leopold and Richard Loeb were the products of great wealth, two brilliant students, who had been allowed to expand their personalities and intelligence at will without having to work or worry about money. They had, since early childhood, been given everything, and as a result, they indulged their fantasies as their millionaire parents had satisfied their childish cravings. These two University of Chicago students, brilliant by comparison to other youths their age, had proven themselves superior in all their pursuits.

The resplendent Loeb mansion in Chicago's Hyde Park, where Richard Loeb was spoiled by his millionaire parents, who ignored his odd behavior.

Leopold, with an estimated I.Q. of 200, had graduated from the University of Chicago at age eighteen, the youngest ever to do so. He spoke nine languages fluently and was an expert botanist and ornithologist. There was, however, little warmth in his home. Leopold lived in a loveless household. Money replaced affection. His father, Nathan Leopold, Sr., was a millionaire transport tycoon who assigned a governess to his son at an early age. Babe, as Leopold had been nicknamed, came under the supervision of a sexually disturbed woman who had the boy practice all sorts of sexual perversions with her, distorting his young mind.

Early on, the Leopolds noticed their son's reluctance to associate with girls and they unreasonably placed him in an all-girl's school to correct his attitude. The governess went with the boy, continuing to warp his sexual growth. Moreover, this strange situation caused Leopold to reject female companionship altogether. By the time Leopold graduated from college, his mother was dead and his father, as usual, compensated for the loss by showering his son with money. He gave his son $3,000 and sent him on a European tour.

When Leopold returned, he was given a new car and a $125-a-week allowance and then ignored. Leopold immersed himself in the works of Friedrich Nietzsche, advocate of the superman concept. But the youth was anything but the physical ideal. He was stoop-shouldered and undersized. He had an overactive thyroid gland and he was physically unattractive with huge, bulging eyes and a weak chin. He was a sexual deviate at age fourteen, when he met Richard Loeb, another early-aged homosexual.

Loeb was later to fulfill Leopold's concept of the superman. He was also the son of a millionaire, and like Leopold,

The Leopold mansion in Hyde Park, where Nathan Leopold's millionaire parents indulged his whims and left him to his own strange pursuits.

The mansion in Hyde Park, which was the home of Bobby Franks, the randomly selected murder victim of Richard Loeb and Nathan Leopold.

had been spoiled with gifts and money since childhood. At thirteen, Loeb became Leopold's sexual master and continued to dominate him until they sought what they considered the ultimate thrill, that of murder. Loeb was always the leader. He grew up a tall, handsome, and clever youth. He was a charming and captivating conversationalist.

Loeb's father was a senior executive for Sears, Roebuck, and Co., and he bestowed a $250-a-week allowance on his son, a sum that amounted to twice that earned by most men during the early 1920s. Loeb also suffered from physical defects. He had a nervous tic, stuttered at times when nervous, and suffered fainting spells, which had been interpreted as petit mal epilepsy. He often talked of suicide with Leopold, and his character, beneath the glossy charm he showed to others, was decidedly morose and fatalistic.

A graduate of the University of Michigan at age seventeen, Loeb believed himself to be an excellent detective, and his most passionate daydream was to commit the perfect crime. He often talked of this with Leopold, who encouraged his superman theories with such a crime. The two not only satisfied each other in their sexual liaison, but they fed upon each other's egos and together believed themselves to be perfect human beings. The youths had two driving obsessions. With Leopold it was abnormal sex, and with Loeb, crime.

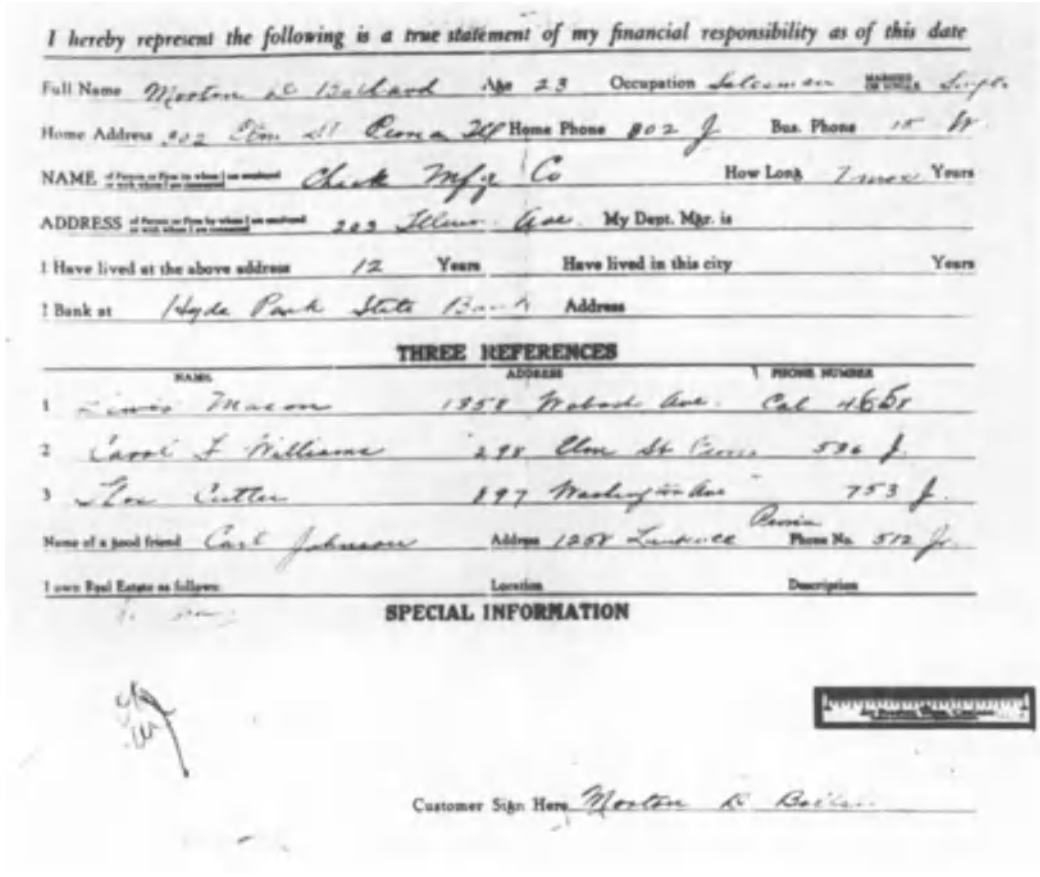
Leopold and Loeb were later termed by their own defense attorneys as "moral imbeciles." It was Loeb who led the pair into active crime. At first Leopold resisted the idea, but Loeb perversely withheld his sexual participation until Leopold agreed to commit crimes with him. They signed a mutual pact in which both agreed that they would support the other's needs, no matter how perverse, degenerate or amoral.

This agreement had been signed when Leopold was fourteen and Loeb was thirteen and the youths embarked on setting fires, touching off false fire alarms, committing petty thefts, and vandalizing the homes of their wealthy neighbors. They spent months creating an elaborate system in which they could expertly cheat while playing bridge, the game of the rich and socially esteemed, the very caste to which Leopold and Loeb belonged and which they held in high contempt, the same contempt they extended to the ignorant and uneducated. They constantly argued with each other, but neither formed friendships with other children. The arguments grew violent and Loeb beat up Leopold on several occasions. Both boys threatened to murder each other some day. Loeb laughed at this idea, saying he would kill himself before Leopold could murder him.

When Leopold told Loeb that he would be going on an extended tour of Europe, Loeb proposed that they commit a spectacular crime before Leopold's ship sailed. Leopold was reluctant, but Loeb appealed to his lover by cleverly positing the idea as worthy of Friedrich Nietzsche, Leopold's intellectual idol. Loeb wrote Leopold a note which read: "The superman is not liable for anything he may do, except for the one crime that it is possible for him to commit—to make a mistake." This prompted Leopold to reconsider Loeb's proposition. The most dangerous crime, the most serious crime, was the only type of crime that Loeb would consider and that, of course, was murder.

They would kidnap and kill someone, and then send a ransom note and collect money for a victim who was already dead, mocking the awful crime they meticulously planned to commit. They were utterly unconcerned with the identity of the victim, as long as that person came from wealthy parents, who could afford to pay the ransom.

Loeb took Leopold to his room and showed him a typewriter that he had stolen in November 1923 from the University of Michigan, when he graduated. Since this typewriter could not be traced to them, Loeb reasoned, the ransom note could be typed on it. The next step was to obtain a car that could be used for the kidnapping. Both boys knew, of course,



I hereby represent the following is a true statement of my financial responsibility as of this date

Full Name Morton D Ballard Age 23 Occupation Salesman Married or Single Single

Home Address 202 Elm St Peoria Ill Home Phone 802 J Bus. Phone 15 W

NAME of Person or Firm to whom I am employed Clark Mfg Co How Long 2 mos Years

ADDRESS of Person or Firm by whom I am employed 203 Illinois Ave My Dept. Mgr. is

I Have lived at the above address 12 Years Have lived in this city Years

I Bank at Hyde Park State Bank Address

THREE REFERENCES

	NAME	ADDRESS	PHONE NUMBER
1	Louis Mason	1958 Mohawk Ave.	Cal 4665
2	Carol F Williams	298 Elm St Peoria	596 J
3	Tom Cutler	197 Madison Ave	753 J

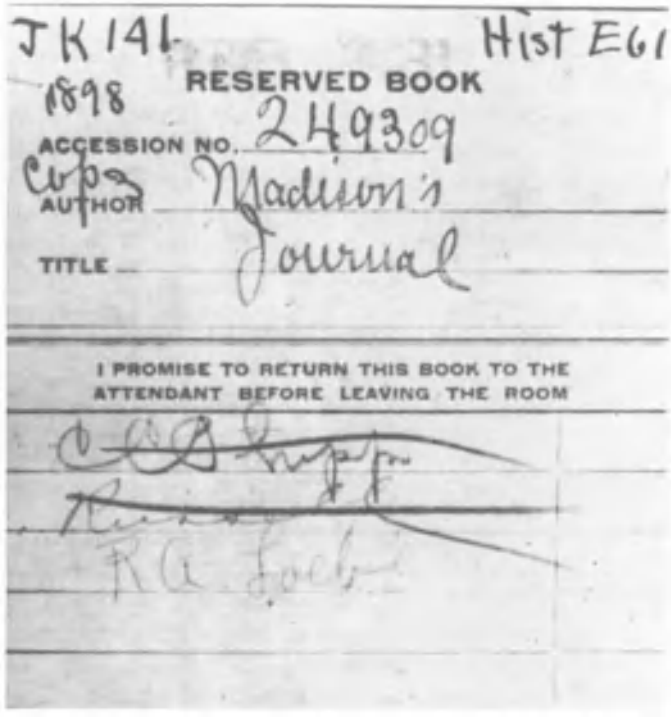
Name of a good friend Carl Johnson Address 1258 Lawrence Ave Peoria Phone No. 572 J

I own Real Estate as follows: Location Description

SPECIAL INFORMATION

Customer Sign Here Morton D Ballard

The contract for the rental of the murder car which Leopold signed, using the alias of Morton D. Ballard, a document later used against him.



JK 141 HIST E61

1898 RESERVED BOOK

ACCESSION NO. 249309

AUTHOR Corp Madison's

TITLE Journal

I PROMISE TO RETURN THIS BOOK TO THE ATTENDANT BEFORE LEAVING THE ROOM

R A Loeb

Richard Loeb's name appears on a library card that he mistakenly left at the Morrison Hotel, when he and Leopold checked in under assumed names, one of the many mistakes made by the killers.

that their own cars might be identified, so they established fake identities which would enable them to rent a car. This element of their plan was elaborate, but it provided the youths with some dramatic play-acting.

One spring morning in 1924, Leopold, using the alias of Morton D. Ballard, checked into Chicago's Morrison Hotel. He registered as a salesman from Peoria. He then went to the nearby Rent-A-Car agency and selected a sedan. The salesman asked for a reference and Leopold gave him the name of Louis Mason, along with a phone number. The salesman called Mason (who was really Loeb) who gave "Ballard" an excellent recommendation. Leopold then took the car around for about two hours and returned it to the agency, telling the salesman that he would pick it up later when he needed it. Loeb and Leopold had already used their aliases to open up bank accounts. They intended to deposit the ransom money in these accounts.

Several weeks before the crime, Leopold and Loeb had boarded the 3 p.m. train for Michigan City, Indiana, which was just outside Chicago. Loeb brought along some small parcels to simulate the size of those in which the ransom money would be paid and threw these parcels from the rear platform of the observation car at points selected by Leopold, open fields where Leopold had, months before, spent time studying birds.

Returning to the car rental agency, Leopold obtained a car on May 20, 1924, and he and Loeb then drove to a hardware store on 43rd and Cottage Grove Avenue. Here they purchased a chisel, a rope, and hydrochloric acid. All these were tools of murder. The rope was to be used to garrote their victim, the chisel to stab him in case he struggled too much, and the acid to obliterate their victim's identity. The murderous pair debated the use of sulfuric acid before opting to use hydrochloric.

On the morning of May 21, 1924, Loeb wrapped adhesive tape about the handle of the chisel to allow a firmer grip. This, along with the rope and acid, were placed in the rented car, along with strips of cloth to be used to bind their victim, and a lap robe to cover the body. A pair of hip boots were also put into the car to be used in burying the body in a swamp the killers had previously selected. Both Leopold and Loeb each pocketed a loaded revolver, and Loeb carried the ransom note typed the day before. This note demanded $10,000 for the return of the victim, who they had no intention of returning.

Neither boy needed the ransom money, but they had to make it appear that the kidnappers were lowly, money-craving underworld types, motivated by cash, not the "supreme thrill" they both sought. This element of the plan Loeb thought to be the most ingenious. Police, he told Leopold, always pinned their investigations on motive and worked backward; with the false clue of cash-hungry kidnappers planted, the police would never look for two respectable, well-to-do students. Never, he said.

The most bizarre aspect of these dark procedures was the fact that on the very day they planned to commit the crime, May 21, 1924, the boys had not yet picked out a victim. This cold indifference was the root of their inhumanity, their utter lack of moral code. They did not care about the human life they were about to take. The identity of their victim was of total unconcern to their clinical minds. The person to be killed was merely another element of their test to prove their own superiority. The victim was a number, an object, a thing. Leopold and Loeb sat down and wrote out a list of possible kidnap victims. First they thought to kidnap and murder Loeb's younger brother, Tommy, but they dismissed the idea, only because both felt that it would be difficult to collect the ransom from Loeb's father and that Loeb might arouse suspicion.

Little William Deutsch was then discussed. He was the grandson of multimillionaire philanthropist Julius Rosenwald. He, too, was eliminated since Rosenwald was the president of Sears, Roebuck and Co., and thus, Loeb's superior. The Deutsch boy was simply "too close to home" for the murderous youths. Richard Rubel, one of their few friends, was also considered as a candidate for the kidnapping-murder. Rubel often had lunch with Leopold and Loeb, but he was dismissed after the killers concluded that his father was a tightwad and would probably refuse to pay a ransom for his son.

What to do? The boys finally decided to pick a random victim in the neighborhood. They got into the rented car and cruised around a few blocks near Leopold's home, focusing upon the young boys coming and going from the Harvard Preparatory School. This was an exclusive school which was attended by children of wealthy parents.

As they drove about, the killers casually discussed their problem. They agreed that they should select a small child since neither of them was strong enough to subdue a child with any strength. They stopped next to the Harvard School yard, spotted little John Levinson, and decided then and there that he would be their victim. But since neither knew the address of the Levinson family, they drove to a nearby drugstore and looked it up in the phone directory. They wanted to make sure that they would have the correct address in order to send the ransom note. By the time the pair drove back to the schoolyard, the Levinson boy was leaving. Leopold, who had brought along binoculars for the purpose of selecting a victim at some distance, spotted Levinson across the field.

Loeb drove at considerable speed around the block in order to catch up with their prey, but the Levinson child went up an alley and vanished. Frustrated, the pair drove about aimlessly, searching for a victim. As they drove down Ellis Avenue, they spotted some boys playing. One of them was Right: Heir to millions, 14-year-old Bobby Franks was selected by Loeb and Leopold at the last minute as their murder victim.

Dear Sir:

Proceed immediately to the back platform of the train. Watch the east side of the track. Have your package ready. Look for the first LARGE, RED, BRICK factory situated immediately adjoining the tracks on the east. On top of this factory is a large, black watertower with the word CHAMPION written on it. Wait until you have COMPLETELY passed the south end of the factory - count five very rapidly and then IMMEDIATELY throw the package as far east as you can.

Remember that this is your only chance to recover your son.

Yours truly,

GEORGE JOHNSON

MR JACOB FRANKS

Should anyone else find this note, please leave it alone. The letter is very important.

The ransom note sent by Leopold and Loeb to Jacob Franks, which promised the return of Bobby Franks if they received Bobby (or Bobbie) Franks, a distant relative of Loeb's. "He's perfect," Loeb stated, telling Leopold that the Franks child came from great wealth, that the boy's father, Jacob Franks, was a multimillionaire box manufacturer, and could certainly afford to pay the ransom for his child, one he doted upon. After parking the car at a curb, Loeb called 14-year-old Bobby Franks to the car. Loeb asked Bobby if he wanted to go for a ride.

"No thanks," Bobby said. He looked at Leopold who gave him a long, hard stare. "I don't know this man," Franks said, pointing to Leopold. There was some apprehension in his voice. "Besides, I have to go home," he said. Loeb persisted, telling Bobby that they would drive him home. He recalled playing tennis with the Franks boy and knew the child had an avid interest in the sport. Loeb then told Bobby that he had a new tennis racket he wanted to show him.

The Franks boy got in the back seat of the car. Leopold remained in the front seat behind the wheel, driving and Loeb got into the back seat with Bobby Franks. Leopold drove northward as Loeb fondled the rope he intended to use to strangle Franks. He quickly discarded this idea as being too clumsy. He grabbed the chisel and with four lightning moves, stabbed the startled child four times. The helpless child fell to the floor, gushing blood from savage wounds to the head.

Leopold turned briefly while driving to look in the back seat to see the dying boy. He saw the contemptuous sneer on Richard Loeb's face. Loeb had enjoyed killing the child and said so. Leopold winced at the sight of the blood and groaned: "Oh, God, I didn't know it would be like this!" Leopold continued driving through heavy traffic. Meanwhile, Loeb ruthlessly tied up the child, stuffed strips of cloth in his mouth, and then threw the lap robe over him.

Bobby Franks lay on the floor of the back seat of the sedan slowly bleeding to death. Leopold kept driving about aimlessly until dusk. He then parked the car and the boys went to a restaurant to get sandwiches. They were waiting for the cover of darkness before hiding the body at a site selected earlier. Leopold called his father and told him he would not be home until late that night.

The boys then got back into the car and began driving south. They stopped at another restaurant and ate a heavy meal, finding themselves famished, even though they had just eaten sandwiches. Outside, parked at the curb, the windows of the car open, the lap robe and the body of the Franks boy beneath it was open to the view of all passersby. This was another element of the contempt the killers displayed for the ability of anyone to detect their crime.

It was Loeb's belief that no one in the world cared about anyone else. He joked with the somber Leopold about the fact that anyone passing the car outside could lean through the windows and pick up the robe and discover the body. "But nobody will," he said in a low voice. Both were wholly insensitive to the murder they had committed. They ate their way through a five-course meal, concerned only with completing the routines they had established for themselves.

At nightfall, the killers got back into the car and drove to an area called Panhandle Tracks at 118th Street. Here a swamp drained into an open culvert and this was the spot they had selected as the burial site for their victim. Loeb got into the back seat of the car and checked the Franks boy. "He's dead," he announced proudly. He then stripped the boy of his clothes and poured the acid over the child's face to mar his features and prevent identification. While Loeb was performing this monstrous task, Leopold was slipping into his pair of hip boots. He then took the child, walked to the culvert, and stuffed the body into the pipe.

Jacob Franks (shown in court), never paid the ransom for his abducted son Bobby, learning that the boy was dead before he could make payment.

It was difficult work and Leopold removed his coat. As he did so, he made the one mistake that would spoil the so-called "perfect crime" he and Richard Loeb had so carefully planned. His glasses fell from the pocket of his coat. Moreover, he believed that he had thoroughly hidden the body of their victim, but in the darkness he failed to notice that a small, naked foot protruded from the drainpipe. He grabbed his coat and went back to the car.

The boys then parked the car near a large apartment building. They noted that the back seat and the lap robe were stained with Bobby's blood. They abandoned the car and then burned the robe in a vacant lot. They went to Leopold's house and there burned all of Bobby's clothes, except the metal he had been wearing, his belt buckle and class pin. They typed the Franks' address on the envelope of the ransom note and then left, driving to Indiana where they mailed the note and buried the class pin, belt buckle, and shoes of Bobby Franks.

The killers then drove back to Chicago and Leopold called

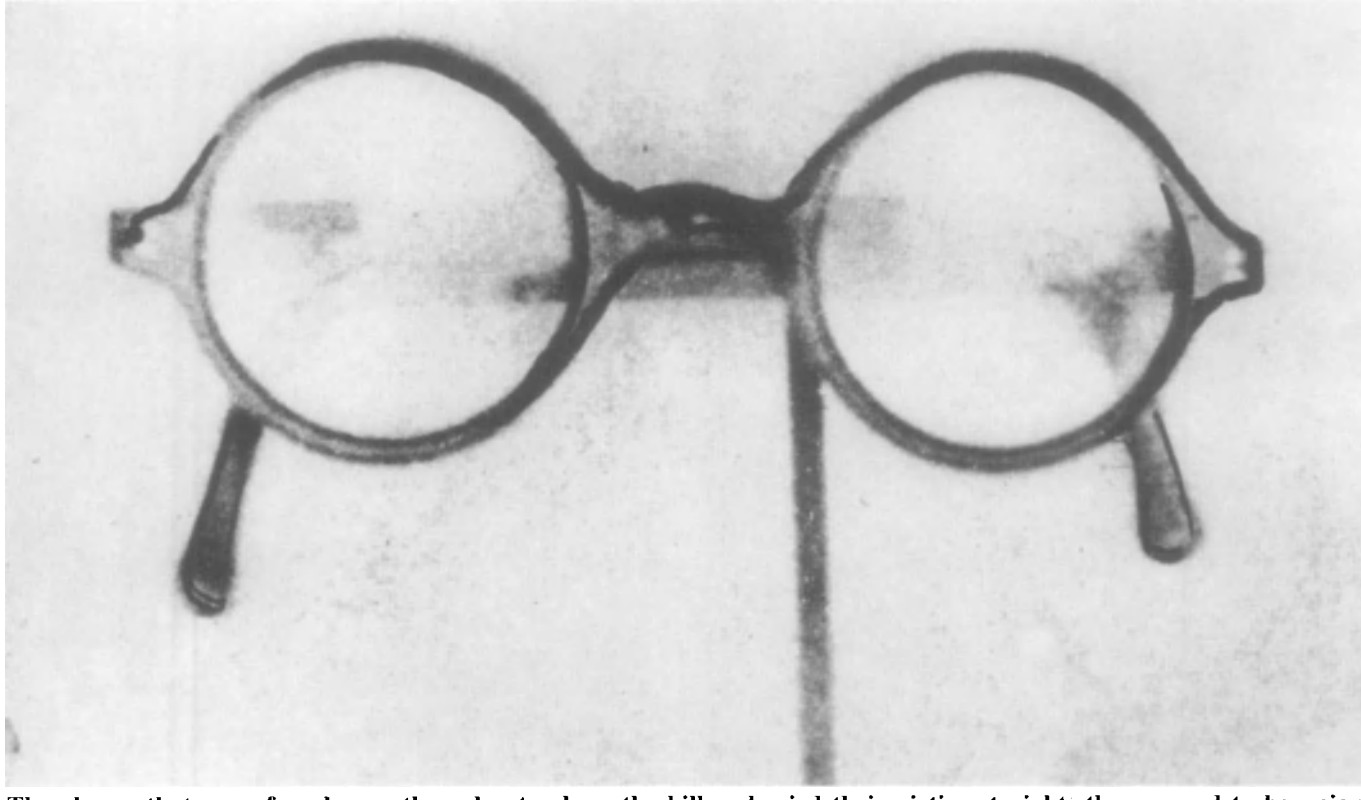
In an incredible photo, Richard Loeb (wearing light coat at extreme right) is shown helping detectives search for the missing Bobby Franks; Loeb's ego compelled him to subtly challenge the police by appearing to help them in their quest for the boy he had murdered.

Jacob Franks, who had been worried ever since his child failed to come home that afternoon. Leopold told Franks: "Your boy has been kidnapped. He is safe and unharmed. Tell the police and he will be killed at once. You will receive a ransom note with instructions tomorrow." Without allowing Franks to respond, Leopold hung up. The boys then made themselves drinks and played cards until past midnight in Leopold's room, working out the final details of their "perfect crime."

A ransom note signed "George Johnson" was delivered to Franks the next day. It demanded that Franks pay $10,000 for the return of his child, the payment to be made in twenty- and fifty-dollar bills. The bills were to be placed in a cigar box and this box was to be wrapped in white paper and then sealed with wax. Franks would receive more instructions at 1 p.m. that day, the note stated. Franks had by then notified the police of his son's kidnapping through his lawyer. The police were told that the Franks wanted no publicity in fear that the kidnappers would murder their child, as the anonymous caller had threatened.

Meanwhile Leopold and Loeb had second thoughts about the bloodstains in the rented car. They retrieved it, drove to the Leopold house, and parked it in the family garage. Sven Englund, the Leopold family chauffeur, noticed the boys scrubbing down the back seat of this car. When he asked them about it, they told him that they had been drinking

Chicago police detectives are shown inspecting the culvert, where a railroad worker found the body of Bobby Franks; he had been stabbed, strangled and beaten to death.



The glasses that were found near the culvert, where the killers buried their victim at night; they proved to be unique prescription glasses that belonged to Nathan Leopold, Jr.

The typewriter, which the killers used to write the ransom note—its keys ripped out by Loeb—was recovered from the Jackson Park lagoon, where the boys had tossed it, and later traced to the killers, another mistake made in the so-called "perfect crime."

An apprehensive Richard Loeb, sits uncomfortably at the wheel of the Willys-Knight car that had been rented on the day of the murder, while State's Attorney Robert E. Crowe interrogates him; by this time Crowe was convinced he had nabbed the killers.

Classmates of the slain Bobby Franks carry his coffin-encased body, en route to a funeral home; at that moment Leopold and Loeb were held in hotel suites, where detectives played a cat and mouse game with the two murderers, trying to "break" them.

State's Attorney Robert Crowe, center, and his staff pose with Loeb, left, and Leopold, right of Crowe, following the confessions of both youths; they blamed each other for the actual killing but most assumed Loeb had murdered Bobby Franks.

Clarence Darrow, America's most celebrated criminal defense attorney, center, is shown with Nathan Leopold, Sr., and Jacob Loeb, who reportedly paid him fabulous retainers to save the lives of their murderous sons. (Another report had it that Darrow received only $30,000 from the elder Leopold, and that the senior Loeb paid nothing, reneging on his promise to pay an estimated $1 million.)

Darrow, center, with his clients, Leopold, left, and Loeb, right, before the bench at their arraignment for murder; Darrow's clients proved to be arrogant and often uncooperative, while he attempted to mount what all believed to be a hopeless defense.

wine in the back seat of the car, borrowed from a friend, and had spilled wine on the seat. They were merely trying to remove the stain before returning the car to their friend.

Englund, who had been berated and humiliated by both Leopold and Loeb over the years, would later prove his lack of affection for Leopold by staunchly maintaining that Leopold's own car never left the family garage on the night of the Franks murder, rebuffing Leopold's claim that he and Loeb had been using Leopold's car that night, cruising for girls.

Upon reflection, Loeb concluded that the murder plan was not perfect after all. The typewriter on which the boys wrote the ransom note bothered Loeb. Even though it was an item stolen the previous year, he feared its discovery. Leopold drove through Jackson Park slowly while Loeb tore the keys from the typewriter and threw them into a lagoon. He threw the dismantled typewriter into another lagoon. By then it was time to contact Jacob Franks once more. Loeb boarded a train en route to Michigan City. He went to the observation car and, at the writing desk of this car, left a note addressed to Jacob Franks in the telegram slot of the desk, behind many forms.

This move would present yet another wrinkle in the "perfect murder" plan. Loeb wrote on the envelope: "Should anyone else find this note, please leave it alone. The letter is very important." Loeb got off the train at 63rd Street to be met by the waiting Leopold. Apparently, the boys intended to inform Franks that the note was on the train and have the victim's father personally retrieve it. However, Andy Russo, a train worker, rummaged through the forms in the telegram slot looking for a piece of paper to write on and found the letter addressed to Franks. Russo personally delivered the letter to Franks the next morning.

By this time, however, Jacob Franks knew that his little boy was dead. A member of a train crew working alongside the culvert, where the body had been hidden spotted the boy's foot sticking from the drainpipe and the corpse was quickly removed and identified by a member of the Franks family. The newspapers were given the full story and huge headlines announced the brutal murder.

A massive, widely publicized manhunt for the ruthless killer ensued. Scores of suspects were picked up, hustled into police headquarters, and grilled. Leopold and Loeb quickly realized that no ransom would ever be paid and that their perfect crime had serious flaws. Leopold grew silent and morose. He kept to his room, staying out of the limelight. Richard Loeb, however, reveled in the manhunt and played amateur detective. He boldly approached police officials searching through his neighborhood for clues and arrogantly offered his sleuthing services.

Loeb babbled his crime theories into the ears of detectives and followed them about during their investigations. To one he remarked: "If I were going to pick out a boy to kidnap or murder, that's just the kind of cocky little son-of-a-bitch I would pick." The detective took a long look at Richard Loeb and then encouraged him to talk further, inviting the self-appointed sleuth to accompany officers on their quest for the killer. Such conduct on the part of killers was not uncommon. In this instance, Loeb's voluntary aid to the police was spawned by his desire to present himself as a suspect and still outwit them. It was all a game, a challenge to Loeb, who felt himself superior to the "dumb coppers" who bumbled about looking for a killer, who was right beneath their noses and secretly jeering at them.

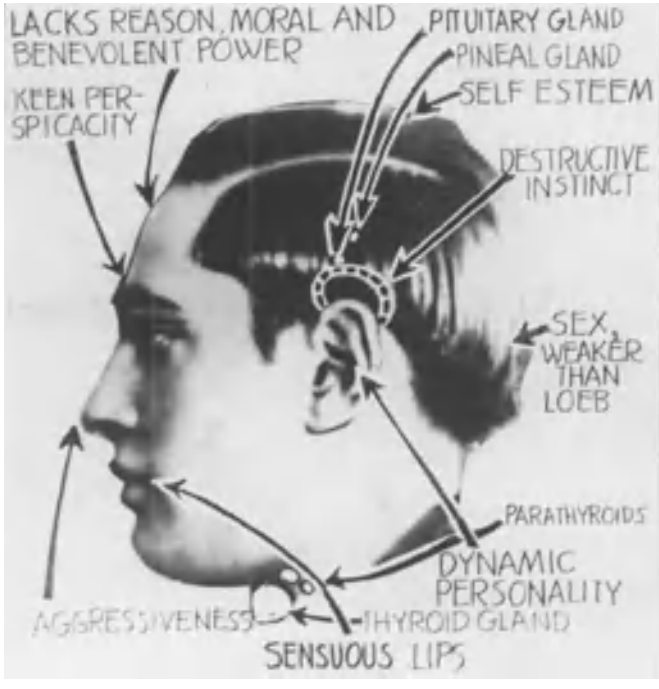
Then the "bumbling" police began to make discoveries that unnerved Loeb. Loeb's stolen typewriter was found in the shallow waters of the Jackson Park lagoon and the keys to it were found in another lagoon. Then the bloody, tape-wrapped chisel was found. The most startling discovery was that of Leopold's glasses. The police traced the horn-rimmed glasses to the manufacturer, Albert Coe and Co. Officials at the firm reported that the glasses were unusual, the frames being specially made for only three people. One pair belonged to a lawyer, who had been visiting Europe for some time. The second pair was owned by a woman and she was wearing them when police arrived to interview her. The third pair had been sold to Nathan Leopold, Jr., dear friend of Richard Loeb, the boy who had been dogging the footsteps of investigating detectives, the self-appointed Sherlock Holmes of Chicago.

Robert E. Crowe, the shrewd, tough state's attorney for Cook County, had Leopold brought into his office for questioning. He showed him the glasses and asked him if they were his. Leopold said no, his glasses were at home. Crowe sent Leopold back home with two detectives, but thorough searching of the Leopold home failed to produce the glasses. Then Leopold was told that the glasses had been found near a culvert at 118th Street, and Leopold, thinking fast, told Crowe that he often went to that area for his bird-watching studies.

Crowe was hesitant to charge Leopold, initially believing that he was a victim of circumstance. He came from incredible wealth and his social position was lofty. There was no reason for Crowe to believe that Leopold had anything to do with the killing of Bobby Franks. Yet he had Leopold interrogated by two detectives who kept questioning him about his glasses and his whereabouts on the night of the murder.

Chicago newsmen are shown in the press room of the courthouse where the Leopold-Loeb trial occurred, these scribes drinking coffee spiked with bootleg booze; Jake Lingle, of the Chicago Tribune (third from left in hat, holding a sandwich) was murdered seven years later on orders of crime czar Al Capone—see Gangs, Gangsters and Organized Crime); Hilding Johnson (in foreground at right, wearing cap), a star reporter for the Chicago Daily News, became the role model for the colorful "Hildy Johnson" in the celebrated play (and later film), The Front Page, by Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur.

This annotated illustration of Richard Loeb, created by phrenologist James N. Fitzgerald, purports to pinpoint the criminal nature of Loeb through an examination of his physiological characteristics.



Fitzgerald also created a "criminal profile" of Nathan Leopold, Jr., again pinpointing the degenerative nature of the murderer, employing the methods of phrenology, which has long since become a discarded science.

Leopold first stated that he could not recollect what he was doing on the night of May 21, 1924, but he later said that he and his friend Richard Loeb had been driving around looking for girls and picked up two attractive girls named Edna and Mae. He could not remember their last names. The four of them, Leopold insisted, had gone to a Chinese restaurant on the South Side and had dinner on the murder night. Leopold then said that he and Loeb had been drinking gin out of a flask and that he did not want to talk about his outing with Loeb and the girls because Loeb's father strongly disapproved of drinking and he did not want his friend Loeb to get into trouble.

Leopold truthfully said he did not know the murdered boy, but was acquainted with his family. He admitted to reading "everything I could find" about the murder in the local papers. He also said that he had seen photos of the glasses found at the murder site, but he never believed them to be his own, which he had lost near the spot some time earlier. Leopold stressed his ability to buy anything he wanted, implying he had no need to kidnap anyone to obtain ransom money. "My father is rich," he said. "Whenever I want money, all I have to do is ask for it. And I earn money myself teaching ornithology."

Crowe realized that, despite Leopold's high social position, he was a primary suspect in the killing of Bobby Franks. He ordered Leopold taken to a comfortable room in the LaSalle Hotel and questioned further. Crowe also ordered Richard Loeb picked up and taken to another room in the same hotel. He was also to be questioned to see if his statements contradicted Leopold's. They did.

Loeb insisted that on the murder night he was at home. He had not gone anywhere with Leopold. He said nothing of the two girls. No one but Crowe and a few high-ranking police officials really believed that either boy was guilty of the Franks murder. Newspaper reporters who knew the boys were allowed to interview them and felt they were innocent, caught in a web of circumstantial evidence.

Both boys remained calm and freely talked to reporters and the police. They were officially under arrest, but they were not formally charged. They were held as "guests" of the city while the lengthy interrogations went on. Their families did nothing to free them, believing that the youths would soon be released and that the questioning was merely a matter of routine.

Crowe continued to play the fatherly host to the boys. He even took them to the posh Drake Hotel where they leisurely ate an expensive dinner for which the city paid $102, a lavish sum for those days. For Crowe it was money well spent. One reporter later claimed that he interviewed Leopold who modestly displayed "his superior education." The reporter was so impressed with the calm demeanor of Leopold that he asked a psychiatrist friend to interview Leopold, which he did. The psychiatrist later stated that "this boy certainly had no part in the murder." The psychiatrist later denied having made any such statement.

Leopold appeared to be cooperative at every turn. He Clarence Darrow, right, in a masterful summary, is shown addressing Judge John Caverly, extreme left, in August 1924, one that moved the juror to tears and undoubtedly brought about Caverly's decision to imprison the youths for life.

Darrow, center, at the defense table, his youthful clients sitting behind him; he was exhausted by the trial, later stating: "From that day, I have never gone through so protracted a strain, and could never do it again, even if I should try."

Their lives saved, Nathan Leopold, Jr., left, and Richard Loeb, center, still smug and contemptuous of the law, are escorted into Illinois State Prison at Joliet to serve out life terms.

The prison photos and record of Richard Loeb; he was an incorrigible homosexual at Joliet, sexually preying upon any prisoner he coveted and paying off guards to look the other way during his attacks; he was stabbed to death in 1936 by a prisoner he attempted to rape.

said to one reporter: "I don't blame the police for holding me. I was at the culvert the Saturday and Sunday before the glasses were found and it is quite possible that I lost my glasses there. I'm sorry this happened only because it will worry my family. But I'll certainly be glad to do what I can to help the police."

It was apparent that Leopold was enjoying the limelight shed upon him by the press. He pontificated on art, literature, politics, sports, and especially philosophy, as if giving lectures, pointing out that he favored such writers as Oscar Wilde and Friedrich Nietzsche, but he added: "I won't add Socrates, for I never thought such a lot of him." Loeb adopted the same kind of superior air. For sheer arrogance and bluff, their equal had never been seen.

Leopold and Loeb family members believed that the police were merely using the boys to see if they had information that might lead to the identification of the real killer. Nathan Leopold, Sr., said: "While it is a terrible ordeal both to my boy and myself to have him under suspicion our attitude will be one of helping the investigation, rather than retarding it ...The suggestion that he had anything to do with this case is too absurd to merit comment." Loeb's father had been ill for several weeks and made no comment from his sickbed, but Mrs. Loeb coolly told a reporter: "The affair will so easily straighten itself out."

While the police were politely interrogating the boys, two newspaper reporters, Al Goldstein and Jim Mulroy, of the Chicago Daily News, conducted their own dogged investigation. They interviewed dozens of persons, chiefly the friends of Leopold and Loeb. One of them, Arnold Maremont, told Goldstein that he was a member of a legal study group to which Leopold belonged. The group met once a week to write "dope sheets" to prepare for examinations. Maremont stated that several of these meetings were held in the library of the Leopold mansion. He recalled that Leopold usually had a large Hammond typewriter, which the group used to prepare the "dope sheets." But in one meeting Leopold produced a small portable typewriter that was used to type some "dope sheets."

Maremont had some of these sheets typed on the portable typewriter, which Loeb had stolen in 1923. Goldstein and Mulroy took these pages to H.P. Sutton, an expert working for the Royal Typewriter Company. Sutton compared the "dope sheets" and the ransom letter and pronounced that they were one and the same. When confronted with this, Leopold still held onto his nerve, saying that the typewriter belonged to Maurice Shanberg, who had brought the typewriter to the study group.

Shanberg angrily denied this allegation and then Leopold, thinking quickly, stated that another student friend, Leon Mandel, owned the typewriter. Mandel was in Europe. Then Leopold said that the typewriter was still somewhere in his house. Another thorough search in the Leopold home failed to unearth the typewriter. Of course, the typewriter was the one found in the Jackson Park lagoon.

More and more evidence mounted against the boys. Sven Englund, the Leopold chauffeur, was brought in for questioning. Englund told Crowe that Leopold, contrary to Leopold's claim, had not used his red Willys-Knight car on the night of the murder. Leopold had insisted that he had been driving this car around that night with Loeb and two girls in it. Crowe turned to one of his aides and exclaimed: "God damn it! I think we got them!"

Crowe then ordered Richard Loeb into his office and Loeb was confronted with this new evidence. When he heard that Englund had insisted that he had been working on Leopold's car on the murder night, trying to fix its noisy brakes, and that it never left the garage, Loeb's face went ashen. He slumped in his chair and found it difficult to speak. Finally, he said: "My God! He told you that?" He asked for a cigarette and then let out a brief, low-voiced curse.

Leopold, in another room, was faced with the same evidence given by Englund. He remained passive and silent. "There were no two girls in that car, were there, Nathan?" one of his interrogators said. "Just one little boy, Bobby Franks. Why don't you come clean and get it off your conscience? Your alibi about driving around with Dickie Loeb and those girls is exposed as a lie by your family chauffeur." Leopold merely smiled, proving his superiority to such police tactics.

Loeb, on the other hand, had lost his composure as the questioning went on into the early morning hours of the day after the boys had been picked up. He trembled and was visibly shaken with each new question that pointed to his guilt. Crowe studied him for some time, realizing that though he was the leader of the pair, he was the weaker of the two and his veneer of bravado and haughty airs had evaporated. He showed all the signs of a trapped animal. Crowe then decided to bluff with the more stoic Leopold. At 4 a.m., he walked into the room, where Leopold sat calmly puffing on a cigarette and said: "Well, your pal has just confessed, told us the whole story."

A sneer passed Leopold's face: "Do you think I'm stupid. I'm not going to believe that. Anyhow, it's impossible. There's nothing to confess!"

Crowe had all the evidence and more. His men had tracked down the rented car used in the murder and then traced its user to the Morrison Hotel. The car rental agent and employees at the hotel identified a photo shown to them by detectives as that of Morton D. Ballard, the young man who had rented the car and had checked into the hotel. Crowe walked back and forth in front of Leopold, saying nothing. He then stopped and slowly removed his glasses, wiping the lenses meticulously as he stared down at Leopold, who stared back at him.

Crowe then slipped the glasses into the breast pocket of his coat, much in the manner Leopold claimed he had done before losing his glasses at the culvert area. Leopold smiled slightly at the ploy, but his smile faded when Crowe began to talk quietly. Said Crowe: "What about your getting the other automobile at the Rent-A-Car Company because your car was red and too conspicuously? What about the false identity at the Morrison Hotel? What about waiting in hiding on Ingleside Avenue for Johnny Levinson to appear? Your friend says you planned the kidnapping. He says you were the one who killed Bobby Franks."

Leopold crushed a cigarette angrily into an ashtray and then nervously lit another. He realized that only Richard Loeb could have provided the information Crowe had related. He had not, but Crowe had pieced this information together from various statements the boys had made to their interrogators.

The cells occupied by Loeb and James Day, the man who killed Loeb; guards were reportedly bribed by Loeb to put Day close to him.

James E. Day, who stabbed Loeb to death, was later acquitted, the killing termed "justifiable homicide," in that he was defending himself against a predator.

Nathan Leopold's cell at Joliet, where he was allowed to keep birds and pursue his ornithology studies.

Leopold concluded that his alibis and excuses were useless. He began to confess and Crowe had a court stenographer take down his statements. He then marched into the hotel room where Loeb sat and played the same game. Loeb nodded slowly and then he began to confess, detailing the murder of Bobby Franks. Their stories matched in every detail except one. Each said that they were driving the car when Bobby Franks was killed and that the other did the actual murder.

Most authorities later determined that Loeb was the actual killer. Their conclusion was based upon Loeb's statements; he described in exact detail how Leopold killed the Franks child, while Leopold could only offer slight information on how many times the boy was stabbed and how the rags had been stuffed down his throat to prevent his crying out. Both were nevertheless charged with murder.

When the boys were first brought together after their confessions, Loeb said to Leopold: "We're both in for the same ride, Babe, so we might as well ride together." Leopold turned to a detective and repeated his claim that Loeb was the killer. Loeb, hearing himself denounced by his best friend, sneered and turned to Crowe, saying: "He's only a weakling after all."

The fathers of these merciless killers realized that their sons were headed straight for the electric chair. They also knew that one man might save them from that fate, Clarence Darrow, the greatest criminal attorney of the day. Darrow was hired to defend the boys, but he knew that he had no hope of freeing the boys. Their guilt was completely established. They were also so unsavory that he could not make appeals on behalf of their inhuman characters. He took on their defense for only one reason.

The case offered an opportunity for him to attack the concept of government-sanctioned execution. "While the State is trying Loeb and Leopold, I will try capital punishment," he declared. He wisely chose to abandon a jury trial and pleaded his clients guilty before Judge John R. Caverly. Darrow knew Judge Caverly to be a fair-minded and exceptionally conscientious jurist, and he played to Caverly's sensitivities regarding the taking of human life.

For thirty-three grueling days, Clarence Darrow put on one of the greatest and most dramatic performances ever seen in a U.S. courtroom. His tireless assault on capital punishment remains a classic argument to this day. He fought with all his strength and intellectual powers. He also exhausted every ounce of his emotion to save two boys he himself had branded as guilty.

Darrow's summation was stunning. He ended with: "I am pleading for the future ... I am pleading for a time when hatred and cruelty will not control the hearts of men, when we can learn by reason and judgment and understanding and faith that all life is worth living and that mercy is the highest attribute of man ... If I can succeed ... I have done something for the tens of thousands of other boys, for the countless unfortunates who must tread the same road in blind childhood ..."

Judge Caverly was deeply moved by Darrow's appeal. He also stated that Illinois had never executed boys of the age of Leopold and Loeb, and having that precedent, sentenced both youths to life imprisonment for the murder of Bobby Franks and ninety-nine years each on the charge of kidnapping. Clarence Darrow had achieved the impossible. He had saved the lives of two youths who had, in everyone's mind, been destined for the electric chair.

Darrow's fee was reported to have been $1 million but he had difficulty in obtaining the one and only payment he did receive, $30,000 paid by Nathan Leopold, Sr. Loeb's father reportedly paid not a red cent. Jacob Loeb disowned his son, Richard, after the sentence and died a few months later. When Leopold finally paid Darrow, he handed him his check and then said to Darrow with the same kind of arrogance displayed by his son: "The world is full of eminent lawyers, who would have paid a fortune for a chance to distinguish themselves in this case." With that he walked wordlessly from the offices of the man who had saved his son's decidedly worthless life.

Leopold and Loeb were sent to the Northern Illinois Penitentiary at Stateville, outside Joliet. Though Judge Caverly had stated in his deliberation that both boys were to be kept separate for the rest of their lives, this order was immediately ignored once the boys were put behind bars. They were placed in cells separated only by one other cell. The "Fun Killers," as the press had dubbed them, were allowed desks, filing cabinets, and their own private libraries. Their cells, which were in a special wing, were left open at night so they could visit each other.

Nathan Leopold, Jr., shown overjoyed at the time of his prison release in 1958; he moved to Puerto Rico, where he married in 1961, working as a technician and dying in 1971.

Leopold and Loeb were separated from the rest of the prisoners and given special meals, often catered from restaurants, in the officers' mess. Both youths were permitted to walk freely outside the prison, where Leopold kept a garden. They washed in the officers' shower and they were provided with bootleg liquor and even narcotics for which they were charged $1 a shot. Visitors were allowed to see the boys at all hours and at any time, in total disregard of prison rules. Leopold and Loeb could make phone calls at any time from a phone in the prison storeroom. They had all the money they could use to bribe the guards and officials to continue living lives of relative comfort.

Richard Loeb was the worse offender of the two. While Leopold retreated into books and his garden, Loeb sauntered about the prison, selecting any young prisoner he admired and then foisting his homosexual attentions on his victim, while guards ignored his vile sexual assaults. In 1936, Loeb was attracted to a young prisoner, James E. Day. Loeb accosted Day in the library on one occasion and said that he loved him and that Day should "be broad-minded and be nice to me." Day, disgusted at such behavior, pushed Loeb away. But Loeb insisted that Day respond to his affection. Day later stated: "I never had a peaceful day. He was always after me. I became desperate. I had to get him off my back. I was looking for the right day."

The day occurred on January 28, 1936. Day was in the shower alone and Loeb entered, stripping and then trying to assault Day. Loeb brandished a razor and barked at Day: "Do as you're told! Keep your mouth shut and get your clothes off!" Day pretended to go along with the idea but then, when Loeb was off guard, Day kicked him in the groin and the two men struggled for the razor. In the fight Loeb slashed Day several times, until Day wrenched the razor away from him and used it to fatally slash Loeb. Loeb staggered naked from the shower, walking down a corridor before falling into the arms of another convict.

Loeb had been slashed fifty-six times. He was rushed to the prison hospital where his mother visited him within hours. Leopold was brought to his bedside and held his hand. Loeb said to his partner in murder: "I think I'm going to make it." He died a few minutes later. When Clarence Darrow was informed of Loeb's passing, he remarked: "He is better off dead. For him death is an easier sentence."

Nathan Leopold continued to be the star boarder at the penitentiary until his parole on March 13, 1958. He said at a press conference: "I am a broken old man. I want a chance to find redemption for myself and to help others." To that end, he traveled to Puerto Rico, where he worked as a laboratory technician in a small church. He later met Trudi Feldman Garcia de Quevedo, a widow who owned a flower shop. They married in 1961.

Leopold then wrote a book, Life Plus 99 Years. At a press conference connected with the book's release, Leopold was asked about the murder of Bobby Franks. He replied: "The crime is definitely still the central part of my consciousness. Very often it occupies the forefront of my attention, and I can think of nothing else. More often, it is not the center of my attention, but it always is present in the background." It was the same kind of mannered, cautious statement that Leopold had made when he was first confronted with his awful guilt by police in 1924.

A year after Leopold's release, the 1959 film, Compulsion, was released, starring (left to right) Bradford Dillman (in a Loeb role model), Dean Stockwell (in a Leopold role model) and Orson Welles (in a jarring role model of Clarence Darrow).

Bobby Franks, three decades after his death, was a memory in the mind of Nathan Leopold, where the victim had been an idea in Nathan Leopold's mind in 1924. Nothing really had changed. For all the posturing of remorse and rehabilitation, Leopold still observed his crime and his long-dead victim as a distant intellectual entity, not as a flesh-and-blood young boy whose life he and the equally perverted Richard Loeb had snuffed out in the exercise of their "perfect crime." Nathan Leopold, Jr. had gone on to live out a life. Bobby Franks had perished at age fourteen, slaughtered by two bestial killers who feared only the failure of their own mad schemes.

"THE REAL McCOY"/August 24, 1924

Norman Selby (AKA: Kid McCoy, The Real McCoy, 1873-1940), was a rough and tumble prizefighter from the bare-knuckle era, who left behind an enduring cliche in American slang: "the real McCoy." Although during Prohibition the phrase meant pure unadulterated alcohol, it originated before the turn of the century when Selby was in his heyday. "I'm in a saloon with a charming lady as usual," the fighter recalled. "A drunk is making passes at her. I try to brush him off without too much fuss. `Beat it,' I says. `I'm Kid McCoy.' He laughs and says: `Yeah? We'll I'm George Washington.' I have to clip him a short one and down he goes. He wakes up ten minutes later, rubs his jaw, and says, `Jeez, it was the real Mc-Coy!'" That oft-told tale was recounted by Damon Runyon and other literary lions, who wrote of Selby's checkered career in and out of the prize ring.

Selby, calling himself Kid McCoy, won the middleweight and welterweight championships in 1895 and 1897. He flattened the reigning champion, Tommy Ryan, in a grueling fifteen-round affair after bluffing his opponent into thinking he was something less than advertised. Selby had sent a letter to Ryan before the bout begging him to "go easy," and carry him for a few rounds. Ryan eased up on his calisthenics and was wholly unprepared for what was to follow in the ring. "The bastard played possum!" cried Ryan after losing the decision.

Selby retired in 1897 at the age of twenty-four. He was worth half-a-million dollars, part of which was invested in a Broadway cabaret that became the favorite watering hole for celebrities of show business and the sporting world. In 1900 Selby was lured out of retirement for a bout with "Gentleman" Jim Corbett who beat him easily. Within the next two decades Selby married nine different women each one of whom took a sizeable chunk of his assets in divorce settlements. In 1924, his fortune all but gone, the out-of-shape ex-fighter moved to Los Angeles to work as a Hollywood movie extra. He accepted employment as a security guard in an aircraft factory and became friends with Hub Kittle, a celebrated flyer and a likely suspect in a number of holdups.

About this time, Selby began a dangerous affair with Theresa Mors, the wife of Albert Mors, one of Los Angeles' leading art and antique dealers. Mors did not appreciate it when the boozing fighter fell in love with his wife. His rancor only increased, when his wife filed for divorce and went to live with the "real McCoy" in an apartment at Hoover and Seventh streets. Happily in love, Selby proposed marriage and Mors readily accepted. Meanwhile, Mors filed a countersuit against his estranged wife naming Selby as corespondent. He advised the U.S. Treasury Department that Theresa Mors was involved in smuggling diamonds. By this time Selby had had enough. He warned Mors to leave his lover alone. Mors then had the police remove Selby from his home.

Norman "Kid McCoy" Selby, a boozing, brawling prizefighter who won the middleweight and welterweight titles in 1895 and 1897, married ten times and by 1924 was penniless when he was convicted of manslaughter and assault.

The press by now had gotten hold of this scandal and everybody had an opinion to offer to these snooping scribes. Sam Schapp, who owned a millinery store next to the antique dealer, described Selby as a dangerous opportunist bent on securing a $125,000 property settlement bound to come Mrs. Mors' way after her divorce went through.

By this time, Theresa Mors began to hedge in her relationship with Selby, but not enough to suit her estranged husband. Albert Mors began acting crazy. He stole from his wife, and then on the night of August 12, 1924, moved out of the family home in the Hollywood Hills to take up residence at the Westgate Hotel. He signed an alias on the guest register.

General Douglas MacArthur, among a bevy of famous people—including New York Governor Al Smith, entertainer Sophie Tucker and actor Lionel Barrymore—asked that Selby be paroled; the fighter was released in 1932, dying eight years later.

The room overlooked an alley only a few doors away from the flat Selby and Mrs. Mors had rented. Around midnight the tenant who lived one floor below heard a dull thud coming from Selby's apartment. She then looked out her window and saw a man racing down the stairwell; the fleeing man, she later claimed, was Albert Mors. Two hours later a drunken Selby appeared in a Hollywood police station asking to see the officer, who had forcibly removed him from Mors' home some days earlier. "It's lucky for him he's not here," Selby stammered. "And why was that?" asked one police officer. "Hell, I'll be in the can tomorrow," Selby replied cryptically.

The police drove Selby home and told him to sleep it off. At 3 a.m. the following morning Selby appeared at the bedroom window of Jennie Thomas, his sister. Looking haggard and drunk, Selby explained that he had just killed Theresa Mors. He then stumbled from the house and headed toward Mors' antique store, where he waited patiently for the owner to arrive. Armed with a .32-caliber pistol, he captured a janitor, Mors, and a clerk, ordering them all to sit quietly on one side of the room as the first customers entered. Selby then forced the customers to surrender their cash and valuables and freed only those who appealed to him. Later that morning, Selby shot and wounded a customer, who tried to escape. Fleeing from the store, he ran into Sam Schapp and his wife. "My God! What are you doing?" Schapp asked. Before they could make any sense of the situation, Selby turned his gun on them and shot them down.

Selby commandeered a passing car and tried to escape on foot, but was brought down by a passing policeman. Investigators later found Theresa Mors lying dead on the floor of her apartment, neatly covered by a bed sheet and a picture of Selby perched at her side. Questioned by Captain Herman Cline of the Los Angeles police, Selby, after he had sobered up, explained that Theresa Mors had committed suicide because of her despondency over her husband's attempt to frame her on smuggling charges. He went on to say that he had struggled with her, but the gun had gone off accidentally. Then, believing that he had killed the woman, Selby tried to drink himself to death, but had only succeeded in passing out. He recalled little or nothing about his armed invasion of Mors' shop.

Selby was arraigned on murder, armed robbery, and assault charges. The prosecution charged that the defendant had murdered his lover because she had decided not to marry him and planned to return to New York. Defense attorney Jerry Giesler represented Selby. Under cross-examination, he demanded an answer from Mors as to why he had checked into the Westgate Hotel on the night of the murder, a perplexing question that went unanswered. Giesler, whose client list would one day be studded with the names of some of Hollywood's biggest celebrities, tried to convince the jury that Theresa Mors stabbed herself with a butcher knife and then inflicted a gunshot wound. However, even he was forced to admit that such a maneuver would be difficult if she had in fact used her left thumb to pull the trigger.

The murder charge was reduced to manslaughter and Selby was found guilty after ninety-nine hours of deliberation. He was sentenced to one to ten years for manslaughter and one to fourteen years on each of the assault charges. He served eight years at San Quentin, during which time Governor Al Smith, Sophie Tucker, Douglas MacArthur, and Lionel Barrymore petitioned for his early release. Selby emerged as a tragic, but sympathetic figure who had won himself many friends during his incarceration. He was released in 1932 and married for the tenth and last time. In 1940, the year he died, Selby reflected on his times. "It's no fun telling people you're Kid McCoy if they've heard of you before." They hadn't. He died a forgotten man.

THE SUN-WORSHIPPER AND HIS "FIRE PRINCESS"/December 10, 1929

Following WWI, wealthy Americans, many of them young and purposeless, went to Europe, specifically Paris, where they embraced the expatriate life. Their lifestyle, though labeled as vice-ridden at home, was an expression of art in Europe. One of the leaders of these youthful effete, dilettantes was a young man who lived only for himself, Henry Grew "Harry" Crosby Harry Crosby in bronze; he was a Morgan heir and a playboy with a death wish.

(1898-1929). He was a sensualist and a part-time poet, a publisher of small books written by avant-guard writers. Crosby had made a career of glorious disillusionment; his fatalism was his only confidence. He was the saint of sophisticated sin, this heir to one of America's great fortunes. Crosby was the nephew and godson of billionaire J. Pierpont Morgan, and he would stain that illustrious heritage with murder and suicide.

Crosby, born into great wealth on June 4, 1898, in Boston's Back Bay, could boast of a lineage (though he expressed hatred for all that was ancestral in America) that ran to the marrow of the founding fathers. He was related to Alexander Hamilton, William Floyd, and other luminaries of the American Revolution. Riches had flowed into the Crosby coffers since the early seventeenth century when another relative, General Stephen Van Rensselaer, established a fiefdom on his land (through a Dutch grant) that ran for twenty lucrative miles along the Hudson River.

Harry's father, Stephen Van Rensselaer Crosby, a pillar of Harvard and Back Bay society, was the eternal club man who became a partner in the banking investment firm of F.S. Mosely. Harry's family ties knotted tightly about the vast fortunes of the richest man in America, if not the world at that time, J. Pierpont Morgan. It was as natural as sunrise that Harry would attend the exclusive St. Mark's preparatory school and then go on to Harvard. World War I interrupted the schedule with Harry sailing to France to become an ambulance driver just after taking his entrance examinations to Harvard in 1917.

For Crosby and his schoolmates, the war in Europe provided high adventure, an exciting excursion into danger. They looked upon the war as members of their class had earlier viewed those traditional European tours taken by the offspring of the rich before entering college. The difference became abruptly apparent when the youthful Crosby encountered horrible, mutilating death on the Western Front. The shock of recognition changed his life forever, especially after his close friends, Oliver Ames, Jr., Richard Fairchild, and Aaron Davis Weld, were killed in battle.

Worse still, on November 22, 1917, the 19-year-old Harry Crosby was hemmed in by a barrage as he attempted to rush his ambulance to a field hospital near Verdun with a friend bleeding to death inside. It was a brutalizing incident he was never to forget, writing ten years later in his diary (absent of almost all punctuation, a writing quirk): "The hills of Verdun and the red sun setting back of the hills and the charred skeletons of trees and the river Meuse and the black shells spouting up in columns along the road to Bras and the thunder of the barrage and the wounded and the ride through red explosions and the violent metamorphose from boy into man."

Crosby's abrupt loss of innocence was replaced by anger and resentment. He blamed God for the war and, in justifying his own slim survival, he concluded that there was a bit of the Superman about him; that he had been forged into a special human being who was, by birth and station, already special in his own mind, not unlike the egotistical postures assumed by Nathan Leopold, Jr. and Richard Loeb, who had attempted to commit "the perfect crime," and failed.

Crosby returned home with medals on his chest, including the Croix de Guerre, which he coveted and likened to achieving an "H" grade in college. Crosby impatient to get out of the service at war's end, begged his parents to prevail upon his omnipotent uncle, J. Pierpont Morgan, to "try and get me a discharge," according to Crosby's War Letters. "Anything can be done by means of graft." Whether or not Crosby meant for Morgan to use his considerable influence or merely buy off authorities to get him released early is not known. But there certainly was a thick venal streak in Crosby, among myriad eccentricities and vices, all of which, in his short life, he would tax to exhaustion.

When he was mustered out, Crosby arrived in New York and immediately went to the Morgan mansion where, in the absence of his uncle, he ordered a feast which he devoured alone while servants did his bidding. (He called them "lackeys" and "menials.") Then he began to down goblet after goblet of ancient, priceless wine until he was drunk. In that state, he later arrived by train in Boston, staggering into the arms of his waiting family.

Harry Crosby is flanked by his wife Caresse (left) and his sister Kitsa, at Deauville, France, in the early 1920s.

Harry's intoxication did not alarm Mr. and Mrs. Crosby; he was their only son and his ordeal in France was excuse enough for his unpredictable behavior. Crosby was quick to take up the same rationale, using his war experience for the rest of his short life as an excuse to wallow in the libertine life.

At first, Crosby seemed to adjust, entering Harvard where his grades were less than spectacular. He studied literature and language, excelling in French in which, by virtue of his war experience, he was fluent. Crosby, like many other veterans of that day, was allowed to earn a "War Degree" at Harvard, which granted a shorter time of study in achieving a degree as compensation for serving overseas. He graduated in 1921.

A year earlier, Crosby had met and fallen in love with a married woman; he was to develop a habit that approached mania of trysting with married women for the rest of his days. The buxom, attractive female, six years older than Crosby, was Mrs. Richard Rogers Peabody (maiden name Mary Phelps Jacob), whom everybody called Polly. They met at a beach outing and both were smitten. Crosby told his parents that he intended to marry Polly, no matter what the consequences.

The Crosbys recoiled in shock. Polly would have to divorce her husband, another scion of a Back Bay fortune, to marry their son, and divorce, at that time, was inconceivable. Yet Harry persisted, telling his father that he would kill himself if he failed to have Polly as his bride. Polly reciprocated Harry's dedication. Her husband, the youthful Mr. Peabody, was a gentleman about it all. He told his wife to think it over during a trial separation. Polly did exactly that, going to New York with Crosby. At the end of six months, she still asked for a divorce and Peabody, who became addicted to alcohol (he would later write about his alcoholism in The Common Sense of Drinking), agreed to let his wife go.

Harry and Polly married seven months after she received her divorce. Before that time, Crosby himself took to drink. He had accepted a desk job, arranged by his father, in the Shawmut National Bank in Boston, and hated it. He told his parents that he found Boston stifling, that the environment strangled his will to write great works. He promptly went on a six-day binge and quit his job. Next he begged uncle Jack (Morgan) to get him a job in Paris, something that would allow him and Polly to live in the "City of Light" where he could follow his artistic urges.

Morgan arranged for Crosby to work in the Paris offices of Morgan, Harjes & Co. Delighted, Harry asked Polly to marry him and they were wed on September 9, 1922, in New York City. Two days later, they sailed to France on the Aquitania. It was all idyllic, a fantasy come true; but then again, Harry Crosby had been born into fantasy and he always got what he wanted.

Crosby at the Four Arts Ball in Paris, 1928, with one of his many conquests, the identify of this woman unknown.

After living in expensive Paris hotels and running up staggering bills paid for by Crosby's relatives, Harry and Polly took a series of apartments, finally renting the huge flat once occupied by Princess Marthe Bibesco in St. Germain. For a year, Crosby halfheartedly worked at his uncle's banking concern, but he spent more time during each workday strolling the boulevards, drinking in bistros, and chasing women, than he did in his office.

Another rich relative, an older cousin, Walter Van Rensselaer Berry, who had been living in European luxury for more than a decade, learned of Harry's writing ambitions and suggested that he quit his job with Morgan. Crosby, using his older cousin as a sanction of the literary life, quit, and wrote his parents that he was, from that point on, dedicating his life to the muse, so would they please sell off a few thousand shares of the great amount of stock he held and forward spending money? The money, as usual, was provided. (Berry may well have been the role model for the wealthy uncle in W. Somerset Maugham's 1944 novel, The Razor's Edge, and his portraits of the rich young couple squandering their lives being based on the self-indulgent Crosbys.)

Crosby at the wheel of his Bugatti, 1926; like T. E. Lawrence ("Lawrence of Arabia"), he was obsessed by speed, as well as the rays of the sun.

Caresse Crosby, who imagined herself a patron of the arts, shown in one of her dramatic poses.

By 1923, the Crosbys set the style of the young rich expatriates in Paris. They exuded a sort of glossy, intellectual hedonism. Harry's new lifestyle as a self-styled artist now demanded that he seek release and "enlightenment" with women other than his wife. Among the many affairs he openly conducted was a torrid interlude with Constance Coolidge who was the niece of Frank Crowninshield, editor of Vanity Fair.

The darkly attractive and willful Constance, divorced from diplomat Ray Atherton, had once been the scandal of China, where her husband had been stationed. There she had raced horses and carried on in such a manner as to earn herself the sobriquet of "The Queen of Peking." Crosby, who met her at a racetrack in Paris, called her "The Lady of the Golden Horse." He was forever dubbing his mistresses with romantic names: Helen of Troy, The Tigress, The Lady of the White Polo Coat, The Sorceress, Nubile, The Youngest Princess, The Fire Princess. These were the names he used in his diaries in referring to his many sexual escapades.

Polly, whose name the Crosbys later changed to Caresse for alliterative, arcane reasons, seemed not to care about her husband's sexual adventures. She knew these "other" women well; they were social acquaintances and many of these ladies were introduced to her womanizing husband by none other than herself. Some in her careless social set went so far as to say that her indifference toward her husband's sexual adventures was rooted to her own latent lesbian nature.

Yet Harry was inexplicably loyal to Caresse. Constance Coolidge insisted Harry leave Caresse for her. When he refused, she went off to marry the Comte de Jumilhac, thereby becoming a rich and landed countess. Harry continued to see her periodically, considering her part of his stable.

There were others, many of them, including petite, dark Polia Chentoff, a Russian painter who excited the Crosbys with her weird, bizarre tales of famine in revolutionary Russia. On one occasion, she said that the people in her village were so hungry that they ate an American missionary who had brought them a little food.

While Harry's harem increased in numbers, Caresse was not idle. She, too, took on a series of lovers, boldly mentioned by Crosby in a letter to his overindulgent mother. "Caresse's boy friends are," wrote Crosby casually, "the Comte Civry, the Tartar Prince, Ortiz, Frans de Geetere (the husband of a couple who had been living on a barge docked on the Seine), Lord Lymington ..."

As early as 1923, Crosby had gotten the reputation of a crazy millionaire American who gave vent to any sensual urge and wrote poetry on the side. One of Harry's passions was attending the raucous Four Arts Balls which heralded the closing of the art academies in Paris each summer. These were nothing more than costume orgies into which Crosby hurled himself with glee.

In 1923, Crosby attended the ball wearing a Roman toga. He returned to his apartment stripped of this garment, his underpants, and all his money. Emerging completely drunk and stark naked, he staggered down the street and into his lodgings, to the amazement of his bug-eyed neighbors. Had this been the conduct of a resident Frenchman, the police would certainly have been summoned, but Crosby was too rich to arrest. Two years later, he found a monkey at the ball and got it drunk.

In 1926, Harry and Caresse shocked even the wild students attending the ball. Crosby appeared as an Incan chieftain, donning a loin cloth and coating his almost naked body with red ocher. Around his neck he wore a necklace of dead pigeons. Caresse matched Harry's abandon by appearing with a turquoise wig and was naked from the waist up, displaying her large breasts to hundreds of hooting students. (Caresse Crosby consistently complained that no female undergarments served as a proper halter for her mammae and, so she later claimed, she invented the brassiere.) The ball culminated with Caresse, breasts flopping wildly, being carried about the ballroom in the mouth of a papier-mache dragon, supported by dozens of students.

These balls were held in enormous halls, where as many as three to five thousand people jammed inside. Half of the guests were whores plying their trade. The police looked the other way on these occasions, tolerating any and all excesses, except assault and battery. It was not an uncommon sight, following the closing of the ball, to see hundreds of naked men and women dancing in the streets and atop cabs, and scores more fornicating in doorways and near the hall.

Before the balls, the Crosbys invariably gave a party which became the pre-ball party. Hundreds flocked into their spacious apartment to guzzle their gin-laced punch and fall to the floor in amorous embrace. In 1927, Crosby threw a party that alarmed even his own sense of expansive tolerance. Males in attendance mobbed his maid and almost raped her. Ushering out most of the guests, Harry retired to the bathroom with Caresse and other close friends, and all stripped and sank into the hot water held by an enormous, specially built bathtub. Then Harry painted himself green, grabbed a bag of snakes, and headed for the ball, where he distributed the reptiles as necklaces to horrified guests.

When bored with Paris, Harry would suddenly hustle Caresse off to Athens or Africa to see the sights and sample the perversions. In 1925, Harry and Caresse traveled to Tunisia, where they both made love to an 11-year-old girl named Zara. In Constantinople, on a later trip, Harry scouted the city to find just the right kind of entertainment and one night took Caresse to an enormous whorehouse, where they paid exorbitant prices to watch couples fornicate.

In Egypt, they visited a huge brothel, one of Harry's favorite visiting spots; the Crosbys sank into utter sexual perversion, seeking out young girls with which to sleep. It was here that they (especially Harry) developed an insatiable taste for opium and hashish, buying the drugs in great quantities. Crosby consumed so much opium on one occasion that he almost died from an overdose (he developed the habit of swallowing opium pills and mixing this with champagne).

The ancient land held a deep and morose fascination for the American millionaire. He collected strange artifacts from its crypts and tombs. On one occasion, he paid a large sum for three mummified hands of young girls, each having a blue ring on the forefinger. Another time he bought the skeleton of a young girl, which he pridefully hung in the library of his Paris apartment at 19 Rue de Lille. What cabalistic rites attended these purchases was never learned. Yet the mysteries of Egypt continued to hold Crosby in a trance throughout his short life.

His uncle, Walter Van Rensselaer Berry, had had an abiding interest in all things Egyptian, and his influence upon Harry to seek the answers to that land's mystical secrets was permanent. It was in Egypt that Harry Crosby became enamored with sun worship, following the ancient Egyptian rites to the sun god, Ra. He thought of the sun as God, and at every opportunity stripped naked and baked beneath its rays, absorbing its heat, its fire, until, toward the end of his life, the normally pale-skinned young man from Boston appeared to friends as a "red Indian."

Walter Berry further enriched Crosby's life when he died on October 12, 1927, leaving to Harry most of his estate and his collection of rare books, almost eight thousand tomes. This behest infuriated author Edith Wharton, who expected not only Berry's fortune, or part of it, but also Berry's library of priceless volumes. (The two had been lovers and Berry, an aristocratic, knowledgeable intellectual, had served as Mrs. Wharton's mentor.)

Crosby with a 13-year-old Berber girl in Touggpourt, Algeria, 1925; he holds an opium pipe, which provided one of his favorite pastimes.

Crosby made a mocking celebration out of his cousin's funeral. He supervised with elaborate pomp the cremation of his cousin and sneeringly greeted distinguished mourners at the funeral in Paris, while Crosby and Wharton vied for the dead man's library. Crosby feared that Mrs. Wharton, who, under the Berry will could choose whatever books she wanted, would swallow the entire library. Harry thought of her as "a bad sort," and Mrs. Wharton, according to Geoffrey Wolf, writing in Black Sun, told a friend that "Walter's young cousin Crosby turns out to be a sort of half-crazy cad." In the end, Mrs. Wharton selected only a few books and Harry received the bulk of the library.

That he read any of these rare volumes is debatable. What he did do with many of the books would have caused Mrs. Wharton, had she known, to collapse with apoplexy. The Berry library caused the normally spacious Crosby apartment to overflow with books; they were everywhere—in shelves on the walls and piled high on the floors of many rooms, so that the Crosbys had to move about the place through narrow paths. Harry solved the problem by giving hundreds of books away to complete strangers, cab drivers, prostitutes, bartenders, those whose interest in ancient literature was considerably less than ravenous. Crosby then amused himself by donning disguises, a rag peddler, say, and slinking through the open-air book stalls lining the Seine where cheap books were sold. He would slip from a bag slung about his shoulders many of his cousin's priceless books and secretly bury them among the tawdry novels. It amused him to think that uneducated book buyers would casually pick up one of Berry's cherished volumes for a few francs, not knowing the book's true value, which would also be the case with the unschooled book dealers along the Seine.

Crosby's own literary aspirations were grossly inflated by himself, his wife, and his friends. He and Caresse started the Black Sun Press to publish their own awkward poetry and then expanded to include the most well-known writers of the day, including Ernest Hemingway, James Joyce, Ezra Pound, and others, but these writers merely tolerated the Crosbys, giving them fragmentary works that were expensively published and for which the authors received handsome payments. D. H. Lawrence, for instance, demanded that the millionaire playboy pay him for a short work in gold pieces, and Harry dutifully complied.

Literary figures Crosby admired repeatedly told him he was a talented poet. They should have known better, but perhaps they were merely stroking the golden goose. As a result of such boulevard flattery, Crosby began to submit his material to other publications, but not before he made substantial financial contributions to such struggling expatriate periodicals as Transition. In this fashion, Crosby's neurotic, erotic poetry found a wider audience than the Black Sun Press could provide. To the literary set, he quickly became known as a weird playboy poet whose work screamed doom and death.

To Ernest Hemingway, Crosby was certainly nothing more than a rich social acquaintance who paid the way at the restaurant and racetrack during the author's lean years. It amused Hemingway, once he learned of Crosby's fanatical sun-worshipping, to jibe him about it. From Cuba in 1929, Hemingway sent Harry a newspaper clipping that ridiculed sun-worshippers, but it did not daunt Crosby's belief in the ancient rite.

By 1928, Harry Crosby had become hopelessly involved in himself. He lived only for pleasure. More and more, he escaped the real world to indulge in his fantasies, not unlike the time when he was on the way to a Paris bank to place Caresse's expensive jewelry in a safe deposit box. He spotted an attractive female relative, a distant cousin, and drank with her, attempting to seduce her. When Crosby departed the cafe, he left Caresse's jewels behind; they were never found. Crosby's drinking increased; he sank into prolonged stupors from drugs and great quantities of absinthe (wormwood alcohol, banned even in Paris where the deadly drink had driven poet Paul Verlaine insane and killed others).

In 1928, Caresse and Harry moved into an old mill in the Ermenonville forest, near Paris, on the 9,000 acre estate of Armand de la Rochefoucauld, renting it by the year. Renovating the place, the Crosbys turned the crumbling structure into posh spa-like quarters. They invited phalanxes of artists, writers, and bon vivants to spend weeks with them, drinking and cavorting. Hart Crane, the distinguished poet, who was published by Crosby, came to marvel at the luxury at the new Crosby dwelling and flaunt his insatiable homosexu-

Harry Crosby baking under the sun, which he worshipped like the Egyptian pharaohs of old, the burning orb becoming for him a symbol of life and death.

ality by seducing Crosby's chauffeur. (Crane would commit suicide in 1932 by jumping from a ship while sailing from Mexico to New York, swimming directly into the propellers.)

Guests at the Crosby mill were encouraged to drink themselves blind night and day, and when not blind with booze, to amuse themselves in the gleaming, enormous pool (into which they consistently jumped fully-clothed), or participate in donkey races which Harry religiously conducted. Some of the guests stayed but briefly at Harry's wild retreat. Writers Robert McAlmon and Kay Boyle, as recalled in Being Geniuses Together, left one of the wild parties late at night, going from the main building to the guest cottages after a riot erupted. "It's too damned depressing," McAlmon groaned to Boyle, "so depressing that I can't even get drunk. They're wraiths, all of them. They aren't people. God knows what they've done with their realities."

Reality had long run out on Harry Crosby. He shielded himself from it with money and the rays of the sun. Crosby was forever adorning his body with pagan symbols; in Africa he had crosses tattooed on the soles of his feet. In 1928, he paid a Hindu to tattoo a huge sun on his back in the dead of night as he lay face down in a boat wallowing on the Nile. It was also in 1928 that Harry Grew Crosby began planning his suicide and that of his wife. Caresse agreed with her husband to end their lives on October 31, 1942, a date arrived at through crazy-quilt theories of Harry's own mad invention, a doomsday date approximating their twentieth wedding anniversary.

The year 1928 was momentous for Crosby. It was also in that year, on July 9, 1928, that he met at the Lido Bar in Paris 21-year-old Josephine Noyes Rotch, a darkly attractive Boston socialite. He fell madly in love with her, calling her his "Fire Princess." For three weeks they carried on a torrid affair, but when Harry refused to leave Caresse for her, Miss Rotch sailed for the U.S. The following year, on June 21, 1928, she married Albert Bigelow, a wealthy member of a distinguished East Coast family.

Crosby brooded over the loss of another mistress. His extravagances increased as did his erratic behavior. He leaped into a cab one night to drive down the Champs Elysees in Paris, hurling gold coins to startled passersby. He bought racehorses he never raced, and lost fortunes through reckless, stupid gambling, paying for his debts by selling off huge blocks of stock. (In 1929, Crosby wired his father: "Please sell ten thousand dollars worth of stock. We have decided to lead a mad and extravagant life." This wire came as no surprise; the Crosbys had led nothing but the life of wastrels to that time.)

Desperate to occupy his hours with something, anything, that would provide stimulation, Crosby suddenly became obsessed with flying. This new mania led him to take many commercial flights between Paris and England (at a time when only a handful of passengers, at great expense, could cram aboard the small planes available, traveling at about 100 m.p.h. and at an altitude of no more than 1,000 feet). Looking down from a plane on one flight, it occurred to Harry Crosby that it would "be fun to drop bombs" on the peaceful French countryside below.

Crosby took flying lessons and, in his gnawing vanity, saw himself as another Lindbergh, to whom he bore a striking resemblance. He saw himself as a hero, a pathfinder, but he never went beyond student status as a pilot. Next came fast racing cars. Crosby raced for weeks, but soon exhausted his zest for dirt tracks, sputtering engines and oil-smeared hands. For a while, the would-be literary giant decided to become the world's greatest photographer and purchased almost every known camera. He tired of this, too.

Caresse tolerated her husband's excesses and went her own way, becoming engrossed with the duties of a publisher at Black Sun Press. Harry thought only of Josephine, his fire princess, and corresponded with her. His thoughts also, more and more, turned to suicide, about which he wrote reams of poetry and talked incessantly. He had apparently little regard for his own poetry. Early in March 1929, while staying at the old mill, he dragged out eighty-some copies of his self-published book, Red Skeletons, and blew them to pieces with a shotgun. He then burned the remains.

On November 18, 1929, Crosby received a wire from Mrs. Josephine Rotch Bigelow, urging him to come to her in America. Harry was at first reluctant to return to his native land. His last visit in 1928 produced in him a hatred for his hometown. In one poem, he called Boston a "City of Dead Semen." Worse, on that trip Harry had barraged Boston's literary bastion, Atlantic Monthly, with more than fifty poems, all of which were rejected.

Writer Ernest Hemingway, who sent Crosby a newspaper clipping that ridiculed sun-worshippers in 1929, the year Crosby decided to end his life.

But Crosby did return to America, accompanied by Caresse. Keeping him company on the boat trip was an other old flame, Constance, the Comtesse de Jumilhac. After going to Boston, Harry met with Mrs. Bigelow on November 28, 1929. Caresse went to New York and registered at the Savoy-Plaza Hotel on November 25, 1929. Her husband showed up three days later but stayed only a week. Harry then took a train to Detroit, where he had arranged to meet Mrs. Bigelow. He and Josephine registered under the name of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Crane, using the name of Crosby's poet friend, Hart Crane. The love tryst lasted for two days before both returned to New York and their spouses.

Crosby began drinking heavily in early December as he and his wife prepared to return to Paris. Hart Crane gave them a party, but Harry seemed disinterested, even when Crane let in a horde of drunken sailors whom he, Crane, attempted to seduce on the spot. Unknown to Caresse, her husband had broken more than his marriage vows; it was already settled in his mind that he would not live up to their suicide pact scheduled for 1942. He intended to end it in 1929 "with a bang, not a whimper," (Harry's convolution of T. S. Eliot's premise), and with another woman, the fire princess.

December 10, 1929, was an auspicious day for the Crosbys. They were to dine in the august presence of J. Pierpont Morgan, Harry's uncle. That morning, Harry and Caresse attended an exhibition by a sculptor, who had completed a bronze sculpture of their dog, Narcisse Noir. Then Harry abruptly left his wife, kissing her and telling her he would see her and his mother at "uncle Jack's." From there, they would join Hart Crane for dinner and the theater.

Following a quick lunch, Crosby took a cab to 1 West 67th Street, the address of the Hotel des Artistes and going to the duplex studio occupied by his friend, Stanley Mortimer, a portrait painter. Here, he met Mrs. Josephine Bigelow. They had met several times at Mortimer's and the artist, an obliging friend, had given Harry a key to his ninth-floor abode. They arrived together at noon to be greeted by Mortimer. They had a few drinks and then Crosby led Josephine to an upstairs bedroom with an overhanging balcony. Mortimer continued painting, but the couple leaned over the balcony and "kidded me," according to Mortimer later. "Crosby gave me a signal and I got on my street clothes and went out."

Crosby spent unknown hours in Mortimer's place with Mrs. Bigelow, who was later described as a "strange wild girl who delighted in saying things to shock people" and who was extremely possessive of Harry. Meanwhile, Crosby's wife and mother spent an uncomfortable tea-time with uncle Jack Morgan in the financier's behemoth mansion, trying to explain the absence of the errant Harry. Caresse and Mrs. Crosby finally left the Morgan house without waiting for Harry, returning to the Savoy, where they dressed for dinner. Still, Harry did not arrive. They went to the Caviar Restaurant and met Hart Crane. Halfway through the meal, she later claimed, Caresse had a terrible premonition, and left the table to phone Stanley Mortimer at his mother's house (this, of course, made it obvious that Caresse knew all along that her husband was not only meeting with Mrs. Bigelow, but was using Mortimer's apartment as a love nest). Mortimer told Caresse that he would go by his apartment and check on Harry.

Josephine Rotch Bigelow, a married woman who became Crosby's "Fire Princess;" he murdered her in December 1929, before taking his own life.

The artist reached his studio at 9:30 p.m. and found it bolted from inside. He knocked and called, but no one answered. Desperately, he raced to the superintendent of the building and demanded that he break down the door. The man wielded an ax to batter down the door. Inside, Mortimer found Harry Grew Crosby and Josephine Rotch Bigelow—he was then thirty-one, she twenty-two—both dead on his bed. A bullet hole was in Josephine's left temple, another in Harry's right temple. Both were fully clothed, according to later newspaper reports. Their left hands were entwined and Harry's free arm was wrapped loosely about her neck, the right hand clutching a .25-caliber Belgian automatic pistol.

Police arrived to find more than $500 in cash stuffed in Harry's pockets, along with the steamship tickets which Harry and Caresse were to use on their return voyage to France. Crosby had removed a gold ring, one he called his "sun ring," which he had promised his wife he would never take off. It had been flattened, as if he had stomped on it.

Caresse learned of the suicide-murder, as it was later termed by police, late that night. She did not go to the scene of the crime, nor did the Crosbys utter a word of the disgrace their son had brought down upon the family name. It became practice for decades that none of the Crosby relatives ever mention the name of Harry Crosby again.

The bizarre end of Harry Crosby and his Bryn Mawr-trained mistress captured the nation's headlines. The Chicago Tribune, which bannered the deaths with the headlines, CROSBY DIED FOR A THRILL, stated that: "As a writer and publisher and a wealthy, amusing fellow besides, Crosby just about set the pace for the whole crowd of expatriates, who credit him with having `lived more fully than any man of his generation.' None of his fast-moving crowd believe Crosby committed suicide for love, and are sure he sought death just to see what it was like ..."

But for Josephine, according to Deputy Chief Medical Examiner Thomas Gonzalez of New York City, there was no such intention. Gonzalez, along with Inspector Mulrooney, stated that, from the position of the bodies and the varying states of rigor mortis, Crosby had murdered Josephine, then spent several hours alone in the apartment before killing himself. Gonzalez was quoted as saying that homicide was obvious, along with "the expression of smiling expectancy on the dead face of the beautiful young wife, indicating that she had gone to her rendezvous expecting a caress, not deadly bullets."

Albert Bigelow arrived in New York from Boston the following day, while his wife and Harry were taken to separate mortuaries to await burial. The outraged husband, a Harvard man, told a reporter from the New York Daily News: "This man lured her to his apartment and murdered her. I don't believe in any suicide pact no matter what the police or anybody else says, and I believe my wife to be the victim of a mad poet who turned murderer because he could not have the woman he wanted and who was true to me."

Bigelow proved his loyalty to Josephine by having her remains buried in the family plot at Old Lyme, Connecticut. Harry's body was cremated two days later, and the remains were given to Caresse in an expensive urn which she took with her to Paris. (She would die on January 24, 1970, still promoting Harry Crosby to the world as an offbeat, misunderstood rebel poet who simply happened to be rich and had ended his young life more at the instigation of a reckless age than from his own hand.) Critic Malcolm Cowley further eulogized Crosby in his 1920s literary memoirs, Exile's Return, remarking about this supremely self-indulgent young man: "Harry Crosby, dead, had ...become a symbol of change ...In spite of himself he had died at the right time." It was Cowley's thought that the death of Harry Crosby signaled the close of the Roaring Twenties, the age of excess, only moments before a great night of depression and war blanketed the world.

Poet e.e. cummings (who used the lower case in his name) had the last succinct words, dealing with the murder-suicide as would a deadline-hounded newspaper editor, captioning the strange deaths with:

2 Boston
Dolls found with Holes in each other
's lullaby

THE MASSIES OF HAWAII/January 8, 1932

In the fall of 1931, Hawaii, then an American Territory, was a wild mixture of cultures—Hawaiian, Japanese, Filipino, Portuguese, Korean, and Americans. Racial unrest was the norm. In early September, the city of Honolulu began to experience a rash of rapes in which white women were dragged into an old touring car occupied by five "little swarthy men," taken to secluded spots, and sexually attacked. On the night of September 21, 1931, attractive 20-year-old Mrs. Thalia Massie, wife of Navy officer Lieutenant Thomas Massie (1900-1944), left a party at the Ala Wai Inn to cool off by taking a walk alone down the poorly lighted John Edna Road. Suddenly an old Buick drove alongside her and stopped. Five men were inside of it, Horace Ida, a Japanese who owned the large touring car; David Takai, another Japanese; Henry Chang, a Chinese; and Hawaiians Ben Anekuelo and Joe Kahahawai, a tough, well-built young man, who was a professional boxer.

Recently graduated from Annapolis, Ensign Thomas H. Massie is shown with his 16-year-old bride, Thalia Fortescue.

Four of the men leaped out of the car and grabbed Mrs. Massie, throwing her into the back seat of the car and speeding off to the Old Animal Quarantine Station, which Mrs. Massie recognized. She was dragged out of the car and when she offered resistance Kahahawai sent a powerful punch to her jaw, breaking it. Thalia Massie went limp and the five men pinned her to the ground and then took turns raping her.

After her attackers departed, Mrs. Massie, battered and bleeding, managed to stagger to Al Moana Drive and flagged down a car. She was taken home and Lieutenant Massie, still attending the party, was called. He rushed home to find his wife's face battered, her lips cut and bleeding, her eyes swollen and blackened. "I thought at first that she had been hit by a truck," Massie later recalled.

Thalia Massie collapsed into her husband's arms, sob-

Thalia Fortescue Massie, shortly before she was abducted while she was walking along a lonely road and brutally beaten and raped by five non-whites outside Honolulu, Hawaii, on the night of September 21, 1931.

Social grande dame of Long Island, New York, Grace Hubbard Bell Fortescue, a woman of iron will, flew to Hawaii after hearing that her daughter had been attacked and, upon arrival, took charge of exacting revenge.

bing: "It's awful, Tommy, the shame! I just want to die!" She then related the story of being raped by five natives of mixed race. She produced a scrap of paper on which she had written the number 58895, the license of the car the men had been driving. Police were summoned and the Buick was tracked down to Ida, who quickly involved the others.

These same five men had been arrested many times in the past, separately and in a group, for committing a number of sex crimes. All five had been previously accused of raping a Mrs. Peebles, but because of "lack of evidence" had been released. The five men were brought before Mrs. Massie, who identified each one of them as her attackers, adding: "I'd know those savages anywhere."

The news of this rape shocked the island and the story made front-page news in mainland U.S. newspapers. What was doubly shocking at that time was that the Massies were members of the social elite in Hawaii and came from distinguished, upper-class families. Lieutenant Thomas Massie was a quiet, gentle officer who had graduated with honors from the Naval Academy at Annapolis and came from a wealthy, much-respected Kentucky family.

Thalia had married Massie when only sixteen, but she had the blessing of her mother, Mrs. Grace Glanville-Fortescue, a wealthy society woman, whose husband was a retired army major. Mrs. Fortescue herself came from a prestigious Long Island family and was the niece of inventor Alexander Graham Bell. She and her daughter Thalia were listed in the Social Register.

While the rapists were jailed pending trial, Fortescue flew to Hawaii to be near her daughter. She was infuriated that such a brutal crime could be perpetrated against a white woman and said so publicly and to her friends in Hawaii, all members of the island's social elite. Fortescue also met with Admiral Yates Stirling, commander of the Navy base at Pearl Harbor. Stirling was livid about the attack. He told Fortescue that "our first inclination is to seize these brutes and string them up on trees, but we must give the authorities the chance to carry out the law. It will be slow and exasperating, but we must be patient."

On November 19, 1931, the five accused men were brought to trial. Hospital doctors testifying at the trial were of little help to the prosecution, stating that, indeed, Mrs. Massie had Joseph Kahahawai was accused of being one of the five men who raped Thalia Massie, but a jury set him and the others free, which incensed Massie and Mrs. Fortescue, who then planned their own brand of justice.

TERITORIAL POLICE
MAJOR ROSS, COMMANDING
SUMMONS TO APPEAR
KAHAHAWAI, JOE
Life Is a Mysterious and Exciting Affair, and Anything Can Be a Thrill if You Know How to Look for It and What to Do With Opportunity When It Comes

The bogus summons (created by Mrs. Fortescue, along with the cryptic newspaper text) that convinced the naive Joseph Kahahawai that he was under arrest and allowed his abductors to drive him away to his death.

been attacked, but they had found no real evidence of rape, no presence of sperm in her body. She was not, as popularly thought, pregnant at the time of the attack. Five white men and seven men of mixed races listened to arguments for fifteen days and then decided that there was not sufficient evidence to convict the defendants, even with Thalia Massie's sworn statements that each of the accused had raped her.

This travesty of justice inflamed the white community on Oahu. The rage over the jury decision was centered on the seven jurists of mixed races who, it was said, had freed the rapists because they were of their own race or nationalities (not unlike the prejudicial decision by the almost all black jury that acquitted O. J. Simpson more than sixty years later). Admiral Stirling summed up the attitude of the white community by later writing: "The criminal assault of a white woman by the five dark-skinned citizens had gone unpunished by the Courts. Sympathies have been aroused in favor of the accused men. Conviction was thus impossible."

The defendants did help their cause by making sneering remarks about Mrs. Massie and strutting about Honolulu as if they were victors of a boxing match. (These men were later portrayed in a far-from-the-truth TV movie as innocent youths who had been pilloried by a white society. In truth they all had police records as sex offenders.) The conduct of the defendants so enraged a group of Navy officers that, on the night of December 13, 1931, a group of officers seized Horace Ida and drove him to a remote spot, where he was beaten and pistol-whipped into unconsciousness and then left to make his way back to Honolulu. Ida had been dealt with in the same manner as had been Mrs. Massie, proper and ironic retribution in the minds of the men who attacked him.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Massie showed the signs of a nervous breakdown. The trial had been a tremendous strain on her and she had been held up to ridicule by defense attorneys whose snide inferences portrayed her as a loose woman, a flirt who invited the advances of white Navy officers. Groundless rumors following the trial had it that Mrs. Massie had not been raped by men of other races, but by a group of white Navy men, and that she had put the blame on the hapless Hawaiians.

Thomas Massie was also shattered during and after the trial. He was a taciturn young man who said little, keeping his emotional problems to himself. On rare occasions he stated that his wife had been victimized not only by the rapists, but by the publicity attending the trial; her reputation was ruined and he sought some sort of justice beyond the court system which had failed them.

Sailors Edward J. Lord, left, and Albert O. Jones, both members of the submarine boxing team, were recruited by Massie to aid in the abduction of Joseph Kahahawai.

To that end, Massie enlisted the aid of two sailors, Edward Lord and Albert Jones, who served under his command and held him in great respect. Massie had learned that Joe Kahahawai, the worst offender of the rapist group, reported each day to the court as a condition of his release. On the morning of January 8, 1932, Massie drove up to the courthouse with Jones. Massie was behind the wheel of a rented Buick, disguised as a chauffeur. Jones, in civilian clothes, got out of the car when Kahahawai appeared and stopped him before the Hawaiian entered the court building, showing him a fake summons to appear before a special tribunal. Kahahawai, who understood little English, shrugged and got into the Buick. Massie drove to a bungalow Fortescue had rented in Ala Moana Valley.

Lord posted himself on guard in front of the bungalow while Massie and Jones escorted Kahahawai inside. The Hawaiian stood before a desk behind which Massie sat, acting as inquisitor, while Jones held a gun on the burly boxer. Said Massie: "Okay, we're here to get the truth out of you and to beat it out of you if necessary. If you don't talk before the police get here, we'll beat you to ribbons. Now tell me, who kicked my wife, broke her jaw, and raped her?"

Kahahawai shook his head and said he was innocent.

Massie persisted, stating: "You're a prizefighter. Of course it was you who hit her. Be a man and admit it!"

Kahahawai then broke down, according to the later statements of Massie and Jones, mumbling: "Yeah, I did it all right. We all did it, all right. We attacked your wife."

What happened next was the subject of courtroom debate and historical argument for decades to come. Massie went into a blind rage at hearing this offhand admission of a brutal crime against his wife and grabbed a revolver and shot Kahahawai Kahahawai was taken to this bungalow, which had been rented by Mrs. Fortescue, and where Massie performed his kangaroo court, grilling the man until he admitted raping his wife, which sparked a murderous response.

Policemen remove the naked body of Joseph Kahahawai from the back seat of the Buick, which was stopped by officers after a five-mile chase, which was carrying Mrs. Fortescue, Massie, Lord and Jones; all were arrested.

once in the chest, killing him on the spot. Jones was interviewed many years later and claimed that Kahahawai leaned or lurched toward Massie at this point in the questioning, while Jones, who was holding a revolver on the man, instinctively squeezed the trigger, shooting the boxer dead.

Mrs. Fortescue and seaman Lord appeared in the living room of the bungalow at the sound of the shot and, after a hurried conference, decided to dump the body in a remote spot. At first Jones and Lord put the body in a bathtub, stripped it, and washed away all the blood. Then they wrapped it in a blanket, and placed the body in the back seat of the Buick. Massie, Fortescue, Jones, and Lord then drove toward Koko Head, thinking to dump the corpse in a canyon there.

Police, however, had already been looking for Massie, Jones, and Kahahawai, who had been seen leaving the courthouse at 8:30 a.m. by Kahahawai's cousin. They intercepted the Massie car and quickly discovered the body of the dead boxer. Fortescue, Massie, Jones, and Lord were taken into custody and charged with murder. The wealthy Fortescue immediately hired America's most famous criminal attorney, Clarence Darrow, who flew from Chicago to Hawaii to defend the foursome. The Massie case became an overnight sensation, a national cause celebre, with the races violently divided. Riots broke out in Honolulu and in various parts of the U.S., where race tension and strife was high.

Before his trial, Massie made a brief statement: "I'm sorry that this man has been shot, but it was no more than he asked for and deserved." By this statement, Massie established the line of defense in the trial, one which Darrow would vigorously pursue, that of the unwritten law, where a man defends his wife's honor at all costs and at all hazards to his own safety and well-being (the same defense that had been mounted in the notorious Harry Thaw murder case).

The U.S. Navy, rather than disavowing the actions of one of its officers, backed Massie to the hilt. Stated Admiral Stirling: "An Hawaiian rapist had been killed by the family of the tortured girl because they felt that legal justice was impossible." In Washington, D.C., Admiral William Lee Pratt, chief of Naval operations, went even further, issuing the following statement to the press: "American men will not stand for the violation of their women under any circumstances. For this crime they have taken the matter into their own hands repeatedly when they have felt that the law has failed to do justice."

Sympathies were generally with the defendants, although the Honolulu Star Bulletin thundered against the killing of Kahahawai, saying: "People who take the law into their own hands always make a mess of it ... There is no justification in civilized society for lynch law methods or premeditated killing of any kind." Stated the Honolulu Advertiser: "Vengeance which takes the form of private execution cannot be condoned."

Most were concerned with how Clarence Darrow would defend his clients, who were obviously guilty of murder. The greatest lawyer in the land had been reluctant to take the case, stating privately that he did not like "the smell of it." But his financial difficulties at the time were acute and he accepted Mrs. Fortescue's fee of $25,000 and an all-expenses paid trip to Hawaii for himself and his wife.

On April 5, 1932, Darrow appeared with his clients before Judge Charles Davis, stating that Massie had killed Kahahawai out of "mental illness brought on by extreme provocation." As usual, Darrow's magnetic presence in the courtroom held everyone in fascination. He walked about in his rumpled clothes, his silvery hair falling in front of his forehead.

Darrow intoned dramatically the series of events that led up to the killing of Kahahawai, emphasizing the awful ordeal undergone by Mrs. Massie at the hands of savage rapists, depicting how Mrs. Massie had been humiliated by the traumatic experience and how she had been emotionally unstable thereafter. The same kind of emotional instability seized the mind of Thomas Massie, Darrow pointed out, one which clouded his reason and judgment and led to the shooting of the murder victim.

Throughout Darrow's orations and the court proceedings, Mrs. Fortescue proudly held up her head. She was dressed in the height of fashion, wearing a cloche hat and a red dress. Massie sat immobile, his blank expression interrupted only Famed criminal attorney Clarence Darrow, center, who undertook the near-impossible defense; he is shown with defendants (left to right) Edward J. Lord, Mrs. Fortescue, Thomas Massie and Albert O. Jones.

Hawaii's Governor Lawrence Judd, to avoid more racial riots, commuted the sentences of the defendants (they were all convicted of second-degree murder and faced ten years in prison) to one hour in custody.

Admiral Yates Stirling, U.S. Navy Commander at Pearl Harbor, felt that the matter should have been settled immediately after the attack on Thalia Massie by the speedy execution of the five men who attacked her.

The defendants and friends are shown with Darrow, after their release from custody; they spent only one hour in the dock, their commutation causing more widespread rioting throughout the troubled islands.

when he bit his thin lips on occasion. The sailors, Lord and Jones, sat passive, staring ahead. The burning black eyes of Joe Kahahawai's parents were constantly focused upon the defendants as they sat in the spectator's gallery. Across the aisle from them sat Thalia Massie, dressed in black. Darrow's brilliant defense worked only to reduce the status of the charge against the defendants. Prosecutor John Kelley was obviously overwhelmed by Darrow's magical addresses and confined himself to the facts in the case. That was enough for a conviction, although it was not the first-degree murder conviction Kelley had sought.

All four were convicted of second-degree murder and sentenced to ten years imprisonment. Darrow immediately stated that he would appeal the case to the U.S. Supreme Court, but officials had had enough of this case. Riots against blacks, Orientals, and Hawaiians had broken out throughout the islands and on the mainland. Further court hearings would only ferment more race riots and unrest, prosecuting attorneys told Darrow after the conviction.

Prosecutors recommended leniency toward the defendants and this plea was acted upon by the much-harassed Governor Judd who was tired of calling out hundreds of national guardsmen to quell riots taking place over the Massie case. Judd signed an order that commuted the sentences of the four convicted murderers, reducing their time to one hour to be served in the courtroom dock. The defendants were placed in the dock and sat motionless and silent for an hour and then walked free.

Fortescue and Thalia Massie immediately sailed back to the U.S. mainland. Massie and the two seaman remained on duty in the islands. Massie himself would remain in the Navy, later serving on the U.S.S. New Mexico, a battleship which saw heavy action in World War II. He later died in obscurity. Thalia did not remain married to Thomas Massie for long. She filed for divorce in Reno, Nevada, which was granted on February 23, 1934. At the time, she told reporters that the crime against her had caused so much strain between her and her husband that their marriage disintegrated.

"Do you think you'll marry again soon?" a reporter asked Thalia Massie.

"Sure," she snapped back sullenly. "I'm going to marry Clark Gable, didn't you hear."

That night the despondent woman went to a Reno nightclub and ordered a drink into which she poured poison. She collapsed shortly after drinking the mixture and was rushed to St. Mary's Hospital where she recovered. Thalia Massie then took a train to New York where she booked passage on the Roma, a liner sailing to Italy. At sea, Mrs. Massie told other passengers that she did not care to live any longer. She was found hours later bleeding to death in her cabin, her wrists slashed. She was saved by a ship's nurse and Dr. Valliga, the ship's captain.

Thalia Massie survived her deep depressions, however, and later moved to Eugene, Oregon, living under her maiden name, Thalia Bell. She later married a man many years her junior and died on July 3, 1963. Although it was not listed as such, Thalia's death may have been a suicide. According to one newspaper account, "she was found in the bathroom of her apartment, barbiturate bottles scattered about her." Her proud and aristocratic mother, Mrs. Grace Fortescue, had already died years earlier.

A TITLED VICTIM IN KENYA/ January 24, 1941

Sir Henry John Delves Broughton (AKA: Sir Jock, 1884-1942), 57-year-old British aristocrat, married the ravishing young Diana Caldwell, a 27-year-old socialite, and in a prenuptial agreement guaranteed her an estimated yearly income of £5,000. This "May-September" marriage was not expected to last. Broughton was overly possessive of his new bride and his alluring wife attracted a flock of young male (and even female) admirers with whom she would allegedly have brief affairs, further inflaming her spouse's inherent jealousy. It was a dangerous proposition for both, made more explosive when Broughton decided to lead a new lifestyle in a savage country.

With his new bride, "Sir Jock," as Broughton was known to his friends in the fashionable London clubs, arrived in Kenya on November 12, 1940, to begin a new life. His well-appointed home outside Nairobi, however, held no fascination for the vivacious Lady Broughton. In this last outpost of the crumbling British empire, Diana met Josslyn Victor Hay, the dashing twenty-second Earl of Erroll and immediately embarked on a torrid affair with the handsome swain.

Hay was eighteen years younger than Henry Broughton, and infinitely more interesting to Diana. Hay had many female admirers, most of them married to men of title, and was, in the words of an English divorce judge, a "very bad blackguard." On January 20, 1941, less than two months after his arrival in Africa, Broughton wrote to a friend about the futility of his situation. He knew that Diana had fallen in love with Hay. "They say they are in love with each other and mean to get married," he confided. "It is a hopeless position and I am going to cut my losses. I think I'll go to Ceylon." That same day, Broughton told the police that someone had stolen two Colt revolvers from his home.

Sir "Jock" Boughton (left), a wealthy sportsman, shown here at the races with friends, married a beautiful woman thirty years his junior, a union that was soon undone when she fell in love with another man.

The handsome Josslyn Victor Hay, the 22nd Earl of Erroll (shown with his wife, who died in 1939), murdered on the night of January 24, 1941, a homicide charged to the cuckolded "Sir Jock" Boughton, who, through money and influence, went free.

Greta Scacchi, right, shown with Geraldine Chaplin, left, played the role of Diana Caldwell Boughton in the 1987 film, White Mischief, which was faithfully based upon the sordid uppercrust society of Kenya in 1941 and the murder of Sir Josslyn Hay.

Diana Caldwell Boughton, who moved to Kenya with her husband and where she conducted a lethal affair.

On the afternoon of January 23, 1941, Hay, Broughton, and Diana discussed their situation over drinks and dinner at the Muthaiga Country Club. "Diana tells me she is in love with you," Broughton said matter-of-factly.

"She never told me that, but I'm frightfully in love with her," Hay replied curtly. Form dictated that the two aristocrats try to arrive at some understanding. Afterward, Hay would remark to his friend Lieutenant Lezard, "Jock could not have been nicer. He has agreed to everything. As a matter of fact, he has been so nice it smells bad!"

That night, Broughton had too much to drink and was driven home by a friend, leaving his wife with Hay. At 2:30 a.m., Hay brought Diana home, said his goodnight on the porch, and then climbed back into his car and drove down the Ngong Road. A short distance from the house, his car careened into a gravel pit. The next morning, a passerby found him slumped over the steering wheel. He had been shot in the back of the head.

Several weeks later, Broughton was arrested and charged with murder. He was the only one with an obvious motive, and the bullet extracted from the victim's brain had been fired with a black powder propellant, which was unobtainable in Kenya. Broughton's African houseboy would later tell the court that he had seen Broughton take two pistols to his bedroom shortly after arriving home from the club on the night of Hay's murder.

Broughton went to trial on May 26, 1941. The prosecution was handled by the Attorney General of Kenya, W. Harrigan. Broughton's life depended on discrediting the witnesses for the prosecution. From South Africa, H.H. Morris, one of the finest legal minds in the country, accepted his case. Morris brilliantly demonstrated to the jury that the murder bullets were not necessarily fired from any of his client's guns. Further, he demonstrated through witnesses that Broughton had never uttered a public word of objection or made a single threat to or about Hay regarding the young man's affair with his wife. Sir Henry John Delves Broughton was duly acquitted on July 1, 1941.

Broughton left Kenya as planned, and took up residence with Diana in Ceylon. However, Broughton soon suffered a serious fall which partly paralyzed him. Forced to return to England, Broughton sequestered himself in a Liverpool hotel, where he committed suicide in December 1942. Physicians attributed his death to an overdose of narcotics. He left a long, rambling note about the Kenya tragedy that neither affirmed nor denied his guilt. Broughton's story became the basis for the captivating 1988 British film, White Mischief, a movie that aptly captured the decaying aristocratic society in Kenya at that time and most decidedly pointed to the guilt of "Sir Jock."

THE JUDGE-TO-JUDGE MURDER/ June 16, 1955

One of the world's most sensational missing persons cases involved New York Supreme Court Justice Joseph Force Crater, who vanished on August 6, 1930 and was never seen again. An equally disturbing disappearance occurred twenty-five years later, one that also involved a distinguished jurist, Florida Circuit Court Judge Charles E. Chillingworth, who seemed to dissolve into thin air in 1955. There was a marked difference between these two disappearing judges. Chillingworth, however, resurfaced, at least in the chilling testimony of his murderer.

Judge Charles E. Chillingworth, who vanished from his Manalpan, Florida, home in 1955.

Judge Chillingworth had spent thirty-four years on the bench. He had been stern, but fair, placing emphasis on the law, always the law. Most of Chillingworth's judgeship had been centered in Palm Beach and Broward counties, and he was particularly known for his promptness, an unbending trait even his wife and three grown daughters had learned to respect.

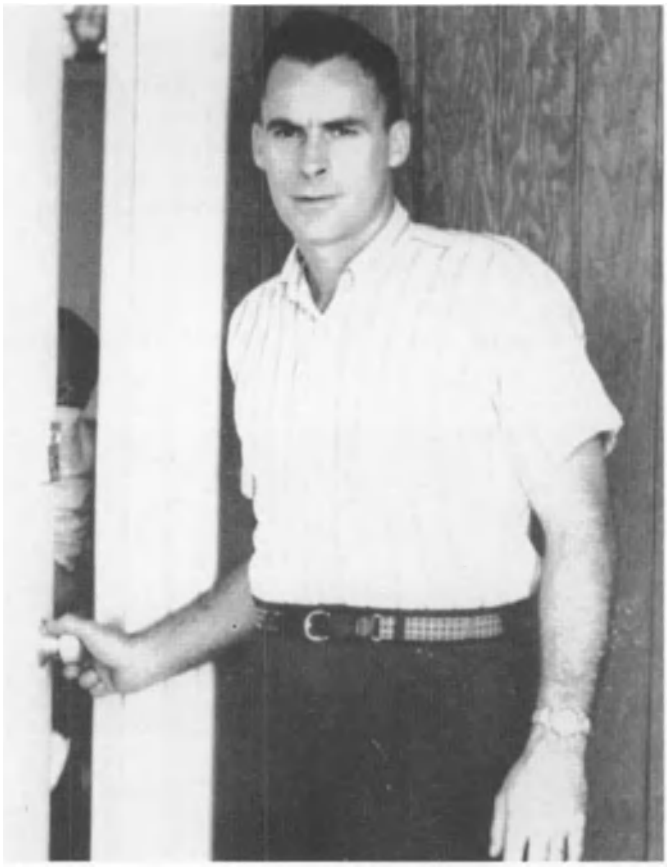
Seldom if ever could the judge's court attendants remember Chillingworth being late; so, when he failed to appear at a hearing at his West Palm Beach chambers on June 16, 1955, the alarm was immediately sent out. Police and family members immediately converged on the judge's fashionable seaside home at Manalpan, an exclusive area twelve miles south of Palm Beach. What detectives found in the Chillingworth home—or what they did not find—stunned and amazed them.

Mrs. Marjorie Chillingworth, who disappeared along with her husband in 1955.

Judge Chillingworth and his wife were missing, with only a few physical traces that they had returned to their home the previous night at 10:30 p.m., after dining with friends. Investigators determined that the couple had undressed and had neatly hung up their clothing, retiring in pajamas. Their money and jewelry remained untouched on bedroom bureaus. Nothing was missing except the two human beings who inhabited the home.

Outside the home, detectives found a few slim clues. A beach lamp that lighted the area leading to the water was broken, and on the wooden stairs and walkway leading to the

The Chillingworth ocean-front home, where the couple was abducted, then rowed out to sea and murdered, their bodies weighted and given the deep six.



Jim Yenzer, who lured one of the killers of the Chillingworths to a drinking party, where he bragged of the double murder.

Undercover police officer P. O. Wilbur was present at the drinking party where the killer's admissions were recorded.

Floyd "Lucky" Holzapfel, right, who got drunk with Yenzer and Wilbur and talked about murdering the Chillingworths; he was convicted and sent to Florida's electric chair.

The affable and scheming Judge Joseph Peel, right, convicted of ordering Holzapfel and his alleged accomplices to commit the Chillingworth murders; he was sent to prison for life.

sea, investigators found traces of blood and two rolls of adhesive tape. One footprint, distorted as if a person had been struggling, was found in the sand next to what appeared to be the marks of a boat that had been beached at the water's edge.

At first authorities deduced that the couple had drowned, even though Chillingworth and his wife were known to avoid deep water since they were poor swimmers. Planes and helicopters soon buzzed and whirred over the waters near the Chillingworth home, pilots and observers scanning the sea for floating bodies. Scores of surface vessels joined the search that extended as far as the Bahamas. Skin divers and deep-sea divers explored the depths offshore. In the end, nothing was found.

Police then concluded that the couple had been kidnapped and they expected for weeks a ransom note to arrive. Officials even went so far as to name a Methodist minister, the Reverend Harry Waller, to act as an intermediary. Others doubted the abduction theory, knowing that Chillingworth and his family did not possess the kind of money that would bring an appreciable ransom payment. A reward of $113,000 was offered by friends, family and state officials for the return of the missing couple, but no leads developed.

The Chillingworth disappearances remained a complete mystery and would have remained so, had it not been for a startling conversation between Brevard County Sheriff aide James Yenzer and an old friend, Joseph Alexander Peel, Jr. (b. 1924) in late 1960. Yenzer was told by Peel that he would receive a large amount of money if he would kill an habitual criminal named Floyd Albert Holzapfel (pronounced holds-apple), known to Yenzer and Peel as "Lucky."

Yenzer stalled, but later contacted the wanted felon, Holzapfel, but not for the purpose of killing him. Yenzer had told authorities about Peel's proposal and they urged Yenzer to contact the intended "hit," in order to obtain more information. To that end, Yenzer, along with P. O. Wilbur, and undercover policeman, lured the alcoholic Holzapfel into a drinking spree in a motel room that was wired for sound. Once drunk, Holzapfel spewed forth a tale that caused the flesh of his listeners to crawl.

Holzapfel and a few of his friends had murdered Judge Chillingworth and his wife, he admitted. They did it, like Hemingway's thugs in "The Killers," for "a friend," a powerful pillar of the Florida community, who was annoyed with the Judge's rigid ways. The murder had not been an easy chore, Holzapfel said. He and his accomplices had arrived late on the night of June 15, 1955, on the beach behind the Chillingworth home. They crept into the house, intent upon slaying only the Judge, but the crotchety old man struggled so fiercely and shouted so loudly in his bed that he woke up his wife, who started to scream. The killers bashed her into unconsciousness. (It was Marjorie Chillingworth's blood the investigators had found the next day on the walkway, blood gushing from her wound as she and her husband were dragged, mouths taped, out to the beach and into the waiting boat.)

Once in the boat—clouds shrouding the moon and the movements of the murderers—Marjorie Chillingworth was wrapped in chains and weights were attached. She was rolled into the sea and sank immediately. The Judge was another matter. So violently did he struggle with his assailants that he almost succeeded in knocking Holzapfel and his friends into the ocean. They barely managed to get the chains and weights about him before tossing him into the water.

Judge Chillingworth would not die easily. To the astonishment of his killers, he did not sink. Encumbered in chains and weights, the feisty jurist nevertheless began to swim to shore. The killers paddled furiously after him, and, just as he was about to reach shallow water, one of them reached out in desperation with an oar and split his skull. Only then did the Judge sink from sight.

Finishing his tale in a drunken stupor, Holzapfel passed out. He was arrested for the murder of the Chillingworths on October 4, 1960. Within hours, he tried to commit suicide by cutting his wrists, but his efforts were as awkward as his murders of the Chillingworths. He lived to stand trial. Holzapfel's employer in this and other murders was Joseph Peel, the man who had politely asked Yenzer to kill him. Investigation into Peel's background was laborious and painful. Peel came from one of the most respected families in Florida. He had been West Palm Beach's only municipal judge and from that sacrosanct position, police learned, took bribes and kickbacks from every illegal operation in the area, from moonshining gangsters to grifters selling illegal lottery tickets.

Judge Peel stood for no nonsense from those who interfered with his lucrative graft. When a 22-year-old informer named Lew Harvey caused dozens of raids on stills producing moonshine whiskey—operations in which Peel had interests—the Judge ordered Holzapfel to murder him. Harvey's bullet-ridden corpse was discovered in a canal outside of Palm Beach in November 1958. Holzapfel was sent to South America until the search for Harvey's murderer subsided. Peel sent his hired killer regular checks to South America, but when he stopped the payments, Holzapfel returned and began to blackmail his employer. This was the reason why Peel went to Yenzer and asked him to kill his troublesome henchman.

Judge Chillingworth had always been troublesome to Joseph Peel, investigators learned. During a 1952 divorce case—Peel was then a practicing attorney—Peel instructed his client to lie. That case was tried before none other than Judge Chillingworth, who helped to establish perjury that sent Peel's client to prison. The Judge's oral rebuke of Peel was so devastating that its repercussions destroyed his law practice and forced him to resign from the bar. Peel later became a municipal judge, but Chillingworth knew of his links to organized gambling and several times threatened to expose him. But, by then, Peel had professional killers like Holzapfel on his payroll and he simply eliminated a nuisance by ordering his henchman to murder Chillingworth.

Peel stood trial for his crimes and was convicted twice and sentenced to two life terms for the murders of Chillingworth and his wife. His not so dutiful stooge, Lucky Holzapfel, did not leave up to his nickname. He went to the electric chair.

"I WILL DESTROY YOUR FACE"/April 4, 1958

The violent deaths of gangsters have been common occurrences, but the killing of gangster Johnny Stompanato in 1958 drew uncommon attention from the press. He died at the hands of a teenager whose actress mother had been an on-screen sex symbol for decades. The only child of Hollywood actress Lana Turner, Cheryl Crane (b. 1943), was born to Turner and Stephen Crane, the actress' second husband, a marriage that lasted only a few months. Turner had already been married to Artie Shaw and, after her annulment from Crane, went on to marry Henry J. "Bob" Topping, Lex Barker, Fred May, Robert Eaton, and Ronald Dante. The marriage to Barker, it was claimed, had been broken up by Cheryl, who continued to live with her mother through her host of husbands.

Johnny Stompanato, left, when he worked as a bagman and driver for Los Angeles gangster Mickey Cohen, right.

Cheryl Crane was surrounded by her mother's enormous wealth, living in a mansion peopled by servants. Always glittering before her were jewels, expensive cars, and mostly fame. Teenage jealousy of her mother prompted Cheryl, some claimed, to whisper nasty gossip to her mother about her husbands and those she dated between marriages. One of these was the handsome, smooth-talking gangster, John Stompanato, one-time chauffeur and bagman for Los Angeles gambler and gangster Mickey Cohen.

Stompanato, born in Woodstock, Illinois, in 1925, had served as a Marine during World War II. He had attended an exclusive military school and then Notre Dame briefly before enlisting in the Marines in 1944, serving three years. The ruggedly handsome Stompanato had married and divorced twice by 1948, when he went to work for Cohen in Los Angeles as Cohen's bodyguard, driver, and later as bagman, collecting the profits from Cohen's gambling and extortion rackets. He then struck out on his own, operating as a Hollywood lounge lizard, picking up lonely but wealthy women who were married, then making love to them in a room where hidden motion picture cameras recorded every move. Stompanato would then sell the film to the compromised women at staggering extortion prices.

When Lana Turner's marriage to Lex Barker ended, she received a call from Stompanato, asking her for a date. He first used the name John Steele when introducing himself to Turner and her daughter Cheryl. The lonely 38-year-old Turner accepted and their tempestuous affair began. The gangster was nothing like Turner's husbands or previous lovers. He was loud, crude, gauche, a braggart and a bully, who wore shiny shirts open almost to his navel to reveal his hairy chest. He oozed Latin charm and earthiness, but at the same time his passions were violent and menacing.

Stompanato and Lana Turner at poolside; the 38-year-old actress was by then madly in love with the gangster.

Cheryl Crane was enamored by her mother's new lover; she and Stompanato spent hours horseback riding or swimming together in her mother's Olympic-sized pool. Stompanato played the older brother to her, writing her long letters when she was traveling with her mother. Turner, meanwhile, lavished Stompanato with expensive gifts, clothes, and then loaned him $10,000, money that was never repaid.

When he joined her and Cheryl in London, while Turner was filming Another Time, Another Place, Stompanato moved into the luxurious townhouse Turner and Cheryl were sharing. The gangster then asked the actress for another loan, $50,000, to secure the rights to a film script for a movie in which, he, Johnny Stompanato, would star. The gangster had long nurtured the secret ambition to become a film star.

The actress turned him down, saying that she did not have that kind of cash and that her financial advisers had ordered Lana Turner's daughter, Cheryl Crane, right, greets her mother and Stompanato upon their return from Mexico.

An officer examines the mortal wound in Stompanato's body, which was sprawled in the bedroom of Lana Turner's home on the night of April 4, 1958.

her not to give him any more money. Her refusal caused Stompanato to go berserk. He threatened the star, who walked out on him, going to the set of Another Time, Another Place, where she began to rehearse with co-star Sean Connery.

Stompanato suddenly appeared on the set, raging, ordering Connery to "stay away from Lana!" Connery turned his back on Stompanato, who grabbed the burly actor and swung him about, waving a gun in Connery's face. The burly actor's response was to land a powerful punch to the gangster's jaw, sending him to the floor in a half-conscious state. Stompanato got up and walked away, swearing revenge. Back at the townhouse, the gangster cornered Turner and shrieked: "When I say hop, you'll hop! When I say jump, you'll jump!"

The actress ordered Stompanato out of the townhouse. He yelled: "I'll mutilate you! I'll hurt you so that you'll be so repulsive you'll have to hide forever!" With that he leaped forward, grabbed the actress around the throat and began to choke her. He then threw her down to the floor and threatened her with a razor, saying that he could cut her "just a little" but he could "do worse." She pleaded with Stompanato, who then relented, but he warned her: "That's just to let you know that I'm not kidding. Don't think that you can ever get away!"

Cheryl Crane had heard the commotion and expressed fears for her mother's life. The director of the film Turner was working on called Scotland Yard, and Stompanato was politely escorted to the airport and put on the next plane to the U.S. Lana Turner had successfully gotten rid of the menacing thug, but this separation was brief.

Once the film in England was completed, however, Turner and Cheryl returned to Los Angeles and the actress made the mistake of calling Stompanato, showing herself to be much more dependent upon him than she had previously admitted. Stompanato now moved into her mansion to fully enjoy Lana Turner's luxurious lifestyle, swimming in her pool, lounging in the sunray and massage rooms, watching the latest Hollywood films in her private screening room. The couple took a seven-week vacation to Acapulco, renting a suite at the Via Vera Hotel.

When they returned to Los Angeles, Cheryl Crane, now a tall girl who towered over her mother, was present to welcome the pair home. The arguments began all over again, beginning with the Academy Awards. Turner had been nominated for an Oscar for her performance in Peyton Place (she did not win) and had decided to attend the ceremonies without Stompanato. When he learned that he was not invited, the gangster went into a raging tirade, accusing the actress of being ashamed of him, that she did not want to be seen in public with him.

More importantly, Stompanato had been gambling heavily in gambling spas owned by his former employer Mickey Cohen, and Cohen held several IOUs Stompanato had signed. On the evening of April 4, 1958, Stompanato demanded that Turner pay these debts. He confronted her in her lavish bedroom and she, in turn, utterly refused to give him any more money. Again the gangster lost control and began screaming that he would use a razor to disfigure her for life. Cheryl Crane, downstairs, could hear the gangster yelling: "If a man makes a living with his hands, I would destroy his hands. You make your living with your face, so I will destroy your face. I'll get you where it hurts the most! I'll cut you up and I'll get your mother and your daughter, too ... That's my business!"

Stompanato grabbed the actress by the arm and she broke away. She opened the bedroom door to see her daughter standing there. "Please, Cheryl, please don't listen to any of this," the actress told her, and closed the door. She then ordered Stompanato to return to his own room. He picked up a hanger with a jacket on it and approached her, poised it seemed, to attack her with it. The actress then told the gangster that she was finished with him and that he was to get out of her house.

Turner again opened the door and Stompanato came rushing toward her, holding the jacket and the hanger. Cheryl Crane was there, moving past her mother into the bedroom, holding a butcher knife with a nine-inch blade, which she had gotten in the downstairs kitchen. The actress was later to testify: "I swear it was so fast; I truthfully thought she had hit him in the stomach. The best that I can remember is that they came together and they parted. I still never saw the blade."

This photo of Lana Turner, which she had lovingly inscribed in Spanish, was found on Stompanato's body.

The gangster, holding his stomach, fell backward on the thick carpet. Lana Turner went to him and pulled back his shirt to see the deep knife wound. Stompanato tried to speak but only a gurgle came out of his throat. She grabbed a towel from the bathroom and tried to staunch the flow of blood, but it was useless. Her lover was dead. Her daughter, meanwhile stood sobbing nearby as Turner called her mother and then her lawyer, the famed Jerry Giesler. She said to Giesler: "This is Lana Turner. Could you please come to my house. Something terrible has happened." Within minutes, Giesler was driving toward the Turner mansion.

Turner is shown accompanied by Beverly Hills police detectives, begging them not to arrest her daughter; Cheryl Crane was nevertheless booked on a charge of murdering Stompanato.

Cheryl Crane then called her father and asked him to come to the house. Crane asked a patron in his restaurant to drive him to Turner's Beverly Hills home and was the first to arrive there. Cheryl met him at the door. Crane looked at Stompanato's stiffening body in the upstairs bedroom while his sobbing daughter blurted: "I did it, Daddy, but I didn't mean to. He was going to hurt Mommy. I didn't mean to, I didn't mean to."

Giesler showed up, meeting the actress for the first time, but promising her that his office would do all it could to protect her and her child. Clinton Anderson, Beverly Hills police chief, then arrived with several officers. Reporter Jim Bacon quickly appeared, gaining access to the house by telling uniformed officers stationed outside that he was from the coroner's office. Lana Turner was by then pleading with Anderson to put the blame on her, that her child only meant to protect her. "I don't want her involved, poor baby," Turner said through tears. "Please say that I did it." Stompanato was by this time examined and pronounced dead.

Giesler immediately introduced his defense by putting his arm around Turner and saying: "Your daughter has done a courageous thing. It's too bad that a man's life is gone but under the circumstances the child did the only thing she could do to protect her mother from harm." Giesler looked at Chief Weeping and in anguish, the above series of photos show Turner's tortured testimony before a jury in the Stompanato case.

Anderson and spoke to Turner, but kept his eyes on the police officer: "I understand your concern for the child's welfare. But you won't get anyplace by hiding the truth, will she, Chief?"

Lana Turner than gushed the whole sordid affair between herself and Stompanato while Bacon and other reporters took notes. Anderson sympathetically listened to her and then to Cheryl's description of how she had plunged the knife into the gangster who was about to attack her mother. The chief reluctantly informed the actress that he would have to lock up her 14-year-old daughter. "Can't you arrest me instead?" Turner pleaded with him. "Poor baby's not to blame for all this mess."

Cheryl Crane was nevertheless arrested and locked up in the Juvenile Section of the city jail, charged with murder. The newspapers blared the killing from coast to coast and most of the gossip columnists used the Stompanato death to parade Turner's myriad torrid love affairs in print. She was pilloried for subjecting her daughter to a series of reckless marriages and love affairs, and some even wildly speculated that Turner herself had murdered Stompanato after finding her daughter in bed with him. Only Walter Winchell came to the defense of the movie queen, asking that fans understand the tragedy and give their sympathy "to the girl with a broken heart."

Few of Turner's peers had anything to say about the killing. The outspoken Gloria Swanson, sex goddess of the silent era, did voice a scathing opinion, attacking Winchell for defending Turner, saying that his defense of the actress was "disgusting ... You are trying to whitewash Lana ... She is not even an actress ... she is only a trollop." Gangster Mickey Cohen then suddenly appeared in the editorial offices of the Los Angeles Herald Examiner, dumping Lana Turner's love letters to Stompanato into the editor's hands. He had ordered his goons to go to Stompanato's apartment after hearing about the killing and obtain these gushing billet doux. The cost-conscious Cohen had paid the bill for Stompanato's funeral, and when Turner reportedly refused to pay him for these expenses, he released the letters out of spite.

By the time Cheryl Crane appeared in court, the charge against her had been reduced to manslaughter. Geisler brilliantly placed Lana Turner on the stand and softly talked her through the nightmare killing. The actress detailed everything that occurred that evening, weeping, wiping away perspiration with her handkerchief, her face distorted in anguish and expressing a mother's pain. Some say it was the greatest performance of her career.

Then Cheryl Crane testified, repeating almost word for word the story her mother had given. The coroner's jury, relying exclusively on the testimony of the two females, ruled that Cheryl Crane had committed justifiable homicide. She was made a ward of the state and placed in her grandmother's custody. The press photographers had a field day with Lana Turner on the stand that day and reveled in taking photos of her kneeling at her mother's feet, a penitent pose that was no doubt meant to elicit sympathy.

Cheryl Crane did not adjust well. Her grandmother, Mildred Turner, could not control her. The girl ran away several times and was later placed by court order in the El Retiro School for Girls in the San Fernando Valley. She later worked for her father as a hostess in his restaurant. The American public favored Lana Turner and her daughter in this sensational killing, and the actress' next few films were box office hits. She and her daughter survived the scandal, emerging as heroines. Cheryl Crane later became a success as a San Francisco real estate broker and wrote a book about her life, detailing the Stompanato murder in terms that repeated her original statements, a book in which she revealed that she was a lesbian. Only the publicity-seeking gangster Mickey Cohen angrily spoke on behalf of Johnny Stompanato, declaring to the world: "Look, everybody is forgetting something here! This was a great guy!"

A jubilant Lana Turner is shown with criminal attorney Jerry Giesler, right, whose strategy in the Stompanato case resulted in an acquittal for Cheryl Crane, her lethal action ruled "justifiable homicide."

TWO MURDERS IN MANHATTAN/ August 28, 1963

In the late afternoon of August 28, 1963, 21-year-old Patricia Tolles, a researcher for Time magazine, returned to the apartment on east 88th Street in Manhattan, New York, which she shared with 21-year-old Janice Wylie, who was employed at Newsweek, and 23-year-old Emily Hoffert. Both Wylie and Hoffert had the day off from work. When Tolles entered the apartment, she soon saw that objects in the hallway had been disturbed and the bathroom was spattered with blood. Alarmed, Tolles retreated from the apartment and called Janice's father, Max Wylie, distinguished author. (The victim was also the niece of famed author Philip Wylie.)

Wylie arrived shortly and explored the apartment. In the bedroom, to his horror, he found the bodies of the two young women. Although Janice's body was nude, Hoffert's was fully clothed. The two bodies bore multiple stab wounds and had been tied together with strips of cloth torn from the sheets. Further investigation revealed that Janice had been eviscerated, and there was evidences that the murderer had intended to rape her.

Police made little progress in the case, finding only a few clues. They knew that the victims had been killed on or before 7 a.m., because an electronic clock-radio had been unplugged when Janie Wylie's body fell across it, unplugging the cord leading to a wall socket. They knew that the assailant had slain the two young women with maniacal fury in that two of the three kitchen knives used by the killer broke in half during the attack. Dozens of suspects were interrogated, but released for lack of motive and having reliable alibis that placed them elsewhere at the time of the murders.

Attractive Janice Wylie, the niece of novelist Philip Wylie, was stabbed to death in 1963.

Wylie's roommate, Emily Hoffert, who was also killed in a burglary gone wrong.

Not until April 24, 1964, did investigators get a break. On that day, George Whitmore, Jr., a 21-year-old Negro, was arrested and charged with a stabbing murder and an assault. Police found a photo among Whitmore's belongings that they believed to be of Janice Wylie. Whitmore eventually confessed to the Wylie and Hoffert murders, but recanted later, claiming the confession had been coerced by police. Regardless, Whitmore was convicted of attempted rape and sentenced to five to ten years in prison. (The Whitmore confession consisted of a 61-page statement that contained many exacting and precise details of the killings, which mystified many latter-day crime historians, who could not determine how Whitmore learned of such exacting information if, indeed, he had not been present at the murders. The only explanation was that detectives working on the case provided these details.)

The case might have ended there, except that in the fall of that year, Nathan "Jimmy" Delaney, a 37-year-old Negro junkie, was arrested on a murder charge. In order to "cut a deal," he told police that he had information regarding the two murders. He told them that 22-year-old Richard Robles, who had a heroin addiction, had been staying with him and his wife at the time of the Wylie-Hoffert murders and had returned home distraught and asking for a fix. He had also told Delaney that he had "just iced two dames" during a burglary.

The Bronx-born Robles (b. 1942) was arrested on January 26, 1965, and confessed to murdering Wylie and Hoffert. He was tried before Judge Irwin Davidson in October 1965. Max Wylie was called to the witness stand by prosecutor John Keenan. The 60-year-old father of Janice Wylie held back his emotions while he clearly described how his daughter's roommate, Patricia Tolles Smalley (she had married since the time of the murder) had called him and asked him to inspect the ramshackled apartment she had entered.

Wylie stated that he had immediately gone to the apartment and entered Hoffert's bedroom, saying: "I passed behind the foot of the second bed, and there I found the girls. They were close together. The space was very confining. They had been flung to the floor, lying side by side. Janice was nude, Emily was dressed. Emily was facing the same direction as Janice—away from the windows. I recognized Janice instantly. I didn't recognize the other girl—I had met her only once.

"Janice had been stabbed through the heart. The knife wounds round Emily's neck were noticeable. The curlers were still in Janice's hair. Emily had been frightfully cut. It was very gory. I knelt at the feet of the two girls. I put my knuckles on Janice's right calf to check if she were still alive. She looked quite peaceful. I realized she was dead. There was a dark woolen blanket on the floor near Miss Hoffert's knees. I pulled the blanket over both the girls' bodies, covering them as much as I could."

Throughout this painful testimony, Richard Robles coldly stared at the witness, the father of the girl he was accused of murdering. Robles never blinked an eye. He was also passive during the testimony of Nathan Delaney, who had fingered Robles as the killer of Wylie and Hoffert. He was portrayed as a lifelong criminal by defense attorney Jack Hoffinger, who attempted to discredit Delaney's statements by pointing out that the witness was a convicted felon, a drug peddler whose white wife was also a drug addict (and that Delaney had hooked her on drugs, as well as the defendant, Robles) and a prostitute.

Delaney admitted that he had made his living from the sale of illegal drugs and lived off the proceeds, as well as the income produced by his street-hustling wife, since 1946. Yet, Hoffinger could not overturn Delaney's statements concerning Robles' own admission to him that he had committed the murders.

Supporting Delaney's statements were tape recordings police had made in Delaney's apartment, which involved conversations between Robles, Delaney and Delaney's wife, Marjorie Delaney. Attorney Hoffinger strongly objected to the admission of these tapes in the trial, but Judge Davidson ruled to admit the tapes, which were played through four large loudspeakers placed in the courtroom.

What came through to jury members was a hellish babble of three junkies babbling in almost incoherent conversation. Apparently, Robles suspected that he was being "set up" during these tapings and tried to supply his own defense by alter-

A clock radio in the apartment showed the exact time of the murders, its plug pulled from an electric socket when Wylie's naked body fell across it.

Burglar Richard Robles, a heroin addict, later confessed to the murders of Wylie and Hoffert; he was sent to prison for life.

ing his original statements to Delaney, saying that he probably "imagined" the killings of Wylie and Hoffert.

More damaging was the testimony of Detective David Downes, who first interviewed Robles when he was arrested and charged with the killings. In the witness chair, Downes emphatically recalled Robles' word-for-word statement to him at that time: "I went to pull a lousy burglary and I wound up killing two girls."

Downes said on the witness stand that he wanted to make sure of the identities of the "two girls." He turned to the jury and stated: "I said to him: 'You mean Janice Wylie and Emily Hoffert?' He said: 'Yeah.'"

On December 1, 1965, Richard Robles was found guilty of first-degree murder by a jury of eight men and four women. He was sentenced to life in prison, with eligibility for parole in twenty-six years. At the time, Robles told the judge: "All I can say, your honor, is that I did not kill those girls. I'm going to jail for something I didn't do."

Whitmore, who had confessed to the same crime, was exonerated on June 27, 1966. His "confession," which was thought to be specious and coerced, was thrown out. Many continued to believe, however, that Whitmore was somehow involved in the Wylie-Hoffert murders, even believing that Whitmore and Robles had committed the killings together during a botched burglary to support their mutual drug habits (about $40-a-day in that era).

Robles continued to insist that he was innocent for the next two decades, but after a spiritual transformation, he admitted to the two murders. He fully confessed to the killings during a parole hearing on November 5, 1986, at the Eastern Correctional Facility in New York. At that time, Robles told commissioners what actually happened on the day of the murders: "I got in through a window. Miss Wylie was in the apartment. She was in bed...I tied her up...I tied her hands up...she was nude...I wanted to have sex with her...I attempted to. She said, 'No!' I stopped." At that moment, Robles told commissioners, Emily Hoffert entered the room.

"I grabbed her," Robles continued. "I tied her up. Hoffert told him that she would remember his face, Robles recalled. "She started telling me that she was going to tell the police on me ... She would remember me ... that I was going to jail ... The thought entered my mind—I have to kill ... I killed ... I was out of it, totally out ... I felt like throwing up and I almost ran out of the room ... I noticed a mirror. I looked in that mirror. The blood had drained from my face. I was like a ghost. My eyes were like glassy."

Robles went on to tell commissioners that he could not recall all the details of that horrible moment since he felt he was in some sort of a trance. "I looked like a ghost. I felt like a ghost. I can't even describe the feelings...I think of that now ... What I had just done ... I was feeling—God knows what I was feeling—I don't know how to describe what I was feeling." Robles remains behind bars at this writing, continuing to serve two life terms at New York's Attica prison.

THE MURDER OF AN OIL TYCOON/ June 30, 1964

The marriage of a blonde, blue-eyed, curvaceous woman to a Texas oil baron twenty-four years her senior would end in tragedy, some predicted. In fact, the union ended in homicide, resulting in one of the most sensational murder cases in America. Born Candace Grace Weatherby (1914-1976) in Buchanan, Georgia, Candy Mossler was determined to escape the poverty of her childhood. At fifteen, she ran away from home to become a shoe and toothpaste model, and by her mid-twenties she owned her own modeling agency in New Orleans. In 1948, at the age of thirty-four, she met and married Texas millionaire oil tycoon Jacques Mossler.

Mossler, fifty-eight at the time he married Candy, had made millions of dollars in oil and then invested his fortune in banks and finance companies. The interest from his investments allowed Jacques and Candace Mossler to live an extravagant lifestyle which included homes in Houston, Miami, and Chicago. The couple adopted four children, all the offspring of a Chicago mental patient, who had murdered his wife.

At 1 a.m. on June 30, 1964, in Key Biscayne, Florida, Candy took her four children, ranging in age from eleven to twenty, for a ride in her car. She drove around apparently aimlessly for the next few hours, stopping once at a hospital emergency room for treatment of a migraine headache. At 4:30 a.m., she returned to the apartment she shared with her husband to find his badly beaten body lying in the living room. He had been stabbed thirty-nine times and hit over the head with a heavy object. Neighbors reported hearing voices coming from the apartment and the sounds of a man leaving it. Several suspects were picked up, but all eventually provided alibis and were released.

On July 4, 1964, police arrested Candy Mossler's strapping, darkly handsome nephew, Melvin Lane Powers (b. 1940),

The body of oil tycoon Jacques Mossler lies beneath a blanket in his apartment in Key Biscayne, Florida; his skull had been crushed and he had been stabbed thirty-nine times.

at a trailer sales lot in Houston. The trailer lot had been financed by Jacques Mossler. Police charged that Powers and Candy Mossler were carrying on an incestuous affair that Jacques Mossler had recently discovered. When he threatened to divorce Candy and cut her out of his will, she called Powers, who flew to Miami, murdered Mossler while Candy and the children were out driving, and returned to Houston that same night.

A bloody palm print in the Mossler's kitchen matched Powers' hand. Candy went immediately to Powers' aid and hired well-known defense attorney Percy Foreman to represent him. However, Candy was soon indicted for murder along with Powers. After fighting extradition from Texas to Florida for more than a year, Powers relented and appeared before Florida Circuit Court Judge Harvie DuVal to plead not guilty.

Mossler and Powers were both released on $50,000 bonds. Prior to the trial, Candy gave countless interviews to reporters in which she claimed that the killer was a man named "Ted" who would come forward if it became necessary. She also categorically denied having an incestuous relationship with Powers. When some so-called love letters were turned up, Candy blithely dismissed them, saying, "I write to everyone, `Darlin`, I love you. I want you in my arms.' I say the same thing to my lawyer. It doesn't mean I really love him."

The trial lasted seven weeks and was covered by more than fifty newspapers to which Candy gave continual interviews. She told Dr. Joyce Brothers (who was then a Hearst columnist) that her husband had invited his own murder by openly soliciting and consorting with homosexuals. Candy told Brothers that one of her husband's homosexual lovers had most probably killed the tycoon. Said Candy: "I think it was one of those strange people he used to pick up on the street all the time. He would waltz into the house with strangers by the half dozen. He would tell people that we were very wealthy and important and owned a chain of banks and then say, 'Come on over and have a drink any time!"

Another Hearst writer, Jim Bishop, described Candy Mossler as "sixty inches of wrought iron ... painted with ... many veneers of honey and passion." The press took pains to point out that Candy's brother, DeWitt Weatherby, a bartender in Georgia, had killed a man during a heated poker game in 1956, and had been sent to prison for life. Candy, after marrying into Mossler's wealth, hired attorney Carl Sanders, who later became governor of Georgia, to aid her brother in getting his parole. Further, Candace was portrayed in the press as an oversexed middle-aged swinger who seduced any available male. One report held that "some claimed to have seen photos of Candace embracing her Negro chauffeur... Other photos show the swinging grandma almost nude on a bed." The most shocking elements of this sordid story involved the insistent claim that Candy had carried on an incestuous relationship with her naïve nephew, Powers. Hotel clerks and stewards later testified that the pair often met in hotels under assumed names, and, in the words of one Texas clerk, were always "a-huggin' and a-kissin'."

Famed criminal attorney Percy Foreman consults with Candy Mossler during her trial, where the tempestuous blonde was accused of murdering her husband to gain his fortune.

Foreman whispers advice to co-defendant, Melvin Lane Powers, Candy's rugged nephew, who, it was claimed, was her incestuous lover and the person who killed Mossler on orders from his aunt.

The prosecution, headed by Richard Gerstein, claimed the murder had been committed so that the two lovers could continue their affair and have all of Mossler's money as well. He produced a note reportedly written by the victim, which stated: "If Mel and Candace don't kill me first, I'll kill them." Moreover, prosecutors brought forth a key witness, William Frank Mulvey, a convicted felon, who stated that Candace Mossler had given him $7,500 to murder her husband so that she could inherit the tycoon's estate of $7 million. He said that he spent the money, but had no intention of ever completing the contract killing. While in prison on another offense, Mulvey said, he met Powers, who was then jailed and awaiting trial for killing Mossler. Powers had bragged to him that he had murdered the tycoon, claimed Mulvey.

When Foreman responded, he first attacked the largely circumstantial evidence upon which Gerstein had built his case, and then launched into the technique of trying everyone but his clients. He characterized Jacques Mossler as a pervert who compulsively picked up homosexuals. It was one of these "creatures," Foreman insisted, who had killed the tycoon. A powerful and dynamic attorney, Foreman stood six-feet-four inches. He was brilliant, articulate and, in delivering his summations, mesmerizing, having lost only one client to the electric chair in more than seven hundred criminal cases he handled. Although Gerstein pointed out the irrelevancy of the tactic Foreman used to defend his clients, the jury found Mossler and Powers not guilty on March 6, 1966, after sixteen-and-a-half hours of deliberation.

Candy Mossler inherited her husband's $33 million banking business. She eventually married again, this time to an electrician eighteen years her junior. The new husband, Barnett Wade Garrison, had an unfortunate accident. Locked out of their Houston home one night, he fell while attempting to climb to a third-floor window and suffered injuries, which left him mentally incapacitated.

The couple divorced in 1975. Later that year, Candy rewrote her will, excluding three of her adopted children for failing to show her the "care, love, and affection" she felt she deserved. All these errant children did, Candy pointed out, was guzzle beer, walk about barefoot, hang out at a drugstore, run up staggering bills on her credit cards, and "use dirty language." On October 26, 1976, Candace Grace Weatherby Johnson Mossler Garrison died at the Fontainebleu Hotel in Miami at the age of sixty-two.

An autopsy showed she was in a state of physical collapse caused in part by years of drug abuse. She had been addicted to the use of Placidyl, a sleeping tablet, swallowing these "like jelly beans," according to a relative. She had received thousands of injections of Demoral and Phenergan, so that her buttocks had "turned as hard as rock." Pathologists reported that Candy had overdosed on drugs, and also stated that they had removed 475 and 500 grams of silicone from her breasts, deposited by injection, not implant. Such injections were illegal, they pointed out.

Candy Mossler and Melvin Lane Powers are shown joyously waving to spectators after leaving a courtroom in 1966, where they were acquitted of slaying Jacques Mossler.

Melvin Powers became a wealthy and successful real estate developer in Houston, Texas, his worth later set at $7 million, the very amount that represented the fortune Jacques Mossler himself had accumulated. Powers did not attend the elaborate funeral services for Candy Mossler, which were held at Arlington National Cemetery, where the remains of the incendiary blonde were put to rest next to the husband she was once accused of murdering.

"I AM THE TIGER"/April 2, 1965

Everyone in Hollywood knew that Tom Neal (1913-1972), "The King of the B Pictures," was a he-man, who took no abuse from anyone. In fact, this jealous and violent man proved to his peers and millions of fans everywhere that he would hand out abuse to anyone who displeased him. A boxer of some note, Neal first appeared as a bit actor in a number of Hollywood films in the early 1940s. His name was listed in the credits along with John Wayne in the war epic Flying Tigers. Neal acted in over 180 films, few of them of lasting importance, the cheaply-produced film noir production of Detour later becoming a minor cult classic.

Neal's first wife, the lovely Vicky Lane, divorced him in 1949 because of his obsessive jealousy. He then became involved with Barbara Payton, an aspiring actress of very modest talents, who was later arrested for intoxication, passing bad checks, and prostitution. Her biggest role was that of James Cagney's girlfriend in Kiss Tomorrow Goodbye, a 1950 film remembered chiefly for its excessive violence. Payton reappeared in Neal's life at regular intervals. Once she tried to get him jealous enough to marry her by dating matinee idol Franchot Tone.

Handsome Tom Neal, shown in the early 1940s, when he was "King of the B Pictures" and even during his novice days in Hollywood proved to have a violent and uncontrollable temper.

Actress Barbara Payton, shown with Neal during the late 1940s; his obsessive jealousy over her prompted Neal to viciously attack matinee idol Franchot Tone, who had been dating Payton.

On September 14, 1951, Neal cornered Tone outside his residence and beat him badly enough to cause a brain concussion. Franchot Tone went on to marry the sympathetic, adoring Barbara Payton in her Minnesota hometown, a union she said she sought due to the beating he'd taken solely because he loved her, but the marriage ended disastrously after only seven weeks.

The Tone episode effectively destroyed Tom Neal's film career as lackluster as it was so he turned to landscaping, which he'd learned from his Japanese gardeners during his salad days, in order to earn a living. The business he started prospered, and within a few years Tom Neal, the man with the short temper and quick fists, was attending to the lawns and gardens of the elite in Palm Springs, California.

Neal remarried, but his second wife Patricia died of cancer in 1958. That marriage produced a son. He married for a third time in June 1961, this time to a petite brunette named Gail who worked as a receptionist at the Palm Springs Tennis Club. The one-time Hollywood bad boy dutifully attended to his wife and his successful gardening business for the next four years. He managed to keep his name out of the papers until April 2, 1965, when he fired a bullet into his wife's head behind the right ear while she reclined on the couch. Within the next several hours he wandered aimlessly around the city, visiting his most intimate friends, to whom he admitted that he had killed his wife.

Neal told a different story to Palm Springs Police. He said that he was making love to Gail, when she inexplicably produced a gun, which she aimed at him, and during the struggle to take it from her, the weapon accidentally discharged. She had obtained the weapon recently for protection, as she had developed emotional problems and believed that she was being followed, but the quarrel had stemmed from Neal's own paranoid jealousy. He had accused his wife of sleeping with other men, a story he later told to the judge and jury.

Robert Lawrence Balzer, part owner of the Tyrol Restaurant in Pine Grove and a close friend of Neal's, substantiated these statements by recounting his confession the night of the murder. While visiting Balzer hours after the shooting, Neal complained that Gail "had become my whole life and I could not live without her." Tom Neal had sought out Balzer, a Buddhist monk, the day before for spiritual advice. The two men had discussed Buddhist philosophy for hours, with Balzer advising his friend, "The problems of life are as a tiger at the door." Neal reportedly answered, "I am the tiger, and the walls are all around me."

Franchot Tone leaving a hospital, where he had undergone a long recovery after the 1951 brutal beating he received from a jealous Tom Neal; Tone's face required plastic surgery.

Neal is shown with his third wife, 29-year-old Gail Neal, in 1961; he shot her to death while she was asleep on a couch in their Palm Springs, California, home on April 2, 1965.

Some time before Neal reported the murder of his third wife, the gun used to end her life mysteriously disappeared and was never found. According to Police Lieutenant Richard Harries, the house was in a shambles when he arrived. Items of clothing belonging to a Steven Peck were found strewn about the rooms. Peck's address was listed as 2481 Cardillo Street, which was Neal's residence, but Peck was never called to testify. The police found the fatal bullet nestled in a plush pillow. Neal was taken into custody and held without bail for four days before being arraigned on a murder charge. No explanation was given for another peculiarity: the fact that all the windows in an adjacent apartment building had been shattered.

Although the prosecution lined up thirty prospective witnesses, they rested their case after calling only eight. No reason was ever given. The nine-woman, three-man jury spent a full day deliberating the evidence before returning their verdict on November 18, 1965. Perhaps more intrigued by the mysteries than by the testimony of the witnesses, the jury found Neal guilty only of involuntary manslaughter.

Tom Neal was sentenced to one to fifteen years at the California Institution for Men at Chino. The courts repeatedly denied Neal's appeals, but he still served less than seven years before being paroled in December 1971. He emerged from prison at age fifty-eight, his face lined and creased so deeply that he appeared to be a man in his eighties. Neal attempted a show business comeback following his release from prison. He produced a morning television show called "Apartment Hunters," but it was short-lived.

His face ravaged by seven years of hard prison time, Neal is shown in 1971, following his parole; he had little to say to the press.

The one-time actor seldom talked about the bestial beating he had administered to Franchot Tone and the killing of his third wife. He clung to the ambition of some day going before the cameras once more, but this was not to be, despite his pleas to directors and producers that he could give fine performances since he was one "who had really lived." Said one producer: "He was kidding himself if he really thought anyone would hire him. He was too dangerous a man for that and everybody knew it." The King of the B Pictures died a forgotten man on August 7, 1972. By then he was simply a gardener looking for lawns to mow.

KILLING A SILENT SCREEN STAR/ October 30, 1968

Ramon Novarro (1899-1968) was an institution in Hollywood, hailed at the dawn of the 1920s as a great Latin lover, his handsome dark features causing legions of flappers to swoon whenever he appeared on screen. (Novarro was one of the "big three" Latin lovers on the silent screen, the other two being Rudolph Valentino and Antonio Moreno.) This surefire svengali of the box office, who was to become extremely wealthy, was born and raised in Durango, Mexico, where his father had a flowering practice as a dentist. The Novarro family fled Mexico in 1913, to escape the bloody revolution, moving to Los Angeles.

At age fourteen, Novarro worked as a grocery clerk, and later as a singing waiter in restaurants—he had a fine tenor voice—and still later as a dancer and bit player in the early-day silent movies. He went to New York and appeared on stage in some minor plays, having small parts and would have remained an obscure Broadway actor had not an enterprising talent agent spotted him and arranged for him to have a short-time Hollywood contract. He first appeared in a billed role in the film Omar, based upon the legendary Persian poet. Director Rex Ingram spotted him in this film and cast him in the role of Rupert of Hentzau in the 1922 silent screen version of The Prisoner of Zenda. He became an overnight sensation.

Novarro went on to starring roles in more big budget films—The Arab, Scaramouche, and The Student Prince—his career culminating in the 1925 silent epic, Ben Hur. Appearing bare-chested in this film, Novarro became the dream idol of every young girl in America and Louis B. Mayer's top star at MGM, which had spent an unprecedented $5 million on Ben Hur. Mayer made a special arrangement with Novarro—one which pleased the actor—wherein he was to act in one high-budgeted film every two years, so that he would not wear out his welcome with his adoring fans. This allowed Novarro a great deal of leisure time, which he spent training his voice for a possible operatic career (which never materialized) and appearing in plays he backed.

MGM's publicity department sent myriad press releases to magazines and newspapers in which it said Novarro spent most of his time studying philosophy and that he was consumed by spiritual thought, so much so that the studio had a difficult time in preventing him from entering a monastery. This was typical Hollywood hoakum and hype. Novarro spent most of his time drinking in Hollywood's exclusive clubs, particularly those who catered to wealthy homosexuals. His penchant for attractive, young men was not unknown to the Hollywood community. Novarro, however, kept such liaisons very private. In the rampantly dissolute and perverted community that was Hollywood during the 1920s, Novarro was considered to be a harmless personality, a reserved gentleman, who never made scandalous headlines.

Ramon Novarro, left, became a superstar of the silent screen when appearing in the 1925 screen epic, Ben Hur; Francis X. Bushman is shown battling with him in the classic chariot race.

Rudolph Valentino, the Great Lover, became one of Novarro's best friends, showering gifts upon him. His sense of the ridiculous undoubtedly prompted Valentino to give Novarro an expensive lead Art Deco dildo in 1923. Novarro cherished this gift and kept it among his special belongings, an oddball object d'art, as events proved, he would have been better off without.

Though Novarro successfully made the transition from the silent era to sound movies, appearing in such smash hits as Mata Hari in 1932 opposite the great Greta Garbo, he knew that his career would soon come to an end. The image of the Latin Lover was fading and more rugged types—Clark Gable, James Cagney and Spencer Tracy—soon captured the attention of the fickle film fans. Following the completion of Mata Hari, Novarro told newshounds that "before it is too late, I want to stop."

Novarro did halt his career, and, despite occasional appearances in films and on TV years later, he spent most of his time and considerable wealth in developing a booming real estate business, growing even richer after buying up large tracts of land in San Fernando Valley. He purchased a $150,000 hillside home in remote Laurel Canyon, where he regularly entertained his party guests by performing marionette shows in the full-sized theater he had built in his home.

As the years passed, Novarro's drinking increased, as well as the number of young men he invited to his home. Two such young hustlers arrived at Novarro's home at the actor's request on the night of October 30, 1968. On the following morning, Novarro's 42-year-old secretary, Edward J. Weber, let himself into the actor's home, as had been his habit for nine years. Weber was shocked to see the house in disarray. The cushions of couches and chairs had been ripped apart, tables turned over, pictures torn from the walls. Souvenirs that Novarro had cherished for forty-some years lay in smashed ruins on the floor.

Novarro continued his film career into the talking era, but his Latin Lover image fell from favor and he decided to quit films; he is shown above with Greta Garbo in the 1932 film, Mata Hari.

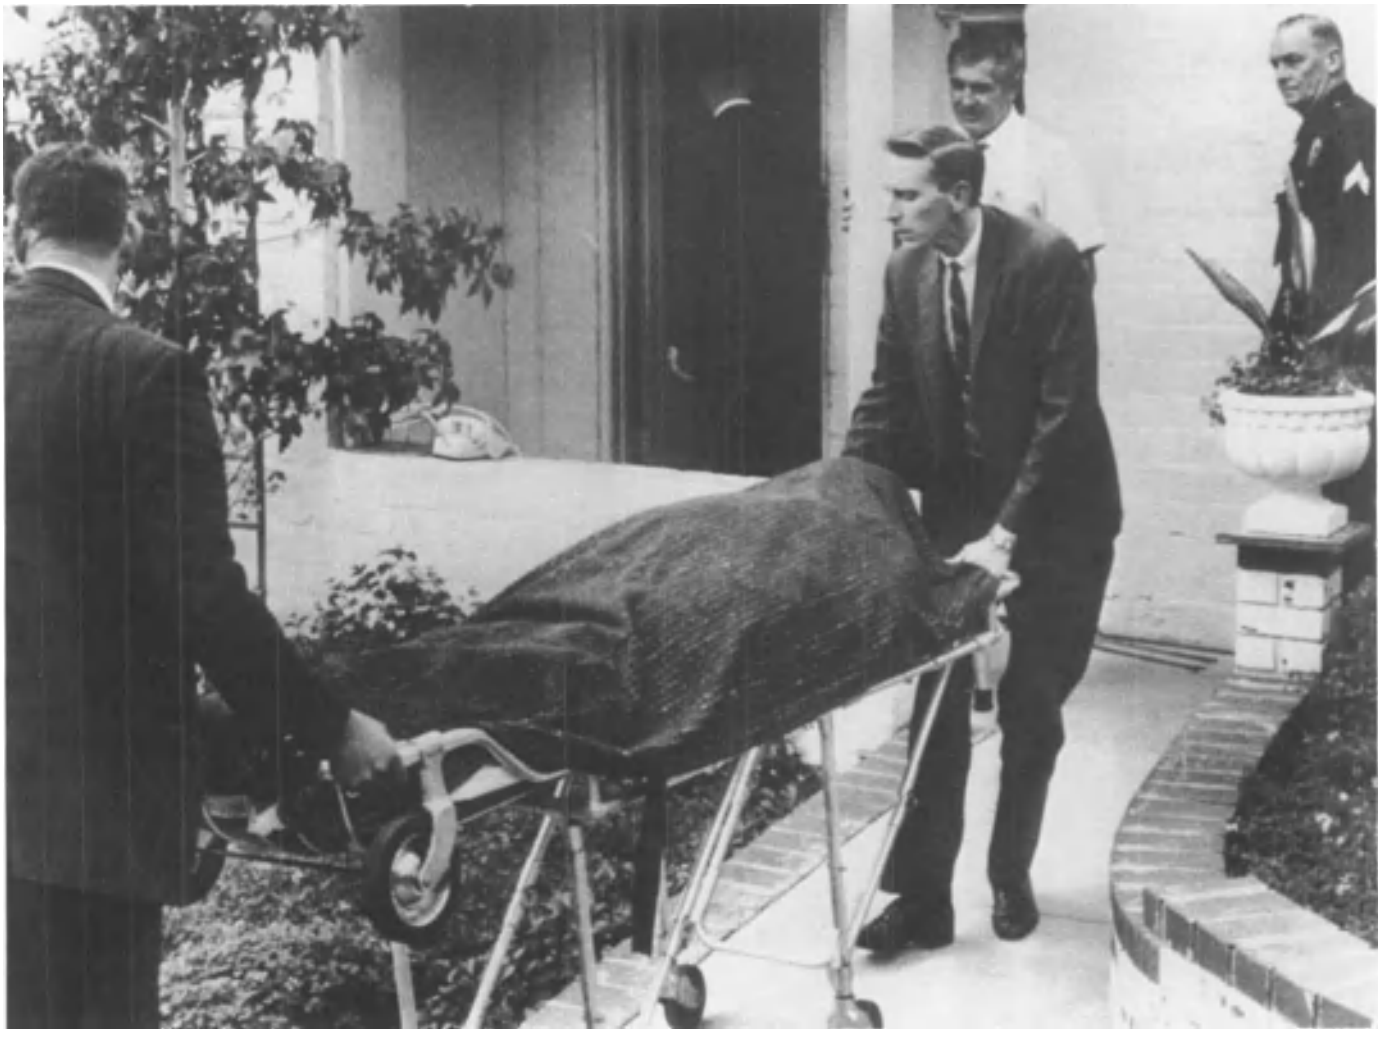
After calling out to Novarro and getting no response, Weber cautiously stepped into the actor's bedroom. He found his employer near the bed, naked, his body a bloody mess. Ramon Novarro was dead, suffocated, the Art Deco dildo Valentino had given him stuffed down his throat. Police were called and began an intensive investigation, questioning neighbors and relatives, but learning little about the brutal homicide. An officer routinely checked Novarro's phone, obtaining a record of all the calls placed from his number on the night of October 30, 1968. One of these was a long-distance call made to an attractive 20-year-old brunette named Brenda Lee Metcalf.

Police called Metcalf and learned that she had, indeed, talked with someone from Los Angeles on the night of the murder.

The last photo taken of Novarro before he was murdered at the age of sixty-nine.

She stated that her friend, Thomas Scott Ferguson, seventeen, had phoned her and told her that he was calling from Novarro's house. She also stated that Ferguson's brother, 22-year-old Paul Robert Ferguson, was with him at the time. The brothers were soon picked up and, after routine interrogation, were charged with Novarro's murder.

Paul Ferguson had been in Los Angeles for five months. Thomas Ferguson had run away from his Chicago home and joined his brother, who had already met Novarro and had introduced him to the actor. At first, Paul Ferguson admitted his guilt, telling police that he had killed the actor. He then recanted, and said that his brother Tom had murdered Novarro. It was later revealed that, to avoid the gas chamber, Paul had told Tom to admit complete guilt because, as a juvenile, he would draw no more than a six-month term and he, Paul, would go free.



The body of Ramon Novarro is removed from his Laurel Canyon home, following his brutal murder on October 30, 1968; his killers ransacked the home in search of money and valuables.

Thomas Ferguson agreed to the plan, telling police that he alone had battered Novarro to death. Then Julius Libow, a Juvenile Court Referee, ordered that Tom Ferguson stand trial as an adult. Hearing this and knowing that now he might face the death penalty, Tom Ferguson denied his guilt and said that his brother Paul had done the killing. No, said Paul, it was Tom.

According to Brenda Lee Metcalf, who was flown from Chicago to Los Angeles to give testimony on behalf of the prosecution, both brothers had had a hand in the killing. At least, that is what she opined after her forty-eight minute conversation with the Fergusons on the phone, which had been made at 8:15 p.m., Los Angeles time. From what the Fergusons told her at that time, she had the impression that the brothers were both abusing the actor.

Tom Ferguson told her at that time that he and his brother had gone to Novarro's home to "hustle" the actor, their visit made strictly for "sex," and that they were tearing up the actor's home in a desperate search for $5,000 in cash that Novarro reportedly kept on hand at all times.

The young hustlers told Metcalf that there were about 700 framed pictures on the walls of the house and they had been busy tearing these down because Paul Ferguson believed that the cash was hidden behind one of them. Tom Ferguson told Metcalf at the time that his brother was "up with Ramon" (in the actor's bedroom), attempting to force the actor into revealing where he had secreted the money.

Metcalf stated that she had warned Tom Ferguson "not to do anything wrong." Tom replied that he was not doing anything wrong. It was his brother, Paul, he said, who was "working" on Novarro, not he. When Tom put down the phone to look for some cigarettes, Metcalf said she could hear loud screams, as if someone were in agonizing pain. When Tom returned to the phone, Metcalf asked him what the screaming was about. Ferguson told her that his brother, Paul, was trying to force the actor into telling him where the money was hidden. "I have to go now before Paul really hurts Ramon," Tom Ferguson said to Metcalf. "I want to find out what's going on." He hung up.

Two hustling brothers from Chicago (shown in short sleeves with their defense attorneys), Tom, left, and Paul Ferguson, were convicted of beating Novarro to death and given life sentences.

During the seven-week trial of the Ferguson brothers, which began in August 1969, both brothers took the stand, squarely placing the blame on each other. Paul Ferguson told the court that Novarro had promised to make him a movie star, that he, Paul, was in Novarro's words, "a young Burt Lancaster, a superstar...another Clint Eastwood." It was his younger brother, Tom, who did the killing, not he, he insisted. After an hour at Novarro's home on the murder night, Paul Ferguson said he had consumed many beers, some tequila, and a fifth of vodka. He claimed that he had passed out dead drunk on the couch and that his brother woke him up. Paul quoted Tom as saying: "'This guy is dead, just like he might say 'hand me a pencil.'"

Tom Ferguson had a decidedly different story. He had gone into Novarro's bedroom after getting off the phone with Metcalf, he testified, to see his brother, Paul, standing over the actor, who was naked and bleeding. "Mostly in the face," said Tom. "It looked like he had a bloody nose...His lips were beat up...there was blood on his forehead." Paul ordered him to take Novarro into the shower and "clean him up," Tom said. He washed the groggy actor in the shower, telling him not to talk to his brother, that Paul "might become violent." Tom Ferguson then claimed that he returned the actor to his bedroom, placing him on the bed and leaving the room. When returning, he found Novarro in a pool of blood. "He looked dead," Tom Ferguson concluded.

"How did you know he was dead?"

"I just had that feeling," Tom Ferguson replied from the witness stand.

In the end, prosecutors placed the blame for the murder on Paul Ferguson. District Attorney James Ideman described to a jury in gruesome detail how Novarro had been "trussed up like an animal," by Paul Ferguson. "It was done for money, by torture...done cruelly by a man who had no respect for himself or others...who had no remorse, no compassion, no regrets...and who got his brother to perjure himself."

Medical experts testified that Paul Ferguson had been a practicing homosexual since the age of nine and that he was, after consuming liquor, subject to uncontrollable outbursts of violence. He was a dangerous man with homicidal tendencies, the experts agreed.

The jury was convinced that both brothers had had a hand in the murder and convicted both, returning a verdict "of guilty of murder in the first degree." The torture killers were both given life sentences by Superior Court Judge Mark Brandler, who recommended that they never be paroled.

The senseless murder of Ramon Novarro produced no fortune for the hustling brothers. They went away from the murder site without ever finding anything other than a few dollars they took from the pockets of their victim. The slain actor left in his will more than $500,000 to his four sisters and three brothers, and his secretary, Edward J. Weber.

THE SLAYING OF AN FILM ICON/ February 12-13, 1976

Teenage heart-throb Sal Mineo had died on screen several times as a juvenile delinquent and an apprentice thug. As Plato, the neurotic rich kid in Rebel Without a Cause, the actor died uselessly, wastefully, gunned down by police as he brandished an empty gun. Mineo went on playing homicidal, self-destructive role models, typecast into the man-child who never grew up, seemingly born for a star-crossed and violent end. In real life, the actor met that very same fate, although he was anything but the type of characters he had portrayed on screen.

On the night of February 12-13, 1976, Mineo was returning from a play rehearsal of James Kirkwood's "P. S. Your Cat is Dead," which Mineo was directing and which was scheduled to open shortly at the Westwood Playhouse. Mineo had appeared in the play during its San Francisco run, enacting the part of a bisexual burglar. The actor had left his blue Chevelle and was walking through the carport at the rear of his West Hollywood apartment, just below the notorious Sunset Strip, which, for decades, had been awash with hustlers, pimps and prostitutes, including an enterprising army of petty criminals, from purse-snatchers to pickpockets.

Sal Mineo, playing the role of a terrorist in the 1960 film, Exodus, a part that earned him an Academy Award nomination.

As he was walking through the poorly lighted carport area, Mineo was confronted by a long-haired man in dark clothes. Neighbors suddenly heard the 37-year-old actor shout: "Oh, God, no! Help! Someone help!" Ray Evans, a neighbor and friend of Mineo's, ran to the carport to find the actor lying on his back, his feet in the air, and a stream of blood several yards long stemming from several wounds in Mineo's chest. He had been stabbed by what the coroner's office later described as a "heavy type knife." The wounds penetrated Mineo's heart and caused massive hemorrhaging, yet he did not die instantly.

Seeing that the actor was still breathing, Evans desperately tried to keep him alive through mouth-to-mouth resuscitation. "He kept gasping," Evans later told police, "and after about five or six minutes his last breath went into me and that was the end of it."

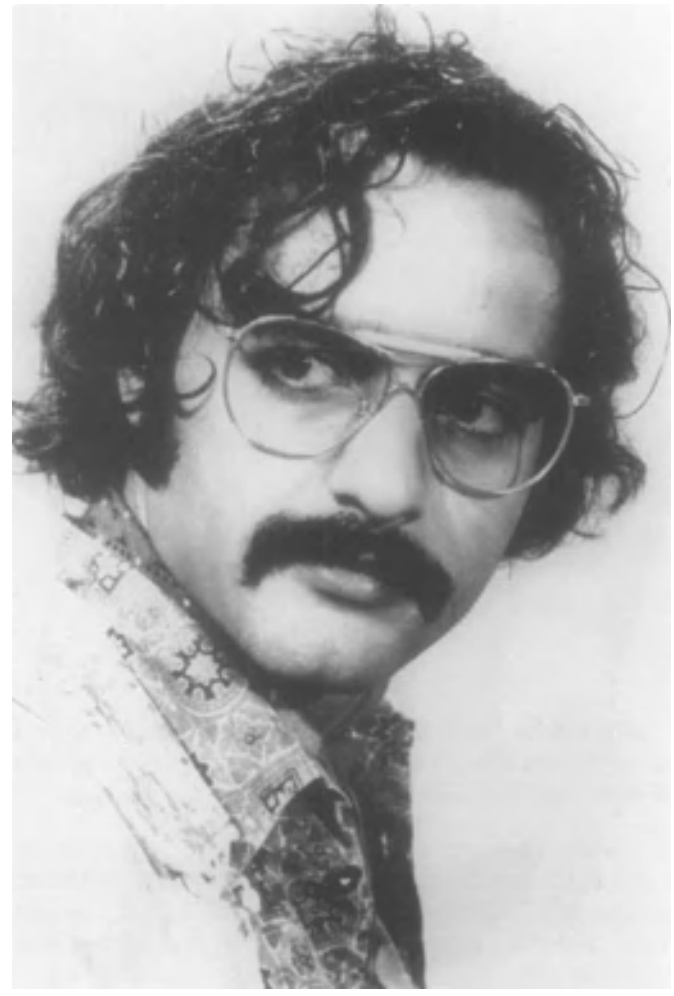
But it was just the beginning for the Los Angeles Police Department. Investigators were initially baffled by the murderous attack. Mineo's wallet had not been taken, and robbery as a motive for the slaying was ruled out. Acquaintances voiced wild speculations as to the motive for the murder. One mentioned "the drug angle." Another anonymous person sneeringly pointed to the kinky Sunset Strip, notorious for its queues of male hustlers waiting at curbside to be picked up, and brought up the "long-whispered reports of the actor's alleged bisexuality and fondness for sado-masochistic ritual." Another callously snickered that "It was a new boyfriend or something. They do have their quarrels."

None of this posthumous gossip aided the police in identifying or locating the killer. Some witnesses claimed to have seen a white man wearing dark clothes fleeing from the scene, but descriptions were vague. After weeks of tracking down hundreds of tips, Lieutenant Stanley Backman of the Los Angeles Sheriff's Department reported that the Homicide Bureau had "reached a dead end."

As Mineo's body was being shipped to Mamaroneck, New York, where it would be interred in the family plot at the Gate of Heaven Cemetery on February 17, 1976, police were still fruitlessly following trails created by rampant gossip and rumor. Critics and friends of the actor went to their typewriters and quickly eulogized Mineo in profiles that saw him as a "born-to-lose" character.

Mineo was not this kind of person at all. He began without a hope of ever becoming a world celebrity. Born Salvatore Mineo, Jr., on January 10, 1939, the son of a Sicilian-born coffin-maker, he came from a large family that struggled for survival in the Bronx. He lived on 217th Street, a tough neighborhood, and was recruited as a gang member at age eight, at a time when he was also dismissed from a parochial school for being a troublemaker. He was reinstated and went on to attend Christopher Columbus High School, but never received a diploma.

Josephine Mineo, his mother, thought to keep her boy out of trouble by enrolling him into a dancing class, where,



Mineo just before the time of his murder in 1976; he had by then turned from acting to directing theatrical productions.

two years later and quite by accident, he was spotted by Broadway producer Cheryl Crawford. She was then looking for two Italian-American children to appear in Tennessee Williams' play, "The Rose Tattoo." At eleven, Mineo found himself leading a goat across the stage of the Martin Beck Theatre, delivering a single line: "The goat is in the yard." He later understudied for the role of the prince in "The King and I," and subsequently took over that role.

The doe-eyed youth with full lips and thick black hair was prey for predatory homosexuals, and Mineo knew it. He bought a gun that fired only blanks and several times brandished this harmless weapon on subways and dark New York streets to ward off molesters. By the mid-1950s, Mineo went to Hollywood, where he landed his first film role in the 1955 film, Six Rivers to Cross, in which he played Tony Curtis as a youth, a delinquent who grew up to rob Brink's. (The film was based upon the 1950 Brink's robbery in Boston.) His next movie, Rebel Without a Cause, shot him to fame and teenage idolatry. He appeared in several more blockbusters, including Exodus, where he enacted the role of a terrorist (another role casting him as a revenge-seeking delinquent, who had been "used as a woman" by Nazi guards in a German concentration camp during World War II).

Stabbed in the heart, Sal Mineo's body lies beneath a sheet in the carport of his West Hollywood apartment on the night of February 12-13, 1976.

When the Mineo fad faded in the 1960s, the actor got fewer and fewer substantial film roles and turned to the theater to support himself. In 1969, Mineo directed "Fortune and Men's Eyes," which had long runs in Los Angeles and New York and which portrayed prison life in homosexual terms, including a graphic homosexual rape scene. Clive Barnes of the New York Times scathingly reviewed this play, stating: "If this does sound like the kind of play you'd like, you need a psychiatrist a lot more than you need a theater ticket."

During the early 1970s, Mineo busied himself with dinner theater, but his fortunes gradually diminished with each year. His family eventually sold the $200,000 home he had purchased in 1956 for them in the exclusive Edgewater Point section of Mamaroneck, New York, with his first big film success. He himself moved from a luxurious Hollywood home to one inexpensive apartment after another, until he was living on the fringe of the West Coast's seamiest district, the Sunset Strip. This area was populated by tens of thousands of female and male prostitutes, dope peddlers, muggers, rapists, transvestites—every conceivable degenerate and pervert. Among this repulsive flotsam was the man who finally killed Sal Mineo, motivated not by sex or drugs, but for money.

After the actor's death, his friends attempted to collect $10,000 reward money for the capture of his killer, but only a few hundred dollars flowed into this coffer. Film director Peter Bogdanovich stated at the time: "In this racket when you're not hot anymore, or when you're cold, you're dead anyway, so a lot of folks turned the page on Sal's murder and shrugged."

One person, Mrs. Theresa Williams, a Los Angeles housewife, did not turn the page. In May 1977, she went to police to say that her husband had admitted to her that he had killed Mineo. He had returned home on the night of the murder covered with blood and casually saying: "I just killed this dude in Hollywood." It was never determined why Mrs. Williams took so long in deciding to report her husband's remarks.

Robber and killer Lionel Ray Williams, right, was convicted of second-degree murder in the Mineo slaying, serving only twelve years for taking the actor's life, being paroled in 1990.

Theresa Williams went on to state that her husband, 22-year-old Lionel Ray Williams, had used a hunting knife to stab Mineo to death, a weapon he had purchased for $5.28. Police were slow to accept the woman's statements, remembering that they had arrested Lionel Williams for robbery a short time after the actor's murder. In a move for leniency on the robbery charge, Williams had offered to provide information on the Mineo killing. The black one-time pizza-deliveryman told officers at that time that Mineo had been murdered in an argument over drugs, but the actor's background suggested that Mineo had no drug connections, so investigators dismissed Williams' story.

Detectives purchased a knife identical to the blade described by Mrs. Williams and inserted it in the wound that had been made in Mineo's chest; pathologists had preserved that part of the actor's anatomy as evidence. The knife fit perfectly. Williams, however, could not be arrested in Los Angeles, as he was then serving time in a Michigan jail for check fraud. Guards and inmates at the jail told Los Angeles investigators that Williams had often bragged about murdering Mineo, but they had not reported his statements, thinking them nothing more than jailhouse brags.

When Los Angeles detectives interviewed Williams in Michigan, the suspect denied having had anything to do with the Mineo murder. One of the detectives noticed that Williams bore a tattoo on his arm that depicted a knife almost exactly like the one used in the Mineo killing. Los Angeles County prosecutor Michael Genelin later stated that the tattoo had ominous significance: "It was almost like he put the mark of Cain on himself."

Because of lengthy legal maneuvering, Williams was not brought to trial until 1979, almost three years after the Mineo slaying. Williams' defense attorney repeatedly pointed out that Mineo's killer had been described as a white man and that his client was a Negro. Genelin then produced photos of Williams taken after the killing when he had been booked for robbery. The photos showed Williams with auburn-colored "processed" hair. The fact that Williams was a light-skinned black further convinced jurors that Williams had been mistaken for a white man by witnesses who had only a fleeting glance of the killer before he fled the murder scene.

Witnesses at that time had also stated that the killer had fled in a yellow subcompact auto. Genelin produced a loan agreement Williams had signed that allowed the suspect to drive a yellow Dodge Colt, the car the defendant was driving on the night of the murder. In his summation, Genelin said: "This man is a predator. This was a progressive process with him...He enjoyed brutalizing people. These were not just street robberies, but one incident after another, where he inflicted pain...and enjoyed it."

Williams' trial involved more than the Mineo slaying; he was also being tried for eleven street robberies in West Hollywood, Beverly Hills and the Wilshire district. The jury found him guilty and as the verdicts were slowly read aloud, the defendant turned to his lawyer, Morton Herbert, and moaned: "My God, they're going to convict me of every one of these things." He was convicted of ten of the eleven robbery charges and the Mineo murder.

Herbert admitted after the trial that evidence against his client "was extremely strong—and they were bad robberies ... Basically, this was a case of ten brutal robberies with Mineo tacked on. It was ironic that Mineo became a very minor part of the trial."

Williams had been convicted of second-degree murder in the Mineo slaying, but he nevertheless received a life term. Judge Bonnie Lee Martin first recounted Williams' long criminal record, beginning with four arrests when he was 14-years-old. She then stated that Williams "should be locked up as long as the law allows...I don't think he's susceptible to rehabilitation, considering his escalating conduct of committing more and more serious crimes and more and more violence." She then sentenced him to fifty-one years to life.

Defiant to the end, the stocky, muscular Williams sneered at Judge Martin and said: "I fault you for my going to the penitentiary."

Prosecutor Genelin felt exceptionally triumphant in the conviction of Lionel Ray Williams, knowing that the conviction was a rare event, especially when it came to the slaying of Sal Mineo. He told newsmen following the conviction: "If a murder is not solved within twenty-four to forty-eight hours, you generally do not get a solution. Anyone who says that people don't get away with murder is crazy. They do it all the time."

Lionel Ray Williams did not serve out his complete sentence. He was paroled in 1990, after serving only twelve years for killing Sal Mineo. Since that time and to this writing, he has been jailed many times for parole violations.

THE DANCER AND THE SKIER/ March 21, 1976

In the 1970s, Aspen, Colorado, hit its stride as the "in place" to be, a rollicking spa for wealthy swingers, whose chief ambition was pleasure. Although those who flocked to this trendy town ostensibly arrived to ski, the attraction was (and is) the expensive bars and restaurants and the chic resorts. The New York Times once aptly described Aspen as "a hedonistic place where the rich, the young, the haunted and the newly divorced come to find a new sense of self."

Claudine Longet (b. 1941), a French performer, who married pop singer Andy Williams in 1961, arrived there in 1974

Dancer Claudine Longet and skier Vladimir "Spider" Sabich, who lived as man and wife in idyllic Aspen, Colorado, until Sabich was shot to death on March 21, 1976.

Claudine Longet, charged with murdering Sabich, is escorted to court by her former husband, singer Andy Williams; she was convicted of "criminally negligent homicide," and served only thirty days in jail.

to be with her lover, Vladimir "Spider" Sabich, a one-time Olympic skier and a ski pro since 1971. In 1973, he lost a race to downhill champion Jean-Claude Killy, and with it, his last chance to emerge as the world's premier skier. A series of crippling injuries had ended his professional career by 1976. His relationship with Longet would follow suit.

Sabich's friends were sympathetic when he told them of the growing discord in his relationship with Longet. By early 1976, he was saying, "It's either going to end or we'll be married within a year."

The end came on March 21, 1976, when Longet returned home from a day on the slopes. She had reportedly been drinking and socializing with several men in a resort lodge. At 6:30 p.m., Roy Griffith, chief of security for the area, received a frantic call asking him to come at once to the Sabich home. He found Spider Sabich lying on the floor in the master bedroom with a bullet in his stomach. Longet said she found a .22-caliber Irma pistol in a closet, and was asking Sabich how to use it properly when it accidentally discharged. Sabich was taken to the Aspen Valley Hospital, where he died a short time later.

Longet's diary recounting the deterioration of her romance with Sabich was taken as evidence, but the presiding judge in the 1977 murder trial refused to admit it. It was also reported that Sabich had ordered Longet and her children from the house. Andy Williams rushed to Longet's side, and during her trial, lived with her in the home of singer John Denver.

At her trial, Longet pleaded not guilty to second-degree murder charges. She stuck to her story about the accidental shooting, and claimed that, as Sabich slipped into unconsciousness, she tried to revive him with mouth-to-mouth resuscitation. On January 14, 1977, the jury returned a verdict of guilty on a reduced charge of "criminally negligent homicide."

Longet left the court to await sentencing, choking back tears to tell reporters: "I have too much respect for human life to have been guilty...I am not guilty."

Facing a possible two-year sentence and a $5,000 fine, Longet pleaded hardship before district Judge George Lohr on January 31, 1977. She said she feared the "stigma" of prison would adversely affect her children, who might become resentful "against a system that would send to jail [the] mother they trust and believe in." Judge Lohr took pity on Longet and ordered her to serve thirty days in jail "at a time of her own choosing," and pay the $25 for the preparation of court documents. He then placed her on two-year probation. Lohr said that he could not in good conscience give her probation without jail because it would have "undermined the law." She served her time from April 18 to May 18, 1977.

The lenient sentence meted out to Longet enraged many of Aspen's citizens, who were embittered over Sabich's death. They summed up the affair in a flurry of bumper stickers that suddenly appeared after Longet's sentencing, one that read: "It's All Claudine's Fault."

THE BIG SLEEP/1979 TO PRESENT

Claus von Bulow (Claus Cecil Borberg, b. 1926) was born into the Danish aristocracy, learning early a great respect for wealth. Sent to a boarding school in Switzerland as a child, he returned to his native Denmark at age eleven in 1937, where he was surrounded by wealth and power. His grandfather, Fritz von Bulow, was Denmark's minister of justice, who controlled the country's treasury. It was from this penny-conscious Edwardian that Bulow learned well an appreciation for money. He would work hard to establish his own wealth, but then marry into millions that he stood to inherit upon the death of his spouse, a death he reportedly arranged with diabolical cunning.

Freedom, not wealth, was foremost in the mind of Bulow when, at the age of sixteen, he escaped the Nazi regime in Denmark in 1942 by fleeing to England to join his mother, who had escaped the Germans earlier. His father, Svend Bulow, remained behind and, following the war, was accused and stood trial for collaborating with the Nazis. He was acquitted, but the family name was stained in Denmark. Claus von Bulow, however, intended to make his mark in England, studying law at Cambridge and, following the war, attending the Sorbonne in Paris, where he became fluent in French, German and English.

Claus von Bulow, who became a European social lion through his legal contacts and his employment with the world's richest man, J. Paul Getty.

Returning to London, Bulow became a junior executive at the Hambro bank and later practiced as a barrister. He lived an ideal bachelor's life, maintaining a luxurious apartment in Belgrave Square. He gave intimate parties at least twice a week, entertaining beautiful women, who eagerly dallied in his bedchamber. High society lions and matrons welcomed the cultured, well-mannered Bulow, inviting him to their mansions for fetes and dinners. He soon became a fixture in this elitist society and it was through these contacts, as well as those established in his banking and legal career that Bulow met the richest man in the world, J. Paul Getty III.

Getty was impressed with Bulow's diplomatic airs and careful social postures and, in 1959, he invited the enterprising Bulow to join the Getty empire as a legal negotiator in the billionaire's labyrinthine businesses. Getty demanded that Bulow give up his law practice and devote his entire time to Getty interests and this Bulow did. Friends and acquaintances correctly believed that Bulow's obsessive passion for money prompted this decision.

Since his tycoon boss refused to fly, Bulow flew about the world to negotiate and conclude Getty mergers, acquisitions and, in particular, the establishment of refineries for Getty Oil. So important did Bulow become to Getty that the tycoon repeatedly asked him to settle family squabbles between him and his sons. This he did with alacrity and with such success that he won his employer's complete confidence. It was more than a rumor that Bulow would some day become the chief executive of all Getty enterprises.

The beautiful blonde heiress, Martha "Sunny" Crawford von Auersperg von Bulow; her husband, Claus von Bulow, authorities claimed, tried to murder her in order to inherit her fortune of more than $75 million.

Then, in 1960, another opportunity presented itself in the form of an attractive blonde, Martha "Sunny" Crawford von Auersperg, whose own fortune exceeded $75 million. She was at that time married to Alfred von Auersperg, an Austrian prince. How many times Bulow saw Sunny after that first meeting can only be speculated, but it is known that the couple met again in 1964, and once more the following year. By that time, Sunny had left her husband and Bulow energetically courted her. They were married on June 6, 1966.

Bulow told his friends that "I have finally found the right girl." What he had found, of course, was a life of riches and comfort stemming from old money. Sunny, born in 1932, was the only child of George Crawford, chairman of the board of Columbia Gas and Electric Company. The utilities tycoon died when his daughter was only three, and she was left in the care of her mother, Annie-Laurie (who later married Russell Aitken), and her grandmother, Mrs. Martha Warmack.

Sunny, like her peers, attended exclusive schools as a child, Chapin School in New York, and Maryland's St. Timothy's. She made her social debut as a tall, stunning blonde in 1951, embarking on the traditional European tour a few years later. Despite her breathtaking beauty, the youthful Sunny was shy and retiring, in awe of the European aristocrats she encountered. On a trip to an exclusive Alpine resort, Sunny met a handsome and charming ski instructor, who turned out to be Prince Alfred von Auersperg. His aristocratic lineage dated back centuries, but, like many of his class following World War II, he had little or no money. That was no problem to Sunny, who promptly fell in love with the nobleman, marrying him in 1957. The couple had two children, Alexander and Annie-Laurie, named Ala.

The resplendent estate in Newport, Rhode Island, purchased by "Sunny" and where she was reportedly dosed with insulin shots which sent her into a permanent coma.

By the early 1960s, Sunny grew weary of supporting her penniless husband and was easy prey for Bulow, who presented himself to her as a man having his own wealth and exuding the kind of authority and worldliness her husband did not possess. She began seeing Bulow regularly long before her marriage to Auersperg ended in divorce. Bulow became Sunny's perfect traveling companion. He was every inch a man of commanding stature, having a tall frame (six feet four inches), a large head with thinning hair, a long nose and prominent jaw that jutted above tightly tied silk ties. He looked elegant in his double-breasted suits, tailor-made in Saville Row.

Bulow made a point of telling friends that he had quit Getty to devote all his time to Sunny, but this was apparently not his wife's true desire. She grew weary of Bulow's loafing—a repeat performance from her first husband—and told him to secure a high level executive post. Bulow instead relied upon the Crawford millions to support his lavish lifestyle, learning early on that of his wife's $75 million fortune, he stood to inherit at least $14 million upon her untimely death.

Sunny finally became resigned to the fact that Bulow would never acquire that high-level post and settled back into her millions. The couple appeared to have a happy and contented relationship for ten years, the union producing a girl, Cosima. They lived in luxury at Sunny's lavish Fifth Avenue co-op in New York and throughout this sprawling suite of rooms, servants scurried about to satisfy the whims and fancies of the family.

Thinking to upgrade her image, Sunny purchased Clarendon Court at Newport, Rhode Island, a resplendent mansion built in the days of the Robber Barons, its impressive acreage having priceless beach frontage. Sunny busied herself by spending a great fortune on the mansion, improving its huge pool and gardens. She and Bulow began to host sumptuous parties, complemented by large orchestras and dozens of servants serving endless quantities of champagne and stuffed pheasant. Their guests made up the cream of Eastern Establishment society and their neighbors were equally satiated with wealth and power. A short distance from Sunny's estate was Hammersmith Farm, where Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis had been raised and was married.

Maria Schrallhammer, Sunny's devoted maid, testified in court that she found hypodermic needles stored by Bulow, which he used to secretly inject his wife with insulin.

The ideal life at Clarendon Court collapsed in 1979. It was at this time, Bulow later insisted, that Sunny came to him and abruptly told him that she "was no longer interested in having sex." This was not the truth, according to Maria Schrallhammer, Sunny's devoted maid since her marriage with Auersperg. Sunny told her that Bulow had broken off their marital relations and Sunny believed that he was having a nervous breakdown.

Bulow's nerves were fine, according to later reports. His own sexual drive was thriving, but it was channeled to another woman, Alexandra Isles, a 33-year-old socialite and actress (who had become a regular on the TV soap opera, "Dark Shadows"). Bulow, at this time, took to staying at his New York club, The Knickerbocker, and visiting Isles regularly. Her father had been a friend of Bulow's in Denmark. Mrs. Isles was divorced and had a young son. Bulow, however, did not confine his extramarital affairs to Isles, but routinely visited at this time Leslie Baxter, a 43-year-old prostitute in New York. Bulow was not suffering from mental problems, as Sunny suspected, but was simply becoming physically exhausted from his incessant bouts with Isles and Baxter.

Bulow blamed Sunny for his own problems, complaining to his children that their mother made him feel like a cheap gigolo and that his uppercrust Newport neighbors had grown hostile toward him, thinking him as nothing more than a man sponging off a wealthy woman. Bulow did try to earn some money by financially backing some Broadway shows. One of these, Deathtrap, became a great success and was later sold to Warner Brothers for $1.5 million, plus a percentage of the profits. It was ironic that the plot of this play involved a man and wife plotting a murder.

Alexandra Isles, TV soap opera star, testified that she had carried on a secret affair with Bulow and had given him a deadline to divorce his wife, a timeframe, prosecutors concluded, that prompted Bulow to attempt his wife's murder.

Bulow's campaign to profile his wife as a purposeful recluse increased. He told friends and relatives that she was retreating from the world to read books and consume great quantities of sweets. He made it apparent that he was contemplating divorce, asking family physician, Dr. Richard Stock, if Sunny could endure the trauma of a divorce. By this time, Alexandra Isles had given her lover a deadline—either he divorce Sunny by the end of 1979, or quit his relationship with her.

At Christmas that year, as was the family's custom, the Bulows moved from New York to Clarendon Court. There, Sunny consumed great quantities of sweets. Her sweet-tooth had caused her to drink rich eggnogs by the pint and drink ice cream sodas. She had ice cream smothered with caramel prepared for her by her cook, Irene Silvia, and these rich dishes were brought to the heiress on an hourly basis. Sunny put on weight.

Then, on December 27, 1979, after she consumed several glasses of eggnog and a large glass of ginger ale, Sunny lapsed into unconsciousness, which Bulow attributed to a case of the flu, aggravated by too much eggnog. At the maid's insistence, Bulow finally summoned Dr. Janis Gailitis of Newport Hospital, who revived Martha and diagnosed her illness as hypoglycemia. But Maria Schrallhammer suspected Bulow of having induced Sunny's condition.

Bulow confers with his attorneys during a murder trial, which resulted in his conviction; he was exonerated in subsequent hearings.

For the next few months, Sunny was lethargic and depressed. Bulow insisted that she had a drinking problem and took barbiturates. In April 1980, tests at New York's Columbia-Presbyterian Hospital confirmed that Sunny, indeed, suffered from hypoglycemia. On Thanksgiving Day, 1980, Schrallhammer found a bottle marked "insulin" and several other containers of drugs in a black bag in Bulow's closet. She gave the bag to Dr. Stock, Martha's personal physician, for chemical analysis. He determined that an odd-looking paste found in the bag would not have been prepared by any legitimate druggist.

Sunny lapsed into a second coma on December 21, 1980, in her New York apartment. She was rushed to the hospital, where tests showed low blood sugar, but a high insulin count. She was placed on a life support system. Bulow suggested that she be allowed to die. On January 23, 1981, Schrallhammer turned the black bag over to Newport police, who found traces of Diazepam, Amobarbital, and insulin on a syringe. On July 6, 1981, Claus von Blow was indicted on two counts of assault with intent to murder.

Bulow's trial began in Newport on February 1, 1982. He pleaded not guilty before Judge Thomas Needham in a courtroom packed with journalists. The prosecution based its case on the testimony of Maria Schrallhammer. The thirty-one-day trial ended on March 16, 1982, when Bulow was found guilty. He was sentenced to thirty years in prison, but was released on $1 million bail pending appeal. Outside the courtroom, a throng of spectators chanted, "Free Claus! Free Claus!" But a year would pass before any further action.

During that time, the defense filed 100-page brief seeking a reversal of the conviction, and on April 27, 1984, the judgment of the lower court was reversed. After the U.S. Supreme Court refused a request from Rhode Island attorney general Dennis J. Roberts to review the case, the state announced plans to retry Von Blow. The second trial began in Providence on Apr. 25, 1985, and ended in a final acquittal on June 10, 1985. Claus von Bulow was at last a free man. There were allegations that he had been "framed" by his stepchildren, Prince Alexander von Auersperg and Princess Annie Laurie Kneissl. Another theory held that Bulow and his mistress, Alexandra Isles, drove Sunny to attempt suicide by taking insulin. At this writing, Martha von Bulow remains on a life support system, still in a coma that has lasted more than two decades.

THE WRATH OF A WRONGED WOMAN/ March 10, 1980

Dr. Herman Tarnower, known as "Hi," was not only a distinguished New York cardiologist, but he grew immensely rich from his best-selling book, Scarsdale Diet, published in 1979 and which grossed $11 million in its first printings. The long and lucrative life of Dr. Tarnower, who enjoyed a thriving practice, a resplendent home and worldwide recognition for his medical skills, was also adorned with a number of beautiful mistresses. He was not a physically attractive man, lean, balding and with a long face and nose, but his wealth and prestige were enticing to women seeking status and financial security.

One of these was Jean Struven Harris (b. 1923 or 1926, depending upon various sources). She dated and then became engaged to Tarnower in a prolonged and troubled union that ended in her murder of the dallying doctor. Tarnower's relationship with Harris began when the physician met Harris at a dinner party in Manhattan on December 9, 1966. Harris, at the time was a divorced mother of two. She had graduated magna cum laude from Smith College in 1945, and by 1972, was the headmistress of the exclusive Madeira School for girls in McLean, Virgina. Her students called her "Integrity Jean" because of her numerous lectures about self-control, commitment to excellence, and propriety.

Following their meeting at the home of Leslie Jacobson, Tarnower and Harris began their lengthy courtship. There was talk of marriage, but it never got past the discussion stage. Tarnower, fifty-eight at the time of his "engagement" to Harris in 1967, entertained a variety of women at his estate in Purchase, New York, his $500,000 home decorated with the heads of African beasts—kudu, lions, rhinos—he had shot on big game safaris in Africa. Though he loved to hunt such animals, Tarnower's chief hobby was hunting attractive women. One of them, Lynne Tryforos, a 38-year-old medical assistant, who was hired by Tarnower and who replaced Harris as the doctor's favorite. In 1977, Jean Harris first became aware of Tarnower's philandering. On New Year's Day, Harris was with Tarnower at a Palm Beach resort when she saw a personal notice in the New York Times that read "Happy New Year, Hi T. Love Always, Lynne."

A long struggle followed between the two rivals for the doctor's affections. Harris and Tryforos cut up each other's clothes, and rubbed human feces on each other's personal belongings whenever they found them in Tarnower's residence. Harris then accused Tryforos of placing anonymous obscene phone calls to her, and when she complained of this abuse to Tarnower, the doctor accused her of fabricating such tales. It was clear that Tarnower favored the younger Tryforos, but he continued to rely on Harris to help him prepare his diet book.

In fact, most of the recipes for the book were provided by Tarnower's housekeeper, Suzanne van der Vreken, although the doctor included one recipe in his book—"Spinach Delight a la Lynne" (creamed spinach made with yogurt) as a way of acknowledging his new, young mistress. This irked Harris, who served as the physician's editor on the book. She polished and improved its structure and grammar.

After twelve years of her tenuous relationship with Tarnower, Harris became increasingly disturbed and apparently made plans to either kill herself or slay the man who she later claimed was ruining her life by taunting her with the Tryforos woman. In November 1978, Harris bought a .32-caliber Harrington and Richardson revolver from Irving's Sport Shop in Tyson's Corner, Virginia, a few miles from the Madeira School. James Forst, the shop clerk, asked her why she was buying the weapon and Harris replied that it was for her own protection since she lived "back in the woods in a secluded area."

The situation between Tarnower and Tryforos became intolerable to Harris. She decided to take action on March 10, 1980. Driving in a heavy rainstorm directly from McLean to the Tarnower estate. In her purse was the .32-caliber handgun

Jean Struven Harris, educator at an exclusive Virginia school, was "engaged" for more than a decade, until she killed the man who jilted her.

Wealthy Dr. Herman Tarnower, author of the best-selling Scarsdale Diet, who was shot to death by Jean Harris on March 10, 1980.

Tarnower's estate in Purchase, New York, where the "Diet Doc" entertained myriad women, including Harris, who, enraged at his many assignations, shot him to death.

Harris, under arrest, is shown en route to court to be arraigned for the killing of Tarnower, March 11, 1980; she claimed that Tarnower was killed when trying to prevent her suicide.

Harris, center, confers with her defense team (left to right)—Barbara York, Joel Aurnou, Bonnie Steingart, and Victor Grossman; she got life in prison, but was later paroled.

and the amphetamines she needed for courage. At eleven that night, after Tarnower's dinner guests had left, Harris drove up the doctor's driveway in her blue 1973 Chrysler. She climbed the darkened staircase, entered the doctor's bedroom, and fired four shots. Tarnower slumped over dead and Harris fled the grounds. Rushing to the window, the startled housekeeper, Suzanne van der Vreken, saw Harris getting into her car. She called police.

Squad cars were soon on the scene. Patrolman Brian McKenna spotted Harris sitting in her car in the driveway and approached her.

"There's been a shooting in the house," she told the officer in a calm voice.

McKenna rushed into the house and raced up the stairs to see Tarnower lying on the floor of his master bedroom, mortally wounded. By that time, Harris had re-entered the house and was standing in the foyer. Patrolman Daniel O'Sullivan went to her and she looked directly at him while saying: "I shot him. I did it. He wanted to live. I wanted to die." She then said to Detective Arthur Siciliano: "I'd been through so much hell. I loved him very much. He slept with every woman he could. I had no intention of going back to Virginia alive."

Harris later stated that her intention had been to persuade Tarnower to shoot her, and she described how she had confronted the doctor, asking that he kill her. Tarnower, she said, called her "crazy," and ordered her from the house. A struggle for the revolver then ensued and Tarnower was shot four times. Police doubted from the beginning that there had been much of a struggle or no struggle at all and that Harris had simply cornered her cuckolding lover and blasted four slugs into him as he stood in his bedroom. A long, rambling letter describing her physical and mental subjugation to Tarnower corroborated her story and established a motive.

Jean Harris was charged with second degree murder. Her trial, sensationalized in tabloids, began in the White Plains, New York, courtroom of Judge Russell R. Leggett in November 1980. On February 4, 1981, the infamous "Scarsdale Letter," mailed from Virginia the day of the murder, was introduced into evidence. "Going through the hell of the past few years has been bearable only because you were still there and I could be with you," it read in part. The letter failed to sway the jury. On February 24, 1981, the jurors returned a verdict of guilty. Harris was sentenced on March 20 to life imprisonment at the Bedford Hills Correctional Facility. As an inmate there, Harris became involved in prison reform, writing a book about her prison experience, They Always Call Us Ladies, which was published in 1988. She was later paroled and went on writing more books and giving lectures about prison abuse, but seldom, if ever, mentioning the name of the man she murdered.

MURDER OF A PLAYMATE/August 14, 1980

Paul Snider had been on his own from childhood. Born into poverty in Vancouver, British Columbia, he was the product of a broken home and the tool of street gangs. His abiding love was for money and to turn a dollar in his early twenties he became a pimp. He grew modestly wealthy peddling only a few girls, "class ladies," in his language. He adorned himself with furs, flashy clothes and an ostentatious pinky ring, in the tradition of any successful whoremaster.

Driving about Vancouver in sports cars (either over-financed or on loan to him), Snider failed in his amateur efforts to promote auto shows and motorcycle races. He stayed with his small-time prostitution racket, carefully avoiding any traffic in drugs, although underworld contacts who protected his flesh peddling attempted to high-pressure him into that racket. He dreaded any arrest for drug violations, which he knew would draw a lengthy prison term, once telling a friend: "I will kill myself before I go to jail."

Still, Snider's expensive habits endangered his life. When he failed to pay a loan shark, he was seized by goons and taken to the top of a Vancouver hotel, where he was held by his ankles out of an open window, until he promised to repay the juice loan. This experience so terrified him that Snider immediately left Vancouver for the fleshpots of Los Angeles. Within days of arrival, Snider recruited several girls to work the neighborhoods in and about posh Beverly Hills. He prospered for about a year (1976-1977), maintaining a lavish Hollywood home and riding about in a gold limousine. Yet, the hordes of hustlers lining Sunset Strip soon diminished the profits his six girls could produce.

Beautiful Dorothy Stratten, shown with a life-size image of herself and holding a plaque that honored her as Playmate of the year.

Snider took his spoils and returned to Vancouver, where he told friends that he would no longer pursue illicit activities. He vowed to go "straight" and to that end he worked several promotion schemes that brought little income and promised a limited future. All that changed on the day he walked into a Vancouver Dairy Queen, where he beheld a tall, buxom girl with a milk-white complexion. She was Dorothy Stratten (real name Dorothy Ruth Hoogstraten), eighteen, who had been working at the Dairy Queen for four years.

Like Snider, she was the offspring of divorced parents. Shy and retiring, the lovely girl lived with her mother, wrote poetry and was saving her money to pay for secretarial courses, hoping some day to become an executive secretary. David Redlick, her employer at the Dairy Queen later stated that Stratten "was the kind of girl you'd be proud to have as a sister or a daughter. She even used to take my kids to the beach sometimes, and she was the only girl I ever bought roses for when she left [the Dairy Queen. I don't even do that for my wife."

Snider was taken by the girl and, typical of his approach, did not directly ask her for a date, but got Stratten's phone number from a friend before asking her to dinner. He then began to shower her with flowers and inexpensive jewelry, flattering her over her good looks. She was overwhelmed by Snider's attention and was proud to be escorted by Snider to her high school graduation dance. Snider then began to take the impressionable girl to better restaurants and nightclubs, but this was only part of another money scheme. He told a friend: "That girl could make me a lot of money."

The hustler had recently learned that Playboy Magazine was about to conduct a hunt for "the perfect girl" to appear in its publication as the 25th Anniversary Playmate. Snider, through flattery and cajolery, convinced Stratten to pose naked so that he could send these photos to Playboy, telling the naïve girl that she would certainly be selected as "the perfect girl." Editors at Playboy were impressed with the photos, but turned Snider down when they learned that Stratten was underage and telling him that they could not use the graphics unless he obtained the signed permission of Dorothy's parents.

Snider then launched a campaign to persuade Stratten's mother to grant that permission, but Mrs. Hoogstraten adamantly refused. This was her daughter's one golden opportunity, he insisted. Never again would the five-foot-nine-inch Dutch blonde have such a chance at fame and fortune. Stratten's mother finally relented and signed the form that granted permission. Snider sent the form to Playboy and, in August 1978, boarded a plane with Stratten—her first ride in an airplane—and flew to Los Angeles, where photo tests were made of the aspiring model.

Playboy photographers were impressed with the girl's photogenic qualities and her natural beauty. She was selected as one of the sixteen finalists for the contest, but lost out to another girl. Still, fame beckoned when Stratten was selected as the August 1979 Playmate, and her appearance in the magazine launched her career. She was no longer Dorothy Hoogstraten, but had acquired a new name, Dorothy Stratten. She was quoted in the article about her as being "a sucker for the romantic approach. Romance is very effective for me because I'm a very sensitive person. I'm a faithful one-man woman. It might sound old-fashioned, but I have to concentrate my love on just one man."

Snider, meanwhile, hustled small promotions, returning to the seamy side of the street by operating a small disco that featured nude male dancers, who titillated middle-aged women. The hustler knew that his own future was limited and banked on the opportunities presented to Stratten. To that end, he proposed marriage to her in May 1979. Though warned that Snider was merely out to use her, Stratten felt obligated to the hustler and described him as her lover, friend, guide, counselor, and manager. She accepted and the couple married in Las Vegas, Nevada, on June 1, 1979.

Stratten with hustler Paul Snider, celebrating her 20th birthday; Snider became her husband and killer.

Stratten appeared in a number of low-budget films; she is shown above as a ravishing robot in Galaxina.

After the Playboy appearance, Stratten began to get TV and movie offers, as Snider expected. She was ecstatic after appearing as a guest star on the Buck Rogers in the 25th Century TV series. At the time, the innocent ingénue blurted: "Seeing my name in the TV Guide was the most exciting thing in my life." She next appeared in a low-budget Canadian film, Autumn Born, but she showed little enthusiasm for her role in the movie, telling a reporter that she spent most of her time on camera "getting beat up."

The model turned actress appeared in more low-budget films, such as Americathon and Skatetown, U.S.A., but in roles that showed she had a genuine talent for acting. Her star rose to greater heights when Playboy chief Hugh Hefner selected Stratten as the 1980 Playmate of the Year. From this coveted position, she gleaned more than $200,000 in jewelry and furniture gifts. Suddenly, she was followed about by Hollywood designers, managers, coaches, hairdressers, and, especially, photographers.

Snider saw that he was losing control of his wife to these entrepreneurial mentors. He became resentful and accused Stratten of cutting him out of her successful business enterprises. He became enraged when being eliminated from the invitation list to many of the Playboy functions at Hefner's lavish mansion. He was further frustrated by Hefner himself, who kept him at arm's distance, after Snider tried to interest the publishing mogul in some of his shady schemes.

While Snider faded into the background, Stratten continued to appear in more films, her latest being Galaxina, in which she appeared as a beautiful robot. "I have been programmed for love," she tells a space crew member in this film, one that was released only a few weeks after her tragic death. Although Stratten began to enjoy the company of Hollywood's movers and shakers, her life with Snider crumbled. The hustler argued with her incessantly, bickering that finally led to the couple's separation. Snider moved into a cheap bungalow in West Los Angeles next to a freeway, while Stratten flew to New York to appear in Peter Bogdanovich's new film, They All Laughed. She would join the company of stars Audrey Hepburn and Ben Gazarra.

Stratten fell in love with the director and when she returned to the Coast, she told Snider that she would make a comfortable settlement in a quiet divorce. Snider was having none of it. He had groomed her for stardom, nurtured her career, he said. He had created her image as a sex goddess, he yelled. Stratten ignored him and moved into Bogdanovich's Beverly Hills home, an act that enraged Snider. He reportedly vowed that he would kill the director, but he soon began to focus his revenge exclusively on Stratten.

Snider called his estranged wife on August 12, 1980, arranging a meeting with her. The following day, he bought a 12-gauge shotgun and then stopped by a photographer's studio, where he looked over some proofs showing his latest protégé, a new model he had acquired. At that time, the promoter cryptically stated to the photographer: "Sometimes, Playmates get killed and when that happens it brings about chaos."

The Playmate and movie starlet arrived at Snider's bungalow about noon on August 14, 1980. She spent about two hours with her estranged husband in the living room where her purse was later found. Inside of it was a note from Snider which demanded money. Early that evening, Snider's roommate, a physician, knocked on the promoter's bedroom door and, entering the room, reeled in horror. Paul Snider and Dorothy Stratten were dead.

The bedroom walls were spattered with blood. The naked body of the 20-year-old Stratten was draped over a bed, her beautiful face shot away. Snider was on the floor, also naked, his bleeding corpse having fallen upon the shotgun he had used to kill his wife and end his own life. News of the murder-suicide sent shockwaves through the Hollywood community. The movies had been robbed of a potential star, the gossip columnists carped, Hefner of a Playmate and Bogdanovich a future wife.

May 2, 1980: Dorothy Stratten appeared with a construction worker in her hometown of Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada, on a promotion tour for Playboy, holding the issue in which she was featured as a Playmate; her husband, Paul Snider, shot and killed her four months later.

The director arranged for Stratten's funeral, having her body cremated and the ashes placed in an urn, which he would later visit with regularity. Bogdanovich, in a moving statement, said: "Dorothy looked at the world with love, and believed that all people were good down deep. She was mistaken, but it is among the most generous and noble errors we can make."

There were no eulogies for Paul Snider. His body was shipped back to his native Vancouver, where it was buried in an inexpensive grave.

THE KILLING OF A SUPERSTAR/ December 8, 1980

Although he desperately tried to disassociate himself from the most popular rock'n roll singing group in history—one that he himself created—superstar John Winston Lennon was forever linked to that celebrated foursome, even long after he was slain by a berserk fan, Mark David Chapman. "We're going to live, or we're going to die. If we're dead, we're going to have to deal with that; if we're alive, we're going to have to deal with being alive." A few hours after he said those words, rock star and former Beatle John Lennon was shot to death by Chapman.

Born into an unhappy family in Liverpool, England, on October 9, 1940, Lennon's father deserted him and his mother when he was three. His mother also deserted him later, putting him in the care of her sister, but Lennon maintained a lifelong hatred for his father. Years later, when the elder Lennon suddenly appeared as his famous son's door, the rock star took one look at him and, without a word, slammed the door in his face. He later stated with deep bitterness: "I don't feel I owe him anything. He never helped me. I got there by myself."

Lennon always took exclusive credit for his enormous success and there was about him an egotistical attitude that bordered on megalomania. At the zenith of the Beatles' career, Lennon stupidly blurted: "We're more popular than Jesus now. I don't know which will go first—rock 'n' roll or Christianity." He was to deeply regret that comment, and, always commercially minded, saw its damage when thousands of irate Beatle fans smashed and burned the albums of the singing group. While on tour in Chicago, on August 12, 1966, Lennon said he "was sorry that he opened his mouth about Jesus Christ."

It was clear that had he not made the retraction, his and the careers of his three singing companions, might well have ended right there. The group had had a rocky beginning in the first place. Lennon had the idea for such a group when he was only fifteen and after meeting Paul McCartney at a party in Liverpool in 1955. Rock 'n' roll was then beginning to emerge through the gyrating efforts of rock pathfinders Elvis Presley, Buddy Holly and Bill Haley. In 1956, Lennon formed his first band, the Quarrymen, which McCartney joined. Most of the members could not stand Lennon's vanity and arrogance and left, but McCartney remained and the group was joined by George Harrison and, finally, the comedic Ringo Starr.

The Beatles in 1968 (left to right): Paul McCartney, John Lennon, Ringo Starr and George Harrison.

Yoko Ono and John Lennon, shortly before the singer-composer was fatally shot on December 8, 1980; they are standing outside the Dakota apartments in New York.

The upscale Dakota apartments, in New York City, where Lennon maintained a suite of rooms and outside of which a mentally disturbed fan waited to kill him.

The group was renamed Johnny and the Moondogs, then Long John and the Silver Beatles and then simply The Beatles. It was a difficult period and Lennon made it more difficult by alienating many of those who might give financial support to the group. He quickly earned a reputation of being a brash young man, who insulted almost everyone he encountered, his sarcasm passing for thin wit.

Lennon's first wife, Cynthia, with whom Lennon had a son, Julian, was to comment in her book, A Twist of Lennon: "I think he was the last stronghold of the Teddy Boys [British street thugs who were aptly described in Anthony Burgess' brutal novel, A Clockwork Orange, later a film by the same name]—totally aggressive and anti-establishment."

Critic Stanley Reynolds, who knew Lennon long before the Beatles came to fame, remarked: "John Lennon was the hardest, toughest kid I ever met. He had an uncompromising attitude that would never give an inch. He was completely unbending and it shocked you [when] meeting him, because he was, after all, a young fellow and a civilian—so why was he at war? The truth was that he was at war with the whole world." Others were even more severe in their appraisal of Lennon, one seeing him as a calculating fellow "whose sensitive ballads were contrived to milk sentiment from emotionally gullible fans—he squeezed out emotion like someone would wring out a mop. He used love to make a fortune and he was a man without the sincerity of love."

Despite Lennon's self-destructive ways, the group caught on and, in February 1963, the Beatles cut their first album, "Please, Please Me," which climbed rapidly in the charts in England. A year later, on February 8, 1964, the Beatles appeared on Ed Sullivan's enormously popular variety TV show and they were an instant success. Within months, the Beatles became a household word in America. Many compositions followed, with McCartney providing the music and Lennon the lyrics. Their songs, style and personae dominated the popular music world for six years, its stubborn vogue continuing to this day.

Mark David Chapman, who shot John Lennon five times, and then sat down upon the cement to read a book.

Thousands aped the Beatles and their lifestyles. When Lennon donned casual clothes and dark glasses—he was myopic—hordes of fans abandoned suits and opted for sport shirts and jeans and dark glasses. Lennon grew a droopy mustache and droopy mustaches became the rage. The idolizing fans soon became to irk Lennon and he expressed his contempt for the throngs of teenage girls that grabbed, clutched and tore at his clothes during public appearances. On one occasion, he told his wife, Cynthia: "We'll have to get out of this death trap before they kill me. I had no idea it was going to be like this. It's like a bloody madhouse out there. We deserve every penny we get."

By 1966, Lennon sought relief from the crowds, having met Yoko Ono, who urged him to pursue a "more classical" kind of music. It took four more years before the group disbanded in 1970. Only Paul McCartney and the Wings saw the kind of success enjoyed by the original group and that latter day singing group did not last for long. Deluged with fame and riches, the foursome went their separate ways throughout the 1970s, experimenting with self-analysis, drugs and a search for gurus with all-knowing answers.

Yoko Ono, for whom Lennon left his first wife, persuaded the singer-composer to move to New York, where he occupied a lavish suite of rooms at the exclusive Dakota apartments. Lennon spent most of his time in New York talking about his own premature demise, which he predicted would occur in a nuclear holocaust. Every time Lennon left the Dakota, he was surrounded by loyal fans seeking autographs, which he dutifully supplied. One of these autograph-seekers was a swarthy, heavy-set young man with glasses and a mop of dark hair, Mark David Chapman.

Chapman was born in Fort Worth, Texas, on May 10, 1955. Raised in Georgia, he ran away from home when he was fourteen. He was away only a few weeks, but remained part of the drug scene for another two years. Becoming a Beatles fan as a teenager, he tried to emulate them with his own band. However, after Chapman became a born-again Christian, he was offended by Lennon's remark about Jesus.

Thus, Chapman gave up the Beatles, as he had given up drugs and used his spare time to work with children at the YMCA. Chapman's friends watched him become increasingly preoccupied with internal struggles concerning the sinfulness of the "Bad Mark." He moved around the country, working at various jobs and studying religions in his free time. He was arrested for armed robbery, kidnapping, and possession of drugs. Chapman tried to commit suicide in 1977, and received psychological care.

In 1979, he married a travel agent, Gloria H. Abe, a woman four years his senior and of Japanese descent (as was John Lennon's Yoko Ono) and moved to Hawaii, where he insisted that she never watch television or read newspapers. He frequently stood outside a Church of Scientology and shouted abuse, and month by month he became more irrational, although he kept that side of him hidden from most people. In 1980, he got a job as a security guard at a condominium and a short time later he changed the name tag on his security guard's uniform to read "John Lennon," and on October 23, 1980 he quit his job, signing out as John Lennon.

From that time, it became necessary for Chapman to get rid of the real John Lennon, since he had taken on his idol's personality and identity. Chapman first bought a .38-caliber pistol. Then he borrowed $2,500 from a credit union and flew to New York City on December 6, 1980. He began to spend long hours stationed outside the Dakota. On December 8, Lennon emerged to go to a recording studio, and Chapman had him autograph his most recent album, Double Fantasy. Chapman stayed where he was as Lennon and Ono drove off, then turned to continue reading a copy of J. D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye.

At 11 p.m. that night, Lennon and Yoko Ono returned to the Dakota. Chapman called out, "Mr. Lennon." Lennon looked up and Chapman dropped to a military crouch, his legs spread apart as he aimed a .38-caliber Charter Arms revolver at him. Without another word, Chapman fired five times, the bullets striking Lennon's chest, back and left arm. He took a few steps, then called out to Yoko Ono: "I'm shot!"

Opposite page, left: Mourning fans gather to honor the memory of their slain music idol; Lennon's killer went to prison for life.

Patrolman Jim Moran, who had been assigned to control the crowds outside the Dakota (many celebrities lived there in addition to Lennon, including actress Lauren Bacall, musical director Leonard Bernstein, and comic Gilda Radner), ran forward and helped Lennon into the back of his squad car. By the time Moran arrived at the emergency entrance of Roosevelt Hospital, Lennon had died from his wounds.

After killing Lennon, Chapman sat down and returned to reading the Salinger novel, seemingly unconcerned at murdering his idol. He was arrested and charged with second-degree murder. At the time, Chapman told the police: "I have a small part in me that cannot understand the world and what goes on in it. I did not want to kill anybody, and I really don't know why I did ..."

Chapman's lawyer, Jonathan Marks, wanted him to plead not guilty by reason of insanity, but Chapman told the court that God had told him to confess to murder. He was convicted and sentenced on July 24, 1981, to twenty years to life in prison, with a recommendation that he receive psychiatric treatment. Even his own attorney asked the judge not to sentence him too lightly. "All reports came to the conclusion that he is not a sane man. It was not a sane crime. It was ...a monstrously irrational killing." Chapman's only response to the sentencing was to read aloud a passage from The Catcher in the Rye. He was sent to Attica State Prison in upstate New York, where he was put to work as a janitor.

IN THE BELLY OF THE BEAST OF FAME/ July 18, 1981

Jack Henry Abbott (AKA: Jack Eastman, b. 1944) spent most of his adult life in prison. He committed his first murder in 1966 and, after novelist Norman Mailer worked for his release, killed a second time in 1981. At first, this convict, dedicated wholly to violence, was celebrated by New York's literati for penning a prison journal successfully published by Random House. Upon his 1981 release, Abbott was adopted by such literary lights as Norman Mailer, his sponsor, and Jerzy Kosinski.

Abbott was invited to elitist cocktail parties, where the rich and famous fawned over him. He was heralded as a "great writer" and an "insightful philosopher." Jack Henry Abbott, however, was in reality, always had been, a man who would kill anyone over the slightest annoyance. This he did, at the height of his brief literary fame, oblivious to his so-called rehabilitation, committing a cold-blooded, conscienceless murder that proved how dangerous it really was for amateur criminologists to meddle with crime.

A habitual criminal, Abbott spent all but nine months of his adult life in prison. He was convicted of forgery, bank robbery, and murder. In 1953, at age nine, Abbott proved so incorrigible in foster homes that he was sent to reform school in Utah. Released at age eighteen, Abbott was arrested and convicted of passing bad checks and sent to Utah State Penitentiary, where he killed a fellow inmate in 1966.

Tried for this murder, Abbott claimed self-defense, that he had been the victim of a violent homosexual attack. When that ploy did not appear to affect the court, Abbot assumed the role of the lunatic, throwing a pitcher of water at the judge and claiming insanity. A court psychiatrist examined him and reported that Abbott was fit to stand trial. He was sentenced to fourteen years.

Abbott escaped from Utah State Penitentiary in 1971 and was at large for six weeks, during which time he robbed a Denver bank and, upon his recapture, became a federal prisoner. While serving time in a maximum security prison, Abbott read voraciously, consuming scores of books on philosophy, enmeshing himself in the credos of Karl Marx and becoming an avowed Marxist. He read a 1977 newspaper story about Norman Mailer writing a book (The Executioner's Song) on Gary Gilmore, who was condemned for murder and was awaiting execution in Utah State Penitentiary.

Mailer, like his New York contemporary, Truman Capote (author of In Cold Blood, a novelized version of the Clutter slayings in Kansas—see Mass Murder), was suddenly departing mainstream literature to enter the world of criminology. Oddly, Mailer never got to meet Gilmore, using the taped interviews between Lawrence Schiller and Gilmore to create Gilmore's dialog.

It was to Mailer, at then a powerful influence in the media, that Abbott began addressing his letters, which were fifteen-page, handwritten missives to the author. The clever Abbott, obviously realizing that Mailer was a complete novice in perceiving prison life, offered to aid him in that understanding by detailing his own experiences as a long-term, "state-raised" prisoner.

Abbott intrigued the author by spewing forth tales of dark violence, writing in a clinically descriptive style reminiscent of Mailer's own early works, particularly certain passages from The Naked and the Dead, which had certainly not gone unnoticed in Abbott's endless rummaging through prison libraries.

The prisoner's literary nightmares described fourteen years of solitary confinement and unbelievable cruelty on the part of prison guards, who beat him, tortured him with antipsychotic drugs, sadistically gassed him, starved him so that he was forced to eat cockroaches in his cell to survive, and placed him in strip-and-search cells, where he had to stand naked, chained by one arm to his bed.

Abbott's relentless correspondence fed on hatred and violence, intriguing an author whose own interest in violence had always been intense. Mailer took Abbott's letters to the editors of the elitist New York Review of Books, and, at his urging in June 1980, an article praising Abbott's writing style appeared in that publication, along with a sample of the letters. This article was read with great interest by Errol McDonald, an editor at Random House. Within two months, McDonald had placed Abbott under a book contract, which called for a $12,000 advance, and McDonald began organizing the killer's book, which was entitled In the Belly of the Beast.

Almost immediately, Abbott began to energetically lobby for a parole. The Federal Bureau of Prisons made the first step easier by returning Abbott to Utah State Penitentiary to serve out his remaining time there. Once inside the walls of that institution, an automatic parole was considered. Mailer and others were influential, if not decisive, in their pleas that Abbott be released.

The chair in which condemned killer Gary Gilmore was executed in Utah, a symbol that inspired the dark ambitions of another murderer, Jack Henry Abbott.

Mailer wrote to the parole board that Abbott was really "a powerful and important American writer," urging a positive decision and offering the killer a job as his research assistant. McDonald, the Random House editor, also wrote to prison authorities, saying that he believed Abbott "could support himself as a professional writer if he were released from prison and that he could very well have a bright future."

The parole campaign was successful and Abbott was released on June 5, 1981, transferred from prison to a halfway house in Manhattan's Lower East Side. When the killer's plane arrived in New York, Norman Mailer was on hand to greet him. Almost at the same time, reviews of Abbott's recently released book gushed torrents of praise upon the killer. Wrote Colgate University Professor Terrence Des Pres in the New York Times Book Section: " ...awesome, brilliant, perversely ingenious; its impact is indelible and, as an articulation of penal nightmare it is completely compelling." New York's literati welcomed the killer with warm embraces, celebrating his published achievement with a number of cocktail parties and smart gatherings at which Abbott was lionized. Great things were predicted for him. He would become a literary giant of the century. His books would be read as credo by anyone needing to know about prison life. Moreover, some even said, Abbott represented the new wave of American literature and was, in fact, its leader.

Other than Mailer, many New York literary lions heaped praise on Abbott's work, and these included the brilliant writer Jerzy Kosinski of Being There fame. (Kosinski would later regret endorsing the lethal Abbott, being one of the few in the clique of the killer's admirers, who later concluded that the Abbott episode was a fraud, likening the literary laurels placed upon Abbott's head to the literati's support of the Black Panthers, an American terrorist group in the 1960s.)

Abbott worked briefly for Mailer by doing some scanty research, but he spent most of his time drifting aimlessly about the city, a misplaced creature, who paradoxically spent time with the elite and powerful of New York one hour, and the next walking about the worst area of the city, the Lower East Side, peopled with prostitutes, pimps, drug pushers, and hardened criminals like himself. Besides Mailer and Kosinski, Abbott found himself in the company of such sterling personalities as author Jean Malaquais, literary agent Scott Meredith, and Robert Silvers, editor of the New York Review of Books.

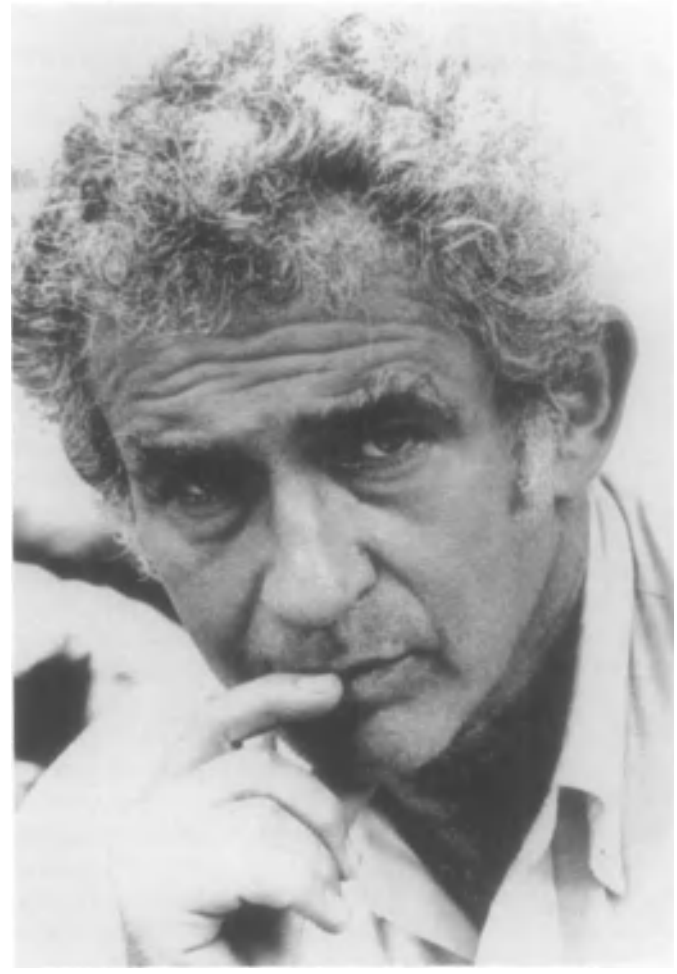
Abbott impressed them no end with his knowledge of Sartre and Camus, existentialists like himself, he said. He knew just what names and quotations would lure these Establishment personalities closer to his web, manipulating them with ease, calling loudly for entrees from their own menus, chewing upon the fat of their own philosophical beliefs, and thanking them for allowing him, Jack Henry Abbott, convicted killer, to dine at their table.

Surrounded by the protecting arms of New York's literary sachems, Abbott undoubtedly felt that his future was secure. He lobbied discreetly for an even loftier position, one which would afford him continuous recognition and financial support, not as a reformed criminal, but as a misunderstood literary giant. He expected his new friends to arrange a fellowship for him at the prestigious MacDowell Colony for accomplished artists in picturesque Petersborough, New Hampshire. Here he would preside over the novice writer, the impressionable artist, dictating the thoughts of youthful, adoring followers. None of this, thankfully, was to be.

On the morning of July 18, 1981, Abbott, accompanied by two women, entered a small, all-night restaurant, the BoniBon, on Second Avenue and Fifth Street. It was 5 a.m. After Abbott and the women took their seats, 22-year-old Richard Adan, a struggling Cuban-born actor working as a waiter, approached the table to take their order. Adan had recently appeared on public TV in Spain in a series of dramatic roles that had given his career a boost. His newly completed play about the Lower East Side was soon to be produced by an experimental stage group and the youth, known always to be polite and pleasant, was looking eagerly forward to a blossoming career in the theater. Adan had recently married a young choreographer-actress whose father had given him a job as a waiter in his restaurant so the young couple could make ends meet.

Abbott asked Adan where the washroom was located. Adan, according to customers in the restaurant, courteously explained that it was an employee-only washroom and that insurance restrictions prevented customers from using it. Abbott became incensed and began using abusive language. According to witnesses, Adan asked him to go outside with him to try to settle the argument so as not to disturb the other customers. Abbott later claimed that Adan was threatening him, but it was Abbott who did the threatening.

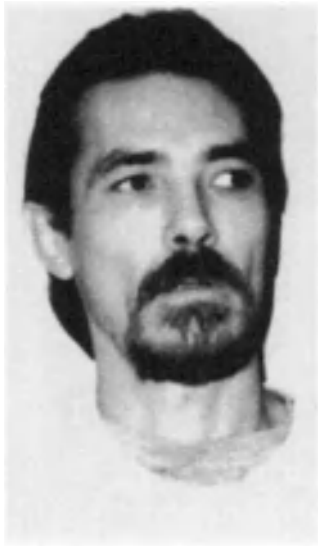
Once outside the restaurant, Abbott drew a knife with a medium-length blade and with one powerful thrust, drove the blade into Adan's heart. Another waiter, just at that moment, looked out of one of the restaurant's windows to see the young waiter jumping up and down, gushing blood. Abbott then returned to one of the women with him, college student Susan Roxas, and shouted: "Let's get out of here. I just killed a man!"



Author Norman Mailer was so impressed by Abbott's writing that he lobbied for his prison release, promoted Abbott's book, and even attempted to reduce Abbott's sentence after the killer murdered again.

At that moment, Jack Henry Abbott, acclaimed author, vanished. It is revealing to quote Abbott's own work, where he describes how he knifed a fellow prisoner to death fifteen years earlier, a methodical, cold-blooded act that was duplicated with the same precision in his 1981 murder of Richard Adan: "The enemy is smiling and chatting away about something. He thinks you're his fool; he trusts you. You see the spot. It's a target between the second and third button on his shirt. As you calmly talk and smile, you move your left foot to the side to step across his right-side body length. A light pivot toward him with your right shoulder and the world turns upside down; you have sunk the knife to its hilt into the middle of his chest."

For two months Abbott eluded police and federal agents who were searching for him nationwide. Using the considerable advances from his book, Abbott managed to get to Mexico and hole up near the Guatemalan border, but after some weeks, not being able to speak Spanish or find work that would cloak his activities, he moved back to the U.S., relocating in Louisiana.



Jack Henry Abbott, heralded as a powerful new writer at the time his book was published.

Abbott was spotted in the Latin Quarter of New Orleans several times but, whenever officers appeared, he had just departed his lodgings, almost as if he had been informed that authorities were closing in on him. Investigators interviewed the prostitutes of the Quarter and one streetwalker identified Abbott's photo, telling police that the much-wanted killer was looking for work in the Louisiana oil fields.

Officers then tracked the elusive killer through the oil towns of Algiers, Harvey, and Marrero, searching through the murky bunkhouses, where hundreds of nameless itinerant workers lived, but at every turn they missed their man, sometimes only by minutes. Abbott seemed to have a sixth sense about lawmen closing in on him and would, according to fellow workers, suddenly quit whatever he was doing, grab his meager belongings, and depart. In mid-September 1981, New York Police Detective William Majeski, who had arrived at the BoniBon restaurant after the Adan killing to take charge of the investigation and had trailed Abbott with other officers to New Orleans, learned that the fugitive was using a social security card with the alias of Jack Eastman.

Abbott had selected an anonymous world into which he hoped to disappear. The boom town oil fields of Louisiana collected thousands of roughnecks and roustabouts, many with criminal records, men like Abbott, who sought obscurity. Mixing with these tough, taciturn men were illegal aliens from Mexico, refugees from Vietnam, the flotsam and jetsam of the world, men who worked for $4 an hour, sixteen hours a day, and paid a third of their salary to the company to sleep in filthy bunkhouses and eat from open-air canteens. The rest of their money they would give to the whores who visited these camps in droves.

On September 23, 1981, following a tip from Detective Carl Parsiola of St. Mary's Parish, James Riley, an intelligence agent of the sheriff's department, accompanied by Dan Dossett of the Morgan City Police, and other officers, located Abbott working in the fields of the Ramos Oil Company. He was unloading pipe from trucks that clogged the roads. Overhead helicopters buzzed about on company work and the nearby bayous belched smoke from tugs pulling freight. Where years before there had been wilderness, this area was now cluttered with humanity and the officers were concerned that their man would once again escape. Carefully, Riley, Dossett, and the others moved toward Abbott, pretending to be workers. When they saw Abbott raise his arms to comb his hair, the lawmen rushed forward, eight shotguns leveled at him.

Abbott was ordered to keep his hands in the air as officers moved forward to handcuff him. He said nothing, remaining motionless, offering no resistance. He wore cheap blue jeans and a T-shirt that were coated with oil; his boots were crusted with caked oil and were falling apart. Returned to New York and held at Riker's Island, Abbott was tried before Judge Irving Lang of the Manhattan State Supreme Court. He was defended by criminal attorney Ivan Fisher and prosecuted by James Fogel. Early on, Abbot displayed anxiety and nervousness, a pose unlike his earlier aloof attitudes.

Jack Henry Abbott when was captured in the Louisiana oil fields.

In his own words, Abbott characterized the death of Adan as the result of a "tragic misunderstanding," a literary understatement without parallel. He went on to explain that he acted in self-defense, believing that Adan intended to attack him, the same plea that Abbott had employed when stabbing a fellow prison inmate to death in 1966. To that claim, a spectator in court rose and shouted, "You intended to do it, you scum!" This cry came from Henry Howard, the father-in-law of the dead Adan. Judge Lang ordered Howard removed from court, but he waited outside the courtroom throughout the trial, frustrated by his inability to see justice done.

The prosecution provided several witnesses, but one, Wayne Larsen, a 35-year-old Vietnam veteran, proved damning to Abbott's self-defense tactic. Larsen was standing at the corner of Second Avenue and Fifth Street and watched as Abbott attacked Adan. He testified that Adan was walking away from Abbott when Abbott drew his knife and raised it. He recalled that when Abbott struck Adan there was an impacting sound that "still rings in my ears."

Even though Adan was mortally wounded and helpless, Abbott, according to Larsen, acted as if he had merely scratched his victim, cursing Adan and screaming, "Do you still want to continue this?" Adan had made no move toward Abbott and, according to Larsen, was trying to back away from his assailant. Abbott "made a beeline" for the backpedaling Adan and lunged forward to make sure he killed his man and, in Larsen's words, Abbott's knife blow to Adan's chest was so powerful "that the hair swung back on his [Abbott's] head."

Abbott sat trembling in court, clutching a handkerchief. He wore glasses and his hair was combed in a meticulous pompadour. Immediately following Larsen's testimony, Abbott asked that he be allowed to leave the courtroom. "The testimony was extremely upsetting to him, reliving the event," lawyer Fisher later stated. Abbott's request was granted, although the paradox was evident. Abbott had graphically described his murder of another human being without a gnat-sting of remorse in his best-selling book, but he was visibly upset by the retelling of his murder of Adan.

The victim, however, was offered up by Abbott to be not Adan, but Abbott. He again recited the litany of his prison sufferings, the endless abuse that was heaped upon him by an unthinking, inhumane prison system, the very rationale that had brought about his much-influenced parole. Abbott wanted it both ways, first to be released from prison for what the prison system had done to him, then excused from another murder outside of prison and shielded from being returned to that system because of what the prison system had done. If nothing else, Abbott was certainly angling for a minimum sentence, after having been found guilty of first degree manslaughter.

Prosecutor Fogel was having none of it, calling for a maximum sentence, a life term. "This is a killer," Fogel argued before the bench, "a killer by habit, a killer by inclination, a killer by philosophy, and a killer by desire."

Fisher clung to Abbott's own lifelong defense, stating that his client had been warped by a lifetime of prison. "He was mistreated for so long and so horrible a way. If it was, in fact, the poison of prison that brought about these events, how can it be urged that a lot more is the cure?"

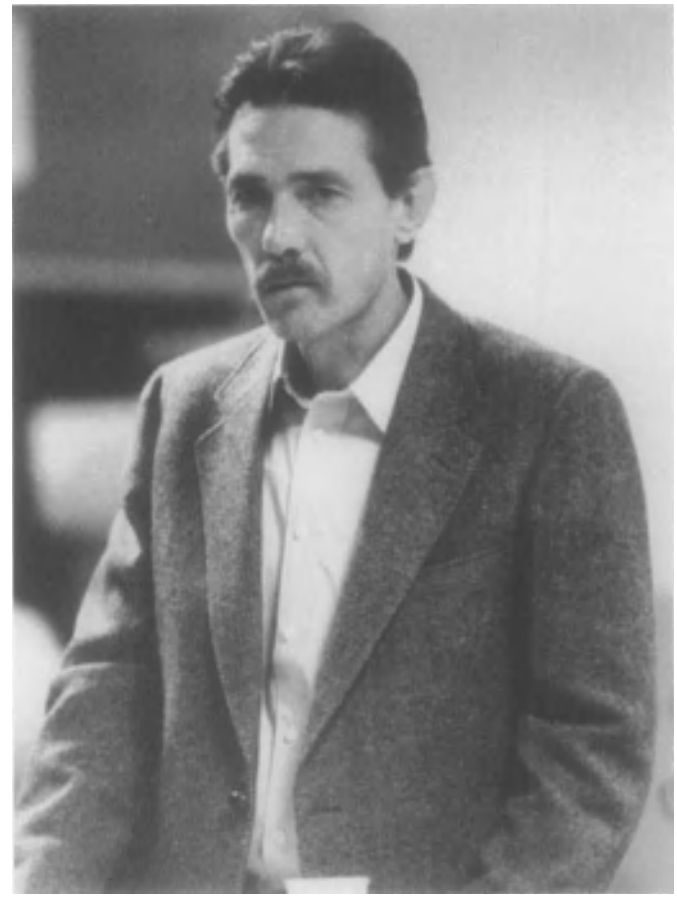
Judge Lang had earlier ruled that Abbott's previous convictions had qualified him as a "persistent violent felon." When he asked the defendant if he had anything to say before sentence was pronounced, Abbott mumbled, "No." Judge Lang then stated that the conviction of Abbott was in part "an indictment of a prison system which brutalized instead of rehabilitating ...It's perfectly clear that the defendant could not cope with the reality of a non-prison existence."

Judge Lang then sentenced Abbott to fifteen years to life, a minimum sentence. He would be returned to Utah State Penitentiary to serve out his remaining eight years for earlier convictions before serving the New York sentence of fifteen years.

Norman Mailer went before the court and implored leniency, stating, "Culture is worth a little risk. A major sentence would destroy him." Even though Abbott did not receive the maximum sentence, Mailer, following the sentencing, was disgruntled, saying that Judge Lang's sentence was so long as to be "killing." Complained the 59-year-old author, "At the point he gets out, he'll be as old as I am now." Adan's father-in-law, Henry Howard, heard the news of the sentence and was filled with rage. "In twenty-four years," he said, "Jack Abbott will be back on the street and he will kill again. Why are his rights better than Richard Adan's rights?"

This was a question answered obliquely and rather callously by Abbott's attorney, Ivan Fisher, who was quoted as saying, in responding to questions about Adan's family being entitled to the profits from Abbott's book (then estimated to be about $500,000), "If you kill a brain surgeon you're in much more trouble than if you kill a waiter working nights at the BiniBon Restaurant. That's not my judgment, that's the law."

Before being led back to prison, Abbott, through Fisher, announced plans to sue the state of New York for $10 million for "the mental anguish and threats to his life" while he was a prisoner on Riker's Island. Meanwhile, Abbott's book soared to best-seller status, selling more than 40,000 hardbound copies through Random House. At the time, dramatic rights to Abbott's savage tale had been purchased by a film company headed by comic Alan King in the amount of $250,000.



Jack Henry Abbott at the time of his trial for the 1981 murder of New York waiter Richard Adan; he was convicted and returned to prison, hanging himself in 2002.

Jack Henry Abbott did not live to see parole. On February 10, 2002, Abbott hanged himself with a bedsheet and a shoelace at New York's Wende Correctional Facility. He reportedly left a suicide note, but this was not released by authorities. Moaned Norman Mailer: "His life was tragic from beginning to end. I never knew a man who had a worse life."

MURDER OF A MILLIONAIRE'S MISTRESS/ July 6-7, 1983

At the age of seventeen, Vicki Morgan was a tall, slender and buxom young woman with a face of classic beauty—high cheekbones, aquiline nose, wide-set expressive eyes and full lips. She drew the attention of every male that encountered her, not the least of whom was 53-year-old department store tycoon Alfred Bloomingdale, who spied the willowy Morgan walking down Sunset Boulevard in 1970. He followed her into the Old World Restaurant and immediately asked for her phone number. "He was so persistent, I had lunch with him," Morgan later said.

Within days, Morgan had become one of Bloomingdale's mistresses, learning early about his myriad perversions. According to her later statements, Morgan became the tycoon's willing pawn in sadomasochistic orgies, where she and other females were stripped naked, bound and whipped by Bloomingdale. Aroused, Bloomingdale then had sex with Morgan and other women and often he invited other males to participate in these orgies, conduct rather startling for one of America's leading businessmen.

Bloomingdale had not only established a department store empire, but had created Diner's Club and numerous other businesses that filled his coffers to the brim. His wife, Betsy, was a social grande dame who counted Nancy Reagan as her close friend and it was through this relationship that Bloomingdale befriended then California Governor Ronald Reagan, whom he called "Ron." The tycoon became part of Reagan's "kitchen cabinet," of unofficial advisors and he was one of those who helped to finance Reagan's presidential campaign, which put him into the White House in 1980.

Other than a brief affair in 1971 with another man that produced a son, Todd, Morgan remained Bloomingdale's devoted mistress for a decade. The tycoon came to love her and lavished a posh home on her, a Mercedes-Benz, furs, jewelry and an $18,000-a-month allowance. Despite his busy schedule in attending to his many businesses, Bloomingdale spent most of his time with Morgan and not until his death by cancer in August 1982, did his wife Betsy learn of the relationship. At that time, Mrs. Bloomingdale ordered Morgan from the home her husband had rented for her.

Embittered at this eviction, Morgan filed a suit against the Bloomingdale estate, claiming $10 million in palimony payments were due her. Her attorneys used as a precedent the palimony case successfully won against actor Lee Marvin by his mistress. Morgan, in her suit, said that her deceased lover had promised to pay her for "her services," as an advisor on a new business scheme, a pizza parlor chain. If the Bloomingdale family established such a chain, Morgan's attorneys said, their client was entitled to fifty percent of ownership.

Vicki Morgan in 1970, when she caught the eye of a millionaire, who made her his sex slave and mistress.

Department store magnate Alfred Bloomingdale, who kept Morgan in style for a decade as his mistress.

Morgan and her attorneys were in for a shock. In September 1982, the case was heard before Superior Court Judge Christian Markey. Morgan told the court that she was Bloomingdale's "business confidante, companion and mistress." Judge Markey, however, determined that the relationship had been only for sex and that the Michelle Triola Marvin v. Lee Marvin case did not apply. Morgan was awarded nothing. Her lawyers immediately instituted new lawsuits, but these cases promised to drag through the courts for years and, meanwhile, the unemployed Morgan no longer had the funds to support her old lavish lifestyle.

The 30-year-old actress—she had appeared in a few low-budget films—could not find suitable work. Unemployed and running out of money, she rented a small $1,000-a-month condominium in Studio City in early 1983, where she and her son Todd lived. To pay bills, she began selling off her furs and jewelry and even the Mercedes-Benz Bloomingdale had bought for her. Still, her extravagant lifestyle demanded more immediate support and to that end, she invited 33-year-old Marvin Pancoast, an admitted homosexual who frequented all the stylish gay bars in Los Angeles, to become her roommate. Morgan had known Pancoast for about four years, thinking that he would share the costs of the condo with her. After Pancoast moved in, however, Morgan learned that he had lost his job as a clerk at the William Morris Agency and was himself unemployed and had little money. To compensate for his inability to pay his way, Pancoast ran errands for Morgan, baby-sat her son and functioned as her obedient servant.

When Morgan realized that Pancoast could not provide needed funds, she decided to move to a girlfriend's house, leaving her roommate with the burden of the condo. She ordered movers to pick up her furniture on July 7, 1983, but this was a move that was never made. Pancoast, who had rankled at his subservient position, decided to simply murder Morgan. "I was tired of being her slave boy," he later lamely explained.

On the late night of July 6-7, 1983, Pancoast turned down the lights in the condo's living room and turned up the stereo so that neighbors would not hear any loud noises. He then picked up a baseball bat used by Morgan's son and walked into Morgan's bedroom. He found her asleep and proceeded to savagely beat her on the head and chest for several minutes until he realized that she was dead.

Before 4 a.m., on July 7, 1983, Pancoast walked into a police precinct station in North Hollywood to tell the desk sergeant "I just killed someone." In addition to the sensational disclosures made by Morgan in her lawsuits, her murder now captured the nation's front pages. The case was further enlarged when Los Angeles attorney Robert Steinberg announced, on July 11, 1983, that he had acquired video tapes that showed Morgan, Bloomingdale and "top government Vicki Morgan in 1982, when she filed a palimony suit following Bloomingdale's death, one that ended in failure.

Homosexual slayer Marvin Pancoast, beat Morgan to death on the night of July 6-7, 1983; he died in prison of AIDS.

officials" participating in sex orgies. He later admitted that these tapes had been stolen from his office and he could not produce them or subsequently identify those involved who posed a "high risk to the national security of the country."

Pancoast, meanwhile, went on trial and throughout it was rumored that he had been a willing pawn in a conspiracy to murder Morgan to keep her mouth shut about high-level government people involved in the Bloomingdale sex scandals. Pancoast, in truth, had a long history of mental problems and pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity to the slaying of Vicki Morgan. His brief trial ended on September 14, 1984, when he was convicted of first-degree murder. He was sentenced to twenty-six years to life.

Pancoast died of aids while serving out his term. The "Morgan conspiracy" lingers in the minds of the suspicious to this day, but Steinberg's tapes never surfaced and there is little or no evidence to substantiate the wild claims that a cabal plotted to silence the beautiful mistress by calculated murder.

THE BEDEVILED BRANDOS/May 17, 1990

One of the greatest actors of the 20th Century, Marlon Brando has heard the plaudits of the world. He has also undergone the pain and suffering of a parent whose son, Christian, went to prison for shooting his sister's lover, and then endured the agony of his daughter's suicide. On May 17, 1990, a 911 operator was startled to hear one of the world's most famous voices report a shooting. It was that of Marlon Brando.

Police drove to 12900 Mulholland Drive, a posh complex in the Santa Monica mountains that overlooked Los Angeles, and entered the twelve-room mansion of the actor. In the entertainment room of Marlon Brando's house, officers found the body of 26-year-old Dag Drollet, the Tahitian boyfriend of 20-year-old Cheyenne Brando, the pregnant half-sister of Christian Brando. They also found Christian Brando (b. 1958), who was promptly charged with killing Drollet.

Christian Brando, the son of actor Marlon Brando and actress Anna Kashfi, had been the center of a bitter custody battle that lasted sixteen years. Tahitian, like his sister (Cheyenne being the daughter of Brando and Tahitian actress Tarita Teriipia, who played the actor's sweetheart in the 1962 film Mutiny on the Bounty), Christian was a high school dropout and drifter, who had briefly held jobs as a tree surgeon, welder, artist and actor, having played an assassin in an Italian-made film.

During the custody battle over Christian, Brando and Anna Kashfi waged a bitter fight. At one point, Kashfi abducted the boy and spirited him to a fishing village in Mexico, where he was tracked down by a private investigator hired by Brando. The hippie keepers of the 13-year-old boy claimed at the time that Kashfi had promised to pay each of them $10,000 to hide the child from her ex-husband. In 1986, Christian himself was entangled in an ugly divorce with Mary McKenna Brando, who claimed he had physically abused her and threatened her mother with a rifle.

Volatile and unpredictable, Christian Brando had a fierce protective instinct toward his sister, Cheyenne. After she and her lover, Drollet, the son of a prominent Tahitian businessman turned banker, traveled to Los Angeles from Tahiti to stay at Marlon Brando's home, Cheyenne, pregnant with her lover's child, began to complain that Drollet was physically abusing her. After a violent argument on May 17, 1990, Christian confronted Drollet in the family room of the actor's sprawling home (Marlon Brando was elsewhere in the house at the time). The two argued and Christian produced a .45-caliber semiautomatic pistol registered to Christian Brando. Both men struggled with the gun, which went off, shooting Drollet in the face.

Christian Brando, left, with his attorney Robert Shapiro, during his 1991 trial for killing his sister's fiancé; he was convicted of manslaughter.

Hearing the gunshot, Marlon Brando rushed to the family room, where he attempted to revive Drollet with mouth-to-mouth resuscitation. It was useless. Drollet was dead. When police arrived, they arrested Christian Brando and then noted the presence of several weapons in addition to the .45-caliber pistol—a shotgun, a .44-caliber carbine, an unregistered M-14 rifle, an unregistered Uzi submachine gun and a silencer. The actor told officers, "I don't want these guns here. Take them out of here."

Charged with murder, Christian Brando was imprisoned while his father called lawyer William Kunstler to defend his son. When arraigned, Brando pleaded not guilty to premeditated murder. Before he was led away, he turned to Kunstler and asked: "Will I have to spend the rest of my life in jail?" Robert Shapiro, who was to become O.J. Simpson's lawyer, later took over the defense of Christian Brando. On February 28, 1991, after his son had pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter, Marlon Brando took the stand to testify on Christian's behalf in a Santa Monica courtroom, explaining that his son had been a troubled youth traumatized at an early age by the vicious custody battles waged by Brando and his wife, Anna Kashfi, and that this experience had contributed to his violent behavior.

Marlon Brando, left, with Martin Sheen in the film, Apocalypse Now; he testified at his son's trial, telling the court that his son had been troubled as a child, blaming the boy's early problems on his mother, actress Anna Kashfi.

Brando also admitted that he may have failed as a parent. "Most people have some good and bad aspects," he related. "His mother came as close to being a negative person, and as cruel and unhappy a person as I've ever met ... You always tend to blame the other parent, but I know I could have done better. But I did the best I could." (Before taking the witness stand, Brando refused to take the normal courtroom oath before God to tell the truth. Instead, he said he would swear only on his children and his grandchildren.)

Superior Court Judge Robert Thomas then sentenced Christian Brando to six years on the charge of manslaughter and four years' imprisonment for aggravating circumstances in the use of a gun. While Christian Brando was serving his time at the California Men's Colony in San Luis Obispo, Cheyenne Brando's life went to pieces. As volatile and unpredictable as her half-brother Christian, she flitted between Tahiti and Los Angeles. Prior to Drollet's death, she had been involved in a traffic accident in Tahiti—she was driving a car in excess of 100 m.p.h. in a fit of pique after her father told her that she could not join him in Canada, where he was then making the film, The Freshman—and was so disfigured by the accident that she had to undergo several plastic surgery operations to regain her attractive appearance.

As the years went on, Cheyenne became more and more moody, introspective and depressed. She delivered Drollet's child, but grieved for her dead lover year after year. On Easter Sunday, 1995, the 25-year-old Cheyenne Brando committed suicide by hanging herself in the town of Faa'a. Ingrid Drollet, sister of the slain Dag Drollet, remarked that her family felt as if "Cheyenne had made something wonderful, beautiful—to die for love. It was like Romeo and Juliet." Irrespective of this pretentious and unnerving endorsement of suicide, Cheyenne Brando's act was not unexpected. She had attempted to kill herself many times in the past.

When Marlon Brando got the news of his daughter's death, he moaned, "Oh, God, no," and then collapsed. He later agreed with his longtime enemy, Jacques-Denis Drollet, father of the slain Dag, that Cheyenne would be buried next to the grave of Dag Drollet. Many pointed to the alcoholism that seemed inherent in the Brando family as the root cause of the tragedies that became Christian and Cheyenne Brando. Marlon Brando himself admitted that his mother, Dorothy Brando, "cared more about drinking than caring for us," and that his father's blood "consisted of compounds of alcohol, testosterone, adrenaline and anger."

Cheyenne had for years become a regular visitor to drug rehabilitation centers in Tahiti, Paris, San Francisco, and Stockbridge, Massachusetts. In addition to drugs, family members shared a common identity crisis. The actor had produced eleven children, five by his actress wives Kashfi, Teriipia and Movita Castenada, all Tahitians, three by his Guatemalan housekeeper, Christina Ruiz, and three more from other affairs. "The family kept changing shape," Christian Brando once said. "I'd sit down at the breakfast table and say, 'Who are you?'" At another time, Christian labeled the entire family "a bunch of crazy drunks."

THE O.J. SIMPSON CASE/June 12, 1994

The murder trial of former football player, actor and promoter O.J. Simpson (James Orenthal Simpson, b. 1947) was the most widely publicized in American history, with millions glued to TV sets and avidly reading printed reports on the case as it unfolded day by day. It was not "the trial of the century," as the media promoted it, but a rather shoddy, sad tale of two brutal murders and a black millionaire suspect whose black attorney managed to win him acquittal by flagrantly using race as the key issue, while playing to an almost all-black jury.

The prosecution essentially botched its presentation of the mountain of circumstantial evidence at its command. The defense tried the Los Angeles Police Department instead of defending its client. And the trial judge, Lance Ito, a smug, limelight-seeking jurist, was so overindulgent with attorneys that, in the opinion of this author, he unnecessarily prolonged an already lengthy trial and vastly contributed to the wasting of millions of dollars in taxpayer money.

Ito had been a prosecuting attorney with little will to seek the death penalty in capital cases. In one instance when prosecuting a serial killer, Ito made sure that defense attorneys got hold of a witness to one of the murders, a witness who asked the jury for mercy, instead of the death sentence. The killer was given a life sentence. When presiding over the trial of colossal swindler Charles Keating, Jr., Ito threw out half the charges against the savings and loan thief.

When hearing the pretrial motions for the murdering Menendez brothers, Ito sealed the grand jury findings and thus muzzled arguments for the prosecution. Before becoming a judge, Ito pridefully placed on his car a license plate that read "7 Bozos, 33," referring to the California Supreme Court judges. When he himself became a judge, Ito got rid of the plate. At the start, Ito said he was not in favor of televising the trial. He not only allowed a TV camera in the courtroom, albeit with a fixed point of view that prevented viewers from seeing the jurors and key evidence produced, but, during the course of the trial, gave a five-part TV interview to Tritia Toyado on a local Los Angeles station.

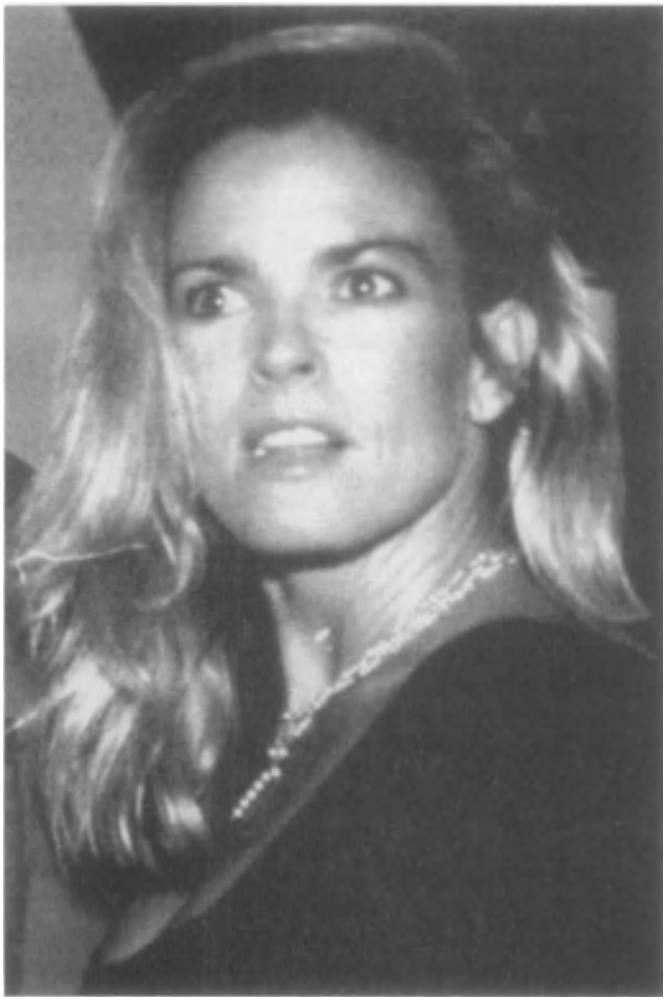
Ito took advantage of this situation to condemn the incarceration of Japanese in America during World War II (without fully explaining the reason for that massive internment), as well as promote his own career. Ito flagrantly likened his public status to that of Cher and Madonna. It was apparent then and now that, unlike most jurists, Ito reveled in the limelight.

From the day of the murders, June 12, 1994, until Simpson's acquittal on October 3, 1995, the world watched as the defense, led by attorney Johnnie Cochran, whipped up race hatred to the boiling point. When the not guilty verdict was announced, most of white America reeled in shock, believing Simpson to be guilty; most of black America rejoiced, insisting upon Simpson's innocence. To this day and for decades to come, these attitudes, woefully, will probably not change. The Simpson case did more to destroy race relations in America than the Dred Scott decision.

The killer or killers of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman, viciously slain some time during the night of June 12, 1994, have not been found at this writing, despite O.J. Simpson's vow (upon his release) that he would not rest until the killer or killers were brought to justice (albeit Simpson has been energetically searching for the killer or killers on every golf course in America). When slaying Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman, the killer apparently hid in the bushes outside Nicole's Brentwood, California, condominium at 875 S. Bundy.

Nicole Brown Simpson and O. J. Simpson, shown early in their marriage, which later became a shambles.

When Nicole appeared outside, either to respond to the doorbell rung by Ronald Goldman (who was reportedly returning her glasses from a restaurant where he worked as a waiter) or summoned by the killer himself, the murderer most probably attacked her from behind, driving a knee into her back, pulling her head backward with an armlock over her face and then reaching around with a large, razor-sharp knife to slash her throat so deeply that she was almost decapitated. He then drove the knife into her breasts many times. The blood spurting from her undoubtedly shot away from the killer because of the murder position he had selected (much the same way Jack the Ripper killed most of his victims).



Nicole Brown Simpson shortly before she was brutally murdered in Brentwood, California, on June 12, 1994.

Police believed that Goldman was most likely killed afterward, coming upon the scene as Nicole was being murdered, and was killed because he was able to identify the killer. He was slashed to death. At 9:50 p.m. the waiter left the Mezzaluna Restaurant, where Nicole Simpson and her family, except for O.J. Simpson, had earlier dined, intending to return a pair of eyeglasses she had forgotten. His death was later signaled, according to the prosecution, by the "plaintive wail" of a neighborhood dog.

A neighbor of Nicole Simpson's, Pablo Fenjves, was distracted from watching TV by the sound of loud barking or wailing from a dog. His condominium backed onto the one owned by Nicole Simpson. The barking went on for about an hour. He later fixed the time the dog began wailing at about 10:15 or 10:20 p.m. This was the time fixed for the murders. There were others in that Brentwood neighborhood who also heard the strange wail of the dog. (Brentwood was packed with famous people or relatives of famous people, including a close friend of Nicole's, Candace Garvey, and her former baseball star husband Steve Garvey; Carl Colby, son of former CIA director William Colby; and Leif Tilden, who had played the part of Donatello in the first Ninja Turtle movie.)

Louis Karpf and Eva Stein, who were also Nicole's neighbors, pinpointed the sound of the wailing dog at about 10:15 p.m. The dog, as it turned out, belonged to Nicole, a white Akita dog named Kato, a name that also belonged to the long-haired houseguest of O.J. Simpson's, the unemployed Brian Kaelin.

The dog Kato was found wandering outside of Nicole's condominium about 11 p.m. by Steven Schwab, who thought the dog was lost. Kato, Schwab later described, kept turning up the walkway toward Nicole's condominium, barking, then turning back to Schwab as if trying to get him to follow him. Instead, Schwab took the dog home with him, where neighbors Sukru Boztepe and his wife took the dog on a walk a short time later, looking for its owner. As Kato approached Nicole's condominium, it pulled hard on the leash, leading the Boztepes up the walkway, where they saw Nicole's body sprawled in a pool of blood.

O.J. Simpson, the accused murderer, had picked up some fast-food hamburgers with Kaelin at 9:30 p.m. that night and then reportedly returned to his estate at 360 N. Rockingham Avenue, Brentwood. From that point until 11 p.m., Simpson could provide no alibi or witnesses who supported his claimed whereabouts. He said later that he was sleeping, resting up for a long-planned trip to Chicago.

Also planned was a limousine ride to the Los Angeles Airport. The limousine appeared twenty minutes earlier than expected at Simpson's estate. Its driver, Allan William Park, entered the Simpson estate and waited. While waiting, he later stated, he noticed that Simpson's white Bronco was not parked in front of the estate as later claimed by the defense.

Park would also later testify that he saw Kaelin walking about the grounds around 10:30 p.m., using a flashlight, as if searching for something or someone. At 10:45 p.m., Park also testified, he saw a well-built six-foot black man weighing, according to his estimation, about 200 pounds, rapidly cross the grounds in front of him and go to the front door. He said he could not make out the man's facial features. After the man entered the house, the house lights went on.

A few minutes later, Park said, he went to the front door and rang the bell. He got no answer. At about 11 p.m., Simpson finally responded, saying that he had been sleeping and that he would be outside soon. Simpson did appear with several bags, ready to go to the airport. One well-packed black handbag Simpson kept close to him. This bag reportedly vanished at the L.A. Airport when Simpson was waiting to check his bags and standing next to a large garbage container. Then Simpson caught an 11:45 p.m. flight to Chicago.

A few hours later, Los Angeles Police Detective Philip Vannatter called the home of Marcia Clark, a deputy district attorney, telling her of a horrible double homicide in Brentwood and that he needed a search warrant. "It's O.J. Simpson," Vannatter said.

"Who's that?" Clark responded.

"The football player? Naked Gun?"

"Phil, I'm sorry. I don't know him."

Vannatter explained further, how Simpson was a legendary football player, a movie star, the man who was seen in television ads jumping over luggage for Hertz rent-a-car. He went on to say how blood had been found on the door handle of Simpson's white Bronco, there was blood on the driveway of his Rockingham estate, and that a bloody glove had been found on the estate by Vannatter's junior associate, Detective Mark Fuhrman.

Ronald Lyle Goldman, the young waiter who was also brutally murdered outside Nicole's Brentwood home.

"Jesus," Clark finally said, "it sounds like you've got enough for filing (an arrest warrant), much less a search warrant."

Vannatter got his search warrant. He and other detectives then began to build a case against Simpson, who was in Chicago. Simpson himself was awakened earlier in his hotel room in Chicago by LAPD Detective Ronald Phillips, who used the kitchen phone in Simpson's home to call him at 6:05 a.m., June 13, 1994.

As soon as Simpson picked up the phone, Phillips said, "I have some bad news for you. Your ex-wife, Nicole Simpson, has been killed."

Simpson's first words were: "Oh, my God, Nicole is killed. Oh, my God, she's dead."

When Simpson became distraught, according to Phillips, the detective said, "Mr. Simpson, try to get hold of yourself. I have your children at the ... police station. I need to talk to you about that."

Simpson then asked to speak to his adult daughter, Arnelle. He instructed her to pick up his children from the police station, his daughter, Sidney, age 8, and his son, Justin, age 6. He then resumed his conversation with Phillips, which lasted five minutes.

Phillips later testified that he never mentioned to Simpson that Nicole had been murdered. The detective later stated in court that Simpson never asked if his ex-wife had been murdered. He never asked when she had been killed or how she had been killed or any other details of her death. Just after he hung up the phone, Phillips talked with Mark Fuhrman, who reported finding a bloody glove on the Simpson estate.

Phillips did not call the coroner until 6:50 a.m., alerting him to the double murders, and again at 8:10 a.m., asking that someone from the coroner's office go immediately to the crime scene on Bundy. Simpson returned to Los Angeles to attend his wife's funeral. When Simpson met with police, he was not immediately told that he was a suspect in the case. Not until the morning of June 17 did Simpson learn that he was about to be arrested for murdering Nicole and Ronald Goldman. This information was given to him by his defense attorney, Robert Shapiro.

Shapiro and Simpson were then in the home of Simpson friend Robert Kardashian, who had held on to some luggage Simpson had taken with him on his trip to Chicago. After Simpson was told that he was going to be arrested, he went upstairs to say goodbye to family members. He then vanished with his burly friend, Al Cowlings.

According to Cowlings, he drove Simpson to the cemetery where Nicole was buried, hiding Simpson's white Bronco in an orange grove. Simpson made three calls on his cellular phone from that area before he and Cowlings fled after seeing a marked police car in the area. Police by then were frantically searching for Simpson and put out a public bulletin describing his car.

Two motorists responded to the police alert at 6:25 p.m., reporting that the Bronco was on the San Diego freeway. The infamous chase then ensued, with dozens of police cars catching up to the Bronco and pursuing it. Police ordered Cowlings, who was at the wheel, to pull the car over to the side of the freeway. He did so. Officers drew their weapons as they approached the Bronco.

Cowlings yelled, "F—- no!" He slammed his fist against the driver's door, shouting, "He's got a gun to his head!" Cowlings referred to Simpson, who sat in the back seat allegedly holding a gun to his temple with thoughts of suicide. With that, Cowlings sped off, the police in pursuit, but in a wave of squad cars that blocked all lanes behind the Bronco and remained at a respectful distance, strange, even bizarre behavior for police attempting to catch a murder suspect who was attempting to avoid arrest.

More than ninety million persons in the U.S. and around the world were glued to the televised police chase (or motorcade), watching the slow chase, which seemed to go on forever, until the Bronco turned slowly into the driveway of Simpson's Brentwood estate, where he and Cowlings finally got out of the car. Simpson was taken into custody and the Bronco was immediately inspected. It was apparent to officers that O.J. Simpson had attempted to flee the country. Items found on him and in his car at that time—these items were never made part of his subsequent trial—included his passport. Also found was $8,750 in cash and six checks in a sealed envelope. In addition, a fake beard and a mustache were found in the car, one which prosecutors believed Simpson would employ in his flight to another country. None of these items were introduced as evidence in the case against O.J. Simpson.

The murder scene outside the Brentwood home of Nicole Brown Simpson; Los Angeles police officers were later accused of botching the DNA samples taken from the pavement and clumsily obscuring other evidence.

Oddly, Vannatter and his partner, Tom Lange, later entered these items not as Simpson's property and evidence but as the property of Al Cowlings. The chase itself was never presented to the jury at Simpson's trial. All of this, according to prosecutor William Hodgman, was a judgment call on the part of the police and the D.A.'s office. Said Hodgman later, "If you knew some of the evidence we were dealing with, you would understand what the cost--benefit analysis was." It was a poor call at that, as events later showed.

The prosecution was made up of Marcia Clark, who had never lost a case; William Hodgman, a veteran trial prosecutor; and Christopher Darden, a young black prosecutor who was portrayed by the defense as an "Uncle Tom." It was Darden who would later, bravely, take most of the abuse heaped upon the prosecution by black defense lawyer Johnnie Cochran, an attorney noted for consistently winning when defending blacks accused of various crimes. His formula was simple. He almost always played the race card to black jurors, insisting that his clients were the victims of race hatred and prejudice.

Cochran had successfully defended black singer Michael Jackson in a child molestation case, one that was reportedly settled out of court for $20 million. (Jackson was arrested and charged with child molestation in November 2003.) Cochran also represented black drug suspect Rodney King, who was videotaped as he was mercilessly beaten by LAPD officers, and won for him a $40 million settlement. Cochran was not originally part of Simpson's "Dream Team" of defense lawyers, hired at unspecified millions in fees.

The case was first headed by Shapiro. F. Lee Bailey was brought in at Simpson's request. It was later stated that Simpson wanted a superstar lawyer like Bailey to match what he considered his own status, that of a superstar. A few days after his arrest, according to Cochran, Simpson began calling him at home. "The whole thing was," Cochran later stated, "he wanted to get out and get this over with by Halloween [of 1994] so he could go trick-or--treating with his kids." It seemed to some that Simpson's only concern was his release and returning to life as usual, rather than any deep concern for solving the murder of his ex-wife.

In addition to Cochran, Bailey and Shapiro, Simpson's monolithic defense team included Alan Dershowitz, who functioned as an adviser and who, in case Simpson was found guilty, would lead the attack on appeal. It was Dershowitz who appealed the conviction of Claus von Bulow for the murder of his millionaire wife and won him freedom on technicalities. Simpson called Dershowitz his "God forbid" lawyer, meaning "God forbid I am found guilty." Dershowitz, who never let the world forget that he was a Harvard professor, promoted himself through his academic position almost every time he appeared on TV. Remaining in Cambridge, Massachusetts with his research team (made up of his students), Dershowitz viewed the televised case on a special split screen monitor and sent in advice via a fax machine that was at the defense table.

The defense team at first was showered with publicity, the wrong kind. It appeared that Shapiro had taken insult at being demoted from lead lawyer when Cochran was brought in by Simpson. He and the temperamental, flamboyant Bailey fell to arguing over the direction the defense should take. Bailey, for instance, was the only one who argued that Simpson should take the stand, telling the accused, "You've got great charisma. You'll blow them away." He also resented Cochran's undeviating intention to play the race card, to portray the prosecution as the white oppressors to a famous black athlete. Shapiro later went on TV to denounce this tactic as his fellow defense team lawyers ridiculed him shamelessly.

The real reason for Shapiro's demotion, however, was undoubtedly based on the fact that early on in the trial, he proposed a plea-bargain arrangement, one where Simpson would plead guilty to manslaughter. (Shapiro was known as "The Prince of Plea Bargains.") This was seriously considered by Allen C. Cowlings, Simpson's boyhood friend, who drove Simpson about in the actor's Bronco, while police searched for him.

The agonizingly slow police chase after the Bronco (at right) carrying Simpson and Cowlings down the San Diego Freeway, a snail-like pursuit viewed by millions of viewers riveted to their television sets.

Simpson and his attorneys and then abandoned, mostly due to Bailey's insistence; Cochran stayed out of this debate, merely listening, it was later reported.

The prosecution, though it had at hand more circumstantial evidence than similar trials, accepted defeat as early as July 1994, less than three weeks after the double murder, when Marcia Clark concluded that, as an American hero, O.J. Simpson was "an unconvictable defendant." Moreover, according to one report, she said at that time that "they've filed this case downtown, which means they're going to get a downtown jury. A black jury will not convict this defendant. Forget it. It's all over."

Yet the prosecution went ahead with one of the most expensive trials on record, playing out legal battles and grandstanding for the television camera Judge Ito had allowed in his courtroom. Ito himself proved to be one of the most blatant publicity seekers in the whole shoddy mess. Ito was not unflappable. He focused upon details apparently to impress the court, but so much so that he often forgot procedures. He was so upset about one juror being televised that he forgot to ask the defense for certain witness information. Prosecutor William Hodgman objected thirteen times to Cochran's wild opening arguments that, rather than focusing on his client's defense, attacked the prosecution and the police department. Ito ignored the objections and let the defense ride roughshod.

A maverick judge on courtroom behavior from his judicial beginnings, Ito made a point of wearing a pair of weathered jogging shoes into court. On the bench, Ito controlled the courtroom through a special television monitoring screen, which allowed him to inspect every corner of the courtroom through security cameras hidden in the ceiling dome. And he reportedly used this device as would an aspiring but amateur film director.

One of Ito's many pet peeves was chewing gum in his courtroom. Three times, while peering at his special monitor he saw the jaws of reporters moving and had an officer chastise the newsmen for chewing gum. One might wonder, since Ito was spending so much time monitoring the conduct of everyone in court, how he could stay focused on the actual trial.

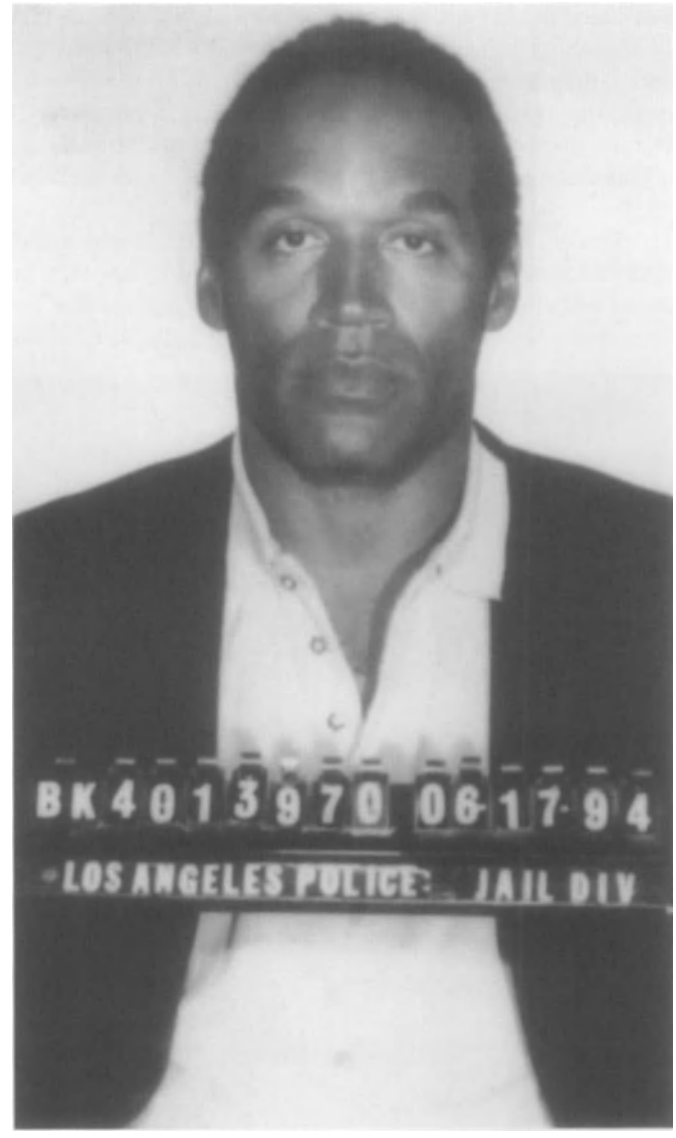
Ito's relationship with chief prosecutor Marcia Clark was strained from the start. Clark later said that she felt she had to pretend to play a submissive role with Ito. She was not alone. Defense attorney Peter Neufeld later related how he and others on the defense team were compelled to go to Ito's chambers to cater to his "petty needs."

Neufeld portrayed Ito as an egomaniac, one who was "so concerned with his status as a celebrity, his willingness to entertain personalities in his chambers, to show the lawyers little videotapes of skits on television." On one occasion, Ito called defense lawyers into his chambers to show them a video he had recently taped from Jay Leno's "Tonight Show," which parodied the trial under the title of "The Dancing Itos."

This incident later caused Neufeld to state, "He had thought it [the Leno show] was great and loved it and wanted all of us to see it in chambers. You may find that amusing on a personal level, but I can assure you that on a professional level it is so unacceptable, for a judge who is presiding over a murder where two people lost their lives in the most gruesome and horrible fashion, and where a third person has his life on the line, to bring the lawyers into chambers to show them comic revues." Ito went so far as to tell the lawyers Simpson jokes he had heard. "I found it deplorable and I was shocked," Neufeld said.

The ego of the lawyers and the judge, however, were nothing compared with the raging, bullish ego of the defendant. Simpson bossed his lawyers about mercilessly, paying millions for the privilege of posing as dictator, of course. He dictated the course of his defense and the positioning of his attorneys from his jail cell and in court. Not until one of his former long-time friends, Ron Shipp, testified in court, however, did Simpson realize that he was in real jeopardy.

Simpson (second from left) is shown under arrest after the Bronco stopped at his Brentwood estate.



O. J. Simpson, former football star and film/TV actor, is shown in a LAPD mug shot, taken on June 17, 1994, when he was booked for murdering his wife, Nicole, and Ronald Goldman.

Shipp, a fellow black, testified that he had been a close friend of both Simpson and Nicole. A one-time LAPD officer, Shipp had taken classes on domestic violence and at one time, at Nicole's request, had counseled both of them on Simpson's long history of physical abuse of Nicole. Shipp testified that at that time, he told Simpson that he fit the pattern of an abuser. More damaging, Shipp went on to say that he went to Simpson's house on the night he had returned from Chicago and, despite the fact that his ex--wife had just been brutally murdered, Simpson laughed and admitted to Shipp that he had thought of killing Nicole. Shipp quoted Simpson as telling him, "You know, to be honest, Shipp. I've had some dreams of killing her."

Cochran's assistant, defense attorney Carl Douglas, attacked Shipp in a bullying cross-examination, bringing up the fact that Shipp was a recovered alcoholic and claiming he was not a close friend of O.J. Simpson, but merely a Simpson groupie. This tactic backfired, most observers agreed, causing the quiet-speaking Shipp to appear sympathetic and believable rather than less credible. Simpson, a shrewd observer himself, realized this, and ordered that Douglas was never again to cross-examine witnesses. That night he held a conference call with Dream Team members and shouted, "I'll decide who the running backs are in this game!"

In the meantime, to shore up his defense fund, Simpson received a $1 million advance from Little, Brown for a quickie tell--nothing book entitled I Want to Tell You, a book he dictated to Lawrence Schiller from his jail cell. This was only the beginning of Simpson's self-serving promotion. He autographed photos and other Simpson memorabilia to glean more millions, including an audiotape that said nothing about the trial but, like all the other propaganda he produced, brought in a great deal of money because of the trial. He was literally earning a fortune on the murders of Nicole and Ronald Goldman and receiving over the course of the trial more than 300,000 letters from fans.

As the trial proceeded, the defense tried several approaches, one being that others had killed Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman, not their client. Simpson's attorneys implied that both had been victims of a drug buy gone wrong, or of drug dealers avenging nonpayment or some sort of betrayal, all of this linked to Faye Resnick, one-time Nicole confidante who was extremely hostile toward Simpson and who had written her own book and made a great deal of money from the case, a book that incensed Judge Ito. Resnick had stated in her book that her friend Nicole had told her that Simpson was going to kill her. Ito personally wrote many letters to the media requesting that no publicity be given to the book, stating that it might prejudice potential jurors. Extending this logic to the media at large would be the same as asking that the trial have no publicity whatsoever for the same reason.

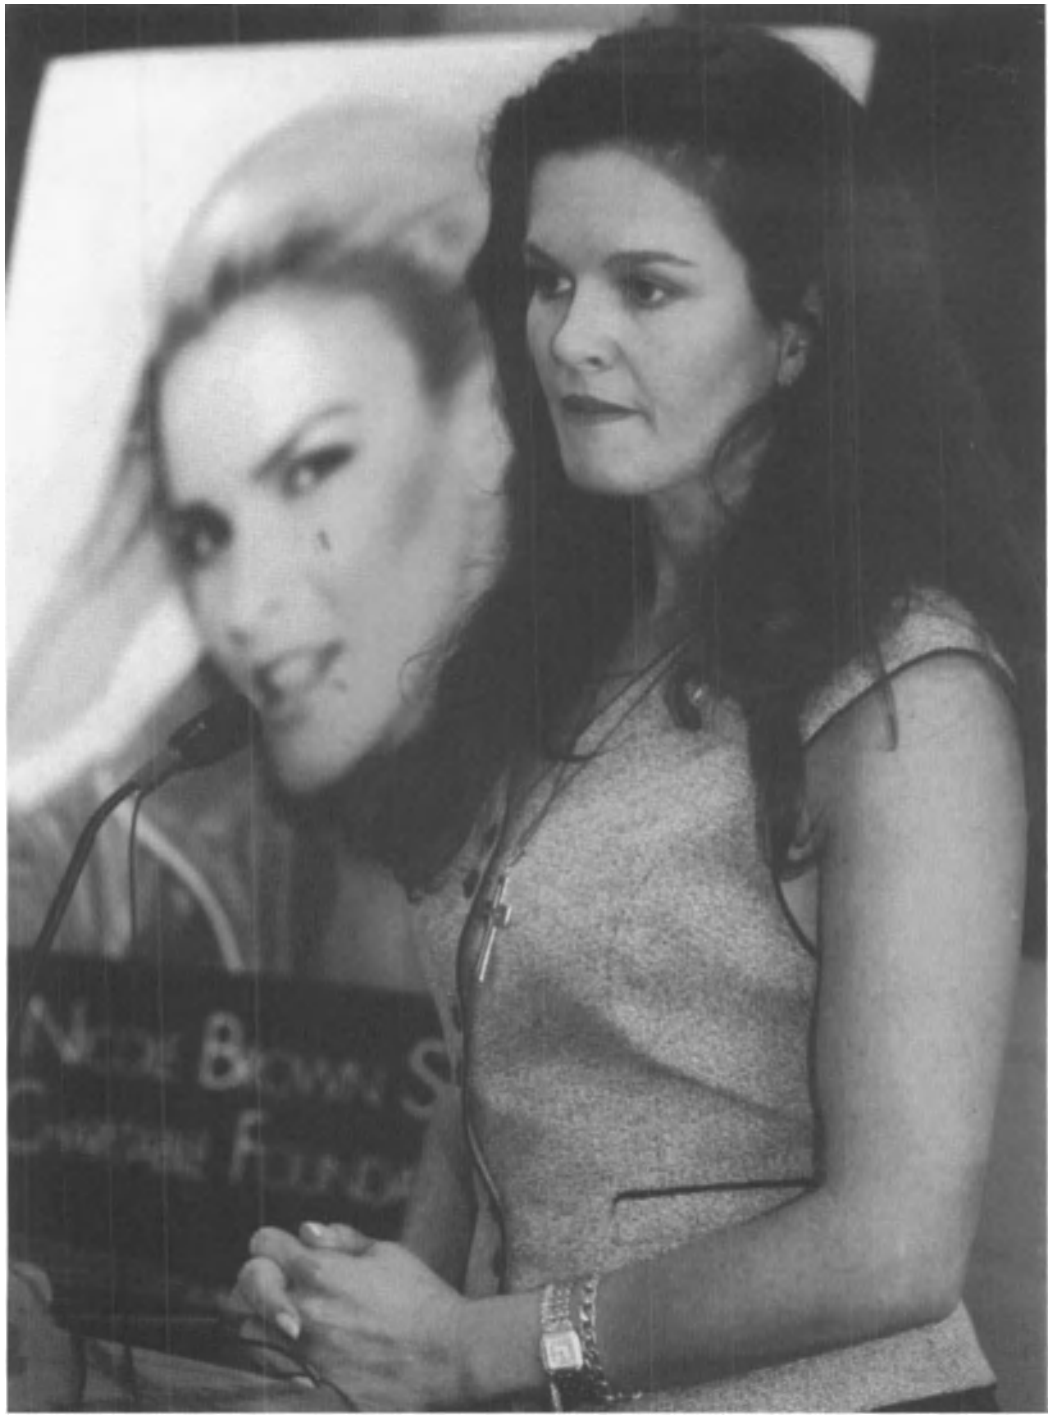
The drug connection advocated by Cochran was a far-fetched scenario, one that was never supported by any facts or actual links to a drug-inspired murder. It was just another defense smokescreen. Defense attorneys offered up the wild statements of Mary Ann Gerchas, who said that she had seen four men running from the murder scene about the time the victims had been killed. Gerchas was later thoroughly discredited as a bad-check artist who had been charged with fraud by several persons and companies. In addition, Gerchas was being sued by Marriott International, Inc. for $23,000 in unpaid room charges.

Cochran told the jury that he would call Gerchas (he did not) and some two dozen witnesses who would support the story about suspicious persons prowling about in Nicole's neighborhood on the night of the murder. Cochran was typically running off at the mouth. He did not disclose the names of these witnesses or call them, which was in violation of a 1990 requirement which demands that the defense turn over to the prosecution all the names of witnesses and their written statements. Judge Ito did nothing about this egregious, disingenuous behavior by Cochran.



Denise Brown (shown with a photo of her murdered sister Nicole in the background) testified how Simpson, a notorious wife-beater, had repeatedly degraded his wife in public and how he physically abused her.

Next, the defense attempted to unseat Allan Park's statements about Simpson's Ford Bronco not being present when he arrived at Simpson's estate to take him to the airport. Defense attorneys brought forth Rosa Lopez, a maid who lived next door to Simpson. Lopez, in halting English, claimed that Simpson's Bronco was parked at the estate at the time when prosecutors said he was murdering Nicole and Goldman. (Lopez was long in getting to court. She was ordered to leave a Las Vegas gambling casino to attend the trial in Los Angeles.)

Under pressure from prosecutor Chris Darden, Lopez admitted that she had lied several times in giving information on passport visas and in other instances. She, like Mary Ann Gerchas, was discredited; in fact, some observers stated that she appeared to be a "bought witness," especially when it was learned that the defense was providing her expenses.

On a day-to-day basis, the defense appeared to be

Marsha Clark, who led the prosecution, gave up early on getting a conviction, believing that since Simpson was "booked downtown," he would get a mostly black jury that would decide in his favor, a deliberation based on race not issues; she and her co-attorneys nevertheless conducted a half-hearted, near incompetent prosecution that greatly contributed to Simpson's acquittal.

Simpson, left, sits passively in court next to one of his high-priced attorneys, Robert Shapiro (later fired by Simpson, who bossed all of his lawyers, relying on chief counsel Johnnie Cochran to play the race card to win his freedom).

losing ground. Simpson's attorneys fought hardest against the introduction of any evidence concerning Simpson's long time abuse of his former wife. That shameful record, it was finally learned, coursed through seventeen years of the Simpson marriage, and it was a horrid litany of physical and mental abuse by a sadistically domineering O.J. Simpson. The record shows that Simpson beat his wife mercilessly and subjected her to ridicule, embarrassment and public degradation. He treated her as a possession, a thing, dehumanizing and disgracing her whenever his dark whims urged. It is the record of a crude, morally deficient bully intent upon inflicting physical and mental pain upon a long-suffering spouse who had told friends that she expected Simpson to someday lose all control and murder her.

Prosecutors found a great deal of the abuse evidence in Nicole Simpson's safe deposit box. It contained a record of all of Simpson's attacks on her, along with color photos showing her bruised and battered face from a 1989 attack for which Simpson was booked. Nicole's careful chronicle of her husband's abuse was assembled for her divorce case two years prior to her murder, but since Simpson continued to visit and terrorize her after the divorce, she kept the evidence, in case, some said, her husband might eventually murder her as she reportedly believed.

In 1986, Nicole wrote, Simpson "beat me up so bad at home, tore my blue sweater and blue slacks completely off me." Nicole's sister, Denise, echoed her sister's grim chronicle, saying that she witnessed many of Simpson's abuses of Nicole. In one instance, Denise Brown recalled how she told Simpson that he took her sister "for granted," which caused a fight. "Pictures started flying off the walls," Denise later testified, weeping, her voice trembling. "Clothes started flying down the stairs. He grabbed Nicole and told her to get out of the house. He picked her up and threw her against the wall. He picked her up and threw her out of the house. She ended up falling on her elbows and her butt."

In 1987, Denise recalled, she and a friend accompanied Nicole and Simpson to a Santa Ana bistro, The Red Onion. There, at the crowded bar of the restaurant, Simpson grabbed Nicole's crotch and shouted, "This is where my babies come from and this belongs to me!" The prosecution added that later that night Nicole asked a friend to drive her home in Simpson's Rolls Royce. As the car began to drive away, Simpson slapped his wife and pushed her out of the car and onto the pavement.

In 1988 Nicole's chronicle recounted an incident where she, her daughter Sidney, and her mother and sister attended a "Disney on Ice" show. Simpson, she wrote, was incensed, accusing Nicole of excluding him from the family outing. He got drunk and then went berserk, calling the pregnant Nicole "a fat pig ... You're a slob! I want you out of my f——g house ... I want you to have an abortion with the baby."

Nicole reportedly responded by saying, "Do I have to go tonight? Sidney's sleeping. It's late."

Simpson, Nicole stated, retorted, "Let me tell you how serious I am. I have a gun in my hand right now. Get the f— out of here."

Nicole Simpson woke her sleeping daughter, packed some clothes, and left. The key to understanding Simpson's motive for murder, one which somehow slipped through the perception of the prosecution, was in the locked fixation Simpson had for being ostracized or shut out (especially in public events, where he could strut the star).

The identical scenario occurred on the night of the 1994

Presiding Judge Lance A. Ito, a limelight-seeking jurist, who grandstanded his way through the tedious trial, manipulating the TV monitors, and causing endless delays in the procedures that made this one of the costliest trials in Los Angeles history.

Faye Resnick, a friend of the slain Nicole Simpson, who authored a quickie book about Nicole's stormy life with Simpson, which was published during the trial and caused Marsha Clark to complain that its publication would taint the jury pool. Judge Ito suspended jury selection for two days because of the book and then told jurors not to read any news stories about it, his widely published remarks helping to make this otherwise undistinguished book a best-seller.

double murders. Simpson was totally rejected by the entire Brown family on the night of his daughter's recital—all of them said he was "not invited" to a celebration party at the Mezzaluna Restaurant—a white family he had enriched by supporting his wife in style, by reportedly funding her father's enterprises, by paying for college expenses for her sisters. Now all of them, these ungrateful whites, were rejecting him, O.J. Simpson, no longer the superstar, merely a black man with money.

Moreover, that night (and not revealed until after the trial), waiting for him on his answering machine was a message from his attractive girlfriend, Paula Barbieri, a message stating that she was breaking off their relationship. (It was reported that Barbieri was with Michael Bolton on the night of the murders.) This was but another rejection from a white woman to a black man who had given her expensive gifts and trips. He had tried to enter the white world, lived inside of its Brentwood majesty, but gnawing on him—beyond his own bone marrow ego and vanity—was the fact that he was nothing more than a black man with money, mostly a black man, who was being rejected by the whole of the white power structure, which he had sought so desperately for years to enter.

Simpson struck out against these whites, it is the author's opinion, by brutally slaying Nicole and the young white man who suddenly appeared at her doorstep. (It mattered not whether Goldman was Nicole's lover, friend or merely an acquaintance—he was there, a witness to the gore.) This was the white race card the prosecution did not, or could not play in response to Cochran's black race card. It certainly would have done little good with a predominantly black jury whose black members were bent on believing from the beginning, irrespective of the reasons they later gave for the acquittal, that a black man—one of their own black heroes—was being unfairly tried by a system Cochran portrayed as white and prejudicial.

Had Simpson premeditated the murder, waiting until the right opportunity, a scheduled trip to leave town, and the correct provocation, another gross insult to his pride and ego by being shut out? He was certainly prepared. He certainly had the right tool. Simpson had purchased a knife, a fifteen-inch stiletto, from a Los Angeles cutlery store in May 1994, it was reported. (This was not brought into evidence by the prosecution.) He had told Shipp how he had dreamed of murdering his wife. The family rejection of him served as the catalyst that prompted his plan into action.

In 1989, Simpson beat his wife so badly that he was booked for assault and battery, the charges later dropped.

This was the incident, where Nicole took pains to have her bruised and battered face photographed. Following that incident, Simpson wrote to Nicole, "Let me start by expressing to you how wrong I was for hurting you. There is no exceptible [sic] excuse for what I did."

Though Simpson later shrugged at accusations of his being jealous of his ex-wife, claiming to be happily attached to Barbieri (when he knew that Barbieri had already broken off with him), his abuse of Nicole continued long after their divorce. On October 25, 1993, only eight months before Nicole was murdered, she called 911 to report that Simpson had barged into her home and was terrorizing her. The 911 tape, played in court, was chilling as it recorded Nicole telling the operator that "It's O.J. Simpson. He's going f———g nuts!" In the background the court could hear Simpson screaming, cursing, banging things about.

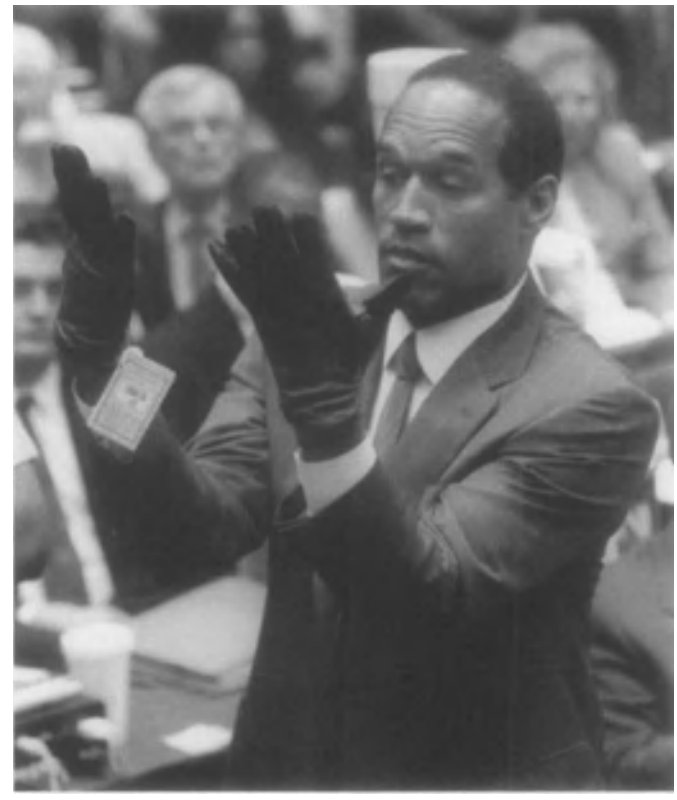
To all of this, Johnnie Cochran responded by saying that these were merely domestic arguments. He portrayed the violent history of O.J. Simpson's wife-beating as somehow nothing more than family spats, not the fist-pounding, body-throwing events that they actually were. According to the Los Angeles Times, Cochran himself had been accused by a former wife, as being a wife abuser. In divorce proceedings against Cochran twenty-eight years earlier, his former wife, Barbara Berry, accused him of assaulting her. Cochran shrugged a denial, saying that these charges were merely used as leverage in a divorce. (Berry reportedly stated that she was writing a book about her life with Cochran, joining a never-ending list of authors linking themselves to this notorious case.)

About the same time Cochran was fending off accusations of being a fellow wife-beater, a national TV talk show presented a woman named April Levalois, who insisted that while Cochran was still married to Berry, he was the lover of Levalois' mother who bore his illegitimate son, Jonathan Cochran.

The prosecution then introduced what it considered its strongest and most telling evidence. The first of these salient artifacts was a pair of black, bloodstained gloves. The left-handed glove had been found at Nicole's Bundy St. address, near the bodies. The right-handed glove had been found on a walkway near the guest house on Simpson's estate. Both gloves had been found by Detective Mark Fuhrman, who was in the company of other detectives when the gloves were found. The gloves, DNA analysis later confirmed, contained blood from Simpson, Nicole and Goldman.

A bloody sock containing Nicole's blood and found on the floor of Simpson's lavish bedroom was introduced. A navy-blue knit watch cap containing hairs from the head of a black man was found on the grounds of Nicole's residence. Some of Simpson's blood, DNA evidence later stated, was found at the murder site and more at Simpson's estate, including blood from Nicole and Goldman. More bloodstains were found inside the white Bronco. Then there were bloody shoe prints (the size of which later matched Simpson's size) leading from the murder scene on a walkway to the alley.

The defense attacked this evidence. Barry Scheck, a reported DNA expert, paraded so-called DNA experts before the court who reported that the LAPD lab experts handling the DNA and other blood analysis were sloppy, their procedures slipshod. The defense went so far as to say that some of the blood samples taken from O.J. Simpson following his arrest were missing, more than what would make up normal "spillage" in DNA testing.



O. J. Simpson awkwardly spread his fingers and arched his hands backwards to display before the jury the blood-stained gloves used in the murders to indicate that they did not fit him.

The thrust of this statement went to a full-blown claim by the defense that all of Simpson's bloodstains had been planted by a conspiracy of racist policemen and perhaps LAPD lab people, and that the chief racist cop was none other than Detective Mark Fuhrman. It was later shown that Fuhrman was, indeed, a racist who repeatedly used the word "nigger" to describe blacks, but it was never shown how this man was able to plant all of the drops of Simpson's blood throughout the Bundy and Rockingham areas, in the white Bronco, and that he also planted and then discovered the gloves, that he planted the knit cap and the bloody sock.

Fuhrman was, however, a prosecution witness who first appeared to be cool and unflappable on the witness stand. Tapes he recorded years earlier when talking to a writer about a proposed book of fiction revealed him to be one who hated blacks. The destruction of Fuhrman's credibility was complete and the most telling blow to the prosecution.

Then, in a dramatic and bold move, Cochran had his client actually try on the gloves before a riveted jury. His method in doing so was unorthodox. Those putting on gloves compress their fingers and cup their hands so as to be able to slip into gloves that are normally tight-fitting. When Simpson tried the gloves, he purposely kept his fingers wide apart, spreading his palms so that the gloves did not go on easily. He kept his fingers spread so that the gloves appeared not to fit, without snuggling the bottom ends over his palms. It was a colossal bluff that worked, since the prosecution did not take exception to the manner in which Simpson performed this procedure.

So effective did Cochran believe this demonstration to be that he harped on it until the very end of the trial, carping in his final summation a glib coinage: "If it doesn't fit, you must acquit." He repeated this phrase over and over while wearing a copy of the knit cap that had been placed in evidence, as if to contemptuously mock the evidence. And always, with almost every statement, was Cochran's insistence that O.J. Simpson was the victim of a white conspiracy.

The prosecution, on the other hand, put up a list of what it thought were convincing arguments for the jury to convict, but Marcia Clark's summation was timid, tentative, weak, unconvincing, as if she were listening to her own words of a year earlier—"A black jury will not convict this defendant. Forget it. It's all over."—and she appeared unenthusiastic, fearful of failure.

Missing from the prosecution's summation was any mention of Simpson's fantastic flight for freedom and the money, passport and false identity inside the Bronco that would pave the way for his escape. Missing was any mention of the stiletto he had purchased a month before the murders. Missing was an argument showing how Simpson had purposely manipulated the gloves to make them appear not to fit. Missing was a precise timetable that would show that O.J. Simpson had had enough time to commit murder and then return to his estate before flying to Chicago. Missing were all of the abuse offenses committed by Simpson against his wife (who had called the Sojourn shelter only five days before her death to say that Simpson was going to kill her).

The International Chiefs of Police had statistics to prove that most women—1,400 of them a year, on average—who were murdered were killed by men who knew them and that most of them were victims of consistent spousal abuse. None of that mattered to a jury of nine blacks (mostly women), two whites and one Hispanic. In less than four hours after merely glancing at the mountain of evidence, the jury acquitted Simpson. Its verdict was not made public for twenty-four hours on order of Judge Ito so that all the lawyers could be present in court, or so he said. Another reason for this delay may have been Ito's typical playing to the TV gallery in order to have the dramatic moment captured on prime time.

The verdict was read on October 3, 1995. Simpson, who had spent 473 days in jail and had defended himself at a cost of unreported millions, was set free. The trial itself had cost more than $9 million and was the most watched event in television history. Judge Lance Ito had seen to it that the trial lasted as long as it did.

Half of the trial time was consumed by endless, unimportant sidebar conferences with lawyers whom Ito allowed to squabble, argue, attack and insult each other. He grandstanded throughout the trial, seeking to impress anyone who would listen to his nonlegal comments, which, for the most part, were neither learned nor enlightening. As a jurist, Ito was a disgrace, and, in the opinion of this author, should have been removed from the bench.

O. J. Simpson wears a triumphant smile, following his acquittal and release, an acquittal that millions believed to be a travesty of justice.

The jurors showed themselves unconcerned with the evidence. Brenda Moran, a black female jurist, labeled all of the evidence of Simpson's spousal abuse "a waste of time." One young juror posed for Playboy, several wrote books, all played to the media. Though they later claimed to have reached a verdict on the evidence, it was apparent that the almost all-black jury released O.J. Simpson because he was black. "It was payback," one observer stated, "for the unfair Simi Valley decision to release the cops who beat Rodney King, and for all of the LAPD oppression of blacks in Los Angeles."

One of the most repulsive reactions to the verdict was a group of televised (by NBC) black women watching TV to hear the verdict. They were all victims of marital abuse, all residing in a battered women's retreat. When the not guilty verdict was announced, the women leaped from chairs, threw their hands in the air in jubilation and screamed their joy. All that mattered to them was that a fellow black had triumphed, not justice.

The reaction to this strange and apparently unevaluated verdict was to deeply divide whites and blacks as never before, and it most likely convinced an able presidential candidate, Colin Powell, that his chances of being elected were considerably lessened by the racial division that had been drawn by the verdict. More than 80 percent of the more than 220 million whites in America believe to this writing that Simpson is guilty. Roughly 80 percent of the eighteen million blacks in the U.S. believe Simpson not guilty.

Everyone except the murder victims profited by this trial. Network television had captured viewers by the untold millions and benefited enormously. Simpson won his release, while his defense attorneys were enriched by his millions. Prosecutors Marcia Clark and Christopher Darden received multimillion-dollar contracts for books and movies about their rather uninteresting lives. Instead of the dismal failures they really were, the prosecutors were looked upon as beleaguered, heroic figures, but such is the warped perception of media-created images. The choked-up conduct of Clark and Darden during a prosecution press conference at the trial's conclusion was embarrassing and, to some observers, obviously feigned. Instead of heaping kudos on these people, District Attorney Gil Garcetti should have pointed out their ineptitude in failing to use evidence at hand to convict O.J. Simpson. But then, Marcia Clark had announced that inevitable failure more than a year earlier.

Simpson's own conduct following the trial, convinced his critics that he was guilty. He had vowed upon his release that he would spend the rest of his life seeking the killer or killers of his ex-wife and Ron Goldman. That was the last time he mentioned that crusade. On the night of his release, he returned to his Brentwood estate, where he held a champagne party to celebrate his freedom, laughing and drinking with fawning friends, hardly the expected conduct of an aggrieved wrongly accused husband.

He was seen thereafter flitting about the country to play golf at the best courses, courting new friends even among the startled strangers who saw him driving past them in golf carts. Simpson, however, did not escape his actions altogether; he next had to face civil lawsuits brought against him for damages from the Goldman family. He dodged depositions in that case, but in January 1996 accepted a reported $3 million payment to appear on a video in which he talked about the trial, attacking Marcia Clark and trying to dispute the evidence brought against him, particularly the DNA analysis.

It appeared at that time that Simpson was still attempting to regain the favor of the power structure that once made him a millionaire. The tape, however, was viewed as a staged affair, one where Simpson simply answered questions that met his beforehand approval. There was no cross-examination. It was a kangaroo court where Simpson retried his own case and turned the facts in whatever direction suited his purpose. Newsman Ross Becker, who was hired to act as Simpson's questioning stooge in this rigged scenario, was interviewed after its completion and was asked if he felt that Simpson lied to him during the staged videotaping. Becker replied, "Sure, sure." Simpson did not mention his quest for the real killers of his ex--wife on the video, nor did he state that he would be offering any portion of the $3 million he received for doing the tape as a reward for the apprehension of that killer or killers.

Many esteemed criminologists and prosecutors throughout the U.S. generally agreed that Simpson had gotten away with murder. Not the least of these was the brilliant prosecutor Vincent Bugliosi, who had won 105 out of 106 felony jury trials, while working for the district attorney's office in Los Angeles, including the notorious Charles Manson case of the Tate-LoBianca slayings of 1969. Said Bugliosi of Simpson in 1996, "I've known a lot of murderers, but this guy is the most audacious murderer I've ever known. I'm convinced that he feels that he had a right to kill Nicole and that she did something to warrant the murder."

Simpson's audacity flared throughout the subsequent wrongful death civil suit brought against him by the Goldman family in the murders of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ron Goldman. This time, most of the evidence improperly introduced or not introduced at all in Simpson's criminal trial was presented in masterful fashion by Goldman family lawyer Daniel Petrocelli. He deposed Simpson and continually caught him in stated inconsistences. (Simpson repeatedly lied to Petrocelli in stating that he had never hit or struck or abused his dead wife.)

A key piece of Petrocelli's evidence was a single photo of Simpson wearing size-12 Bruno Magli shoes, the same shoes that had reportedly left a bloody imprint at the scene of the Nicole Simpson-Ronald Goldman murders. Only 299 pairs were sold in the U.S. between 1991 and 1993, and Simpson emphatically denied that he ever owned, let alone wore, such shoes, describing them as "ugly." The single unclear photo of Simpson wearing such shoes at a September 26, 1993 football game at Rich Stadium in Buffalo, New York, was discredited by Simpson's lawyers, who stated that the photo was a fake.

Then Petrocelli found an entire series of photos taken of Simpson at the same event that were crystal clear, and by blowing up the photos he was able to pinpoint the identification of the rare shoes: Indeed, at that time, Simpson was wearing size-12 Bruno Magli shoes. He had been caught in a lie, another lie his lawyer, Robert Baker, could not undo. Baker took the unsavory approach of attacking the victim, attempting to portray the slain Nicole Brown Simpson as a promiscuous woman, a drug-taking alcoholic who abused her children by subjecting them to the company of drug dealers and perverts. His attack backfired; the jury refused to believe his argument.

Petrocelli then worked in the evidence that the black jury in the criminal trial had ignored, but this time he effectively nailed that evidence to O.J. Simpson's guilt. On February 4, 1997, the jury in the civil trial found Simpson guilty on all eight counts brought against him and that he was guilty of the wrongful deaths of Nicole Simpson and Ronald Goldman. The victims' families were awarded $33.5 million in damages.

Simpson immediately scurried about to liquidate assets, but he eventually lost everything, including his resplendent Brentwood estate, which he had occupied for twenty years (six bathrooms, a tennis court, waterfalls, and an Olympic-sized pool). His money gone, his prestige and fame reduced to the stigma of murderer, O. J. Simpson even lost custody of his two young children, according to a November 10, 1998 appellate court decision in Santa Ana, California, based on the civil court decision that found Simpson responsible for the murder of his ex-wife. He was no longer famous, but notorious.

ITALY'S BLACK WIDOW/March 27, 1995

Milan is the chic capital of Italy's fashion industry, and no one's name in that dizzying designer world of glitz and glamour is more potent than that of Gucci. Three generations of Guccis have imprinted the founder's initials, "GG," on the most coveted leather goods and shoes to be found anywhere. Maurizio Gucci was the grandson and last of the direct descendants of Guccio Gucci to hold a stake in the company, and he sold out his interest in 1993 for $120 million following years of family discord and acrimony.

Much of that acrimony had to do with Maurizio Gucci's former wife, Patrizia Reggiani Martinelli Gucci (AKA: The Black Widow, b. 1948), a social-climbing, money-loving ex-spouse who was so unsatisfied with her $860,000-a-year alimony that she planned to obtain all of Gucci's millions through a murder-for-hire plan. Having been divorced years earlier by Gucci, the once glamorous Neapolitan, who had humble origins and who had given birth to two of Gucci's daughters, had threatened the fashion king with all sorts of terrible fates and even told him to his face that she would have him killed unless he turned over many millions to her.

Gucci waved her off. On March 27, 1995, as he was mounting the stairs to his elegant offices in Milan, Gucci was shot to death by an unknown assailant who fled in a fast car with another conspirator behind the wheel. Police doggedly worked on the killing until they identified the getaway driver, Orazio Cicala, an unemployed auto worker. Cicala led police to the gunman, Benedetto Ceraulo, the owner of a pizzeria who was swimming in debt. Ceraulo told detectives that he had received his orders from Ivano Savioni, the doorman of a broken-down Milan hotel.

The doorman was picked up and, following grueling interrogations, said that he had followed the orders of Giuseppina Auriemma, a mysterious psychic, warning officers that her spiritual powers could overwhelm and destroy any law enforcement agencies probing into her dark doings. Police then learned that Auriemma had for years been the personal psychic "adviser" to Gucci's ex-wife, Patrizia Reggiani Martinelli.

The one-time queen of Milan's social world bristled when investigators cautiously approached her, gently quizzing her about her husband's murder. She said she had nothing to do with it. She later admitted that she had for some time been seeking someone to kill her miserly ex-husband, but, she emphasized, she had never gone through with that plan. Of course, nodded the polite police inquisitors, but her personal psychic now stood accused of acting on her behalf.

Reggiani Martinelli then said that Auriemma had arranged for the murder without her approval and that the psychic had been blackmailing her ever since, taking more than $375,000. But, the ex-wife insisted, she was nevertheless innocent of having her former husband killed. "Never let even a friendly wolf into the chicken coop," she confided to police, a statement she would often repeat in months to come. "Sooner or later it will get hungry." She was, of course, referring to the scheming psychic, Auriemma, the real mastermind behind the murder of Maurizio Gucci, she said.

In June 1998, Reggiani Martinelli and her four co-conspirators were brought to trial in Milan, all charged with capital murder. The former queen bee denied having anything to do with the other four defendants, insisting that they had acted on their own under Auriemma's orders and that the psychic was an evil person, who had seized upon Reggiani Martinelli's dislike of her former husband to initiate a murder and involve her in it, so that she could become the perfect blackmail victim.

"I have been naive to the point of stupidity," Reggiani Martinelli cried out to the court, where her mother sat with a worried look on her face. "I found myself involved against my will. I deny categorically that I was an accomplice."

The costly trial dragged on for five months while the seamy side of Milan's social set was exposed. Tawdry tales of greed, intrigue, calculating social climbing and murderous betrayals were told and retold in detail, an army of reporters in the courtroom writing down every sensational word and photographing every move made by witnesses and defendants, especially the former grande dame, Reggiani Martinelli, who played the role of the discarded wife and blackmail victim to the hilt.

On November 3, 1998, Reggiani Martinelli and her four co-defendants were all found guilty of capital murder. Instead of the life term expected for her, Reggiani Martinelli was sentenced to twenty-nine years in prison. Auriemma, the scheming psychic, received a 25-year sentence. Savioni, her stooge, the doorman, got a 26-year sentence, while Cicala, the getaway driver, received a 29-year sentence and Ceraulo, the gunman who continued to shout out his innocence, was sent to prison for life.

Only Savioni, the go-between, seemed repentant, stating: "I know that I face many long years in prison for what I've done. I ask the pardon of Gucci's children. I am horrified that things went so much further than I intended."

At the announcement of the verdict and sentence, Reggiani Martinelli's two daughters, who had sat patiently through the trial, burst into tears. The defendant's mother sat stone-faced and silent. Reggiani Martinelli herself then turned to her lawyer, Giovanni Dedola, and, showing her best bewildered face, said in a soft and knowing tone: "Truth is the child of time. Evidently, they didn't believe me."

As Italy's most notorious "Black Widow" was being escorted from the courtroom and en route to prison, hordes of journalists began brawling with police. Reporters and photographers struggled, jostled, pushed, and shoved to get close to Reggiani Martinelli, to scribble down a final statement, to snap just one more photo.

Opposite page, left: Patrizia Reggiani Martinelli Gucci, who was convicted and sent to prison for hiring killers to slay her millionaire ex-husband, Maurizio Gucci, in 1995.

A MURDEROUS MAD MILLIONAIRE/ January 26, 1996

David Schultz, 36, a wrestling coach, had the unenviable job of training an Olympic wrestling team on the grounds of John E. du Pont's sprawling Foxcatcher estate outside Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. He lived on the estate with his wife Nancy and two small children and was subject to the unnerving and eccentric behavior of tycoon John E. du Pont (b. 1939), heir to the vast chemical company fortune, whose own fortune was estimated to be $250 million. At times du Pont would appear to be affable and easygoing, and at other times he was harsh and dictatorial.

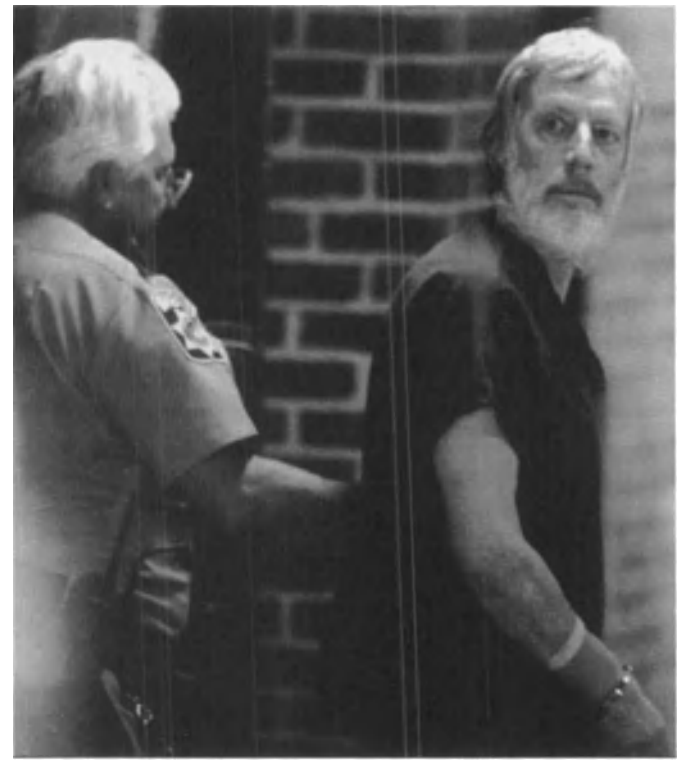
Du Pont began to develop a wrestling program on his sprawling estate in the 1980s, becoming the founder and head coach of the Team Foxcatcher Athletic Club, which sponsored programs in swimming, triathlon, modern pentathlon and wrestling, grooming the best candidates for Olympic appearances. He contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to sponsor Olympic teams. Mark and David Schultz were two of the first wrestlers to join Team Foxcatcher. Both had been 1984 Olympic champions, with David winning a gold medal in his class. Du Pont spent more than $500,000 in establishing a wrestling center on the grounds of his estate.

On January 26, 1996, for no apparent reason, du Pont suddenly appeared before his trainer, David Shultz and his wife and shot the coach three times, killing him. He ran into his mansion and remained barricaded there for two days, while police tried to coax him into surrendering. He was captured when he emerged to fix his heating unit.

Charged with murder, du Pont was at first thought to be mentally incompetent. He claimed at different times to be the Dalai Lama and Jesus Christ. He said that he was "the last surviving heir of the ruling family of Russia." He told people that there were mechanical trees moving about on his property and trying to get into his mansion to steal his money. He said that Schultz had been "killed by Republicans because I didn't contribute [money] to them." While awaiting trial, du Pont told guards that "Bill Clinton will get me out of jail."

In September 1996, a judge ordered du Pont to the Norristown State Hospital to undergo observation in order to determine his competency to stand trial. Psychiatrists gave du Pont antipsychotic drugs to "clear his head" (of what was later described as paranoid schizophrenia) and he was later ruled competent to stand trial. Described by a prosecutor as "the wealthiest murder defendant in the history of the United States," du Pont sat passively through his three-week trial, his gray hair grown so long that it fell over his shoulders and spouting a bushy gray beard. He wore the same blue sweatshirt every day in court.

A twelve-member jury found du Pont guilty of third-degree murder on February 5, 1997, a verdict that stipulated he had acted without premeditated intent. On May 13, 1997, du Pont was sentenced to thirteen to thirty years in prison by Delaware County Court Judge Patricia Jenkins. He was to serve his time in a mental institution, or, if deemed mentally fit at any time during his sentence, to be removed to a prison to there serve out his sentence.



Millionaire John E. du Pont, beset by madness, shot and killed Olympic wrestler David Schultz, on his estate outside Philadelphia in 1996.

In 2002, the National Law Journal reported that a wrongful death suit brought against the du Pont estate by Nancy Schultz, was settled for an estimated $35 million. This was one of the largest awards ever bestowed upon an individual in wrongful death suits.

No one ever explained the motive for du Pont's strange murder of Schultz. Mental illness overtook him in 1988, one report held, after his mother died. He then allegedly began to use large quantities of cocaine and walked about his estate heavily armed. Prosecutors claimed that the millionaire killed his wrestling coach simply because he was jealous of Schultz's standing in worldwide wrestling competition. Others suggested a more sinister motive, that du Pont, who had been briefly married, was a latent homosexual and that he was incensed when Schultz rudely rebuffed his sexual advances, spurring him to shoot a reluctant lover.

In 1988, Andre Metzger, a coach at Villanova University, filed a complaint against du Pont, in which he accused the millionaire of making sexual advances toward him. Little evidence points to this claim and Metzger, at the time of the Schultz shooting, refused to make any comment.

THE HARTMAN SUICIDE-MURDER/ May 28, 1998

The life of Canadian-born comedian Phil Hartman (1948-1998) was seemingly crowded with blessings. Only days before he was shot to death by his wife Brynn (Vicki Jo Omdahl, 1958-1998) on May 28, 1998, in their comfortable Encino, California, home, the comedian, who had been a fixture on Saturday Night Live and other comedy TV shows, stated, "In the overall spectrum of human careers, I have what is, I'm sure, in the top 1 percent of the world's most fun jobs. I've made money beyond my wildest dreams. I have every toy I've ever wanted. I have a beautiful home, plus all the important things, the wife and two perfect kids. I've got every reason to be happy."

His wife, Brynn Hartman, an attractive, stately blonde, was not happy. Born in Thief River Falls, Minnesota, she had married young to Douglas Tourfin, moving to Arizona, where they both worked for the Bell Telephone Company. Brynn moved to California to become a model and worked at that profession, changing her name to Brynn. By that time, she was divorced and met comedian Phil Hartman, marrying him on November 25, 1987. They lived in New York for eight years, where Hartman became a fixture on the "Saturday Night Live" TV comedy show.

Then the Hartmans moved to California to raise their two children, Sean and Birgen in a comfortable ranch style home in Encino at 5065 Encino Avenue. While Brynn had ambitions to become an actress and a screenwriter, she remained a housewife, a role she did not envy. Moreover, she reportedly became intensely jealous of her husband's success, fame and popularity. The handsome Hartman, who had been married three times, was attractive to many women and Brynn often exploded, becoming hysterical whenever other women paid attention to her amiable husband. She was particularly spiteful toward Hartman's second wife, Lisa Jarvis, who had remained friendly toward the comedian following their divorce.

Steve Small, the attorney who handled that divorce, later stated that Brynn "had trouble controlling her anger. She got attention by losing her temper." He pointed out that the couple separated more than once over bitter squabbles and that "Phil had to restrain her at times."

Brynn's composure began to crumble after she increased her drinking and cocaine use, although the couple continued to appear at public affairs where they were described as "an adoring couple." Hartman, however, by 1998, had resolved to end the marriage, believing that he could not remedy the problems between Brynn and himself. It was also rumored that he had become interested in another woman and when Brynn suspected this clandestine relationship, she planned her husband's murder.

On May 28, 1998, Brynn Hartman went drinking with a friend, staying at the stylish Buca di Bepo restaurant on Ventura Boulevard and she did not return home until about 2 a.m. She found her husband sleeping in bed. Brynn then took a Smith and Wesson revolver from her purse—she had reportedly been carrying the weapon all night—when she went into the bedroom. Phil Hartman was asleep on their king-sized bed, wearing a purple T-shirt and boxer shorts with cartoon Dachshunds on them. Calmly, Brynn placed the muzzle of the revolver to her husband's head and fired a bullet into his forehead. She then shot him twice more, in the neck and forearm, the last shot proving fatal.

With her two children still sleeping in the house, Brynn went to a neighbor's home, waking up Ron Douglas, saying to him: "I shot Phil." She seemed dazed and soon fell asleep on a couch. Douglas did not initially believe her, but he searched her purse and found the revolver. Brynn woke up three hours later and took Douglas to her home, where she showed him her husband's body. Douglas immediately called 911, telling police: "Yeah, hi...I think there's been a shooting here. She came to my house and she was drunk. She said that she had killed her husband and I didn't believe her."

Police arrived at 6:20 a.m., and while they were escorting the two Hartman children from the house, Brynn locked herself in the master bedroom with the corpse of her husband. Officers tried to talk the woman from the room, but she was in hysterics, screaming incoherently. They then tried to distract her, but that did not work either. Finally, they heard a single shot explode and they broke down the door to find Brynn Hartman sprawled in a two-piece pajama outfit, next to the body of her husband. She had used a second gun (both were legal and had been purchased by Hartman to provide the household with protection) to end her life by putting the muzzle of the revolver into her mouth and pulling the trigger. One unsubstantiated report held that Brynn Hartman had become distraught that night when she read a note from her husband that suggested they end their marriage. A coroner's inquest later determined that Brynn Hartman had that night consumed considerable quantities of alcohol, cocaine and an antidepressant, Zoloft (her family members later sued the drug firm making Zoloft).

According to Phil Hartman's will, the bodies of Phil and Brynn Hartman were cremated at Forest Lawn Glendale and their ashes were reportedly scattered all over picturesque Catalina Island.

Many Hollywood friends and associates had much to say about the shocking suicide-murder of the Hartmans. "They fought a lot," said Cassandra Peterson, the voluptuous Elvira, Mistress of the Dark. "[She was] a very troubled person. I tried to talk Phil out of marrying her in 1987. She put a serious damper on our friendship."

The death of Phil Hartman shook the Hollywood community. He was a personable, well-loved comedian, a master mimic who expertly impersonated more than seventy public figures, among them President Clinton, Ed McMahon, Frank Sinatra, and Jimmy Swaggart. Like many other stars of "Saturday Night Live," including Dan Aykroyd and John Candy, Hartman was a Canadian, born in Brantford, Ontario. He worked in graphic design before choosing the world of comedy as his vocation. Many Hollywood reporters felt that Hartman's death was part of the so-called "Saturday Night Curse," recalling the premature deaths of John Belushi and Chris Farley from drug overdoses, and Gilda Radner and Danitra Vance, who both died of cancer at early ages.

Brynn Hartman, shown with her husband Phil Hartman, a comedic superstar in film and TV, murdered her spouse in 1998, after a night of drinking and drug-taking, then ended her own life.

CHAPTER TEN:

MURDER/MASS MURDER

Unlike the serial killer (see Serial Killers, this chapter), who stalks his or her prey over extended periods of time—months, years, sometimes decades—the mass murderer kills in one fell swoop, and is one who often acts on irrational impulse, or is driven to rage through the influence of drugs or alcohol. There are no set numbers of victims that qualify for a mass murder, although more than one victim is considered justifiable for such categorization. The term is applied to those who are killed in numbers at the same time, murders that take place within the framework of a short period, usually within minutes or hours of a given day.

Such wholesale killings prove to be the most shocking in the public view in that the loss of life is estimated by quantity which is easily equated with slaughter or massacre. The Indian massacres of the Old West, the so-called Fort Pillow "Massacre" of April 12, 1864 during the American Civil War, the massacres committed by troops on both sides during many wars rightly belong in the category of war crimes.

Vlad Tepes, the bloodthirsty ruler of Walachia (Romania), who committed many mass murders in the 15th Century.

It is the killing of a number of non-combatants—innocent victims—in a short period of time that truly constitutes the act of mass murder and there are thousands of such recorded events which span the troubled centuries of mankind. One of the earliest mass murderers was the savage king, Vlad Tepes (Basarab; AKA: Vlad the Impaler, prom. 1456-1462, 1476-1477), who excelled his father, Vlad Dracul, in practicing extreme cruelty in his kingdom of Walachia (later Romania).

Like all mass murderers or serial killers, the Walachian ruler had an enormous capacity for evil and sadistic cruelty. Vlad Tepes' castle, high in the Carpathian Mountains of Transylvania, later inspired novelist Bram Stoker for the location of the castle of his infamous fictional monster, profiled in the book, Dracula. Stoker drew from the lives of both Vlad Dracul and Vlad Tepes to create his frightening character, but most of his research is based on Vlad Tepes, also known as Vlad the Impaler.

Vlad Tepes impaled his enemies on high spikes, reportedly murdering 50,000 victims in this fashion, hundreds, if not thousands at the same time. This monster dined amidst victims impaled on spikes, reveling in their dying agonies. It was also said that he drank the blood of these hapless persons, thus giving rise to Stoker's tale of a blood-drinking vampire, who survived on the blood of the living. Vlad Tepes was a Bela Lugosi, as Bram Stoker's horrific vampire, in the 1931 film, Dracula, a character based upon Vlad Tepes.

Mass murderer Edward Morgan, who slaughtered his relatives in Wales in 1756, then tried to hide his crime through arson.

hopeless pervert who enjoyed the pain of others, reserving his special wrath for Saxon invaders and Turkish merchants. He impaled the Saxons and tortured the Turks by having their turbans nailed to their heads.

Though feared as a bloodlusting maniac by foreigners, Vlad Tepes was considered a hero by his own people, a great warrior, who finally rid Walachia of foreign invaders. Historically he is remembered, thanks to novelist Stoker, as an inhuman beast whose lethal reputation conjured up images of undead spirits and bloodsucking vampire bats. In this gruesome image, Stoker was not far from the truth.

The living nightmare of Vlad Tepes was translated into evil dreams that plagued others who slew by the numbers. Superstition, the concept of a lurking Devil, often impelled deluded souls to mass murder. One such demented soul was Edward Morgan, whose routine visit to Welsh relatives ended in bloody disaster. According to Welsh custom, the Christmas feast was open to all visitors. In 1756, Edward Morgan was invited to share in the celebration at his cousin's farmhouse in Lanvabon. Rees Morgan's hospitality led to his death.

On Christmas night, Morgan retired to his bedroom with another house guest. In the middle of the night, Morgan awoke and decided to commit wholesale murder. He would later say that the devil commanded him to kill the family. Morgan found a knife. He first attacked his roommate, then went to his cousins' bedroom and slit their throats from ear to ear. Next he stabbed the couple's young daughter, then set fire to the barn, the stable, and the farmhouse to cover his tracks.

The blaze leveled the three buildings, leading authorities to believe that the entire Morgan family died in the fire. Morgan, however, failed to murder the young apprentice who shared a room with him that night. Based on his testimony, and Morgan's eventual confession, Morgan was convicted and hanged at Glamorgan on April 6, 1757.

THE RATCLIFF HIGHWAY MURDERS/ December 1811

During the early 1800s, the separate slayings of two families in the East End of London came to be known as "The Ratcliff Highway Murders." The crimes shocked and terrified all of England and were eclipsed only by the Jack the Ripper killings, which began in 1888.

Timothy Marr operated a hosier's shop on Ratcliff Highway and lived there with his wife, Cecilia, their infant daughter, an apprentice, John Goen, thirteen, and a maid, 18-year-old Margaret Jewell. On December 7, 1811, as Marr and Goen were closing up the store shortly before midnight, Jewell was sent out to buy some oysters and was told that the door would be left open for her. When she returned about twenty minutes later, the house was locked and quiet.

Jewell rang and knocked at the door, but no one answered. When neighbors arrived and entered the house, they found the entire family slain. Timothy Marr was lying behind the counter, Cecilia Marr was found in the doorway between the back room and the store, and the apprentice, Goen, was at the bottom of the stairs. The killer had battered their heads and slashed their throats. The infant's throat had also been cut.

Although the killer may have stolen some pocket change or small items, nothing valuable was taken. He apparently had been looking upstairs when he heard Jewell at the door and fled through the back door. A ship's carpenter's maul and a sledgehammer with the initials J.P. on the handle were found.

The residence and shop of Timothy Marr, where he and three others were slain on the night of December 7, 1811.

Londoners were stunned when they learned of the mass murders, and the entire country, especially the Birmingham region, was gripped with fear. People became cautious, and many equipped their homes with sturdy bolts and chain locks. Door-to-door searches were conducted in the Shadwell area, where many tramps were arrested, and rewards were offered for the killer's capture.

On December 19, 1811 the killer struck again at the King's Arms, a pub on Old Gravel Lane, a road that intersected Ratcliff Highway. The pub was operated by an old man named Williamson, who resided there with his wife; their grandchild; 14-year-old Kitty Stillwell; a maid, 50-year-old Bridget Harrington; and a journeyman carpenter John Turner. Williamson customarily closed the pub and the house door at 11 p.m. He usually left the pub's front door open until 12 a.m. for anyone who wanted a late-night drink.

Turner arrived home shortly before 11 p.m., and, exhausted from work, immediately went to his second-floor room and fell asleep. Sometime after 11 p.m. the killer entered the King's Arms and first attacked Harrington, who was setting up the fire for the next morning. When Williamson's wife entered the room, he attacked her as well. He cut both women's throats, nearly severing Harrington's head, and then killed Williamson, who had just returned from the cellar.

At 11:25 p.m., Turner was awakened by the slamming of the outside door. He went downstairs, where he saw "a tall man in a loose, shaggy coat" inside the parlor. The killer, whose back was to Turner, was hovering over a body and going through the pockets. When the killer stood up and walked away, Turner heard his boots creak. Undetected by the intruder, Turner slipped back up to his bedroom, tied some sheets together, and climbed out his window. He alerted neighbors, who broke into the house. The killer broke a window at the back of the house and escaped. Kitty Stillwell had escaped injury.

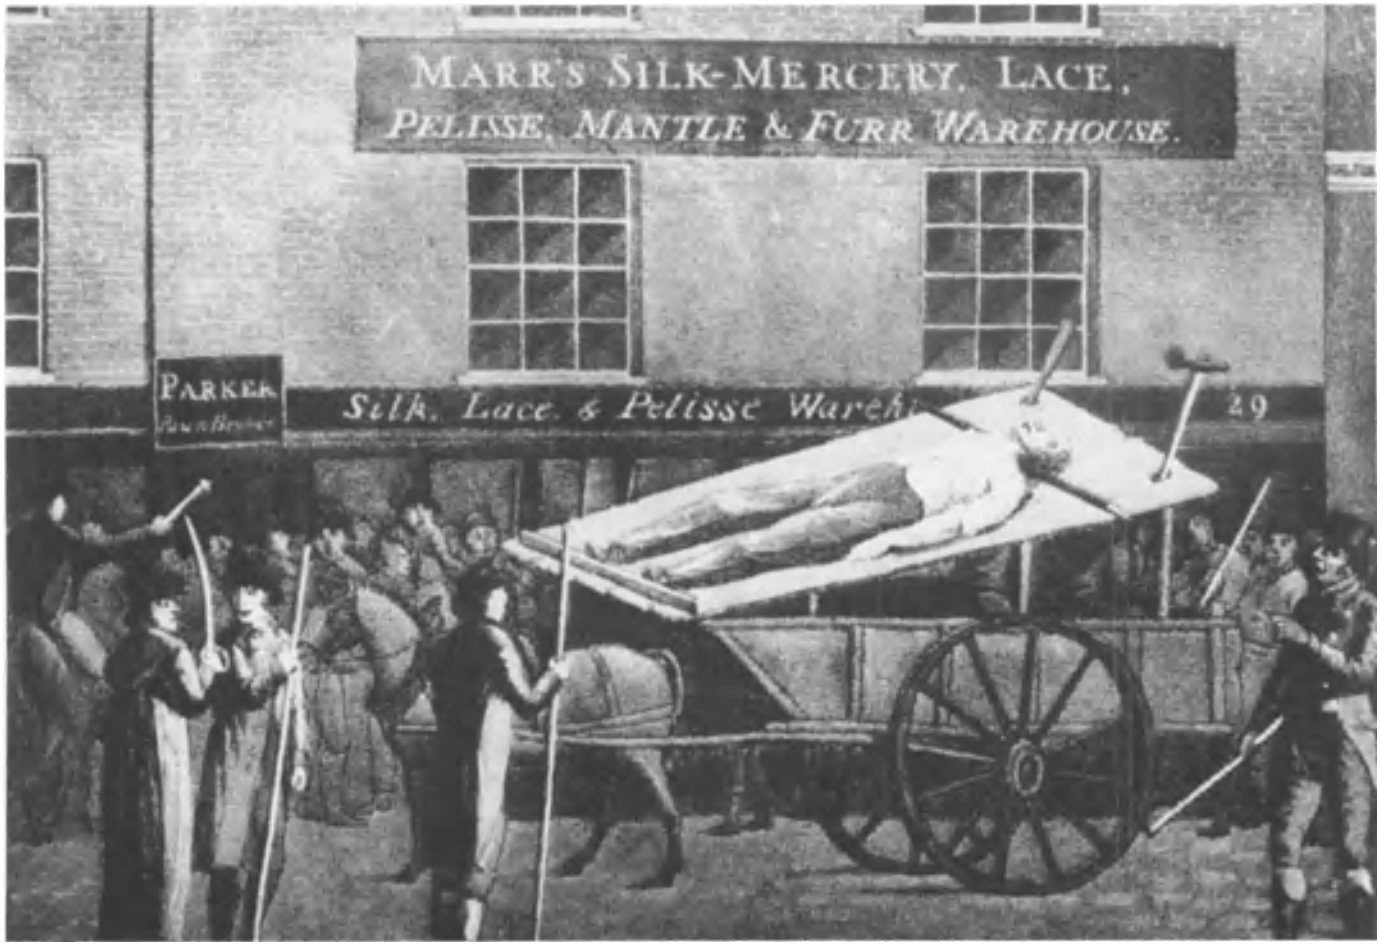
The Williamson slayings caused even greater panic. Notices were circulated, emphasizing the initials, J.P., found on the sledgehammer left at the first murder scene. A man who ran an area pub and inn called the Pear Tree, named Vermiloe, saw the flyers and thought the weapon might belong to a Nordic seaman, John Petersen, who had lodged at his inn and stored a tool chest there. Vermiloe identified the maul as Petersen's, but Petersen, it was later proven, had been at sea during the murders.

Another Pear Tree lodger, Irishman John Williams, about twenty or thirty years old, became a suspect and was taken to the Shadwell police station for questioning. Williams had been seen going toward the King's Arms the night of the slayings and was known to have returned to the inn at about 1 a.m. on the nights of the murders. On the night of the King's Arms murders, he had asked two other lodgers to snuff out their candles and then gotten into bed in the dark.

Officials discovered that Williams' shoes and socks were muddy, and he had blood on his shirt, which he said had resulted from a fight. After the first murders, Williams had purchased a new pair of boots, which creaked. Additionally, Williams' coat pocket was stained with blood, as were a pair of his pants found in an outhouse. During questioning, Williams admitted frequenting the King's Arms. He was arrested and taken to the New Prison at Coldbath Fields.

A contemporary print shows carpenter John Turner escaping the stalking mass murderer at the King's Arms pub by dropping to the street from knotted sheets on the night of December 19, 1811.

John Williams, shown in death, a sketch drawn by Sir Thomas Lawrence, only minutes after Williams hanged himself in his prison cell.



The half-naked body of John Williams, displayed on a cart, was taken to the scene of the first mass murders, the Marr shop, so convinced were authorities that Williams was the mass murderer.

On December 28, 1811, Williams hanged himself in his prison cell. His corpse was placed on a cart and taken to the scene of the crime. On December 31, 1811, his body was taken to the intersection of New Road and Cannon Street, and a stake was driven through his heart before burial. About five or six weeks later, a knife covered with dried blood was discovered in Williams' former room at the Pear Tree. The weapon had been hidden in the floor of the room in a mouse hole. Although Williams was never tried, and the evidence in the case was primarily circumstantial, the slayings stopped after his arrest and officials conveniently concluded that Williams had been the killer in the Ratcliff Highway Murders. In 1849, Williams' remains were disinterred and reburied because of street repairs.

Within hours of Williams' death, Sir Thomas Lawrence made a watercolor portrait of him, showing light blue eyes and blond hair, although according to other reports, he had red hair. The case also captured the imagination of Thomas De Quincey (1785-1859), who wrote a dark, long essay entitled On Murder, Considered as one of the Fine Arts, published in 1827. In an appendix, he composed a descriptive piece recreating the mass murders.

"THE WORST MAN WHO EVER LIVED"/ March 16-17, 1860

On the misty morning of March 17, 1860, the sloop E.A. Johnson was found aimlessly drifting in the lower bay by the schooner Telegraph. Crew members of the Telegraph boarded the sloop and found no one on board. They did discover, however, evidence of widespread carnage: blood spattered on the ceiling, floor, table, and bunks in the ship's interior. Furniture was scattered and broken. Heel marks that seemed to be from a heavy body trailed from the cabin to a railing. The railing itself was coated with dark splotches of blood. Next to this spot, on the deck, were four neatly severed human fingers and a thumb.

After the tug Ceres towed the derelict E.A. Johnson to the Fulton Market slip, authorities released the story of the deserted vessel and its gory clues. The crew had obviously been killed and dumped overboard, but by whom? John Burke, who owned a boarding house on Cedar Street, and one of his boarders, Andrew Kelly, thought they had the answer. With fresh newspapers relating the strange story of the blood-soaked ship curled in their hands, these two men entered the police station commanded by Captain Weed and gushed out an accusation.

The shambles left in the cabin of the oyster sloop, E. A. Johnson, after a brutal killer had slain the captain and crew on March 16-17, 1860.

"Hicksey is your killer," one of them said. "Twenty-four hours before that ship was discovered, he was back in the house."

"He had a lot of money," the other put in, "but when we asked how he came by it, he talked of other things. Yes, Hicksey is your man."

The "Hicksey" the informants referred to was Albert E. Hicks (AKA: William Johnson; 1819-1860), known as Hicksey to a rare few. He had lived with his wife and child in Burke's boarding house and had inexplicably come into a large sum of money. Knowing his background, his acquaintances did little guessing as to how. A professional thief, pirate, and killer-for-hire, the large, middle-aged Hicks was a lone wolf, who sometimes, if the pay was promising, would join with one gang or another in raids for loot, but he owed no one his allegiance. This brutish but somewhat intelligent thug would fight with various gangs, sometimes on the side of the Daybreak Boys. On other occasions, he would stand with the Dead Rabbits. The highest bidder owned his knife hand.

Police had a long file on Hicks, one that told them he had run away from his home in Rhode Island, where his father had been a tenant farmer. As a teenager, he stole some money and was imprisoned. Hicks escaped twice and was recaptured and put into solitary confinement. Upon his release, Hicks, by then a broad-shouldered, towering man, hardened by long years of prison, signed on board a merchant ship and traveled around the Horn. He led a violent mutiny, which was suppressed. Hicks was flogged, tossed into the hold, and turned over to authorities, when the ship returned to port. Again, he was sent to prison. Released, Hicks pursued many criminal activities, mostly theft, while disguised as a peddler. Pickings were slim, so he again signed on board a ship, the ill-fated E. A. Johnson, using the alias, William Johnson.

Captain Weed selected his best patrolman, a man named Nevins, and ordered him to track Hicks down and take him into custody. Through tips, Nevins trailed the gangster to Providence and, with the aid of a local police squad, arrested him in a rooming house. (Nevins later stated that he found Hicks asleep in his room and that the sleeping suspect emitted "buckets of sweat.") Hicks and his wife and child were returned to New York. The thug was locked up in the Tombs, his hands manacled and his feet chained to a large stone block in the center of a cell. A police officer entered his cell shortly after Hicks had been chained, and held up a gold watch.

"Hicks," the officer said, "this was found in your room at Burke's place."

The thug stared at the watch which swung from a chain gripped in the officer's large hand. He said nothing.

"This watch belonged to the skipper of the E. A. Johnson, Captain Burr." The policeman next held out a daguerreotype of an attractive young woman. "This portrait was given to one of the two Watts boys, Oliver, by his sweetheart. This was also found in your room."

New York thug and mass murderer Albert E. Hicks, who called himself "the worst man who ever lived."

"I don't know what those things were doing in my room," Hicks growled. "I never saw those things a'fore."

"You shipped on that sloop under the name of William Johnson," the policeman said. "You then killed Captain Burr and Oliver and Smith Watts."

"My name ain't Johnson and I never been to sea on that ship."

"Oh yes you have, Hicks. And you're going to swing for it."

Hicks clenched his hands into fists and violently rattled his manacles, and with short kicks jangled his chains. He spat and cursed at the officer. He then remained silent. The questioning was brief. Officials knew Hicks' background and his reputation as being tight-lipped. They also concluded that he was violently insane. Hicks' brother, who had murdered several persons in recent years, had also been considered a lunatic and had been scheduled to die on the gallows, but had escaped and completely disappeared.

Circumstantial evidence was weighty in the Hicks trial held on May 18, 1860 in the U.S. Circuit Court before Judge Smalley. The pirate was found guilty of slaying the entire crew of the E. A. Johnson. Sentenced to die, Hicks suddenly decided to not only confess to this multiple killing but offer in a small-book form his biography, the proceeds of which were to keep his family "all snug." Mrs. Hicks, however, made it appear to prison warders that she had no intention of being "snug" from her husband's murder profits. When she first visited her husband in the Tombs, she held up her small child to the bars and screamed: "Look at your offspring, you rascal, and think what you have brought on us! If I could reach you, I'd tear your bloody heart out!"

"Why, my dear," Hicks replied in a quiet, soothing voice, "I've done nothing. It will be all out in a day or two." The murderer talked many times again with his wife, jailors hopelessly straining to hear their conversations. It was felt that Hicks had told his wife, where the loot from his many killings and robberies was hidden and that she eventually recovered this large amount of money.

The published confession was only a smoke screen to make it appear to authorities that Mrs. Hicks' newfound riches came by way of royalty payments for his book. These payments were paltry at best, but authorities did not learn this until much later, when Hicks had been executed and his wife moved on with her child to live out a life of relative ease. It was the last act of a scheming criminal who turned his own hanging into a plot to protect his ill-gotten fortunes.

New York's Five Points, in 1859, where Hicks and his fellow criminals operated and found a safe haven from police.

No doubt a reader of the more lurid press of the day, Hicks belched out a sensational tale of brutal killings, robberies, and licentiousness that encompassed several decades in New York's underworld. When speaking of the crime that had condemned him, Hicks insisted that he had been shanghaied. He had been drinking, he said, in one of the low dives along Cherry Street on the night of March 14, 1860. The owner was apparently unafraid of the terrible Hicks and slipped just enough laudanum in the thug's ale to knock him out (too much of this drug was fatal). Unconscious, Hicks was carted to the E. A. Johnson, he said, where Captain Burr threw him into the cabin. When he came to, Hicks was told to "get to work" and in a few hours found himself at the helm.

"I was steering," he told his publisher, "and Captain Burr and one of the Watts boys were asleep in the cabin. The other Watts was on lookout at the bow. Suddenly, the devil took possession of me and I determined to murder the captain and crew that very night."

Lashing the wheel to maintain course, Hicks grabbed a capstan bar and, on his hands and knees, crawled slowly toward the bow. Oliver Watts turned slightly when he noticed Hicks' shadow, but the hoodlum was quicker, leaping up and forward, crashing the bar down on the boy's head. Watts managed one scream before the blow sent him toppling to the deck. The noise had awakened the other brother, Smith, and he came running up from the cabin. Hicks waited for him with an ax, and as Watts emerged on deck, the killer took a swipe at him. "It was like chopping a small tree," gloated Hicks. "His whole head came off. The rest of him took a few steps, spouting blood like a fountain. Then it sagged down as the head rolled along the deck."

Peering into the dark cabin, Hicks leaned on the ax. He was looking for the heavyset Captain Burr. The thug took a step into the dark room and knocked over a chair. Burr awakened to see Hicks standing over him, his arms over his head, and the ax already descending. The captain moved slightly and the blow missed his head by inches, the ax thudding through the pillow and part of the wooden headrest of the bed. Rolling onto the floor, Burr took a moment to come to his senses. Hicks yanked his ax out of the wood and turned, rushing toward Burr, who also sprang forward from a crouch. Clasping the murderer's legs and driving forward, the captain was able to topple Hicks backward, but the thug obstinately clung to the ax.

Burr managed to crawl on top of the gangster and get his hands around Hicks' throat, but the killer worked his way into a roll and shoved the captain against the hot stove, stunning him. Hicks then jumped up, brought the ax down in one slashing chop, and drove it deep into Burr's skull. "The blow took away half of Burr's head...half of his eye was on the blade, a piece of his nose, some beard."

Tired from his grisly labors, Hicks went up on deck for some air. His chores were not completed, however, for Oliver Watts, whom he had attacked first, had only been knocked unconscious and was just then staggering to his feet. Hicks rushed over to him and hit him with the blunt end of his ax. He then lifted Watts to his shoulders and carried him to the rail. Again, the youth recovered and, just as Hicks was letting him over the side, Watts reached out and tenaciously clung to the rail. The gangster swore at him as he tried to pry the boy's fingers loose. Hicks then grabbed the ax and brought it down on one hand, cutting off Oliver Watts' four fingers and thumb, which plopped to the deck. The youth slipped into the water and disappeared.

The Bowery Boys and the Dead Rabbits are shown battling for control of the Five Points; Hicks fought with the Dead Rabbits.

Such slaughter was work enough to tire any hearty man. Hicks paused to drink several tankards of ale which he filched from the captain's stores. It tasted strange, and while pouring himself a fourth drink, he finally noticed in the dim light that the tankard was coated with blood, human gore that had dripped from his own hands. He threw the tankard overboard and then tossed the bodies of Smith Watts and Captain Burr in after it. He almost forgot the decapitated head of Smith Watts and had some difficulty locating it. This, too, he hurled into the water. Rifling the lockers of the captain and crew, Hicks took all the valuables on board the sloop, including Burr's watch and the picture Oliver Watts kept over his bunk.

It was almost dawn when Hicks made out the coastline of Staten Island. He steered for it in the fog and when he neared land, he lowered a small lifeboat and rowed for shore, setting an open-sea course for the E. A. Johnson. The tides, however, caused the sloop to drift in the wrong direction, and the Telegraph spotted it before it disappeared. By then, Hicks had reached land and gone home, where he made the mistake of paying his rent and several other bills the moment he walked into Burke's boarding house. He ostentatiously withdrew the money from Burr's sea bag. The suspicious Burke and another roomer, Kelly, later went to police when the mystery of the E. A. Johnson was publicized.

Death by hanging was to be meted out to Hicks on July 13, 1860. It was a Friday. "That date and day have never held good for me," Hicks complained to the dozens of curious spectators, who came to gape at him through the bars of his cell, the horribly vivid details of his crimes gouged into their imaginations by his widely published memoirs. Among the many notables visiting Hicks was the irrepressible Phineas T. Barnum, who was always on the lookout for curiosities with which to enliven his museum. Barnum wanted a death mask and the condemned man's clothing to display in his building, but he was wary of dickering with the money-grubbing Hicks. Instead, he bartered with Warden Charles Sutton.

Showman and jailor haggled in the corridor outside of Hicks' cell, while the killer silently glared at them. For $25 cash, Sutton agreed to turn over Hicks' clothing to Barnum, a death mask to be thrown in for free. When Hicks protested, Barnum promised to send him two boxes "of the finest cigars." They were delivered some hours later, and Hicks happily puffed on these until the time he met his doom. The killer was less enchanted with the suit of clothes Barnum sent to replace Hicks' "murder suit."

"This suit I got in exchange for my own," Hicks complained to Sutton, "is shoddy." Oddly, with no thought to the waiting rope, he added bitterly: "It won't last." (Barnum later had a sinister-looking wax effigy made of the mass murderer, which was exhibited at his museum for decades and was catalogued thusly: Hicks - "No. 74. Life-Size Model of Albert E. Hicks, the murderer of the crew of the oyster-smack. E. A. Johnson, on or about March 18, 1860, attired in the very clothes worn by him when he butchered his victims with an ax. Note dark stains on jacket. The face was modeled from a plaster cast made by P.T. Barnum, of the Greatest Show on Earth, a fortnight before Hicks was hanged. Acknowledged to be a wonderful likeness of the infamous pirate.")

Sutton, hearing that the hanging was to be a gala event, decided that his star Tombs boarder should be more presentable and prevailed upon officials to provide better clothing. The day before Hicks was to hang, he was given a suit of blue cottonade with gilt buttons and needlework anchors. It pleased Hicks enormously. "I look like an admiral," he beamed.

At 5:30 p.m. on Thursday, July 12, 1860, Mrs. Hicks was shown into her husband's cell. He was free of his chains and wearing his new suit. He shook her hand briskly and then kissed her twice, murmuring each time, "Goodbye, goodbye." The woman showed no emotion whatever and only a faint smile played about the killer's lips when she departed.

True or not, Hicks manifested a spiritual change during the last hours of his life and prayed with Father Duranquet until midnight when he told the priest he was tired. He flopped onto

New York's old Tombs prison, where Hicks awaited execution.

Entrepreneur and showman Phineas Taylor Barnum, shown at the time he haggled with jailors for Hick's clothing and death mask, which he later displayed at his museum.

his bunk and was soon sound asleep. Guards had to shake him awake at 3 a.m. He then renewed his prayers, pronouncing his words loudly, as if he wanted his jailors to overhear his devotions.

A large breakfast was brought to Hicks and not only did he devour the eggs, bacon, and bread, washing it down with several cups of tea, but asked for more. Another meal was brought, and he finished it. He then methodically washed his face and hands, put on a clean shirt and his new sailor's suit. He brushed the dust from his shoes with a rag, saying with a grin: "Hicksey should look his best this day. My, my, won't New York be proud!"

Hicks was preening himself when the jailors opened his cell door at 6 a.m. It was time, they told him. He stepped into the corridor and signaled to a janitor who mopped out the cells: "Take what you find in there," he told the man and then quizzically looked at his jailors.

"How do you feel, Hicks?" a guard named Clackner asked.

"I feel very well," the killer responded.

Another guard reminded Hicks that Barnum wanted the empty cigar boxes, which he would also place on display with other Hicks memorabilia. Hicks jammed the last cigar into his mouth and pointed to his cell. "Under the bed...That man overlooks nothing."

Suddenly, Hicks leaned forward and firmly grasped the lapel of Officer Dugan. Looking the guard straight in the eyes, the murderer gritted: "I am the worst man who ever lived!"

Dugan gently removed Hicks' hand.

"You don't seem to think I mean what I say, Dugan."

"Yes," Dugan replied solemnly, "I believe you would not say what was not true when so near your end."

Then, they walked down to the main corridor. Awaiting them was a large group of officials headed, ironically enough, by U.S. marshal, Isaiah Rynders. Captain Rynders had for some twenty years been the political boss of the Sixth ward, and a Tammany stalwart and mentor and financial backer to dozens of New York's super criminals. Unknown to all but two present on the day of the execution, Rynders had employed Hicks on several occasions. The hooligan had handled the more unsavory jobs in the dark doings of Isaiah Rynders.

Hicks smiled when he saw Rynders, but before he could speak, the calculating politician and U.S. marshal, wearing a long, clanking sword especially for the affair, stepped forward and unraveled a long scroll, stating in stentorian tones: "Albert E. Hicks, it is now my painful duty to read to you in the presence of these officers of the law, the warrant of execution which I have received from the President of the United States." The killer was still smiling at his sometimes employer as Rynders read the document, ending with: "This is my authority for now carrying out the sentence of the law. The prisoner will prepare to depart."

Rynders, Sheriff Kelly, Father Duranquet, and Hicks then left the Tombs and got into a carriage. Several other carriages carrying dozens of guards formed the procession to the foot of Canal Street. On the way, Rynders devilishly stared at Hicks, who returned his gaze. The marshal inquired: "And what do you think the future holds for you, Mr. Hicks?"

Thousands of excursionists are shown sailing in every type of vessel near Bedloe's Island, New York, to watch the hanging of Albert E. Hicks on July 13, 1860.

Hicks squinted at his one-time employer, who showed no trace of apprehension that his former thug for hire would reveal their dealings. The killer mouthed his words carefully: "That is a matter I would rather leave to Father Duranquet."

A huge throng was gathered on Canal Street next to the dock. Frantic members of this curious mob pushed away the guards, and, to get a better glimpse of Hicks, smashed the carriage windows and tore away the curtains. The killer gave them his most derisive smile. Rynders and his guards shoved their way through the crowd, their prisoner in tow, and boarded the already jammed Red Jacket, a ship chartered by U.S. authorities to take the execution party to Bedloe's Island, where Hicks was to be hanged in full view of the harbor.

The killer was taken to the ladies' cabin and there held court, conversing calmly with many reputable and famous people, who wished to talk with "the worst man in the world." Hicks seemed to enjoy it all, smiling at his visitors and acting as if he were merely on a pleasant outing.

Once on Bedloe's Island, the killer was led to a scaffold, which was promptly surrounded by 200 marines. These troops formed a hollow square around the gallows. The harbor was full of tooting vessels, thousands of spectators lining the rails. All of these gapers had paid large sums to ships' captains for the privilege of witnessing the execution. Huge ships like the Harriet Lane and the Great Eastern joined the procession of bobbing vessels. The multiple decks of the Lockwood and the Chicopee, giant side-wheelers, were crammed with people. As an act of either grim irony or strange vengeance, the E. A. Johnson, on whose decks the blood of Hicks' victims had been spilled, had been ordered drawn up close to the island. It had been freshly painted, and Hicks was placed on the scaffold so that he could not help but see the vessel.

More than 10,000 shouting persons coated the small island and the floating ships nearby. It was an unreal scene of civilized bedlam. A reporter for the New York Times stood near the scaffold, which had been purposely erected on a knoll to afford a good view of the execution. The newsman took in the cacophonous spectacle, and scribbled: "Steamboats, barges, oyster sloops, yachts and rowboats swarmed everywhere in view of the gallows. Large steamers such as carry hundreds of people away on pleasure excursions were there, so laden with a living freight of curious people, that it seemed almost a wonder that they did not sink.

"There were barges there with awnings spread, under which those who were thirsty imbibed lager beer. There were rowboats with ladies no, females of some sort in them, shielding their complexions from the sun with their parasols, while from beneath the fringe and the tassels they viewed the dying agonies of the choking murderer." The ships were decked out with colored bunting, and colored flags snapped in the wind. The incessant crowd roared: "Down in front!...Get out of the way!"

On the scaffold, Hicks turned to Rynders and was heard to utter: "This is your show, isn't it, Marshal Rynders?" The remark was thought insignificant at the time, but it was later pointed out that Rynders reaped a fortune from the circus; he had issued tickets for the execution and those thousands in attendance had unwittingly purchased these from his private agents. His own man, Hicks, would perform one last service up to the moment of his death, once again lining his former employer's pockets.

The executioner, George Isaacs, came forward and placed the rope around Hicks' neck. "Mr. Isaacs," Hicks said sternly, "hang me quick, make haste!" Isaacs stalled for more time after getting a signal from Rynders, who obviously wanted the event to drag out for the edification of the spectators.

The roar of the crowd to "Stand away in front!" became deafening, and the troops, fearing a riot, moved to one side of the square so that the view from the water was better. Hicks had had enough. He jerked his head violently in the direction of Rynders, and the marshal, displaying his only signs of nervousness, perhaps thinking his one-time bully boy was about to reveal their sinister relationship, hurriedly motioned Isaacs to get on with his work.

At the drop of an arm, Isaacs cut the rope and Hicks was hanged. A thunderous din of approval went up from the throng at that moment, and cheers went on unabated for six minutes. Then, a hush fell over the crowd as doctors Woodward and Guilmette approached the body. They determined that Hicks' third cervical vertebrae had been broken almost at once when the rope had jerked him upward. They then examined his heart. A repeated shout rippled through the crowd on land and above those gathered on the tightly-packed ships: "They found pulsations! He still lives!" And then thousands began to chant in mass hysteria: "Hang him some more...hang him some more!" The body was left to hang another twenty-eight minutes, allowing those visitors who had brought their lunch to eat in a leisurely fashion. At 11:45 a.m., Hicks' corpse was taken down and placed in a wooden box, which was carried to the tug, Only Son. The tug moved off to the dock of the customs house, while boat whistles whined and horns blared, signaling the end of the "grand" celebration.

Mrs. Hicks waited for her husband's body in vain. Rynders had purposely misinformed her as to the eventual whereabouts of the corpse. She sat alone on the wrong dock for hours, while officials quickly buried her husband in Calvary Cemetery without her knowledge. In a few days, the body of the mass killer and terror of New York disappeared altogether. Ghouls, it appeared, had dug up the corpse and made away with it. In reality, Isaiah Rynders had turned yet another profit on his dutifully silent protégé, Albert E. Hicks. Rynders had sold Hicks' body to medical students for dissection.

A HANDYMAN'S HANDIWORK/ April 25, 1866

Antoine (or Anton) Probst, a German immigrant, arrived in America during the Civil War. When learning that the Federal Army would pay enlistees to fight for the Union, Probst promptly volunteered. He had no intention, however, of serving in the front lines. Instead, he turned his loudly demonstrated patriotism into a business. He enlisted again and again for service in the Union Army, each time collecting a bounty of $300 with each enlistment.

After each enlistment, Probst would desert, thus becoming a professional "bounty jumper." By the end of the war he had spent all the money, so he first drifted about, committing petty thefts. Finally, he took a job as a handyman on the farm of Christopher Dearing outside Philadelphia. His laziness and his leering attitude toward Mrs. Dearing soon got him fired. Probst pretended illness and went to a charity hospital while he began to work out a plan for getting even with Dearing and for obtaining some money.

On March 2, 1866, Probst went back to Dearing, telling him that he had had a change of heart, that he believed that doing honest work was the best policy and he begged to have his job back. In a generous gesture, Dearing rehired Probst, and the man worked well for several weeks.

On April 25, 1866, the family left Probst at the farm while the Dearings traveled to Philadelphia to pick up a visitor. Probst began his revenge by hitting Cornelius Carey, a young farmhand, over the head with an axe. He beheaded the body and hid it in a haystack. When the Dearing family returned, he lured them into the barn, one at a time, where he systematically murdered Mrs. Dearing, four of the five children (the oldest was away on a visit), Mr. Dearing, and the visitor, Elizabeth Dolan. He arranged the bodies in a row sitting against the barn wall and covered them with hay.

Going into the house, Probst ransacked it for cash, finding a total of $13. Then he changed into some of Dearing's clothes, and, ironically living up to his new code of work ethics, dutifully fed the animals before leaving the farm. Neighbors found eight bodies a few days later. All of the victims had been killed with an ax, some of them partially dismembered, some of the body parts hidden beneath horse blankets and stacks of hay, as if the killer had decided to secret the gory remains and had then given up on the grisly chore. One report held that Probst "had too many bodies to hide and abandoned the idea of covering up the evidence."

Within five days, the police found Probst in Philadelphia. He was easily identified as wearing Dearing's clothes and some of the family's meager heirlooms were found on his person. Probst did not deny his mass murders, and merely shrugged when he was convicted and sentenced to death. He was hanged on June 8, 1866.

Handyman Antoine Probst, shown entering a barn with ax in hand before he slaughtered the entire Dearing family outside of Philadelphia in 1866.

This was not the end of Probst's story. Like his more infamous counterpart, Albert Hicks, Probst's body was much sought, not by P. T. Barnum, however, but by a host of physicians. "The doctors had a field day with his cadaver," said one account, "putting it through all kinds of tests, including one to test the theory that the retina of the eye of dying persons retains the last image seen." Probst's head and right arm were later exhibited in a New York museum of anatomy and science.

THE "BUSINESS" OF JEAN TROPPMANN/ 1869

It was rumored that the diabolical murders of Jean Kinck, his wife, and six children by the fiend, Jean-Baptiste Troppmann (1849-1870) were engineered by Otto von Bismarck, Germany's "Iron Chancellor," to undermine the government of Napolon III. Troppmann was the agent provocateur, according to one account, paid to do away with Kinck, a Prussian spy who had become an embarrassment to Bismarck. The story was dismissed out of hand when the true facts of the case came to light in late 1869.

Troppmann was born in Cernay (Haut-Rhin), west of Mulhouse. As a boy he was apprenticed to his father's manufacturing company, Troppmann and Kambly. In December 1868, the firm sold some heavy equipment to a Paris businessman and the son was sent to the city to supervise its installation. The young man made a good accounting of himself and was greatly admired for his thrift and ambition.

After the project was complete, Troppmann moved to Roubaix, where he made the acquaintance of Jean Kinck, an Alsatian businessman, who had risen from the status of common laborer to private entrepreneur and who successfully manufactured spindles and looms. The enterprising Kinck desired to resettle in Alsace, his ancestral home. He owned a house in Buhl, but had so far been unable to persuade his wife, a native of Roubaix, to agree to move. Troppmann exploited this gnawing ambition in Kinck, a man thirty years his senior. In time, the two became fast friends, discussing at length their ambitions to grow wealthy together in Alsace.

Kinck was convinced by Troppmann to map out a journey with him to Bollwiller, Alsace, where, presumably, they would set into motion their business plans. On August 24, 1869, Kinck left Roubaix, having told his wife that he would "be home between ten and eleven on the morning of September 2, 1869." He carried in his valise a number of blank checks issued by a bank in Roubaix. At the train station, Kinck was greeted by Troppmann, who escorted him to the village of Guebwiller by carriage. From there the trusting businessman fully expected to be taken to Bollwiller to meet some family members. But he was never seen again, at least by those family members who expected him for a visit.

Troppmann appeared in Cernay, about a dozen miles from Bollwiller, on August 25, 1869. He told of an important business contact he had made and of an impending transaction involving large amounts of money and bank-notes. Meanwhile, back in Roubaix, the anxious wife awaited some news of her husband. On August 27, she received a curious letter in Troppmann's handwriting.

Jean-Baptiste Troppmann, who murdered the Kinck family as part of his "business."

Kinck explained in the letter that he had met with an accident and was unable to hold a pen, but his young friend Troppmann was taking down his instructions. Hortense Kinck was directed to cash an enclosed check in the amount of 5,500 francs and remit the cash to her husband in Alsace. The money arrived at Guebwiller on the thirty-first, and, using Kinck's identification papers, Troppmann attempted to claim the money. A suspicious postmaster, however, refused to turn it over.

Troppmann devised a new strategy. He returned to Roubaix and presented a letter to Hortense Kinck, allegedly dictated to him by her husband, which read: "You must all of you come to Paris for two or three days. Don't fear the expense as Troppmann has given me a half a million. I insist on your coming. You, Gustave, must go at once to Guebwiller to draw out the money." The next day, Hortense Kinck received power of attorney and 500 francs as promised in the letter. The check, however, was in Troppmann's handwriting. The wife barely concealed her uneasiness about her husband's continuing disability, which prevented him from writing in his own hand, but she trusted Troppmann and followed his instructions to the letter.

Troppmann insisted that the family join him at the Hotel du Chemin de Fer du Nord in Paris, and to bring money. Troppmann's parents received several dispatches from their son. which alluded to a fabulous business transaction that was to make them all rich for the rest of their days. Puzzled, they simply waited. On September 17, 1869, Gustave Kinck met Troppmann at the railway station in Paris.

Two days later Hortense Kinck and her five children left Roubaix. Mrs. Kinck still had apprehensions, which she hoped would be diminished once she and her children were reunited with Jean Kinck. When Troppmann made his rendezvous with the Kinck family members, he told them that they must go with him by carriage to Pantin. He directed the driver to continue past several farms and fields to a secluded spot off the main road.

When the cab stopped, Troppmann, Madame Kinck, and the two youngest children made their way down a winding path toward a dark and silent building that stood nearby. The other three youngsters remained behind, talking with the driver. Half an hour later, and under the cover of darkness, Troppmann returned alone. "We have decided to stay the night here, children," he said. Thinking nothing more of it, the cabman received his fare and drove off. The following Monday morning, Troppmann returned to Paris to change into clean clothing in preparation for his journey to Le Havre, where he planned to set sail for America. His bloodstained clothes were carelessly left behind in the hotel. This mistake was to cost Troppmann his life.

The bodies of Hortense Kinck and her five children, Emile, Henri, Alfred, Achille, and Marie, were unearthed on September 20, 1869, by a farmer named Langlois, who reported his gruesome discovery to the police. Each of the victims had been bludgeoned over the head and there was evidence that the younger ones had been buried alive. The identity of Hortense Kinck and her children was quickly established by clothing labels.

In Le Havre the police quickly became suspicious of a young man shopping for immigration papers. The suspect was arrested and taken into custody after registering at two different hotels on successive nights. The man claimed to speak only German, but he was overheard conversing in French.

Placed under intense questioning, Troppmann said he was merely an accessory. Jean Kinck and his son Gustave had plotted the murders of Hortense and the five children. On September 26, 1869, a seventh body was pulled out of the Langlois field, that of Gustave Kinck who had been stabbed through the throat. When shown the grisly remains, Troppmann became indignant, saying: "The swine! He has now killed his remaining son." The police continued to interrogate Troppmann until he confessed his mass killings.

"I murdered the father," Troppmann admitted, "to get possession of the money, which he said he had in the bank and which would have been paid out to his order. That order I proposed to forge by copying his signature. Having murdered him, it was almost a matter of necessity to me to kill all the rest of the family, since they all knew that Kinck had gone with me to my home."

Jean Kinck (center foreground), with his wife and eldest son, all murdered by Jean-Baptiste Troppmann in 1869.

On November 25, 1869, what was left of Jean Kinck was found in a wooded glade outside the castle of Herinfluch, north of Cernay. Troppmann explained that he had poisoned Kinck in Alsace using prussic acid poured into a wine flask.

Following the discovery of the eighth and final body, an indictment charging Troppmann with theft, fraud, and murder was returned by the courts. The trial commenced at the Assize of the Seine on December 28, 1869. The gallery was packed with spectators from all strata of French society including politicians, artisans, and nobles. It was in many respects the gala social event of the year as people haggled for scarce tickets.

Troppmann was represented by the notable attorney Charles-Alexandre Lachaud, who attempted to portray his client as a weak, innocent knave who suffered from a diseased mind. Lachaud was a highly respected lawyer who had earned the admiration of leading political figures in the government. But the task before him proved too great.

For his part, Troppmann persisted in his assertion that he had accomplices, which gave rise to the theory that Prussian agents were behind the murders. Invasion of France was imminent, some said. Left-wing sympathizers accused the emperor of paying Troppmann to murder the Kinck family to divert public attention away from the sagging fortunes of the Second Empire. Both theories were nothing more than baseless conjecture.

Jean-Baptiste Troppmann was found guilty and executed at the Place de la Roquette on the morning of January 19,

1870, amidst solemn fanfare. The event was witnessed by scores of celebrities including the Russian writer Ivan Turgenev, who later wrote about Troppmann in one of his novels. Observing the curious solemnity of the day, Turgenev quoted a remark made by one of his friends: "It seemed to me as though we were in 1794 instead of 1870, as though we were not ordinary citizens escorting to the scaffold a common assassin, but Jacobins hurrying to his execution a [nobleman]."

"YOU'RE GOING TO HELL, BOY"/ November 10, 1904

On May 26, 1904, Adolph Weber (1884-1906), robbed the Bank of Placer County in Auburn, California. Dropping his gun during the robbery, 20-year-old Weber absconded with $5,000 and buried a five-pound can filled with $20 gold pieces in the back yard of his family's home. As evidence began to mount against Adolph, his father, Julius Weber, a wealthy, retired brewer, secured an out-of-court agreement to prevent the young man's prosecution.

In July 1904, the young Weber bought another pistol in a San Francisco pawn shop on Dupont Street from the shop owner, Henry Carr. The owner noted that Weber was accompanied by another youth, who purchased brass knuckles and a blackjack. Such items were openly sold in San Francisco and other towns, where a variety of weapons were ostensibly used for self-defense.

On November 10, 1904, the Weber home was consumed by fire. While the blaze continued, Adolph Weber suddenly appeared at a store in Auburn, where he purchased a new pair of trousers from a storeowner named Cohen. Weber quickly changed his trousers in the back room of the store and wrapped up the old ones, running from the store and back to his burning home. Here he was seen to break a window with his hand, throwing his old trousers into the flames. In breaking the window, Weber cut his hand so severely that he fainted from loss of blood and was taken to the home of Adrian Wills, where he was doctored and spent the night.

At the time of the fire, a neighbor broke down the door of the burning Weber home. He entered a room that had not been consumed by flames and here he found the bodies of Mrs. Weber and 18-year-old Bertha Weber. Both had been shot to death, their corpses apparently dragged into the room, where the killer had attempted to set fire to their clothes. Following the fire, the bodies of Julius Weber and Adolph's invalid brother Earl, who was 8-years-old, were also found. Earl Weber, officials discovered, had been beaten to death. Julius Weber, like his wife and daughter, had been shot to death.

While investigators were rummaging through the smoldering remains of the Weber house, Adolph Weber took up residence with his great aunt, a Mrs. Snowden. She questioned him about his miraculous survival from the burning building and getting no answers, suspiciously said: "I believe you know a great deal about what happened there."

Weber grew angry and snapped: "Your turn will come next!"

Mrs. Snowden reported this remark to the police, who, by then, had concluded that Weber was behind the fire. He was arrested and a coroner's inquest was held on November 12, 1904. At that time, part of Weber's old trousers had been retrieved from the ashes of the house and they proved to have bloodstains on them. Some days later, a .32-caliber pistol was found under the flooring of the barn at the rear of the Weber home. It was identified by San Francisco pawnbroker Henry Carr as the weapon he had sold to Weber five months earlier.

Adolph Weber, who murdered his entire family in Auburn, California, in 1904.

All the bullets had been fired from the pistol's chambers and on the handle was found clots of blood and some of Earl Weber's hair. On November 23, 1904, officers digging in the Weber yard found a large lard can containing $20 gold pieces, the proceeds from the bank robbery committed in Auburn. To four charges of murder, a charge of robbery was lodged against Adolph Weber.

Weber was brought to trial for murdering his mother on February 6, 1905. He was convicted on February 22, the jury recommending death. Throughout the trial, Weber said little and his attorneys found no evidence to establish his innocence. He was sentenced to death, but his attorneys filed several appeals and even obtained a stay of execution, while an insanity hearing was conducted. Determined to be sane, Weber was hanged on September 22, 1906. He went to the scaffold with the same stoic attitude he had displayed throughout his trial and imprisonment.

Before he was executed, an official visited Weber in his cell, confronting the young man with his crimes, and seeking a full confession. "Your family learned of your bank robbery, did they not?" asked the official.

Weber said nothing.

"You believed that they might later tell authorities about the robbery, did you not?"

Weber said nothing.

"To silence them and to also gain the family inheritance, which was substantial, you killed them, did you not?"

Again, Weber refused to answer, but the official thought he detected a thin smile on the youth's face.

"You murdered four people—your own family. You're going to hell, boy," the official announced and left the cell.

It was never learned from the tight-lipped Adolph Weber whether or not he had any concept of such a destination.

"HE FOUGHT LIKE A MAD WOLF"/ November 24, 1932

Explaining that he "felt funny in the head" at the time, Julian Marcelino (b. 1902) of Seattle decided to kill everyone in sight. Armed with a pair of crudely fashioned knives, the 30-year-old Filipino entered the Midway Hotel on November 24, 1932, which was centered in a skid row area. Marcelino was in a rage. He proceeded to the room of Pito Gualto, whom he had accused of stealing $300. Without warning, he stabbed Gualto in the heart and then wounded his nephew, Christolo Bayson.

Julian Marcelino (standing right), who killed six people and wounded thirteen others in a murder rampage on the streets of Seattle, Washington in 1932; Marcelino is shown in a cell with five other murderers who are enjoying a game of cards.

"I was sitting in my room with my uncle when Marcelino came in," Bayson said. "They had been quarreling this morning about what I don't know...Marcelino said nothing. But he had that funny look. All of a sudden he pulled out his knife and stabbed my uncle."

Marcelino fled the hotel, running haywire down the crowded skid row streets. He stabbed grocer W. J. Morris on the sidewalk, and also an astonished bystander, who failed to get out of the way in time. He assaulted four more men, throwing the street into confusion as people scurried for cover.

The Seattle police arrived on the scene just as Marcelino was about to kill a Japanese man identified as L. Kitamura. Officer Gordon Jensen, driving home from a football game, helped subdue Marcelino.

"He fought like a mad wolf," Jensen recounted. "He had more than human strength." The seven-inch razor Marcelino used had been manufactured in the Philippines and was known to the local residents as a bolo. Sixth Avenue and Jackson Street resembled a combat zone as ambulances rushed fifteen people to nearby hospitals. The six murder victims were taken to the county morgue.

Julian Marcelino was led under heavy guard to the King County Jail. He was declared sane and tried for first-degree murder. Sentenced to life imprisonment, he entered Washington State Penitentiary on April 22, 1933. Three years later, on March 11, 1936, he was transferred to the Eastern State Hospital after examining psychiatrists declared him insane. Sixteen days later he was granted a conditional parole and deported to the Philippines.

It was later reported that Marcelino found work in Manila, and later joined the Philippine Scouts, an army unit that fought against invading Japanese during World War II. Marcelino survived the Bataan Death March in April 1942, escaping to the hills and, as a guerrilla, constantly attacked occupying Japanese forces. He was credited with killing scores of his nation's enemies. Following the war and the establishment of Philippine independence, Marcelino vanished.

THE KANSAS CITY MASSACRE/ June 17, 1933

Police photos of bank robber Frank "Jelly" Nash, who was in federal custody, when the Kansas City machine gunners attempted to free him at Union Station on June 17, 1933.

American gangsters had been slaughtering each other for more than a century in an effort to dominate the lucrative rackets of big cities, the most infamous of these bloodlettings being the 1929 St. Valentine's Day Massacre in Chicago, perpetrated by members of the Capone gang (see chapter on Gangs, Gangsters and Organized Crime). Found in the folklore of the Mafia is another broad-based underworld bloodletting, euphemistically called "the night of the Sicilian Vespers," when, on September 10, 1931, more than forty old-time Mafia leaders were summarily executed in several U.S. cities, including boss of bosses, Salvatore Maranzano, who had waged a prolonged underworld war in New York with Joe "The Boss" Masseria.

Killed in these mass murders were Maranzano stalwarts—called "Mustache Petes" by the young gangsters who sought to replace their authority—Samuel Monaco, Louis Russo and James Marino. The perpetrators of this slaughter included Charles "Lucky" Luciano, Albert Anastasia, Meyer Lansky, Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel, Thomas Lucchese, Joe Adonis and other young turks, who quickly established the new U.S. crime syndicate over the bones of these old-time Mafia chiefs.

The Kansas City Massacre four years later is not to be confused with such organized crime slayings. The bloody slaughter occurring in Kansas City was at the hands of independent gunmen belonging to a loose federation of bank robbing gangs that plagued the Midwest in the early 1930s. This massacre was not inflicted by gangsters upon a rival gang, but on a bevy of lawmen attempting to take to prison one of the most notorious independent bank robbers of that era, Frank Nash, an exploit that mirrored the actions of Old West outlaws like Jesse James and the Dalton Brothers.

The plan to free Frank Nash from federal custody was impetuously hatched in Hot Springs, Arkansas, which was one of the "safe" cities for independent outlaws in the U.S. during the early 1930s. There high-rolling and much-wanted independent bank robbers, kidnappers, and members of organized crime moved about unmolested by local authorities. This pleasant southern city was one of many U.S. cities, including St. Paul, Minnesota, and Kansas City, Missouri, which catered to the needs and desires of American public enemies.

The politicians and police departments of these cities, for the most part, were heavily bribed by these outlaws. One of these, the notorious Frank "Jelly" Nash, had been robbing banks and trains since the days of Al Spencer. Spencer dated Frank Nash's wife Frances, who asked underworld contacts to free her husband from custody, a decision that proved fatal to her errant spouse.

Gambler Dick Galatas, shown in custody with a female associate, got the "high sign" from Nash, when the bank robber was arrested by FBI men in Hot Springs, Arkansas; Galatas alerted underworld contacts to put in motion a bold plan to free Nash from his captors.

Kansas City's Boss Tom Pendergast (left), with his hand-picked city manager, Henry F. McElroy; through these two men, Galatas made contact with Kansas City underworld boss Johnny Lazia, who, in turn, hired the gunmen to attack lawmen in an effort to free Frank Nash.

back to the turn of the century and had ridden on horseback with western outlaw Henry Starr. After Spencer was killed, his gang was captured, including Nash, Grover Durrell, Earl Thayer, and George Curtis. All four were tried and, on March 1, 1924, were given twenty-five-year sentences for train robbery and sent to the federal penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kansas.

Nash had escaped from Leavenworth in 1930 and, for more than three years, had robbed banks throughout the Midwest with Harvey Bailey, George "Machine Gun" Kelly, the Holden-Keating gang, and the Barker brothers. His underworld contacts were deep and wide and he had taken refuge in Hot Springs, Arkansas, when FBI agents began tracking him.

Ralph Colvin, FBI agent-in-charge of the office in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, received a phone call from Hot Springs on June 15, 1933. An informant told Colvin that Nash was hanging about the White Front, a gambling den in Hot Springs run by Dick Galatas. Agents Joseph Lackey and Frank Smith were immediately sent to Hot Springs to arrest Nash. First, these two agents went to McAlester, Oklahoma, to see Police Chief Otto Reed, who had known Nash for decades and could recognize him on sight. They convinced Reed to accompany them to Hot Springs so he could identify the fugitive.

The FBI agents had another reason for having Chief Reed with them. By current law, all local arrests had to be made by local police before the FBI could assume jurisdiction. The police in Hot Springs, Lackey and Smith knew, were wholly corrupt. They could not trust Hot Springs chief of police Joseph Wakelin or chief of detectives Dutch Akers, whom they rightly believed were receiving bribes from Nash and others to protect, not arrest them.

On June 16, 1933, Lackey, Smith, and Reed drove to Central Avenue and parked across the street from the White Front Poolroom. At 11 a.m., a car came to a stop in front of the place and a man got out whom Reed believed to be Nash. "I'm not so sure," Smith said, squinting at the man, who sauntered into the White Front. "That guy has a mustache, is wearing glasses and has a full head of hair. Nash is bald."

Reed, however was positive. He and the agents went into the White Front. There was a bar area and a door to the back room, where the gambling hall was located. A bartender eyed the trio as they entered. One of the agents noticed a shotgun in a rack behind the bar. Although Prohibition was still enforced, customers could buy 3.2 beer in this bar. The three lawmen moved toward the back room door just as Frank Nash stepped through it holding a bottle of beer in his hands.

The two FBI agents grabbed Nash's arms as Chief Reed jammed a revolver in his back. "Come along, Nash," Agent Lackey said. Neither of the agents were armed. FBI men were not yet authorized to carry firearms and invariably relied on local lawmen to provide the necessary firepower when making arrests. The lawmen hustled Nash outside and into their car. Without returning to their hotel rooms to retrieve their luggage or contacting the Hot Springs police, they immediately headed out of the state, driving at high speeds.

Gambler Dick Galatas arrived at the White Front only minutes after Nash was taken and called Dutch Akers, chief of detectives in Hot Springs, to ask what he knew. Akers told Galatas that he did not even know FBI agents had been in town, but he put out an alert for the car in which the agents and Nash had been seen, a Buick sedan with California license plates.

At that time, Nash and his captors were heading for Little Rock, Arkansas. Outside that town, a local sheriff, alerted by Akers, set up a roadblock. The Buick came in sight and the sheriff's posse leveled shotguns and rifles at the agents and Nash and ordered them to produce identification. They complied, but the sheriff gave them a hard time before letting them go. It appeared that the sheriff and his men were purposely delaying the FBI agents and Chief Reed from getting to their destination, Kansas City, Missouri.

Meanwhile, Dick Galatas was informed that the lawmen were taking Nash to Joplin, Missouri. He hired a plane and flew there with Nash's common-law wife, Frances Nichols Luce. In Joplin, Galatas contacted Herbert "Deafy" Farmer, who had served time with Nash in the Oklahoma State Prison in the early 1920s. Farmer was part of the underworld network used by the independent bank robbers of the day. He, in turn, tried to find the route the agents were taking back to Kansas City. Farmer knew that once Nash reached Kansas City, the gangster would be hustled back to Leavenworth. A hasty plan was put in motion to free Nash from the agents, regardless of cost. Nash had substantial sums from recent bank robberies and also had high-level contacts in Kansas City. He would gladly pay any price for his freedom, it was concluded. If he went behind bars again, Nash had repeatedly said to his associates, and at his present age of forty-five, he feared he would never come out.

On the afternoon of June 16, 1933, the FBI agents and Chief Reed, with Nash in tow, reached Fort Smith, Arkansas. It was 285 miles to Kansas City and after numerous stops by many local sheriffs and constables, at which times their papers were checked and rechecked by suspicious and uncooperative Arkansas police, the lawmen came to believe that they might never get out of the state alive. At least, that is what Frank Nash told them.

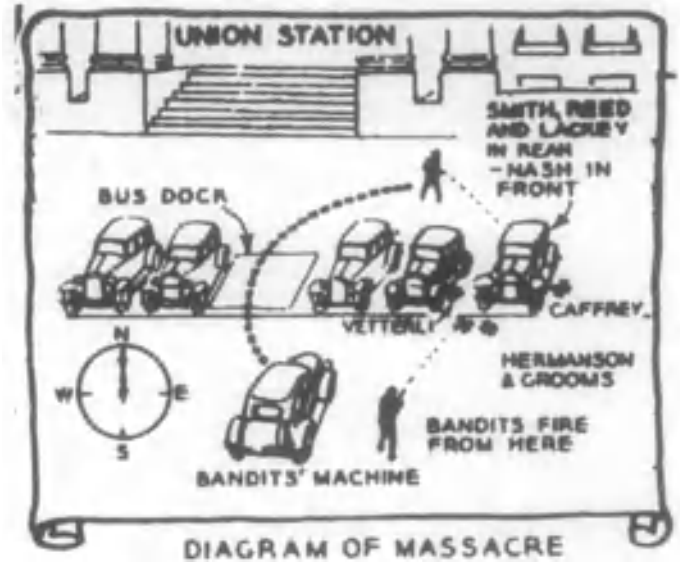
Nash also added cryptically that he himself might not survive the trip, a remark that later caused some to conclude that his underworld friends were really hunting him for some arcane reason. He had been wearing a red wig when arrested apparently to disguise himself from police as well as others. When the lawmen inside of the car removed Nash's red wig, he carped: "Hey, take it easy with that hairpiece. It cost me a couple of hundred bucks." The agents laughed and gave it back to him and Nash repositioned it on his head.

When the agents reached Fort Smith, Lackey called Ralph Colvin and told him they were having trouble getting Nash out of Arkansas. Colvin instructed Lackey to take Nash on to Kansas City by train, where he would arrange to have FBI agents there meet the train and escort Nash to Leavenworth. Colvin then called Reed E. Vetterli, the FBI agent in charge of Kansas City, and told him that Lackey, Smith, and Reed would be arriving at Union Station in Kansas City on the Union Pacific train at 7:15 a.m. Colvin instructed Vetterli to meet the agents when they arrived. Vetterli, in turn, called the Kansas City Police Department and informed them of Nash's arrival, requesting local officers to join him and others when they met the Nash party.

Former sheriff Vernon C. Miller, who led the attack on the lawmen at Kansas City's Union Station; he was later murdered by underworld killers.

When Agent Vetterli made that call to the Kansas City Police Department, he inadvertently informed the underworld exactly when and where gangster Frank Nash would be on Saturday morning, June 17, 1933. The KCPD was then in the grip of the corrupt Pendergast machine, a political organization that had controlled Missouri for decades. Boss Tom Pendergast ran the state, especially Kansas City, and his imperial edicts were carried out by the local politicians under the direction of Pendergast's minion, city manager Henry McElroy. Moreover, Pendergast's underworld lieutenant, Johnny Lazia, ran all the rackets in Kansas City, splitting the enormous profits from gambling, prostitution, and bootlegging with Pendergast, after enormous monthly payments had been made to Kansas City politicians and to the city's crooked police force.

Lazia, on the evening of June 16, 1933, received a call from his contact in the KCPD, telling him that Nash would arrive on the 7:15 train the next morning. He, in turn, called



A contemporary sketch shows how the gunmen attacked the lawmen at Union Station.

The carnage following the machinegun attack at Union Station; detectives Grooms and Hermanson lie dead between the cars.

Vern Miller, a local independent bank robber and strong-arm man. Miller had already been contacted by Dick Galatas and Herb Farmer and was looking for Nash and his FBI escort. (Miller was not and never had been connected to the Capone gang, as later alleged in books and in an outlandishly fabricated film about him.)

Miller and Lazia met in a restaurant that night and Lazia assigned two of his best killers, brothers Homer and Maurice Denning, to help Miller free Nash. He also assured Miller that he would have no trouble from the local police. Only two detectives, W.J. "Red" Grooms and Frank Hermanson from the burglary squad, would be sent to meet the Nash party when they got off the train. They would not give Miller and the Denning brothers any problems, Lazia assured Miller. There would be no other police officers or detectives present at the station, Lazia said. The only difficulty might come from the FBI agents, but Lazia pointed out with a wicked smile that these men could offer no real resistance since none of them, by law, were armed.

Bright and early the following morning, Kansas City detectives Hermanson and Grooms appeared at Union Station, driving an armored car in which Nash was to be taken to Leavenworth. Both detectives noticed that all the automatic weapons in the armor-plated car had been removed, leaving the detectives with only their two police revolvers. They got out of the car and met the unarmed FBI agents, Vetterli and Raymond Caffrey. Earlier, Vetterli had mentioned to Caffrey that he had not seen one uniformed policeman in or around the station. When Vetterli checked with the station master, he learned that the Union Pacific train would be on time. The officers had about twenty minutes to wait.

At that moment, a car drove into the station parking lot and came to a stop facing a row of cars and beyond them, the station. At the wheel of the car was Mary McElroy, the impetuous daughter of City Manager Henry McElroy. She had a penchant for gangsters and took her thrills from the exploits of underworld characters such as the slick Johnny Lazia, who worked indirectly for her father and Boss Pendergast.

McElroy had asked bank robber James Henry "Blackie" Audett (who later became an associate of the notorious John Dillinger) to accompany her to the station that morning, telling him that "all hell is going to break loose." Somehow, she had heard that Frank Nash was going to be freed by gunmen planning to attack federal agents accompanying Nash on the 7:15 a.m. train. The two sat in the car like spectators awaiting a circus parade.

Union Station was crowded that Saturday morning. Cars filled the lot, depositing people who were either departing on the Union Pacific train or meeting persons arriving on it. A Chevrolet sedan pulled into a parking spot a short distance from where McElroy sat with Audett. It parked so that it faced a two-door sedan parked there earlier by agents Raymond Caffrey and Reed Vetterli.

Three men sat in the Chevrolet, the heavily armed gunmen Vern Miller and Homer and Maurice Denning. They did not get out of the car. How these men identified Caffrey's car and knew where it would be parked that morning remains a mystery. It was later speculated that police officials had identified the car for the gangsters so they would know exactly where to wait for Nash and his escorts.

Vetterli, Caffrey, Grooms, and Hermanson were waiting at Track Twelve for the train to pull in when Vern Miller got out of the Chevrolet and went into the station, peering about. He walked to the Travelers Aid counter and started to say something to Mrs. Lottie West, then stopped and nervously walked into the crowds. On the train, a conductor knocked on a Pullman drawing room door and told Agent Lackey that the train was about to reach Kansas City.

Knowing the agents' purpose for being on the train, the conductor told Lackey that he would let the lawmen and their prisoner off first. Lackey, Smith, and Chief Reed, with Nash between them, walked down the train aisle, and as the train came to a halt, stepped down onto the station platform. Vetterli, Caffrey, and the two Kansas City detectives met them, and the party of eight began walking through the station toward the parking lot. Frank Nash was surrounded by the seven lawmen, his hands manacled in front of him.

In the plaza parking lot, the group walked to Ray Caffrey's two-door sedan. Lackey, Reed, and Smith got into the back seat of the car. Nash was placed in the front seat, told to sit in the middle. Before the rest of the officers could climb into the car, Miller and the Denning brothers alighted from the Chevrolet facing Caffrey's car. They all held Thompson submachine guns and Miller shouted to the lawmen: "Up! Up! Get 'em up!"

The four lawmen outside the car, Vetterli, Caffrey, Hermanson, and Grooms, stood motionless for some seconds, their eyes riveted on the three gunmen slowly approaching them, guns aimed directly at them. Then Red Grooms' hand instinctively reached into his coat pocket and he withdrew his police revolver. He fired two shots, and although one appeared to hit a heavyset gunman in the arm, the gunman showed no signs of being wounded.

"No! No!" Frank Nash shouted from inside the car.

Vern Miller made a split-second decision. "Let 'em have it!" he shouted to the other two gunmen. "Let the bastards have it!"

Three submachine guns sent a torrent of bullets into Caffrey's car and sprayed the group of officers inside and outside the car. As Homer Denning stood in front of the Chevrolet, Miller and Maurice Denning ran around behind the Caffrey car, continuing to fire at it so that it was caught in a cross fire. People in the parking lot screamed and ran in all directions as the one-sided battle continued. Police Chief Reed was struck several times in the chest, slumping dead against the rear seat of the car. Smith and Lackey were both struck several times by bullets. Lackey managed to get Reed's weapon and tried to fire at the machine gunners from the smashed window of the car, but bullets tore the gun out of his hand.

Outside the car, all the lawmen were down. Vetterli was hit in the arm, Caffrey was shot in the head and was dying. Detectives Hermanson and Grooms received the full force of the opening barrage of submachine gun bullets, which had knocked them over on their backs, one on top of the other. Both were dead. Frank Nash, when the firing began, crouched on the front seat. He now sat up, waving his manacled hands above his head, shouting at the machine gunners: "Don't shoot me! My God! Don't shoot me!" But he was ignored and a stream of bullets crashed through the window of the car, blowing a hole in it and killing Nash instantly.

Frank Nash, dead behind the wheel of one of the cars parked at Union Station, killed by the very men who were assigned to free him from the clutches of the law.

Suddenly, a patrolman, Mike Fanning, arrived in the lot to investigate the awful racket. Mrs. West, who had run from her counter at the sound of the firing, spotted the patrolman's familiar face and she shouted to him: "They're killing everybody!" She pointed to Maurice Denning, who was spraying the ground around the fallen bodies of the lawmen, and she screamed: "Shoot the fat man, Mike! Shoot the fat man!"

Fanning pulled his revolver and fired several shots at Denning. After dropping to the ground, Denning jumped up, fired another burst of bullets into Caffrey's car, and then raced to a waiting Oldsmobile and escaped. Miller and Homer Denning got into the Chevrolet and it roared away and disappeared. Fanning ran to Caffrey's car. "It was a shambles," he later reported. "In the front seat a man was dead under the steering wheel [Nash]. On the left rear seat was another dead man [Chief Reed]. On the right was an unconscious man, but he was groaning [Smith]. A third man lay face down on the floor [Lackey]. I could see that he was alive."

Holding his wounded arm, Special Agent Reed Vetterli managed to get to his feet. He slipped on the pavement, which FBI agent Raymond Caffrey, killed.

Detective W. J. Grooms, killed.

Police Chief Otto Reed, killed.

was running with blood. Five men were dead, FBI agent Raymond Caffrey, police chief Otto Reed, detectives Red Grooms and Frank Hermanson, and Frank Nash, the very man the attackers had intended to free during their bloody machine gun raid. Nash was not wearing the red-haired wig when found behind the wheel of the car. One witness said he saw Nash take the wig off and wave it in front of the machine gunners so that he could be properly identified. Now the officers came to believe the killers intended to murder Nash; that the raid was not intended to free Nash, but to ensure his silence about the Lazia operations in Kansas City and his underworld contacts in the Midwest.

Nash had been suspected of being an informant because he had "magically" escaped from the Old Mission Golf Course a year earlier, when FBI agents had captured bank robbers Harvey Bailey, Thomas Holden, and Francis Keating. One minute Nash had been teeing off with this trio and the next, when agents closed in to arrest the three gangsters, Nash was gone. Had he set up Bailey, Holden, and Keating for the arrest so that he would be allowed to flee? Was the Kansas City Massacre really designed to silence a dangerous informer? These questions were never really answered.

The identities of the killers were not known for some time. Miller was the only machine gunner, who was quickly identified. Mrs. West and others, with questionable coaching from FBI agents, tentatively identified bank robber Charles Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd and his sidekick, Adam Richetti, as the other two machine gunners, but these two outlaws were elsewhere at the time of the Kansas City Massacre.

Even though Floyd insisted, in his dying statement when being apprehended by FBI agent Melvin Purvis in 1934, that he was "not in on" the Massacre, he is to this day considered one of the killers by the Bureau. Adam Richetti, who was later executed for this crime, insisted that he was innocent to the moment of his death.

James Henry "Blackie" Audett, who watched the awful carnage that day, and clearly saw the killers, insisted decades later in interviews with the author that the true killers were Miller and the Denning brothers. He also implicated William Weissman, brother of notorious Kansas City killer and Lazia henchman, Solly Weissman. "Floyd was nowhere near that station that day," Audett told the author. "The FBI had to solve the case fast because one of their own men got killed so they pinned it on two guys, who were already wanted and widely known. They ran down Floyd and killed him over it and then they burned poor little Adam Richetti for the same crime and he wasn't there either. I know. I sat in that parking lot with Mary McElroy and saw the whole thing from less than fifty yards away."

Following the shooting, the wounded agents Caffrey and Lackey were taken to the Research Hospital. Caffrey, who was pronounced dead on arrival, left behind a young wife and a 6-year-old son, Jimmy Caffrey. Lackey recovered slowly from a near-fatal wound. A bullet lodged in his spine kept him confined for some time. When Agent Smith regained consciousness in a hospital bed and was told that his close friend, Chief Otto Reed, had died, tears came into his eyes. "I asked him to come with us," Smith said.

"You can't blame yourself, Frank," he was told by FBI agent Monte Spear, who had been called from the FBI office following the massacre to look after the wounded agents. Agent Smith was inconsolable regarding Chief Reed's death. "I took him to his death," he said. "I took him from his family."

Some hours later Vern Miller called Herb Farmer in Joplin, Missouri. He asked to talk to Frances Nash, but she would not come to the phone. She had already heard how the machine gunners had botched the escape attempt of her husband and blamed Miller for killing Nash. About the same time, J. Edgar Hoover, after hearing the news that his unarmed agents had been slaughtered in Kansas City, called Mrs. Regina Caffrey to offer her his condolences over the loss of her husband. "I promise you that these fiends, whoever they are, will be caught and punished," Hoover told Mrs. Caffrey. "The Bureau will never cease its relentless search until they are caught." Hoover then ordered agents from Texas and Oklahoma to go to Kansas City to help in the investigation. He told his field agents that catching those responsible for the Massacre was their top priority.

Eugene C. Reppert, police director of Kansas City, announced that the men responsible for the Kansas City Massacre would never get out of his city. "A net of guns and steel has been placed around the city. We expect to have them in our custody at any hour now. They simply cannot get out of Kansas City."

The Denning brothers had no intention of leaving Kansas City. They returned to their apartments and went to sleep. Vern Miller, however, believed he might be identified at any moment. He made plans to leave town, ordering the furniture in his bungalow stored with a friend and telling his mistress, Vivian Mathias, only an hour after the shooting when he arrived home in a sweat: "Things went wrong this morning. We're getting out of here." That night, Miller met with Johnny Lazia and his top henchman, James LaCapra later suspected of murdering Lazia in a grab for the crime boss' empire.

Ironically, Lazia and LaCapra were having dinner at the Fred Harvey restaurant in Union Station. This is where Miller met them, eating a sandwich and drinking coffee only a few hundred feet from the spot where, in the morning of the same day, he had stood with a blazing machine gun in his hands, shooting down officers of the law. Miller was told by Lazia to get out of town. Lazia said he would make sure that the Denning brothers also went into hiding somewhere. (Both Maurice and Homer Denning remained undetected for this crime for decades to come, continuing to work with the successive crime bosses of Kansas City and dying comfortably of natural causes, Maurice in the early 1950s, Homer Denning in the late 1970s.)

That night, after conferring with police director Reppert and Chief of Detectives Thomas J. Higgins, City Manager Henry McElroy held an amazing press conference in which he stated: "It has been definitely established that no Kansas City gangster had anything to do with the shooting at the Union Station this morning." It was as if McElroy was saying that the gangsters in Kansas City would never stoop to such bloody slaughter and even the astounding admission of the existence of these powerful criminals went unchallenged. The newspapers throughout the country headlined the grim story.

The event's only rival was the 1929 St. Valentine's Day Massacre in Chicago in which a death squad, at Al Capone's order, shot down seven rival gunmen inside a garage. The Kansas City Massacre seemed worse because the killings were committed on a beautiful Saturday morning in June, in the open, with hundreds of innocent people about. It was the most flagrant act of criminal violence on record and it shocked the nation.

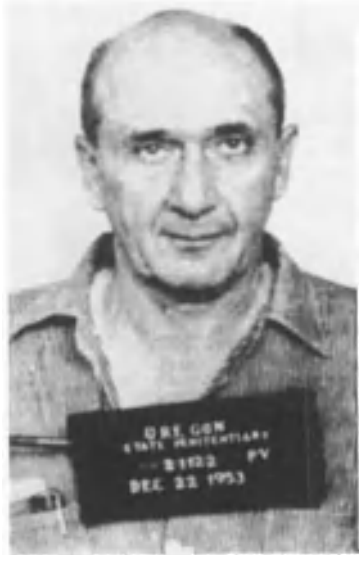
In Washington, FBI director Hoover used the mass murders to convince Congress to give his agents the right to bear arms and make their own federal arrests without the interference of local police departments which might have ties to the underworld. The Kansas City Massacre was finally responsible for accomplishing those purposes for Hoover and the FBI.

Meanwhile, Vern Miller and Vivian Mathias went to Chicago and took an apartment and waited. James "Fur" Sammons, Capone mobster and fur thief, wanted for fur robberies in Philadelphia and Baltimore, was picked up and charged with being part of the Kansas City Massacre. He emphatically proclaimed his innocence. Sammons was later convicted of a different crime and sent to prison. When Frances Nash was picked up, she implicated Galatas and Farmer, who were tracked down and arrested and charged with complicity. Both would later be given long prison terms. These men knew only that Vern Miller had been involved in the mass slayings.

Bank robber Charles Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd, who was named by the FBI as one of the machinegun killers at the Union Station, but he was reportedly not in Kansas City at that time.

Adam Richetti, Floyd's bank robbing sidekick, shown in custody; he was later convicted as one of the Kansas City killers and executed, although he insisted to the last that he was innocent of that crime.

Miller himself was finally named as a wanted federal fugitive. He fled to New York, where he sought work from crime syndicate boss Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, but he was turned down for being too reckless. In New Jersey, Miller was taken in briefly by that state's mob boss, Abner "Longy" Zwillman. He began drinking heavily, however, and killed one of Zwillman's gunmen in an argument. He fled back to the Midwest, first going to St. Paul, Minnesota, another "safe" underworld city. But mob bosses Harry Sawyer and Jack Peifer ordered Miller to leave town. "There's federal heat everywhere because of what you pulled in K.C.," Sawyer told him.



James Henry "Blackie" Audett, who was paroled to the author in June 1979, and who stated that he witnessed the mass murders at Union Station; Audett told the author that Vern Miller and the Denning brothers were the killers, not Floyd and Richetti.

After deserting Vivian Mathias, Miller went to Detroit and vanished. Vivian Mathias was tracked down some days later in Brainerd, Minnesota. She was charged with harboring a fugitive, and was convicted. Vivian Mathias was given a year and a day in prison and was sent to the federal detention farm in Milan, Michigan. She was, however, steadfastly loyal to Miller, refusing to tell FBI agents where he had gone to ground. He was, at the time, hiding in Detroit, protected by members of the old Purple Gang.

Miller had been a member of the Purples years earlier before moving to Kansas City. He was given a cheap room in a sleazy hotel and ordered not to go into the streets. Sometime during the night of November 28, 1933, Miller received a visit from two East Coast gangsters, members of Zwillman's New Jersey mob. They exacted a terrible revenge for Miller's killing of their fellow gang member.

The next morning, Vern Miller's naked body was found wrapped in a moth-eaten blanket in a ditch beneath a railroad embankment outside Detroit. The body of the once slick, bold gunman had been riddled with bullets. It also bore dozens of holes from an ice pick, along with scores of cigarette burns. Parts of Miller's body had also been mutilated. He had obviously been tortured for some time before his murderers tired of the gruesome game and shot him to death.

NIGHT OF THE LONG KNIVES/ June 30, 1934

Where the mass murders in 1933 Kansas City was a botched attempt to free a fellow outlaw by independent gunmen, the wholesale slaughter of Brownshirts in Germany the following year was strictly a ruthless political move on the part of a mesmerizing madman, Adolf Hitler. But like the Kansas City killings, where the murderers slew one of their own, Hitler ordered the killing of one of his closest associates, Ernst Roehm (Rohm, 1887-1934), head of the SA, along with that powerful organization's top leaders.

These mass murders were designed to appease an apprehensive German army, as well as eliminate a potential political rival that had the ability to unseat Hitler. The decision to order the slaughter was not a rash one, but long calculated by Hitler in estimating the result of murdering Roehm, who had become the most dangerous man in the Third Reich.

Roehm came from the lower class in Germany, joining the army at an early age. He rose through the ranks, and emerged a captain following World War I. He was tough, pig-eyed, and battle-scarred, part of his nose having been shot off during fighting on the Western Front. An ardent nationalist, Roehm was one of the first to join the National Socialist party, even before Adolf Hitler, who became its leader.

Roehm enthusiastically supported Hitler from the inception of the Nazi party and backed Hitler with the army of strong-arm thugs, the Brownshirts or the SA. When Hitler decided to take over the German government in Bavaria in 1923 in the abortive Munich Beer Hall Putsch, it was Roehm who provided his storm troopers to make the march against government offices. Roehm seized many key buildings during this putsch, but the effort failed and Roehm was tried, convicted, and sent to Stadelheim Prison to serve a short term. Hitler was also sent to prison, where he wrote his memoirs, Mein Kampf.

During the 1920s, Roehm remained a member of the regular German army, a captain, but he commanded an army of Brownshirts that was five times the size of the army, giving the German High Command anxious moments. The generals feared that with his great numbers of SA men, Roehm could seize the government. When Hitler was finally named chancellor, the generals went to the Nazi leader and told him that he could count on their support, but only if Roehm and his top leaders in the SA were eliminated, and if the storm troopers were disbanded and drafted into the regular army.

Hitler agreed, and made plans to exterminate the SA. The Brownshirts by 1934, had become an unruly horde of thugs, thieves, and killers. Its upper echelon leaders, like Roehm, were, for the most part, flagrantly homosexual, and they indulged in all manner of perversities and sexual orgies. Hitler, with the help of Paul Joseph Goebbels, Hermann Goering, and especially, Heinrich Himmler, head of the Gestapo and SS, moved to crush the SA on June 30, 1934.

At that time, most of the leaders of the SA, including Roehm, were on a retreat, relaxing at Wiesee at the Hanslbauer Hotel on the shores of Lake Tegernsee, outside Munich. Arriving at this hotel before dawn with a group of heavily armed SS men, Hitler marched through the rooms occupied by the SA.

In one room Hitler found Brownshirt leader Edmund Heines, head of the SA in Silesia. Heines was a notorious homosexual and convicted killer, and sleeping next to him was a young SA officer. Hitler exploded, screaming to his SS men to "drag this filth out of here and execute them!" Heines, who had a broad, burly figure and the face of a teenager, blinked in amazement as he and his friend were dragged naked outside behind the hotel and summarily shot. Many more SA men, who had all bedded down with other SA men, were also pulled from their beds and taken to prison. Hitler then barged into Roehm's bedroom, slamming the door. He could be heard by those in the hall as he screamed at Roehm, calling his most staunch supporter "a traitor" to the Nazi cause. Roehm, of course, was stunned and baffled; he had no idea what Adolf Hitler was talking about.

Adolf Hitler (left) conspired with the German High Command to get rid of his old ally, Ernst Roehm (shown at right at an SA/Stormtroopers rally) in 1934.

SS men then carted off Roehm to Stadelheim Prison, where he had been imprisoned ten years earlier after following the lunatic Hitler in the Munich Putsch. He was placed in a cell and then one of Himmler's SS men placed a pistol on a table in the cell, telling Roehm that Hitler was allowing his old comrade to shoot himself rather than having him placed before a firing squad. Roehm demanded to know why he and the other SA men had been arrested and shot. He was told "because you are a traitor." No specific charges were made. Roehm refused to use the pistol, shouting at the guards: "If I am to be killed, let Adolf do it himself!"

In this Nazi propaganda poster, SA stormtroopers are shown as heroic figures ready to defend the Fatherland; in truth, most were perverts and street thugs with criminal pasts.

Heinrich Himmler, left, head of the SS, stands next to Ernst Roehm, center, while reviewing Roehm's stormtroopers; Himmler had by then received orders from Hitler to "eliminate" Roehm and the SA.

A scene from Visconti's film, The Damned, which depicts Roehm's homosexual stormtroopers at a cross-dressing orgy in Wiesee on the night of June 30, 1934, and where Hitler and Himmler found them, executing the leaders out of hand.

The SS men then pulled out their weapons and aimed them at Roehm. He stood defiant, bare-chested, his face scowling contemptuously at his executioners. The SS men fired point blank at him, emptying their pistols. Roehm fell dead. More than 200 SA leaders were also executed that morning, and the SA was disbanded. The odd thing about the mass murders during the SA purge of 1934 was that none of the victims realized what was happening. Most believed that the government had been seized by left-wing radicals.

Many, like Karl Ernst, the SA chief of Berlin, thought it was all a joke until the last moment when they were placed against a wall. They came to attention, giving the Nazi salute and shouting "Heil Hitler," dying as they uttered the name of the man who had ordered their murders. Ernst, like so many of the SA leaders, was a thug, who was raised from the criminal dregs of Berlin.

Ernst had been a bellhop in a seedy Berlin hotel, where he made his money by pimping whores to guests. He later became a bouncer in a notorious homosexual café in Berlin, where he was spotted by Roehm and recruited into the SA. Ernst rose high in the organization by ingratiating himself to Roehm by offering to beat up any of Roehm's political opponents, and this he did often, many such beatings resulting in death. Roehm rewarded Ernst by appointing him chief of the SA in Berlin.

On the night of June 30, 1934—known later as "the night of the long knives"—Ernst was being driven to Bremen with his new bride, planning to board ship for an extended honeymoon in the Canary Islands. His car was stopped by SS gunmen, and his armed chauffeur and bodyguard, thinking the SS men were members of a right-wing takeover of the government, drew their guns and were immediately shot to death.

Ernst was dragged from his car and handcuffed, then taken to a cadet school at Lichterfeld, a suburb of Berlin, where he and 150 other SA men were placed in a coal cellar. The men were then dragged out in groups, lined up against a wall and shot to death without trial. Ernst was also dragged to the wall and believed up to the moment of his death that his beloved leader—the man who had approved of his murder—Adolf Hitler, had himself been slain in a political coup. Ernst raised his handcuffed hands and shouted: "Heil Hitler!" Moments later bullets tore into his body, killing him.

Karl Ernst, head of the SA in Berlin, who was dragged from the side of his new wife, lined up against a wall, and shot to death; he died saluting Hitler.

Also typical of these victims was SA leader and Munich chief of police August Schneidhuber. His Nazi insignias and rank of colonel were personally ripped off by Hitler, who called him a traitor and who was later placed against a wall in the courtyard of Stadelheim Prison. Just before the firing squad sent its lethal volley into him, Schneidhuber said: "Gentlemen, I don't know what this is all about, but shoot straight."

Within twenty-four hours, Adolf Hitler had slaughtered hundreds (the body count was never accurately given, but there may have been several thousand victims) of men who had made his rise to power possible and rid himself of an army of thugs to appease the German High Command, which he desperately needed to fulfill his ambition of world conquest. The deaths of Roehm and the others meant nothing to him. He later commented that "they were all filth, diseased creatures, who had disgraced our uniform."

One-time Nazi ally Gregor Strasser, who was also murdered on June 30, 1934, during a massive blood purge that took thousands of lives.

Not only SA leaders were executed on June 30, 1934. Hitler, Goering, Goebbels and Himmler drew up lists of everyone and anyone they disliked, including fellow Nazi Party members, like Gregor Strasser, and slated them for murder. Politicians, army officers, civilian officials by the scores, were marked for death and they were summarily executed by Himmler's SS assassins, who, in their authorized bloodlust, also slew their family members—wives, children, servants.

Hitler publicly excused the mass murders of the SA by releasing information he had obtained (a false report created by SS leader Josef "Sepp" Dietrich) that showed how Roehm had made up an assassination list that included all of the officers of the Army's High Command and that Roehm intended to liquidate these commanders and seize control of the government. In Hitler's political gobbledygook—routinely accepted by the German public in that dictatorial era—the Nazi leader claimed to have saved the country from radical usurpers, who were, in reality, his own hand-picked terrorists.

"IT LOOKS LIKE A PRETTY GOOD SCORE"/September 6, 1949

One of the worst mass murderers in American history, Howard Unruh, was born (January 21, 1921) and raised in Camden, New Jersey. He had a normal, uneventful childhood and was a good student, graduating from high school during the early stages of World War II. Unruh was drafted into the army and served with an armored division. In basic training, he became a sharpshooter and his fellow GIs noticed that he had a fascination for weapons. He would spend hours each night sitting on his bunk taking apart his rifle and putting it back together again. Unruh never took advantage of weekend passes and was never seen in the company of women. He preferred to remain within the confines of his barracks and occupy himself reading his Bible or cleaning his rifle.

Religion had been deeply rooted in Unruh since childhood. He had attended church regularly, gone to Bible class and read the Bible each day at home. Unruh continued to carry his Bible with him through battle after battle as his armored unit fought its way up the boot of Italy in 1943. By this time, he had become a machine gunner in a tank turret. In the following year, Unruh's unit, part of General George Patton's Third Army, helped to liberate Bastogne in the bloody Battle of the Bulge.

Throughout these war years, Unruh kept a diary in which he daily wrote his private thoughts. A fellow GI, who later became a New York policeman, sneaked a look at Unruh's diary and was horrified to view its contents. Unruh had recorded the death of every German soldier he had killed, the hour and the place he had killed them and how they appeared in death after he had shot them.

Yet the Army looked at Unruh as a hero and before receiving his honorable discharge at war's end, he was awarded several commendations for his heroic service during battle. There was no hero's welcome for Howard Unruh when he returned to Camden. He was just another soldier, among millions, returning to civilian life.

Unruh announced to his parents that he intended to become a pharmacist and, to that end, he took some refresher high school courses and then enrolled at Temple University in Philadelphia. He continued his Bible classes and here met the only girl he ever dated. The relationship was only a mild flirtation and quickly ended.

Howard B. Unruh, twenty-eight, at the time he went on his killing spree in his home town of Camden, New Jersey.

This brief affair left Unruh embittered. By 1949, he was considered the neighborhood recluse. He became more withdrawn and seldom spoke to his parents, keeping to his room. The only preoccupation that made him joyful was maintaining his collection of weapons, which he had begun after his military discharge. Unruh set up targets in the basement of his parents' home and practiced his marksmanship each day.

Always sensitive to criticism, Unruh began to take offense at off-handed comments made by neighbors. These became in his mind terrible insults and he suffered what doctors later termed acute paranoia and schizophrenia. He started another diary, or a hate list, wherein he jotted down every imagined and real insult made by neighbors and friends. No grievance was too small to record. This diary was no less exact than the one he had kept in service where he compiled in gruesome detail the German soldiers who had died at his hands.

The next-door neighbors, the Cohens, were particularly annoying to Unruh. Once, while taking a short-cut through the Cohen backyard, Mrs. Cohen had yelled at him: "Hey, you! Do you have to go through our yard?" The Cohens gave their 12-year-old son a bugle, which he practiced daily and Unruh looked upon this as a personal offense against him, as if the neighbors had purposely awarded their son this noisy instrument to annoy him. The list of names and those who offended Unruh grew and grew and after each offense, Unruh wrote the abbreviation "retal," meaning "retaliate."

At first Unruh tried to shut off the world that offended him, rather than attack it. He built a high wooden fence around the tiny Unruh back yard. With his father's help, he built a huge gate that was locked against the intrusions of the world. Unruh's room was another haven, where he took refuge from offensive neighbors. Here the young man kept a 9mm German Luger which he had purchased for $40, several pistols, a large quantity of ammunition, a knife and a machete, both kept razor sharp by their owner.

The shaky world of Howard Unruh collapsed on September 6, 1949. He came home at 3 a.m. that morning to find that someone had stolen the massive gate he and his father had labored so long to erect. Local pranksters had done the deed, but to Unruh, everyone living about him was responsible for this unforgivable insult. Unruh was up all night, staring at the ceiling of his room, seething with hatred. He decided to take revenge.

At 8 a.m. he sat down to a breakfast prepared by his mother. He stared at her strangely and later admitted that she was to be his first victim. He had to kill her to spare her the grief he would bring upon the family through his homicidal plans. Unruh went to the basement, then returned, eyes glaring at her, walking toward her menacingly. His mother ran from the house and to a neighbor's where she blurted her fears about her unstable son.

Going to his room, Unruh loaded his Luger and another pistol, pocketing these weapons, along with a knife. He gathered up several clips of ammunition for both guns and filled his pockets. He walked outside and scrambled over the fence instead of going through the gaping area where the gate had been. At 9:20 a.m., Unruh stood in the doorway of a small shoemaker's shop owned by John Pilarchik.

The cobbler, who had just recently finished paying off the mortgage for his shop, was busy working on children's' shoes. The 27-year-old Pilarchik looked up to see Unruh, someone he had known since boyhood. He stared in disbelief as Unruh pulled out the Luger and fired two bullets into his head. Pilarchik pitched forward dead onto his work bench.

Unruh then stepped next door, into the barbershop owned by 33-year-old Clark Hoover, who had been cutting Unruh's hair for years. Sitting on a small plastic horse in the shop was 6-year-old Orris Smith, whose mother and 11-year-old daughter stood nearby. Without a word, Unruh raised his Luger and

Police grabbed Unruh (in bow tie) after he had murdered thirteen people on September 6, 1949; he told them he was not insane and had "a good mind."

shot the boy dead and then pumped two more bullets into the startled Clark. He ignored the screams of Mrs. Smith and her daughter, who rushed forward to cradle the dead child. Unruh looked at both of them, but strangely did not fire his Luger. With a vacant stare, he wheeled about and headed for the corner drugstore, which was owned by the Cohen family, the people he most hated.

James Hutton, Unruh's insurance agent, stepped from the drugstore. "Hello, Howard," he said affably.

"Excuse me." Unruh said in a monotone. He leveled the Luger at Hutton and fired twice. The insurance agent toppled dead to the sidewalk. Cohen, who saw Unruh shoot Hutton through the window of his shop, raced upstairs to warn other members of his family. Unruh entered the drugstore, inserted another clip into the Luger and then plodded up the stairs after his mortal enemy.

Upstairs, Unruh saw no one about. He suspected that the Cohens were hiding and when he heard a noise in a closet he fired a bullet through the closet door. He opened this to see Mrs. Rose Cohen sagging to the floor. He sent another bullet into her head. Cohen and his son slipped out a window and walked along the second-story ledge of the building, scrambling to a nearby roof.

Police inspectors examine the arsenal Unruh used in his mass murders.

Unruh went into another room of the Cohen apartment and saw Cohen's elderly mother, 63-year-old Minnie Cohen, desperately calling police on a phone. He fired twice, killing her. Then he spotted Maurice Cohen and his son scrambling across a sloping roof and he leaned calmly from a window and fired a bullet that slammed into Cohen's back, causing him to slide off the roof and crash to the pavement below.

Carefully leaning out the window, Unruh fired straight down at Cohen, sending another bullet into his back, although the man was already dead. The Cohen boy had by this time worked his way down to the side of the roof and was clinging to its edge, screaming. Unruh glanced at him, but did not shoot him. He walked back downstairs and went outside. He found Alvin Day, a passerby, kneeling at the body of James Hutton, trying to help a man who was already dead. Day looked up to see the muzzle of Unruh's Luger poking into his face. Unruh fired twice, killing Day, a man he had never met before this moment.

Reloading the Luger, Unruh began to leisurely stroll across the street. A car was idling at the corner, its driver waiting for the light to change. Unruh walked up to the car and stuck the Luger through the window, shooting the female driver dead. She was Helen Wilson. He then fired at and killed the woman's mother, Emma Matlack, who was in the back seat of the car, along with her 9-year-old son, John Wilson.

Unruh then began walking down the street. He spotted a truck driver getting out of the cab of his truck a block away. Taking careful aim, Unruh shot him in the leg. By then panic had gripped the entire area. The maniac in the streets was shooting anyone he encountered. The manager of a supermarket quickly locked the front doors and told his customers to lie down on the floor. So did the manager of a bar which Unruh approached. As bar customers huddled on the floor, Unruh tried the door and found it locked. He fired twice, trying to blow away the lock but it held. He moved on, seemingly unconcerned.

Going into the tailor's shop next door, Unruh found the place empty. Tom Zegrino, the proprietor, was not present but Unruh heard a noise in the back room. He pushed back a drape to see Mrs. Helga Zegrino cringing behind a chair. "Oh, my God, please don't," she pleaded. Unruh said nothing as he sent two bullets into her, killing her instantly.

Stepping outside, Unruh looked about at the now empty street. The only persons present were those whom he had already killed or wounded. Neighbors and passersby had rushed into houses and shops and had locked themselves inside against the random rage of the lunatic. Unruh looked up to see 3-year-old Tommy Hamilton staring down at him. He fired once, killing the boy.

Walking to a nearby house, Unruh entered it by the back door which he found unlocked. Inside the kitchen, he found Mrs. Madeleine Harris and her two sons. The older son, a courageous youth, saw the gun in Unruh's hand and dashed forward, driving his shoulder into the body of the tall killer. Unruh fired twice, wounding the youth and his mother. He then stood over these two fallen victims who squirmed in pain. He leveled the Luger at them but, oddly, decided not to end their lives. He turned on his heel and walked once more outside.

Police sirens wailing from squad cars could be heard in the distance. Unruh increased his pace as he walked back to his home, where he went to his second-story room, barricading the door and reloading his Luger. He waited patiently as police surrounded his house. He looked out his window at them without firing. His identity was by then known and had been reported to Phillip Buxton, editor of the Camden Courier Post. Buxton obtained Unruh's listed phone number and took a chance, calling the killer.

Unruh is shown bed-ridden (he had been wounded by a stray police bullet before surrendering) in Camden's Cooper Hospital, interviewed by prosecutor Mitchell H. Cohen; the mass murderer had no regrets, saying "I'd have killed a thousand if I'd had bullets enough."

Unruh picked up the phone and one of the strangest phone conversations in the annals of murder then occurred.

"Hello," Unruh answered in a calm voice.

"Is this Howard?" Buxton inquired.

"Yes, this is Howard," Unruh replied. "What is the last name of the party you want?"

"Unruh."

"Who are you and what do you want?" Unruh asked politely.

Buxton was diplomatic: "I am a friend and I want to know what they are doing to you."

"Well, they haven't done anything to me yet," Unruh said in an even voice, as if he were chatting with an old friend. "But I am doing plenty to them."

"How many have you killed?"

"I don't know yet. I haven't counted them, but it looks like a pretty good score." (Thirteen persons had been shot to death and thirteen more had been wounded by Howard Unruh within twelve minutes.)

"Why are you killing people, Howard," Buxton asked, trying to control his own passions while writing down the murderer's every word.

He was greeted by silence. After some moments, Unruh replied in a low voice: "I don't know. I can't answer that yet. I'm too busy. I'll have to talk to you later." He hung up.

At that moment tear gas canisters fired by police outside smashed through the glass of the bedroom windows and exploded inside, filling the room with eye-searing gas. These were followed by fusillades of bullets that smacked into the walls of Unruh's room, chipping the plaster. After a few minutes, Unruh took down the barricade in front of his door and walked downstairs and outside. He put his hands slowly into the air at a command barked by a police officer. Dozens of guns were trained upon him.

Detectives rushed forward, manhandling him, manacling his large hands. Detective Vince Connelly, sickened at the sight of the bodies in the street nearby, stared at Unruh and said: "What's the matter with you? Are you a psycho?"

Howard Unruh lifted his head indignantly and snapped: "I am no psycho! I have a good mind!"

More than twenty psychiatrists, who later examined Howard Unruh disagreed. They believed him to be hopelessly and criminally insane. The mass killer was never brought to trial, but sent to the New Jersey State Mental Hospital for life. He had no remorse for his brutal, unthinking murders. In one interview with a psychiatrist, Unruh stated: "I'd have killed a thousand if I'd had bullets enough."

Unruh, alive at this writing (age seventy-eight), has repeatedly petitioned to be released from the Trenton Psychiatric Hospital (where he has spent most of his days "cowering near the nurse's station in the locked ward for the criminally insane") to another hospital for the elderly. Such petitions have thus far been denied.

DEATH OVER QUEBEC/September 9, 1949

Three days after Howard Unruh went on his berserk murder spree in Camden, New Jersey, blasted steel and flesh rained from the skies over Quebec. On September 9, 1949, Canadian Pacific Airlines Flight 108, a two-engine DC-3 (Dakota) from Quebec to Baie Comeau exploded in flight forty miles from Quebec, only twenty minutes after takeoff. All twenty-three passengers and crew members were killed in the crash, which was initially considered an accident.

Among those grieving over the lost lives in the crash was Joseph Albert Guay (1919-1951), a mild-mannered Quebec jeweler. He appeared with his small daughter, Lise, at the airport, to learn that his wife, Rita Morel Guay, a petite, dark-haired French-Canadian, had perished with all on board the ill-fated flight.

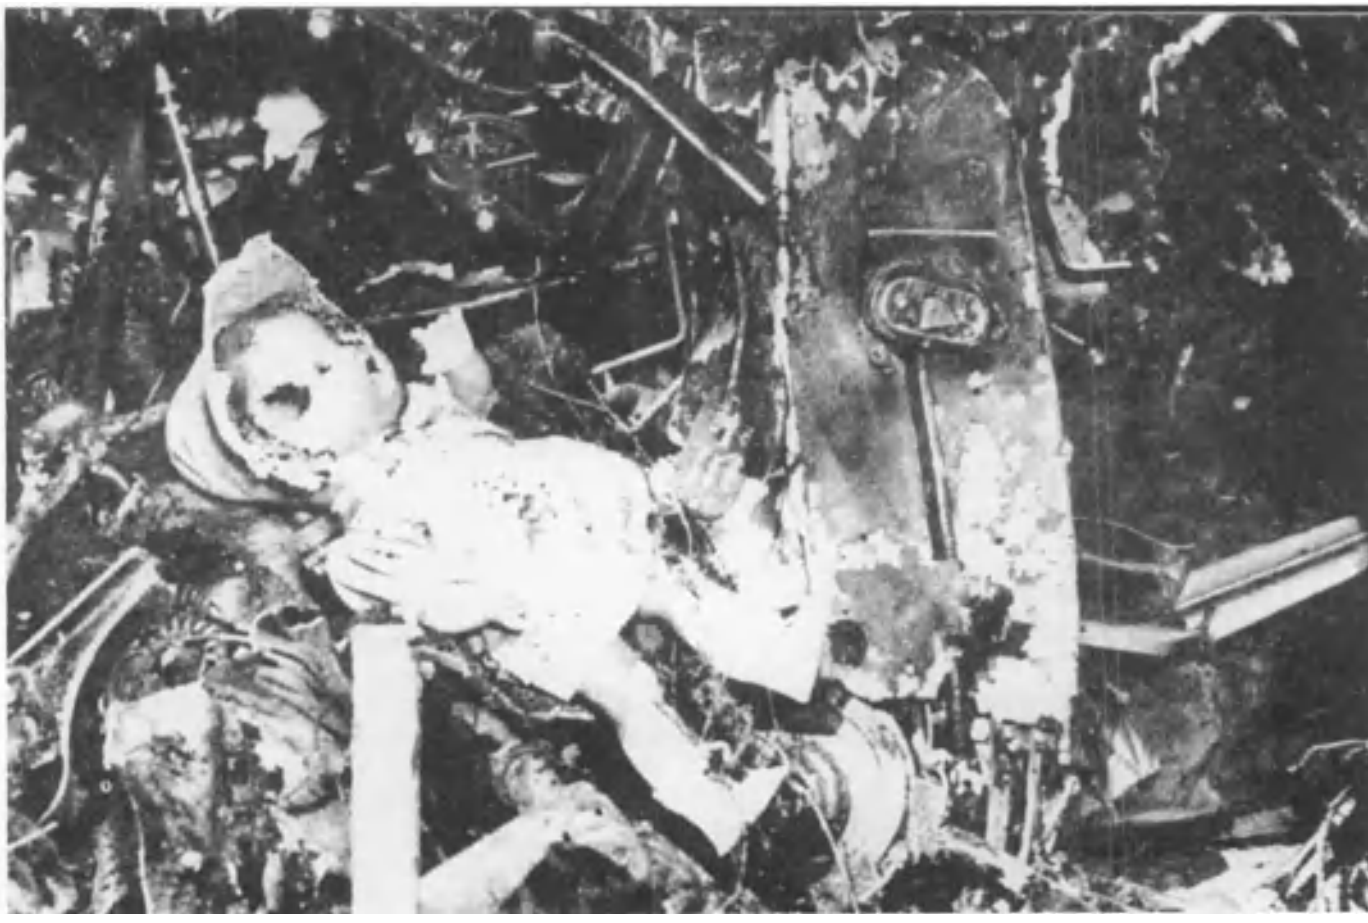
Guay was remembered earlier by workers at Quebec's Ancienne Lorette Airport, when he affectionately bid his wife goodbye earlier that day, kissing her on the cheek before she boarded the plane. He had in his pocket at that time, an insurance policy he had taken out on his wife, one calling for a $10,000 payment in the event of her death in the air. Like many other mourners that day, Guay appeared unconcerned about anything but the loss of his loved one. He was emotionally devastated, or so he appeared, weeping openly. He and his daughter were driven to one of Quebec's better hotels where they were given a room. A priest then consoled the stricken husband, who seemed to be inconsolable.

By that time, searchers struggled through dense woods to find the debris from the shattered plane, mangled body parts, luggage and twisted steel spread over a wide area. The explosion made national news across Canada and in the U.S., particularly since three of the passengers were American millionaires, who had interests in Canadian copper mines.

Inspectors examined all the remaining fragments of the plane and found that flames had touched only a section of the freight compartment where the metal walls were scorched. Items were taken from the freight compartment and closely examined by chemists, who then issued a shocking report. The plane had been sabotaged, that dynamite had been used to blow up the plane and that the twenty-three fatalities on board were victims of mass murder. Specifically, investigators had found evidence of a dry battery cell and dynamite in the wreckage, indicating that a bomb had been planted on the plane.

The cargo manifest listed a package being sent to a nonexistent address. Airport freight handlers recalled that a woman dressed in black had left the package. Ten days after the crash, a taxi driver, Paul Pelletier contacted police to say that he remembered driving a woman in black carrying a package to the airport on the day of the crash. He gave police an address that turned out to be that of Marguerite Pitre.

When police arrived to question Pitre, however, they were informed that she was in the hospital recovering from a suicide attempt. Pitre admitted taking the package to the airport, and told police that she had done so at the request of a friend



The wreckage of Canadian Pacific Airlines Flight 108, which exploded over Quebec on September 9, 1949, killing all twenty-three persons on board, including three children, the mangled doll shown in this photo belonging to one of those victims.

Joseph Albert Guay ordered the bomb to be placed on Flight 108 to rid himself of an unwanted wife and to collect her flight insurance; he was executed in 1951.

Eccentric watchmaker Genereaux Ruest, who accommodated the killer by constructing the bomb that blew up Flight 108; he was executed in 1951.

Marguerite Pitre, who delivered the bomb to the airport; she cooperated with police in exposing the murder plot but was nevertheless executed in 1951.

and former lover, Joseph Albert Guay. She explained that it was all part of a plot to kill Guay's wife, Rita Guay.

Albert Guay had become involved with 19-year-old night-club cigarette girl, Marie-Ange Robitaille and wanted to get rid of his wife so he could marry her. He got help from Pitre, who in turn convinced her brother, Genreaux Ruest, to build the bomb. Guay managed to get his wife to take the plane flight by asking her to go to Baie Comeau to pick up two suitcases of jewelry for him. He took out the insurance policy on her life as an added bonus to his murderous plan, the $10,000 from her life insurance to be lavished upon his mistress.

Guay had long plotted the murder of his wife, Pitre insisted. In fact, he had offered a friend $500 to put poison in a bottle of wine and give it to his wife, but the friend laughed off the request as a joke. It was after this rebuff that Guay went to Pitre, who lived in the seamy side of Lower Quebec, where she was known as a petty criminal and abortionist.

It was Guay, Pitre said, who suggested that a bomb be placed on a plane carrying his wife. To construct this infernal machine, Pitre went to her brother, Genreaux Ruest, a crippled jeweler and watchmaker, who undertook to construct the bomb. He was inexpert at the job at best, struggling to put dynamite into an alarm clock at his workbench in his open shop.

At one point, when Ruest saw a miner enter his shop, he exclaimed: "Now, here's a man who can tell us about dynamite!" On another occasion, Ruest and Guay attempted to persuade a taxi driver to carry the bomb in his car while Mrs. Guay was riding in it, and leap out of the taxi after setting it off. The cab driver refused, not because of any moral qualms, but because his taxi would be destroyed. Guay finally settled on blowing up a plane carrying his unsuspecting wife.

All of this was related in Guay's trial, beginning in March 1950. He was found guilty and sentenced to death and was hanged in January 1951. His two blundering confederates, Pitre and Ruest, followed him to the scaffold.

"I WISH THEY WOULD HANG ERNIE"/ November 17, 1950

Ernest Ingenito (b. 1924) was a violent youth from the time his parents separated in 1937. Mrs. Ingenito found it impossible to control him during his childhood, and by the time he was fifteen he was known to police in Gloucester County, Pennsylvania, as an incorrigible thug. Before another year had passed, Ingenito was serving a term in the Pennsylvania State Reformatory, convicted of attempted burglary. After his release, he returned to his mother's home. Her death in 1941 created an emotional scar Ingenito carried with him for the rest of his life.

Ingenito married at seventeen, but his angry tirades were too much for his young bride and she left him while she was pregnant. He then enlisted in the army, where his habit of sleeping late did not endear him to his sergeant or the officers on the base. In 1943, during an argument, he beat up a sergeant and an officer. Imprisoned in a stockade for two years, he was dishonorably discharged in 1946. The next year he met Theresa Mazzoli, a dark-haired Italian beauty whose parents owned and operated a prosperous truck farm in Gloucester

Ernest Ingenito (center) is shown entering court, where he was convicted of slaughtering his in-laws in 1950; he was later sent to an insane asylum.

County, and though Theresa's mother objected loudly to the couple's relationship, they soon married.

The impoverished young couple went to live with the Mazzolis in their home and from the start there was trouble. Pearl Mazzoli, the mother, did not care for her son-in-law and daily made a point of expressing her disapproval of him. At first Mike Mazzoli, the father, took Ingenito's side. But when he learned that Ingenito had cheated on his daughter, he immediately evicted Ingenito from his home.

Ingenito moved to a residence a short distance away, so that he could be near his two sons. When Theresa refused him visitation rights, Ingenito consulted a lawyer, Fred Gravino, of Woodbury, New Jersey, who told Ernie to get a court order to see his children. Ernie rejected the advice because it would take too long, he said. A second lawyer told him the same thing. Agitated, Ingenito selected two pistols and a carbine rifle from his extensive weapons collection and, on November 17, 1950, banged on the Mazzoli's front door armed with his guns.

Upon seeing her estranged husband approach, Theresa Ingenito fled. When Mike Mazzoli appeared, Ingenito leveled a German-made Luger and fired two times, then stepped into the house and fired at his wife, wounding her. Next, he went after Pearl Mazzoli, but was unable to locate her in the house for she had run screaming to the home of Armando and Theresa Pioppi who lived down the block. "It's Ernie!" she cried, running upstairs to hide in a bedroom closet. "He's shooting everybody!"

Before Gino Pioppi, Pearl's brother, could summon police, Ingenito burst through the door with his guns blazing. He fired on Mrs. Pioppi and Gino's wife, Marion, killing them. Ingenito fired repeatedly at Pearl Mazzoli and then fired on his 9-year-old daughter before exiting the Pioppi home. As he left, Gino's brother, John, grabbed a knife lying on the kitchen table and chased the gun-toting madman across the lawn until Ingenito turned and fired, killing John Pioppi instantly. Ingenito next drove to the home of Frank Mazzoli in Minatola, New Jersey. Screaming a torrent of curses, he shot Hilda and Frank Mazzoli and then tried to escape.

The killing spree had begun at 9 p.m., and ended shortly after midnight when a patrol car flagged Ingenito down. As the police officers approached, Ingenito tried to kill himself with the jagged edges of a tin can, but failed. Speaking from her hospital bed, Theresa told a reporter: "I wish they would hang Ernie."

In January 1951, Ingenito was tried for the murder of his mother-in-law. His severe psychological problems led to a sentence of life imprisonment at the New Jersey Hospital for the Insane, in Trenton. In 1956 he was brought to trial for four additional murders committed that same night, and received a sentence of life for each killing.

A MASS MURDER IN FRANCE/ August 4, 1952

Gaston Dominici (1877-1965), the elderly, affable patriarch of a large French farm family living near Lurs, Provence, became the hub of one of the most sensational mass murder cases in modern French history. Sir Jack Drummond, a brilliant 61-year-old British biochemist, his wife Ann, forty-six, and their daughter Elizabeth, ten, were vacationing in France, driving leisurely through the beautiful Durance Valley. They decided to camp on the night of August 4, 1952, and pulled their car off the road outside the town of Lurs, near a farmhouse.

The Drummonds pitched a tent and began to dress for bed. Someone hiding in some nearby bushes and watching them was discovered by Drummond, who berated the Peeping Tom, who, in turn, shot Drummond and his wife to death and chased the terrified Elizabeth Drummond through the tall grass and crushed her head with the butt of a carbine.

The bodies of the Drummond family were found the next morning by railway workers. Police also received a report from 33-year-old Gustave Dominici that he had also discovered the bodies on a large, sprawling farm called La Grande Terre, belonging to his father, Gaston Dominici. The deaths of the prominent Drummond and his family members made headlines in Paris, London, and New York, and Edmond Sebeille, the superintendent of police in Marseilles, was called in to personally direct the investigation.

Sebeille was convinced that the killer or killers were part of the Dominici family at La Grande Terre. The family included Gaston Dominici, seventy-five, his reticent wife Marie, his son Gustave, Gustave's wife, Yvette, and their child. Another son, 49-year-old Clovis Dominici, lived on a nearby farm. Superintendent Sebeille methodically conducted dozens of interviews with residents and workers in the area.

One of the railway workers who had discovered the bodies told the superintendent that Gustave Dominici had stated that Elizabeth Drummond was alive when he found her, although she was apparently dying of head wounds. Sebeille

British biochemist Sir Jack Drummond, shown with his wife Ann and daughter Elizabeth, all brutally slain while vacationing in France's Durance Valley on August 4, 1952.

Gustave Dominici, who was at first thought to be the mass murderer.

Clovis Dominici, who also came under suspicion as the killer of the Drummond family.

Family patriarch Gaston Dominici, who was found guilty of slaying the Drummonds.

confronted Gustave Dominici, who admitted this was the case, but he was quick to say that he had nothing to do with the murders.

Sebeille ordered Dominici's arrest for failing to come to the aid of a dying person. He was tried at Digne on November 13, 1952, convicted, and sentenced to two months in prison. The sentence was appealed and Dominici was released. Sebeille, however, persisted in visiting the Dominici family, questioning members over and over throughout 1953. Finally, with Gustave and Clovis Dominici present in the farmhouse, Sebeille openly accused Gustave of murdering the Drummonds. Gustave's nerves were frayed by the prolonged police investigation and he shouted: "It was my father!"

Sebeille looked at Clovis and the older brother nodded. Gustave then stated that he heard two shots at about 1 a.m. on the night of the murders and he ran to the field, where he saw his father with an American carbine. He had just shot the Drummonds after being caught spying on them and had bludgeoned the little girl. Gustave, terrified that his father might turn on him, fled and returned at 5:30 to find Elizabeth Drummond in a dying condition. He left her to be found later, still fearing that his father would kill him if he knew he had witnessed the murders.

The fierce old man, with a head of white hair, a droopy mustache, and dark, beady eyes, was arrested and taken to jail. He cursed his sons when he learned that they had informed on him and he later confessed to police that he had, indeed, slaughtered the Drummond family because Jack Drummond had accused him of gaping at his half-dressed wife and making lewd advances to her.

Dominici felt it was his right to do as he pleased on his own land, even to commit sexual assault and murder. The old man made several confessions, but these were later retracted and denied when Gaston Dominici was placed on trial at the Digne Assize Court in November 1954. Before that time, Gaston Dominici is shown going to prison under heavy police guard; he was condemned to death, but his sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment.

Dominici accompanied police to the scene of the murders, which were re-enacted before him, so unnerving the hoary old killer that he tried to commit suicide by jumping off a railroad bridge.

At the end of the eleven-day trial, Gaston Dominici was found guilty and sentenced to death. As the old man was led from the dock and back to his cell, he turned to the court and hissed: "My sons! What swine!" Dominici's death sentence was commuted to life in prison. Meanwhile more developments and revelations in the case left considerable doubt about who had killed the Drummonds. One story had it that the old man killed the adults, but someone else in the Dominici family murdered the child.

Another account insisted that Gaston Dominici was a senile old man, who had confessed out of ignorance and confusion and that his sons had done the killings. The old man was released in 1960 and returned to La Grand Terre where he lived until his death in 1965, residing for six years inside a household that seethed with hostility and hatred.

"SEND IT TO HELL!"/November 1, 1955

John Gilbert Graham (1932-1957), called Jack by family and friends, was a clean-cut young man, tall, well-mannered, his hair cropped close to his head. A stranger might guess that he had played center for the local high school basketball team. His politeness and quiet voice suggested years of experience as a Boy Scout. He would be the kid down the block selling cool drinks at a cardboard stand outside his house in the summer, the boy next door who shoveled the walk in winter, cut the grass in spring. But he was none of these things, as his neighbors in Denver, Colorado, would slowly discover, along with the FBI. He was a killer, moreover a mass murderer who plotted not only the death of an overindulgent mother, but would be responsible for the first in-flight plane bombing in U.S. history.

Mrs. Daisie King, Jack's mother, doted on her only son. She had led a roller-coaster life, marrying in and out of poverty three times. Her second marriage produced her only child, Jack, who was born in Denver in 1932. When Jack was five, his father, William Graham, died, and Daisie Graham was left without a dime, forced to place her son in an orphanage. In 1943, Daisie met and married a wealthy Colorado rancher, John Earl King, and she immediately recovered her son, bringing him to an upper-middleclass home where comfort and convenience replaced Spartan discipline.

Yet the disparity of the two lifestyles young Jack had lived seemingly affected him little. He was bright, some said highly imaginative. He was an above-average student through his first year of high school. Then, at sixteen, he ran away to join the Coast Guard, lying about his age. Graham served only nine months, being AWOL for sixty-three days, which caused his detention. Officers learned that he was underage and dismissed him from the service. His mother took him back into her home and, when he said he did not want to complete school, she nodded patient understanding.

Jack Graham went to work, taking odd jobs. To his neighbors he appeared the same easygoing boy, but close friends noticed that he would become restless when talking about his mother and then sink into brooding silence. Mrs. King urged her son to return to school so that he could qualify for a white-collar job. By 1951, Graham had accumulated enough night school credits to earn himself a job as a payroll clerk for a Denver manufacturer.

Mrs. Daisie King, who, along with forty-three others, died when United Airlines Flight 629 blew up after taking off from the Denver Airport on November 1, 1955.

Though Graham had a taste for riches, his meager salary afforded few pleasures. He wanted fast, new cars and a handsome wardrobe. He insisted upon taking his girlfriends to better restaurants. He could afford little of this lifestyle on his $200-a-month salary, so Jack Graham did what had become a habit at home—he merely helped himself, in this case forging the name of his company's vice-president to checks he had stolen from his firm and cashing these to collect $4,200. He bought a fast convertible and drove away from Denver to see the sights.

For several months, Graham went on a minor crime spree, but when he took up bootlegging in Texas, the Rangers and other lawmen closed in on him. Outside of Lubbock, Texas, police set up a roadblock on a tip that a young bootlegger would be taking a certain route, his car loaded with moonshine. Graham approached the barrier at high speed, ignoring police warnings to stop. When he drove through the roadblock, officers riddled his beautiful new convertible, which Graham crashed into a house. Miraculously he was uninjured when taken into custody.

After serving sixty days in the county jail, Graham was turned over to Denver officials who intended to prosecute him for forgery. But Daisie Graham King wouldn't hear of it. She couldn't bear to see Jack behind bars and begged authorities to be lenient toward her errant son, a good boy really, who had made a mistake for which he was sorry, she said.

Rescue workers are shown carrying some of the bodies strewn over a wide area from the remains of Flight 629.

Mrs. King offered her son's former employer $2,500, saying that Jack would work off the balance of the stolen $4,200. Authorities agreed, placing the apprentice forger on probation. For a time, it seemed as if Mrs. King's unswerving belief in her son was vindicated. Graham did get a job and did make regular payments to the firm he had looted.

In 1953, Graham married Gloria Elson in Denver and settled down, working hard as a mechanic, righting his wrong. Like many another citizen, Jack Graham had his "brush with the law" and had been spared prison. It appeared that, like any other citizen having made one mistake, he was on his way to becoming a respected member of his community. His friends found him hardworking, conscientious, and a faithful husband. His relatives marveled at the consideration and affection he showered upon his mother, especially after her third husband died in 1954.

Following King's death (he had been a successful rancher), a large sum of money was left to Mrs. Daisie Graham King. Thrice widowed, Mrs. King turned to her son for consolation and, to occupy her time, proposed a business partnership between herself and her hard-working offspring. She invested $35,000 of her husband's money in a drive-in restaurant in West Denver. Jack became her partner, managing the restaurant. Graham labored to make the restaurant a success, and he continued working nights at a Hertz Drive-Ur-Self garage to further reduce the money owed against his forgery theft, until the balance remaining was no more than $106. He had learned his lesson, his mother was fond of saying. Jack was a good boy, she said, a solid citizen.

Then, on November 1, 1955, an ear-shattering event took place that would slowly strip away that upstanding image of John Gilbert Graham, penitent lawbreaker, hardworking married man, and dutiful son. At 7:03 p.m. on that day, United Airlines flight number 629, only eleven minutes from Denver's Denver's District Attorney Bert Keating, who later led the prosecution case against John Gilbert Graham, is shown examining the crucial cargo section of Flight 629, which had been painstakingly reassembled by experts in a warehouse of the Denver Airport.

John "Jack" Gilbert Graham is shown only minutes after he signed his confession at FBI offices in Denver. He took pride in constructing the bomb that killed his mother and destroyed Flight 629.

Stapleton Airport and en route to Portland, Oregon, with forty-four passengers and crew members aboard, passed directly over a Colorado beet farm near Longmont. The farmer stood near his barn, looked up, and saw a terrific explosion that sent to earth the shattered remains of the silver plane, burning wreckage that littered his fields and sent him scampering for help when help was useless.

Within an hour, nearby citizens and National Guardsmen arrived to recover the mutilated bodies. These shattered remains were taken to the National Guard Armory at Greeley, Colorado. Responding to one of the worst air disasters in American aviation, the FBI routinely offered the aid of its Identification Division in an effort to help authorities pinpoint the identities of the victims. Two of the Bureau's fingerprint experts arrived in Greeley the following day. Of the forty-four aboard Flight 629, including one infant and five crew members, nine had already been identified by grieving relatives and friends.

The FBI experts fingerprinted the remaining thirty-five bodies, or what was left of the bodies, and twenty-one of these were identified from prints, which were in the Bureau's files. The reason why so many sets of prints were on file was explained by FBI officials: a Canadian couple had had their fingerprints taken in 1954, when applying for citizenship, another for personal identification, and many had been government workers during World War II, holding jobs requiring fingerprinting.

FBI experts also joined with investigators from United Airlines, the Douglas Aircraft Company, and the Civil Aeronautics Board to determine the cause of the crash. Mechanical failure and human error were high on the priority of probabilities; sabotage was an almost unthinkable possibility.

At the same time, other investigators looked into the unthinkable by examining the backgrounds of every passenger and crew member. They were shocked to learn that a staggering $752,000 in flight insurance had been taken out by eighteen of the passengers, almost as if these travelers had had a collective premonition of disaster, making Flight 629 one of the most heavily insured flights in the history of commercial aviation up to that time. The policies were put through the checking mill.

Other experts collected the jagged pieces of the plane, from tail to nose, which, when falling from the fireball to earth had spread over a mile-and-a-half of cropland. The pieces were carefully moved to a Denver hangar and pieced together meticulously, until the ill-fated DC-6B's fuselage was completely reassembled except for a section near the tail from Number 4 Cargo Pit. Not a fragment remained of this section of the plane. The metal shell of the fuselage surrounding the area that had once been Number 4 Cargo Pit, engineers discovered, was bent outward in jagged pieces. This could only mean that a force more powerful than any crash had torn out that part of the plane.

Moreover, bits of steel from the fuselage had been driven through the soles of some of the shoes worn by passengers sitting near the cargo section of the plane. Even the brass fittings of one suitcase had been driven through a stainless steel container known to have been in the hold. An explosion had occurred in the cargo hold and, since no gas lines or tanks were located near this section, experts concluded that something in the hold had exploded by accident, perhaps an illegal dynamite shipment or—and this was the last possibility any of the experts wanted to include—someone had deliberately sabotaged the plane, planting some sort of bomb on board.

The tragedy of Flight 629 was quickly known to many of those who had friends and relatives on board. One of them was John Gilbert Graham, whose mother, Mrs. Daisie Graham King, had been en route to Portland, then Seattle, and finally to Alaska, to visit her daughter. Graham and his wife Gloria, accompanied by their 2-year-old son, Allen, had driven Mrs. King to Stapleton Airport and walked her to the gate, kissing her goodbye.

After Mrs. King boarded, the Grahams went to a nearby coffee shop to have a snack. Jack got sick, rushed to the restroom, and threw up. When he returned he told his wife: "It must be this airport food." As they were leaving the airport, they heard rumors that a plane had crashed. When they returned home, Jack turned on the radio to listen for news about the supposed air crash. Said his wife later: "We finally heard his mother's name on the radio and Jack just collapsed completely."

Graham appeared to be in shock for days after learning of his mother's death. Said one neighbor: "He was really broken up about it, They were very close." While Graham was recovering from the loss of his mother, FBI lab technicians were sifting through the smallest remains of the crash found in the sections of the plane and at the crash site. One technician finally emptied the contents of an envelope onto the desk of Roy Moore, assistant special agent in charge in the Denver FBI office, saying: "These fragments were found among the wreckage but they are the only pieces of debris that we have been unable to identify in any way with parts of the airplane or with known contents of the cargo."

Before Agent Moore were five tiny pieces of sheet metal. The technician went on to say that the pieces of metal contained foreign deposits of white and dark-gray colors which consisted mainly of sodium carbonate and traces of nitrate and sulfur compounds. That added up to dynamite, and that meant a bomb had been placed in the luggage of one of the passengers on Flight 629. According to the plane's manifest, the cargo hold carried nothing that day but passengers' luggage.

The tedious job of checking every piece of luggage carried by the forty-four persons on board the flight began. The only person for whom no luggage, except tiny fragments, could be found was Mrs. Daisie King. Airport authorities then informed the FBI that Mrs. King had taken out $62,500 in flight insurance, very heavy insurance for those days and far in excess of the amounts taken out by other passengers. The beneficiary was her son, Jack. Although Mrs. King's luggage had vanished in the explosion, the handbag she carried was found intact, and inside, tucked into a small purse, yellowed and folded into a wad, was a newspaper clipping, which Mrs. King had been careful to keep with her.

The clipping reported her son's forgery of stolen checks and his subsequent arrest. Why a mother so devoted to her son would carry about such an item, as one might carry about a keepsake, remains imponderable. Perhaps, some later theorized, she kept the clipping as a reminder of what her son was capable of doing, or, it was also later said, she kept the clipping to remind him of his errant ways. No one ever knew for sure, but it was this very clipping, which Mrs. King may have wanted authorities to find should she ever meet with foul play, that led FBI agents to the door of Jack Gilbert Graham.

Before interviewing Graham, agents learned that he was not the penitent wrongdoer attempting to set things right. He and his mother had been arguing constantly about Jack's management of the drive-in restaurant, particularly about a strange fire from an even stranger gas explosion that had caused more than $1,200 in damages. The explosion had occurred only a few months before Flight 629 exploded in the skies of Colorado. Graham had tried to collect insurance on the restaurant after the fire, but had failed.

Insurance must have been much on Graham's mind, agents thought, when they discovered that on another recent occasion, the 23-year-old had apparently stalled his pick-up truck in front of a speeding railroad train to collect insurance. Then a neighbor told agents that Jack had boasted of his demolition work while serving in the Coast Guard.

On November 10, 1955, agents went to the home of John Gilbert Graham. Jack was cordial, offering the agents coffee and telling them the story of his life, detailing his days in the orphanage, his mother's three marriages, even his forgery of stolen checks, being careful to point out that he had just about made complete restitution.

Graham told them that his mother was going to Alaska to visit his half sister and hunt caribou. He added that she was carrying in her luggage a large amount of shotgun shells and other ammunition for hunting purposes. The agents nodded, already knowing that Mrs. King was an outdoorswoman, a woman who loved to fish and hunt.

Then one of the agents inquired: "Exactly what did she have in her luggage and did you help her pack it?"

District Attorney Bert Keating demonstrates in court where an explosive device was located on United Flight 629 in a model of the plane that blew up on November 1, 1955.

"I can describe her luggage," replied Graham in an even voice, "but I can't tell you what was in it. Mother would never allow anyone to help her pack. She always insisted upon doing it herself."

Jack's wife, Gloria, stepped forward to support her husband's statements, saying that Mrs. King, who had recently been living with them, was always particular about her things. Jack excused himself, telling the agents he was going to make some more coffee. Gloria Graham then remembered a small item about Mrs. King's luggage: "Just before Mrs. King left for the airport Jack gave her a present, or, I presume he did."

"A present?" asked one of the agents. "What kind of present?"

"Oh, I think it was a small set of tools, like drills and files. My mother-in-law used these things to make art gifts out of sea shells. Jack had talked of buying her a set for Christmas. On the day she was to leave, he came home with a package and took it to the basement, where his mother was packing. I just assumed that this contained the tool set and that he gave it to her to take along."

When the agents left the house, they immediately interviewed Graham's next-door neighbors. One woman stated that she remembered the gift Jack had bought for his mother, recalling that "he had wrapped it in Christmas paper and I was told that he put it in his mother's luggage before she left."

"What else were you told?" asked an agent.

"Nothing important...only someone told me later that Jack became suddenly ill only a short time after the plane had taken off, and was very pale. I remember also having been told that when the Grahams were informed of the crash, Jack remarked: 'That's it.' I guess he was too stunned to know what he was talking about. It was really a great blow to him...Why, the poor fellow has been unable to eat or sleep since. All he does is walk up and down the house."

John Gilbert Graham at his trial; he had little or nothing to say, having already confessed to the mass murder of his mother and forty-three others.

On November 16, 1955, agents called the Grahams and asked them to come to headquarters to identify, if possible, some fragments of luggage, which might have belonged to Mrs. King. Both appeared on time and agreed that, yes, the pieces looked like parts from a small suitcase Mrs. King had taken with her. Agents then asked Graham to stay behind for some more routine questions, while sending his wife home.

The young man stretched out his six-foot-one-inch, 190-pound frame in an office chair and smilingly agreed to answer any questions. Agent Moore conducted the interrogation, beginning slowly, detailing all the facts the agents had gathered, then stating that Jack's wife had told them about the Christmas gift he had slipped into his mother's suitcase, a package approximately eighteen inches long, fourteen inches wide, and three inches deep, as described by Gloria Graham.

Graham's attitude was cool and cooperative. Calmly, and with a smile, he replied: "Oh, you've got your facts all mixed up. I had intended buying her a tool set, but I couldn't find the right kind so I didn't buy any."

"But your wife told us you did and that you brought it home with you."

"She's wrong about that. I'd been talking a lot about the tools and I guess she just supposed I bought them. That's reasonable, isn't it?"

Moore did not respond, but asked about Graham's conduct at the airport restaurant. "You did get sick, didn't you, Jack?"

"We had a snack to eat out there," he responded quickly, "but the food was miserable and it turned my stomach."

Then Moore took the hard line, saying: "I want you to know that you have certain rights. The door there is open. You can walk out any time you wish. There is a telephone. You can call your wife or an attorney if you wish. You don't have to tell us anything and if you do, it can be used in a court of law. There will be no threats and no promises made while we talk with you." Moore stared at John Gilbert Graham for some moments, then said firmly to the smiling young man: "Jack, we have gone over what you told us. You blew up that plane to kill your mother, didn't you?"

"No, I didn't," Graham answered in a calm voice.

"Then you don't mind making any statements?"

"Of course I'll make a statement," Graham said. His voice was full of confidence. "Why shouldn't I? And I'll do a lot more. I'll take a lie detector test if you wish. What's more, you have my permission to search my house, my car or anything else. I haven't done anything wrong."

To prove his claim, Graham signed a waiver giving the agents the right to search his home, eliminating the necessity for a court-ordered search warrant. Agents went immediately to Graham's house. Within minutes one of them called to inform Moore that "Mrs. Graham says Jack told her not to tell about the Christmas present. She signed a statement." Moore immediately confronted Graham with his wife's contradiction of his statements.

Graham thought for a moment, then said: "Oh yeah, I remember now. I did get her that present." He related that he had bought an X-Acto tool set from "some guy" whose name he did not know, paying him $10 for it. Yes, he had slipped the present into his mother's luggage. It now came back to him, all of it, he said.

Agents busy searching the Graham home kept calling with more information. A small roll of copper wiring, a type used for detonating dynamite, had been found in a pocket of one of Graham's shirts. An hour later agents found the insurance policies his mother had signed at the airport, all of them making her son the beneficiary. These had been hidden in a cedar chest in Graham's bedroom. Then they found the shotgun shells and ammunition Mrs. King was supposed to have taken with her. Also left behind by Mrs. King were presents she intended to give to her daughter in Alaska.

Agent Moore outlined the discoveries to Graham, one by one, then summed up the evidence, mounting every minute, surrounding the suspect with his guilt. "Why didn't your mother take these things [the ammunition and gifts] with her?"

Graham grew solemn, then said: "I told her not to take them because her baggage was overweight."

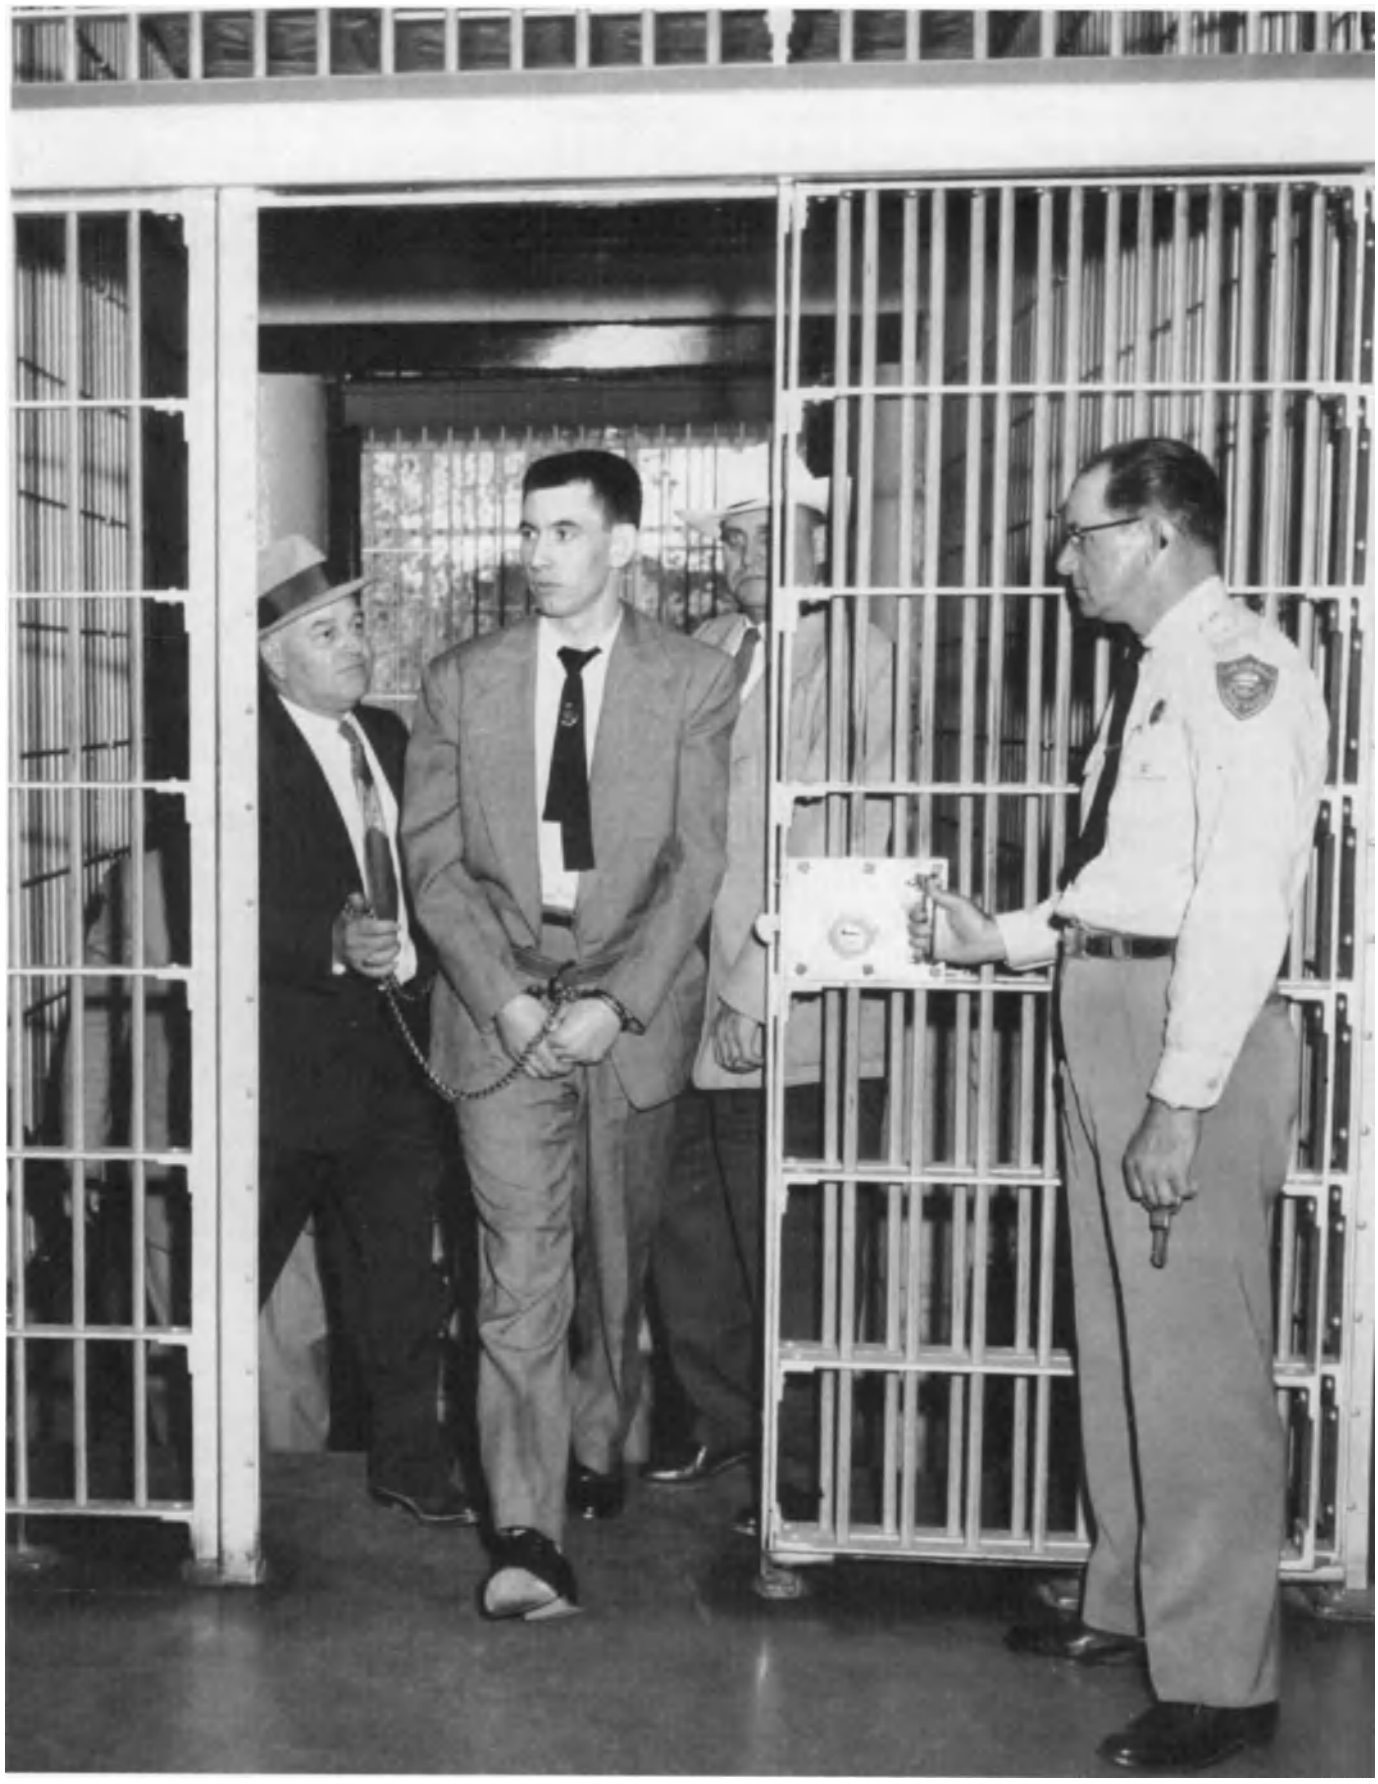
Moore threw a report in front of Graham. "This is from our lab and it proves that the crash was caused by a dynamite explosion." The agent looked at his watch. It was past midnight. They had been at it for almost six hours.

Then Graham sat stiffly in his chair. "May I have a glass of water, please?" he said. He was given a glass of water, which he drank slowly with long gulps. He put down the glass and, in a hard voice, said: "Okay, where do you want me to start?"

"Wherever you want to," replied Moore.

"Well, it all started about six months ago. Mother was raising hell because the drive-in wasn't making any money." He then explained how he had caused the explosion that wrecked the kitchen of the restaurant.

"And what about the truck you left on the railroad tracks so that you could collect the insurance after the train had wrecked it?"



A heavily manacled John Gilbert Graham, center, entering Colorado Penitentiary; he was executed in the gas chamber on January 11, 1957, telling a newsman before entering the chamber: "I'd like you to sit in my lap as they close the door in there."

"I did that, too, for the insurance." Graham's confidence had vanished. He squirmed in the chair. Sweat welled up on his forehead and ran down his cheeks. When he wiped it away with his handkerchief, his hand visibly trembled.

Moore leaned close to Graham. "What about the plane crash? You did that, too, didn't you?"

Graham wet his lips and looked at the ceiling nervously.

"What about the plane crash, Jack?"

Graham drank some more water, spilling some on his shirtfront, but said nothing.

"Come on, Jack," Moore persisted. "The truth. You blew up that plane for your mother's insurance. We know it. Let's have the truth from you."

Graham's bloodless face greeted the question. Slowly, he nodded, as if unable to speak the words. He then asked for more water. This was brought to him and he drank slowly, then said: "I might as well tell you everything." With that, Jack Graham became calm and in a deliberate, seemingly indifferent tone, he told in exacting detail how he had made his bomb from twenty-five sticks of dynamite, two electric primer caps, a six-volt battery and a timer (the fragments of sheet metal found by the technicians were from the battery).

Graham seemed proud to announce the fact that he had worked at an electric shop for more than a week to learn how to connect and activate the timer before buying the dynamite. Yes, he had taken the ammunition and the gifts for his half sister from the suitcase and replaced them with the bomb. After twenty minutes, Graham fell silent. A stenographer was then called into the office and he repeated the entire story, and then signed the confession.

John Gilbert Graham was arrested for sabotage and mass murder and later turned over to Colorado authorities. The stores where he had purchased the dynamite and timer were checked and Graham was identified as the buyer. Graham's half sister arrived from Alaska and told how Jack had once grimly joked about the possibility of his mother's hunting ammunition exploding during one of her plane trips. She quoted him as saying: "Can't you just see those shotgun shells going off in the plane every which way? Can't you just imagine the pilots and the passengers and Mother jumping around?" She thought he was insane.

Graham was placed in the Denver jail to await trial. He refused to see his wife, to whom he had transferred all his assets, and told a guard: "You can send my mail to Canon City [Prison] until next month. After that, you can send it to hell."

Graham claimed that he was without funds on December 9, 1955, when being arraigned for murder. Three lawyers were assigned to defend him. He was then charged with murder in the first degree, but Graham, ignoring his confession, entered a plea of "innocent and innocent by reason of insanity before, during, and after the commission of the crime."

The State then sent Graham to the Colorado Psychopathic Hospital, where four psychiatrists examined him. As a way of repudiating his confession, Graham told a weird, wholly unbelievable tale. He said to the doctors sitting before him: "While the FBI men were interviewing me in Denver, I saw a photograph on the wall and it fascinated me. It showed the capture of Nazi saboteurs on the coast of Florida during World War II and FBI men were digging up dynamite. Somehow, that gave me the idea of confessing that I'd used dynamite to blow up the plane but, really, I didn't do it."

Graham's ridiculous tale failed to convince the doctors that he was insane, and he was returned to jail to await trial. On February 10, 1956, Graham was found by guards in his cell almost dead, after trying to strangle himself with a pair of socks. He was revived and made his confession all over again, almost word-for-word with the statement he had given the FBI.

Night and day in his cell, he professed his deep sorrow for the murdering of his mother and forty-three other helpless human beings, but he would often recant his confession and turn brutally callous, telling guards that the people on Flight 629 were no more than strangers to him, saying the number of dead was unimportant, that "...it could have been a thousand. When their time comes there is nothing they can do about it."

Graham's trial began on April 16, 1956, at which time the confessed killer admitted signing his confession, but said that the confession was not true. He chewed gum incessantly and shrugged indifference at the testimony of the eighty witnesses and 174 exhibits brought against him. Though he had bragged that he would take the witness stand and demolish the State's case, Graham never sat in the box. He was convicted of first-degree murder on May 5, 1956, by a jury of five women and seven men after they deliberated only seventy-two minutes.

The Colorado Supreme Court heard Graham's appeal on August 8, upholding the decision of the lower court. Graham unexpectedly did take the stand this time, but only to inform one and all that his appeal had been made by his lawyers against his wishes. He was promptly sentenced to death. His lawyers went on appealing for many months, until the state Supreme Court ordered that the bomber's execution take place on January 11, 1957.

On that Friday morning, Jack Gilbert Graham stepped coldly into the gas chamber at the Colorado Penitentiary, where he would be pronounced dead within eight minutes after the lethal gas was let loose. Only a few moments before gingerly stepping into the death chamber, Graham turned to a few reporters standing nearby. One newsman who had incurred Graham's ire because of the criticism he had heaped upon the mass murderer, asked the condemned man if he had any last words.

"Yeah," snapped Jack Graham, ending his life with a wisecrack: "I'd like you to sit on my lap as they close the door in there."

THE CLUTTER SLAYINGS/ November 15, 1959

Richard Eugene Hickock (1932-1965) and Perry Smith (1929-1965) were habitual criminals, professional burglars, and thieves. Neither man was mentally sound, according to reports. Hickock had suffered headaches since a car crash in 1950 and Smith was diagnosed a paranoid long before both men became infamous (thanks to a pervasive, novelized book treatment of their otherwise pedestrian lives by author Truman Capote) for their slaughter of the Clutter family.

While serving time in the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing, Hickock learned from his cellmate, Floyd Wells, of a wealthy farmer in Holcomb, Kansas, Herbert W. Clutter. Wells, who was at one time employed by Clutter, told Hickock that the farmer often kept as much as $10,000 in a safe in his home. This misinformation—Clutter never held such sums in his rural house—sparked an idea of robbery in the devious mind of Hickock.

Perry Smith, who admitted killing one or more of the Clutter family members; he hanged on April 14, 1965.

Upon his release, Hickock teamed up with Smith. Both men planned to rob the Clutter family and then retire to South America, where they would while away their lives diving for treasure from a boat they would buy from the spoils of the Clutter robbery. The two thieves entered the home of the Clutter family on the night of November 15, 1959. They stumbled about in the darkness of the large farmhouse, until they awoke family members. Both men held their victims at bay with guns and knives, deciding what to do with them.

Richard Eugene Hickcock, who joined Smith on the scaffold in 1965 for the Clutter killings.

Hickcock. in custody after he and Smith were tracked down and arrested in Las Vegas; the killers had sought $10,000, but realized less than $50 for slaughtering the Clutters.

The intruders tied up the Clutters and then systematically searched the house. Failing to find anything other than about $50, Hickock and Smith turned in a rage upon the helpless Clutter family, which included Herbert Clutter, forty-eight; Bonnie Clutter, forty-five; daughter Nancy, sixteen; and son Kenyon, fifteen. They stabbed and shot the four members of the family, killing all of them before they fled.

Wells, who was still an inmate of the Kansas State Prison, heard the news of the Clutter deaths on the radio in his cell and he asked to see the warden, telling him about Hickock's talk with him earlier concerning the Clutters. Detective Al Dewey then led an exhaustive hunt for Hickock and Smith, finally running both men down in Las Vegas, where they were arrested.

The murderous thieves immediately turned on each other. Hickock told authorities that "Perry Smith killed the Clutters. I couldn't stop him. He killed them all!"

Smith denied killing anyone. Then he said of Herbert Clutter: "He was a nice gentleman. I thought so right up to the time I cut his throat." He later said he killed only the wife, Bonnie Clutter, and that Hickock murdered the rest. Smith added, as if to make himself appear noble, that Hickock insisted upon raping the 16-year-old daughter Nancy, but he had kept Hickock from sexually abusing the girl.

Only Herbert Clutter was knifed, his throat cut from ear to ear and his body then thrown into the basement of the house. The others were murdered as they sat tied to chairs, Hickock and Smith taking turns blowing off their heads with a shotgun.

Both Hickock and Smith were tried in March 1960 in Kansas City. The prosecutor in the case aggressively pilloried the two men, aptly describing them as inhuman beasts and reminding the jury that "chicken-hearted jurors" before them had allowed ruthless murderers to go free. The jury found Hickock and Smith guilty on four counts of murder and both men were sentenced to death. Appeals were denied and each man, quaking and screaming for mercy, were half-dragged to the gallows inside the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing on April 14, 1965, and promptly hanged.

"BORN TO RAISE HELL"/July 13-14, 1966

When he was nineteen, mass-murderer Richard Franklin Speck (AKA: B. Brian; Richard Franklin Lindbergh; Richard Benjamin Speck, 1941-1991) emblazoned a tattoo into his left forearm which accurately summed up his emotional and mental state at the time. It read: "Born to Raise Hell." Years later, Speck burned the tattoo off using the ember of a lit cigar. From his cell in the Illinois Penitentiary (Stateville) at Joliet, Illinois, he dreamed of the day he would be paroled. By his own admission though, the convicted killer of eight student nurses believed that the chances were not good. "If he was ever freed on parole, I'd probably take up arms myself," explained John Wilkening, father of one of the women Richard Speck murdered. "I have a lot of friends and so I would probably have to wait in line."

Richard Franklin Speck was born in Kirkwood, Illinois. He was one of eight children belonging to Margaret and Benjamin Speck. In 1947, the family moved to Dallas, Texas, where Speck completed junior high school. It was the only formal education the young man received before he left home. By the time he was twenty, Speck had been arrested ten times on charges ranging from criminal trespass to burglary.

Speck had tallied thirty-seven arrests by spring 1966, when he returned to Chicago to find work as a merchant seaman. The semi-literate drifter spent his waking hours reading comic books and drinking himself into stupors. He was a habitual Richard Franklin Speck, drifter, thief and mass murderer of eight nurses in Chicago on the night of July 13-14, 1966.

Speck's mother, Mrs. Margaret Speck Lindbergh, who raised him in Dallas, Texas, where, by 1966, he ran up 37 arrests.

One of the blood-stained bedrooms at the house in Chicago, where Speck molested and murdered some of his victims.

pill-popper with a distorted view of reality, evidenced by his total lack of recall concerning his movements the night of July 13, 1966.

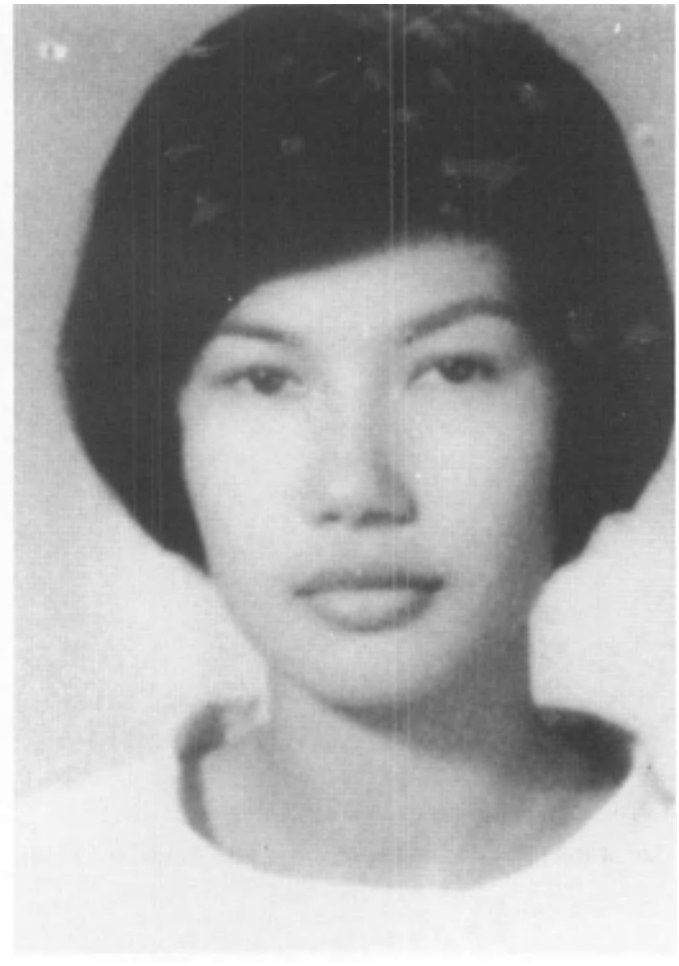
Speck shipped out on the cargo vessel the Randall, owned and operated by the Inland Steel Company. He was discharged in June 1966 for insubordination and fighting with a superior officer. His sister Martha Thornton, who lived in Chicago, provided him with pocket money and drove him to the National Maritime Union hall, where Speck hoped to find work on a cargo ship heading to New Orleans. But there were no berths available to him on July 10, 1966, the day he made his application.

Brooding about his inability to find any work on merchant ships, Speck began drinking for the next three days. His bender took him through the lowlife taverns and skid row dives that dotted the west side of Chicago, where he plotted ways to earn enough money to pay for his trip to New Orleans. On the night of July 13, the besotted Speck injected a narcotic into his veins and headed to the South Side to see what he might steal.

Speck wandered to a two-story townhouse belonging to the South Chicago Community Hospital on East 100th Street around 11 p.m. He dug into his pockets and pulled out a handgun and a knife. He knocked on the door, and after a few seconds had passed, 23-year-old student nurse Corazon Amurao appeared. "I'm not going to hurt you," he said. "I'm only going to tie you up. I need your money to go to New Orleans." Amurao and two of her companions were directed to the upstairs bedroom, where three of their other roommates were sleeping.

A second room of the murder house, coated with human gore, where Speck sexually attacked and then stabbed several nurses to death.

Mary A. Jordan, murdered by Speck.



Merlita Gargullo, murdered by Speck.

Gloria Davy, murdered by Speck.

Nina Schmale, murdered by Speck.

Valentina Passion, murdered by Speck.

Pamela Wilkening, murdered by Speck.

Patricia Matusek, murdered by Speck.

Suzanne Farris, murdered by Speck.

At gunpoint, the nurses were ordered to lie flat on the floor. The young women meekly complied with Speck's directive. He bound their hands and feet with strips torn from the bed sheets and then waited. At 11:30 p.m., Gloria Davy returned home from a date. Speck seized her at the door and led her upstairs. Then at midnight, Suzanne Farris and Mary Ann Jordan arrived home. Jordan did not live at the address; it was her tragic luck to be Farris' overnight guest.

Having tied up all nine young women, Speck then demanded their money. He restated his peaceable intentions. "Don't be afraid, I'm not going to kill you," he said. A few more minutes passed. Speck chatted with Merlita Gargullo, who was born in the Philippines. "Do you know karate?" he asked. According to the statements of Amurao the only survivor that night, Speck became increasingly agitated. He led 20-year-old Pamela Wilkening into the adjacent bedroom and stabbed her with his knife. Her muffled scream was stifled when Speck twisted her neck with a strip of sheet.

The killer was apparently sexually excited by committing this brutal murder and decided to continue killing. Speck returned moments later for Mary Ann Jordan and Suzanne Farris. The two of them were repeatedly slashed in the face, neck, and chest. Farris, the daughter of a Chicago Transit Authority employee, fought him, but was stabbed eighteen times. Afterward, Speck calmly went into the washroom, where he rinsed the blood off his hands.

The next victim was 24-year-old Nina Schmale from suburban Wheaton. He stabbed the woman in the neck and then strangled her to death. The remaining student nurses attempted to hide beneath beds, but Speck tracked them all down but one: Corazon Amurao, who succeeded in pushing herself under the bed and out of the killer's view.

Paralyzed with fear, Amurao heard the death cries of her two friends from the Philippines: Valentina Passion and Merlita Gargullo, who were stabbed in the next room. Twenty-year-old Patricia Matusek, a former swimming champion, was carried to the bathroom. She begged Speck to untie her ankles before he killed her. He kicked her in the stomach and then strangled her to death. This left Gloria Davy, the only one of the eight that Speck sexually molested.

Lone survivor, 23-year-old Corazon Amurao, who hid beneath a bed and went undetected by Speck; she later became the chief witness against the mass murderer.

Amurao remained beneath the bed for hours, fearful that Speck would find her if she attempted to escape. Not until 5 p.m. the next day did she venture out. She stepped out onto a narrow ledge outside her bedroom and called for help. Her cries were heard by two local residents. The police arrived minutes later. What they found shocked and sickened them: eight student nurses, savagely mutilated, were lying dead. Detectives found thirty fingerprints and a man's T-shirt was found beside Davy's body. Police artist Otis Rathel sketched a composite drawing of the suspect from a description provided by Amurao. The Chicago newspapers published the likeness the next day. As it turned out, Rathel's sketch bore an amazing likeness to the killer.

Speck's identity was established when a gas station attendant recognized the suspect from the police sketch. The suspect had told the attendant that he was looking for work at the National Maritime Union. The union retrieved Speck's application from a wastepaper basket. Fingerprints taken at the murder scene were matched to a set of Speck's prints on file with the Dallas police. With a name and a description of their suspect, police prepared to search for Speck. Their search was short-lived; the killer made himself easy to locate.

Following his murder spree, Speck had returned to his ninety-cent room at the Starr Hotel on West Madison Street, where he fell asleep. On July 16, 1966, the gaunt, thin-faced killer slashed his right wrist and left arm with a blade. As the blood pulsated from his arm, Speck called to the man in the next bunk. Failing to elicit sympathy, Speck stumbled into the hall. A police ambulance was summoned and he was taken to the Cook County Hospital emergency room, where Dr. LeRoy Smith attended to him. "What's your name?" Smith asked. He answered, "Richard. Richard Speck."

Dr. Smith summoned police, who promptly arrested the mass murderer. It took a Cook County jury only forty-nine minutes to convict Richard Franklin Speck of the crime of murder. On June 15, 1967, he was sentenced to die in the electric chair. After the U.S. Supreme Court set aside the death penalty, Speck was re-sentenced on November 22, 1972, to 400 to 1,200 years at the Illinois Penitentiary the longest jail term ever meted out, up to that time.

The flophouse room in which Speck cut both arms (his blood stains the floor in this photo) in an attempt to commit suicide.

Richard Speck, left, shown at the time of his 1967 trial; he was convicted and sentenced to death, but his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment following the U.S. Supreme Court's moratorium on the death penalty.

Nevertheless, Speck became eligible for parole in 1976. In 1977 and again in 1981, the convicted killer sent a tersely worded note to the state parole board saying that he was not interested in an early release. He was content to remain behind bars, where he happily pursued his hobby of oil painting. "Why don't you give parole to some of those young guys in here?" he complained. "They don't need to be in here in the first place."

In August 1987, Speck had a change of heart and asked that the Illinois Prison Review Board consider granting his application for early release. There was little chance of that occurring, however. The memory of Speck's crime was still fresh in the public's mind. According to Joseph Matusek, Patricia's father: "We can't let this go. We'll be there to oppose it."

Matusek and many other relatives of the slain nurses had no need to block the release of Richard Speck after December 5, 1991. On this day, the mass murderer died in his cell of a massive heart attack. Though dead, Richard Speck went on generating lucrative "news stories" for TV journalists such as Bill Kurtis, who exemplified the worst kind of TV's "crime journalism." One-time anchorman for the CBS affiliate in Chicago, Kurtis went on to produce and "star" as an on-screen narrator in a series of shock crime programs for the Arts and Entertainment (A&E) cable station. His show, euphemistically entitled "American Justice," and "Investigative Reports," pandered, among many unsavory subjects, a vile videotape that showed the imprisoned Speck using drugs and having oral sex with other male prisoners before his death.

Kurtis at first presented this tape to the Illinois House of Representatives in May 1996, as a way of "exposing" prisoner excesses, but he had already shown and would continue to show (with censored applications) this tape on CBS. In reality, Kurtis, having no credentials as a penologist or criminologist, or having any published works to indicate his expertise or authority in these fields, ostensibly used the tape to indict the prison system. His real purpose was obvious—he employed the tawdry tape to promote his own career and to boost viewership, typifying the tasteless brand of TV crime journalism that establishes notorious killers as media icons, recycling their rap sheets over and over again to reap large profits, ghoulishly feeding upon the rotting carcasses of society's worst criminals.

THE SHOOTIST IN THE TOWER/ August 1, 1966

A one-time altar boy, Eagle scout, and U.S. Marine, Charles Joseph Whitman (1941-1966) of Lake Worth, Fla., committed one of the most ruthless mass murder rampages in U.S. history. In July 1966, Whitman, twenty-five, was enrolled as a junior for the summer semester at the University of Texas in Austin. A student in architectural engineering, Whitman was taking an Charles Whitman at age thirteen, top, with his two younger brothers Patrick, left forefront, and John, right forefront.

Charles Whitman as a student at the University of Texas in Austin, a quiet scholar with psychological problems.

Whitman sleeps a short time before he began his mass murder spree, first killing his mother and wife.

unusually heavy class load of fourteen credit hours, the pressure from such studies, it was later thought, contributing to his mental breakdown and his illogical decision to embark upon mass murder.

Like the dark resolve of Howard Unruh in 1949, who first thought to murder his own mother, Whitman's first victims were selected from his own household. In the early morning hours of August 1, 1966, Whitman stabbed his 24-year-old wife, Kathleen Leissner Whitman, to death in his Austin apartment. He then shot and killed his mother, Mrs. C.A. Whitman.

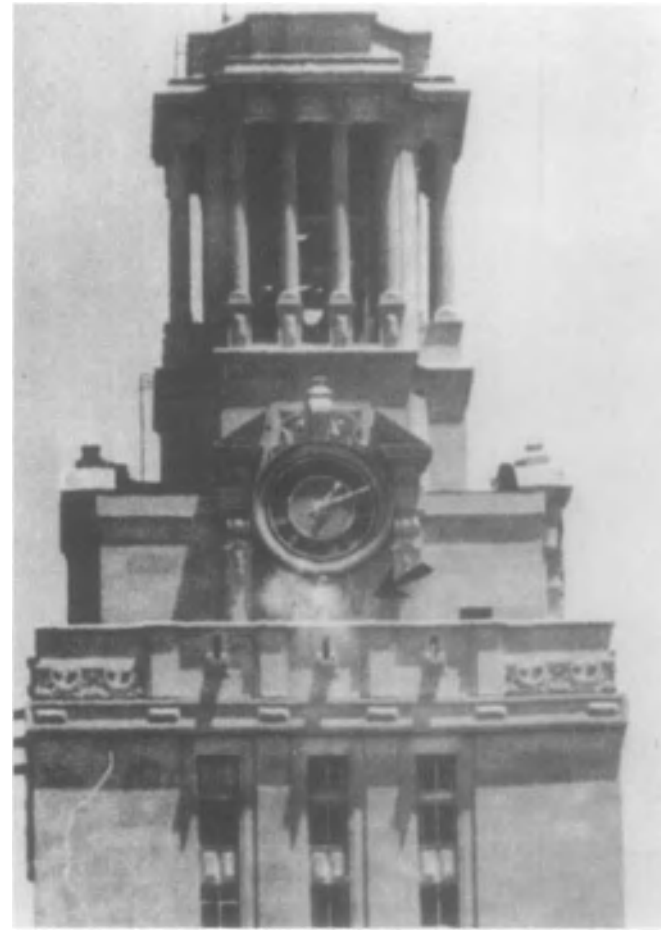
Nothing indicated that these savage attacks were provoked. Whitman left three cryptic notes in his apartment. The first, addressed to "Roy" read: "My mother's ill and won't be at work today." The two remaining notes were addressed "To whom it may concern." In one, Whitman professed love for his wife and mother, but confusion about why they had to die, except to "save them the embarrassment" of the action he had planned. Whitman expressed contempt for his father, a plumbing contractor from Lake Worth. He said he hated him "with a mortal passion."

Whitman spent the remainder of the morning assembling an arsenal of weapons and gathering provisions. A mail carrier, Chester Arrington, watched as Whitman retooled his shotgun in the family garage. "I talked to Whitman for about twenty-five minutes on the day he did it," Arrington recalled years later. "I saw him sawing off the shotgun, and I knew that was illegal." Arrington did not call police. "All I had to do was pick up the phone and report him. I could have stopped him. I've always blamed myself."

When Whitman was finished with his preparations, his foot locker resembled an arsenal. It contained a 6-mm. rifle with a telescopic sight, a Remington .35-caliber pump rifle, a .357 magnum pistol, a 9-mm. Luger pistol, a 30.06 reconditioned army carbine, a 12-gauge sawed off shotgun, and a large Bowie knife. The locker was well stocked with food and two bottles of water.

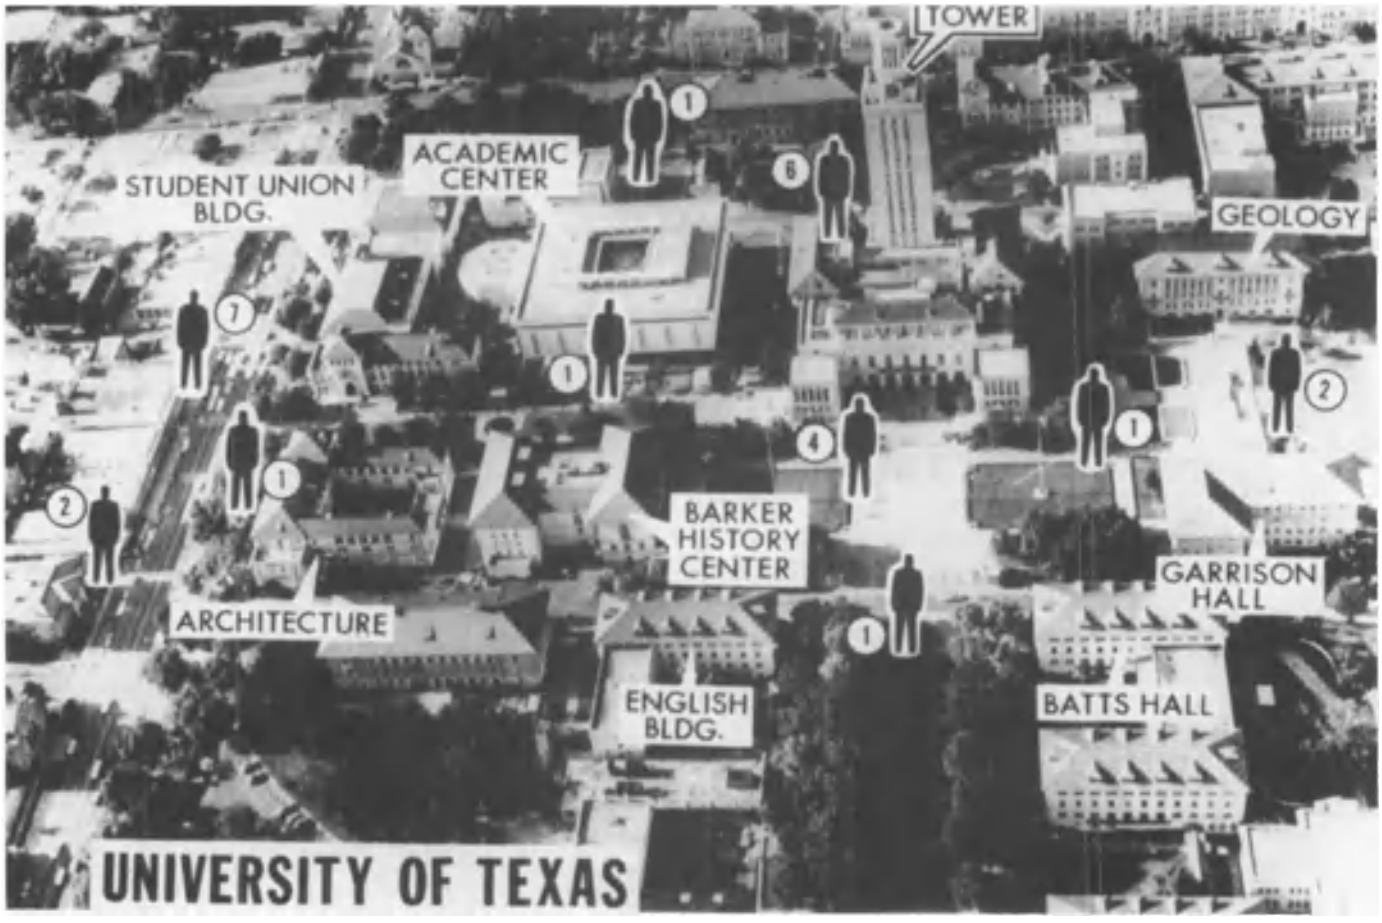
Whitman then carried the locker to the tallest building in Austin, a twenty-seven story tower on the university campus. The granite tower housed the university library and administration offices with an observation deck on the top level. In 1966, the deck was open to the public, commanding an expansive view of the entire campus and a significant portion of Austin. Whitman entered the tower, shot and killed the woman at the visitor's registration desk, and proceeded to the elevator. He next killed a mother and her two children, who were spending the day sightseeing. Just before noon, Whitman reached the observation deck, and with his cache of weapons he began random shooting at those below who fell prey to his telescopic sights.

An office worker on the eighteenth floor of the tower, Ruth Kiykendall, heard gunshots and called a friend in a nearby building. "Somebody's up there shooting in the tower," she said. "There is blood all over the place!" The campus was thrown into an uproar as students, faculty, and visitors scur-



The observation platform of the Tower at the University of Texas campus in Austin, where Whitman began firing at people after 11 a.m. on August 1, 1966; arrow shows where responding police bullets kicked up the dust when striking the side of the building.

A female student crouches behind a statue, right, during Whitman's onslaught of fire; a man lies wounded at left, one of the thirty-one persons injured by the sniper.



A police diagram shows Austin's University of Texas campus, where sixteen persons were killed and thirty-one wounded by Whitman (the numbers next to each figure indicate the number of dead or wounded found at that location).

Whitman's arsenal was found in the tower.

His face half shot away, the body of Charles Whitman lies on a stretcher only minutes after he was shot and killed by policemen.

ried for cover. Whitman fired his shots with unerring accuracy. He killed a student riding his bicycle near the Texas Union Building and a police officer standing behind a wooden fence. Whitman fired on a small boy and a pregnant woman, Mrs. Claire Wilson, who was taken to a hospital, where she gave birth to a stillborn baby.

Police sectioned off the campus, and tried frantically to keep 10,000 students and curiosity seekers out of the line of fire. A police airplane flew over the tower in an attempt to shoot the sniper. Armored cars were called in to rescue the wounded, several of whom lay bleeding in the 98 degree heat for more than an hour.

Whitman sprayed Guadalupe Street with bullets for eighty minutes. Police officers Romero Martinez, Houston McCoy, Jerry Jay, and George Sheppard rode up the tower elevator with civilian Allen Crum to subdue the sniper. Martinez and Crum slowly moved around the observation wall while the others covered exit doorways. Whitman spotted Martinez and fired once at him.

A few minutes later, Martinez fired six rapid shots while McCoy kicked in a door and emptied his shotgun. Martinez waved a green flag from the top of the tower signaling the all clear. Whitman lay dead on the observation deck, his head covered with blood.

"The sniper was on the northwest corner of the roof," Crum told reporters. "We rushed through the door and spread out." Whitman's body was carried out of the tower at 1:40 p.m. Later that day, administration officials allowed reporters up to the tower for a look. A pile of bloody rags was found lying in the corner. The glass face on the massive clock overlooking the campus grounds was chipped and fragmented with three bullet holes. The ex-Marine's murder spree left sixteen dead and thirty-one wounded.

School officials expressed shock over Whitman's actions. They were unable to uncover a motive. According to graduate faculty advisor Leonard F. Kreisle, Whitman "seemed to be more mature than most people his age." University Chancellor Harry Ransom released Whitman's student records, which showed that he had never been treated at the university for a psychiatric disorder, and was a "B" student. He had received an honorable discharge from the Marine Corps on December, 4, 1964, but had gone through court martial proceedings on one occasion for providing gambling loans.

Not everybody hated Charles Whitman. Hugo Ley, the owner of a Needville drug store remembered Whitman as a fine young man. "I loved Charlie," he said. "He was the kind of boy you would want for a son."

The residents of Austin were badly shaken by the slayings. Texas governor John Connally cut short a diplomatic visit to Rio de Janeiro to return home to launch a "complete and thorough investigation" into the sniper killings. Connally said that he hoped some good would result, and the inquiry would "shed light on the background and causes and give us some clues on preventing future occurrences of this nature."

In 1975, a made-for-television movie adaptation called The Deadly Tower starring Kurt Russell and John Forsythe aired on NBC. Martinez sued the network for $1 million, in a breach-of-contract suit, claiming the movie invaded his privacy and misrepresented his character by showing him as a radical. The same year, the University of Texas closed the observation deck, which had also been the site of several suicide attempts.

"TO MAKE A NAME FOR MYSELF"/ November 12, 1966

The summer of 1966 saw two of the most horrific mass murders in American history, the killing of eight nurses in July in Chicago by drifter Richard Speck, and the shooting deaths of sixteen persons in Austin, Texas, in August by sniper Charles Whitman. A third senseless mass murder would occur only a few months later in Mesa, Arizona, committed by a reclusive youth, who had become obsessed with the murdering Richard Speck.

Arrogant and maniacally grinning for photographers, mass murderer Robert Benjamin Smith, eighteen, is taken into custody only minutes after he killed four women and a child and wounded two others at a beauty parlor in Mesa, Arizona, on November 12, 1966.

Robert Benjamin Smith (b. 1948), was an 18-year-old high school senior living in Mesa, Arizona in 1966. The son of a retired Air Force major, the young man was intelligent and handsome, yet extremely shy. A good student, he was elected to the student council, but he made no friends and, other than attending school, remained for the most part in his room at home, where he consumed books about the American western outlaw Jesse James and French conqueror Napoleon I. When the news about the Chicago mass murders committed by Richard Speck dominated the press, Smith read every story, keeping clippings on the killings. When the Whitman story broke, Smith avidly collected news reports on those mass murders in Austin.

Three-year-old Debra Sellers was shot and stabbed to death by Smith "because she was jumping around a lot."

Glenda Carter, who was killed by Smith.

Mary Margaret Olsen, who was killed by Smith.

Fellow students thought Smith anti-social, but his reclusive attitude was later attributed to the fact that he had recently moved with his family from Maryland to Arizona. His father had retired from the Air Force and had taken a position in an electronics plant in nearby Phoenix. It was later learned that Smith harbored a deep hatred for his father and, on one occasion, lay await for him one night with a knife but abandoned the idea of murdering him.

Psychiatrists later described Smith as schizophrenic, one saying that the boy looked upon himself "like a god, cut out to become a kind of ruler over people." Nurturing a life-and-death authority, Smith also entertained at this time, according to analysts, perverted sexual fantasies in which he shot or stabbed women. It was ironic that his parents inadvertently put into his hands on his eighteenth birthday in August 1966, the very instrument with which to murder such women. He was at that time given a gift, a .22-caliber pistol for target shooting.

On the night of November 11, 1966, Smith helped his 6-year-old sister write a letter to Santa Claus and then, following the recorded routine of Charles Whitman in Austin three months earlier, began to pack a murder case. Into this container Smith placed his target pistol, rubber gloves, two hunting knives, extra bullets and several plastic sandwich bags which he first thought to use to suffocate female victims (another fantasy he had nurtured). At the last moment, he discarded the idea of employing the bags when he realized that they were too small to fit over a human head.

Carol Farmer, who was killed by Smith.

Joyce Sellers, who was killed by Smith.

Three-month-old Tamara Lynn Sellers, though wounded, survived when her mother shielded her with her own body.

The following morning, November 12, 1966, Smith walked into the Rose-Mar College of Beauty. He immediately fired a shot into a mirror, shattering it and terrifying all of the occupants inside the beauty parlor. He ordered the five women and two children into a back room, where, according to a survivor, he laughed and frequently talked "as if he was weak in the head." He next ordered the women and children to lie on the floor head-to-head, forming a pattern that resembled the spokes of a wheel.

"Are you kidding?" one woman asked Smith.

He kneeled next to another woman and put the pistol to her head, saying: "Do you think I am?"

A third woman tried to warn him off, telling Smith that more than forty persons would shortly arrive at the beauty parlor.

He snorted: "I'm sorry, but I didn't bring enough ammunition for them."

One woman began praying and Smith asked what she was doing.

"She's praying, if you don't mind," one of his captives indignantly replied.

"I do," said Smith and he began firing, shooting each woman in the head. Killed at point blank range were Glenda Carter, eighteen; Carol Farmer, nineteen; Joyce Sellers, twenty-seven; her 3-year-old daughter Debbie, and Mary Olsen. Three-month-old Tamara Sellers was saved when her mother cradled the child as she was being shot. He also fired a bullet into the head and arm of beautician Bonita Sue Harris, but she was alive, although she pretended to be dead, waiting for the mass murderer to leave. Debbie Sellers, however was still alive, but Smith drew his hunting knife and repeatedly stabbed her to death. He later told police that he "had to do it because she was jumping around a lot."

The gunfire attracted atten-

Beautician Bonita Sue Harris, who was wounded and survived by playing dead.

tion from neighboring shopkeepers and passersby and police were summoned. They entered the shop just as a smiling Smith was about to leave. He calmly told startled officers: "I shot some people. They're back there." He pointed to the back room of the beauty parlor. "The gun is in the brown bag." The officers found four women and the three-year-old girl dead. They rushed Harris and the baby, both badly wounded, to a hospital, where they recovered.

Smith was calm about his murder spree when confronted by police. One of the horrified officers asked: "Why did you do this?"

"I wanted to make a name for myself," Smith grinned. "I wanted people to know who I was."

Arrested, Smith cooperated with police, openly admitting the mass slayings, although he stated he did not expect to find any children in the beauty parlor when he entered the place.

"Why did you shoot the baby?" he was asked.

"Well, it was going to grow up and become an adult," Smith replied. He added that if his mother and sister had been in the beauty parlor when he entered it, he would have shot and killed them, too. He expressed no regrets, adding that the shootings had "exhilarated" him.

Robert Benjamin Smith was tried and found guilty of first-degree murder on five counts on October 24, 1967. He was sentenced to death, but the U.S. Supreme Court's moratorium on the death penalty caused his execution to be commuted to life imprisonment. He is presently serving four life terms and two 99-year terms, with no hope of parole.

THE MANSON "FAMILY"/ August 8, 10, 1969

One of the worst mass murderers in America was a runt. The illegitimate son of a teenage prostitute, Charles Manson (b. 1934), never stood more than five feet, two inches, and was an unlikely candidate to lead a criminal commune, let alone a murder cult. He nevertheless became a guru to a pack of psychopathic killers whose murders shocked California and the entire U.S. in 1969.

Manson was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on November 11, 1934. His mother, Kathleen Maddox, of Ashland, Kentucky, unable to support even herself through prostitution, left her son with his grandmother in Mc Mechen, West Virgina. He was later sent to Boys Town in Nebraska, but his incorrigible thieving and truculent manner soon caused him to leave.

Living a nomadic life, Manson drifted to Peoria, Illinois, where he was arrested for the first time for stealing food. He was sent to the Indiana Boys School in Plainfield, but Manson proved to be as surly and troublesome there as he had been at Boys Town in Nebraska. He escaped eighteen times from the Charles Manson, fourteen, having been released from a juvenile home and made a ward of the court in Indianapolis; his mother had abandoned him.

Manson at age sixteen, a photo taken of him when he was in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Charles Manson in 1969, at the time he supervised his motley "family" at the Spahn Movie Ranch and planned mass murders of whites, which he would blame on blacks to incite a race war.

Steven Earl Parent, eighteen, the first victim in the mass murders of August 8, 1969, shown at his high school prom.

school and finally fled west. He was arrested again in Beaver City, Utah, in 1951 for theft. Over the next four years, Manson spent most of his time in federal reformatories.

Manson served time in the National Training School for Boys in Washington, D.C., and he was finally paroled from the Chillicothe Federal Reformatory in November 1954. In the following year, Manson married Rosalie Jean Willis, and a short time later he was arrested and charged with transporting stolen autos across state lines. For this federal offense, Manson was sent to Terminal Island Prison outside Los Angeles to serve a three-year prison term.

In 1958, Manson was released and he immediately became a pimp, but again he was arrested, charged with violating the Mann Act for transporting females across state lines for immoral purposes. After several of these arrests, Manson resorted to forging checks and was again arrested, this time drawing a ten-year prison term in the federal penitentiary on McNeil Island, Washington. Released in March 1967, Manson bummed his way to Los Angeles. By this time he had spent seventeen years behind bars—more than half his life.

Almost illiterate and completely unschooled, prison life had nevertheless turned Manson into a shifty, cagey, and cunning creature, who had learned how to manipulate people in prison to compensate for his diminutive size. He had been used sexually by men in prison and he was bisexual, but by the time he reached California in 1967, Charles Manson had a decided taste for young women, especially the long-legged, long-haired flower children of the turbulent 1960s.

Manson mocked and sneered at convention and authority and he infused his mostly female followers with his own arrogant posture and hatred for the police and law. He labeled everyone opposed to his gypsy lifestyle an enemy of his "family," and he moved from one seamy road camp to another, first living with several young dropout women and a few docile and obedient men outside of San Francisco. Manson complained that the weather was too cold for his delicate body and insisted that his "family" follow him southward to the warmer climate of Los Angeles.

Heiress Abigail Folger, with Voytek Frykowski; both were killed by Manson Family members invading the home at 10050 Cielo Drive.

Hair stylist Jay Sebring, who at one time dated film starlet Sharon Tate; he was murdered in the slaughter of August 8, 1969.

There, in 1968, Manson quickly gathered new followers who were mesmerized by his hypnotic stare and monosyllabic pronouncements, which they mistakenly took for insightful comments from an idiot savant. He mouthed platitudes and generalities that were about as enlightening as the slogans on calendars in gas stations, where he had occasionally worked in earlier years. Yet his gobbledygook and gibberish appealed to young women seeking excitement and affection.

One such was 21-year-old Patricia Krenwinkel. She had grown up in an untroubled middleclass family, had been a Camp Fire Girl and had a good education. Krenwinkel held a good job with a Los Angeles insurance company, but the moment she met Manson on Manhattan Beach, she gave up everything. She even abandoned her car and did not bother to pick up her paycheck. She was typical of the followers Manson led to the Spahn Movie Ranch, a broken down shack-cluttered dusty area in eastern Simi Valley.

Susan Atkins, twenty-one, also joined Manson. Her background rivaled his own. She had worked at seamy jobs all her life, including that of a topless dancer and bar hustler. She was unkempt, unschooled, and, like many of her repugnant ilk, proud of her ignorance, lack of hygiene and defiance to authority. Worse, she had been a practicing satanist for a number of years, an influence which was to infiltrate the deluded, receptive minds of the Manson commune. She quickly became Manson's chief aide.

The group also included tall, pretty Leslie Van Houten, nineteen, a school dropout and LSD addict, who had run away from home at an early age and had lived like a tramp in the Los Angeles area until meeting Manson and joining the commune at the Spahn ranch. In July 1969, Linda Kasabian, twenty, stole $5,000 from the home of a friend to give to Manson so he would accept her as a member of his lunatic commune. Kasabian was married and had small children, but she took her infant daughter Tanya and abandoned the rest of her family to live at the Spahn Ranch. She, like Van Houten, was addicted to LSD and was usually in a drug daze when cavorting with Manson.

Also among this motley clan was Charles "Tex" Watson, twenty-three, tall, powerfully built, a one-time high school football and track star from Farmersville, Texas. Though he had been a top student, once Watson moved to the Spahn Ranch, he became a mindless robot who slavishly followed Manson's orders. Manson's every waking moment was spent either indoctrinating his followers with his own satanic teachings or by appeasing his insatiable sexual cravings by sleeping with one or two or all of his female followers at the same time.

Manson reveled in the sexual attention his females followers lavished upon him, and he promised each of his fanatical female cohorts that he would make them pregnant with his child as a reward for being loyal to him. As time went on, Manson began to tell his family that he was "Man-son," or "Son-of-Man," which he likened to Christ. He grew long hair and a scraggily beard and marched about Christ-like on the Spahn Ranch spouting his idiotic philosophy, telling his followers that he was not only Christ but Satan, too.

Actress Sharon Tate, pregnant when murdered, begged for her life and her unborn child, a plea her slayers ignored.

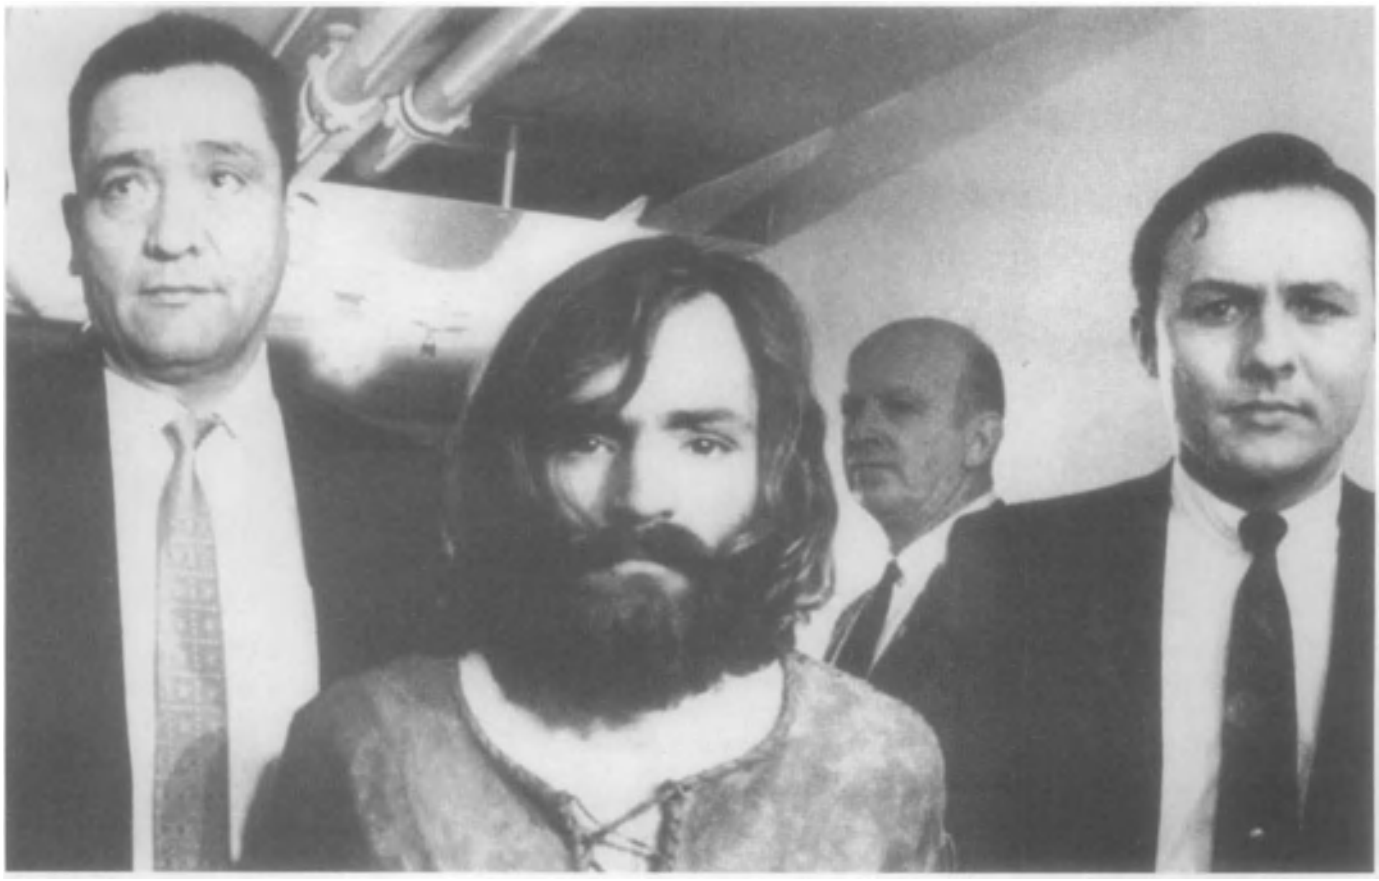
At this time Manson began to rant against blacks, saying that he had been sent to wreak divine havoc upon the earth, and against those who had allowed blacks to co-mingle with whites. The planet had to be purged of this inferior race, he said, and this could only be brought about by whites, who would rise up and slaughter all blacks. This world race war would not begin, Manson pointed out to his followers, until whites themselves had been brutally attacked, especially important white people.

His family, Manson proudly stated, had been selected as the instrument of his wrath. They would kill some important whites and blame the slaughter on the blacks. The result would be a general uprising by whites against blacks and the slaughter of blacks would ensue. Manson's hatred for blacks stemmed from his miserable life in prison, where he had been repeatedly raped by black prisoners. He would now take vengeance upon the entire race for this offense to his youthful body.

Meanwhile, Manson began playing the guitar and soon deluded himself into believing that he was one of the most accomplished guitar players in the world and a composer of great talent. He composed a monotonous song that was no more than a few notes strung together and lyrics that consisted of only two words "You Know" repeated over and over again.

Grocery store owner Leno LaBianca, murdered by Manson's people on the night of August 10, 1969.

Rosemary LaBianca, murdered with her husband in her home by the Manson killers on August 10, 1969.



Charles Manson, under arrest and charged with the Tate-LaBianca mass murders in 1969; he taunted the court and reveled in his notoriety, making contorted faces and babbling like an idiot.

Wearing "party" dresses, left to right, Susan Atkins, Patricia Krenwinkle and Leslie Van Houten arrive at their hearing.

Linda Kasabian, twenty-one, became the star witness for the prosecution, detailing the Manson Family murders.

Laughing contemptuously at the death penalty meted out to them (left to right) Susan Atkins, Patricia Krenwinkle and Leslie Van Houten leave a Los Angeles courtroom in 1971; they, along with Manson, and the hulking Charles "Tex" Watson were spared the gas chamber when a moratorium on the death penalty was decreed.

Charles "Tex" Watson, who fought extradition to California, was ultimately sentenced to death.

Manson thought that his song would, if he could get it before the public, become the most popular ditty in the U.S.

Pursuing that warped ambition, Manson contacted Gary Hinman, a successful musician, badgering him to make a hit out of his song. Hinman was amused by the dogged Manson and made the mistake of allowing Manson, Susan Atkins, and Robert K. Beausoleil, another fanatical follower of Manson's, to stay in his house. Hinman did little but tolerate Manson, and he subsequently enraged the pint-sized cultist by ignoring Manson's composition.

The group moved out of Hinman's house, but Manson harbored a deep hatred for the musician, coming to believe that Hinman was jealously ignoring his song. When hearing that Hinman had recently inherited $20,000, Manson sent Atkins and Beausoleil to Hinman's house to steal the money and kill Hinman for snubbing Manson and his brilliant composition. Beausoleil and Atkins held Hinman prisoner, torturing him, while they ransacked his house in their desperate search for the inheritance money, naively believing Hinman would keep $20,000 in his home.

After two days, Atkins and Beausoleil grew disgusted and murdered Hinman. Beausoleil stabbed the musician to death, while he was bound hand and foot. Atkins then dipped her fingers in her victim's blood and wrote on the wall of his resplendent home: "Political Piggie." The killers then wiped the house clean of their fingerprints and left, but they were sloppy. Two prints were overlooked, both belonging to Beausoleil, and police quickly identified him and tracked him down, finding the killer in his car wearing a shirt stained with Hinman's blood. The knife Beausoleil used to kill the musician was found in the car with him. He was charged with murder and jailed.

Manson ignored the loss of Beausoleil. He was expendable. Manson's only concern was to have his song published, and he next approached Terry Melcher, the son of singer-actress Doris Day, asking Melcher to introduce him to the important people he knew in the music industry so that they could benefit from his musical masterpiece. Melcher apparently did nothing to help Manson, which infuriated the little cult leader. In his demented thinking, Manson came to believe that he would instill terror in the heart of Terry Melcher, so much fear that Melcher would do as Manson asked.

To create this terror, Manson would unleash his drugged up followers, instructing them to murder some innocent people. Manson drilled his cultists, organizing a death squad, telling them to put on black clothes and enter abandoned buildings in grim rehearsals which the cultists called "the Creepie Crawlies." It was all a game to these people, who had reduced themselves to moronic obedience. They become slavish cretins, all of them, blindly following the orders of their leader, Charlie Manson.

On March 23, 1969, Manson and Tex Watson went to Melcher's lavish home, a sprawling tree-lined estate in remote Benedict Canyon. Melcher no longer lived at the house on Cielo Drive. Manson saw some glamorous-looking people moving about and he labeled them "movie star types." He did not know their names, but while still brooding about how Melcher had ignored him, Manson decided that everyone now living in the house, where Melcher once lived would die. Their deaths would prove to Melcher that Manson meant business, the business of death and that next time Melcher would be more energetic in promoting the little man's long-neglected song.

On the night of August 8, 1969, Manson sent his death

In this photo series, Charles Manson is shown making faces in a Los Angeles courtroom, where, despite the pleas of his attorney, he refused to face either the judge or jury; he was finally ordered from the courtroom for his incorrigible, moronic behavior and was later condemned to the gas chamber, which he escaped, along with his fellow murderers when capital punishment was put on hold.

squad to the house on Cielo Drive. Only Linda Kasabian lost her nerve at the last minute and remained outside the house, according to her later statements. Those unsuspecting inhabitants of the house included movie star Sharon Tate, eight months pregnant. The beautiful blonde was the wife of Roman Polanski, maker of horror films, who was then in London working on a movie. Also residing at the house was Abigail Folger, coffee heiress, who was living at the house with her boyfriend, Polish writer Voyteck Frykowski, a friend of Polanski's. Present in the house that night was Jay Sebring, a celebrated hair stylist to the rich and famous. Sebring was a former boyfriend of Sharon Tate's.

Manson had made all the necessary preparations for mass murder. He had given Tex Watson a rope, a knife, and a .22-caliber revolver, ordering him to take Krenwinkel, Atkins, and Kasabian with him. The cult leader directed Watson to kill everyone in the house adding: "And make it as gruesome as possible."

As the group entered the grounds of the estate, Watson came upon 18-year-old Steven Parent, who had been visiting caretaker William Garretson. The 19-year-old Garretson lived in a small house far removed from the mansion, one completely overlooked by the killers. Watson thrust the revolver into Parent's face and the youth begged for his life. Watson fired four shots into him, killing Parent instantly. Watson then entered the house with Atkins and Krenwinkel. They ordered Tate, Sebring, Frykowski, and Folger into the living room, telling them that they were only robbing the house and would harm no one.

Sebring was tied up, but he broke free and started to flee. He was shot to death. Then Frykowski, realizing they would all be killed, leaped forward, attacking the hulking Watson. He was shot, knocked down, and kicked; then Watson beat the Polish writer with the butt of the revolver, while the girls stabbed him fifty-one times. Folger made a dash for the back door and managed to reach the lawn before Krenwinkel ran after her and knocked her down. Watson caught up to Folger and stabbed her repeatedly until she was dead.

Only Sharon Tate was left alive. She pleaded for her life, telling Susan Atkins that she was pregnant and begged for the life of her unborn child. "Woman, I have no mercy for you," sneered Atkins, who then stabbed Tate sixteen times, killing her. The slaughterhouse killers then tied a rope about Sebring's head and the other end to Tate's mutilated corpse. They spread an American flag on the couch and then wrote the word "pig" on the front door in Sharon Tate's blood.

The killers changed their bloody clothes, gathered their weapons, and drove away, later throwing their clothing and weapons into a ravine in the San Fernando Valley. It was then they realized that they had left Atkins' knife behind at the murder scene. The foursome stopped at a small house and unraveled a hose which they used to wash away the blood on their hands and faces. The homeowner then appeared and chased the killers away.

The next day Manson and his followers, now numbering almost thirty, read the gruesome newspaper accounts of the murders on Cielo Drive. While the country reeled in disgust and shock, Manson and his followers wildly celebrated this Female Manson followers not charged in the mass murders shaved their heads and sat chanting outside a Los Angeles courtroom during the murder trials of Manson and his fellow killers; these women used aliases and refused to give authorities their true identities; like those convicted, they were social dropouts and misfits.

"triumph" by having a sex orgy, with Manson at the center of the frenzied love-making, and by smoking endless marijuana cigarettes. Manson then stated that it was time to make another terror raid.

On the night of August 10, 1969, Manson led his group of killers, including Watson, Atkins, Krenwinkel, Leslie Van Houten, and 23-year-old Steve Grogan to the home of Rosemary and Leno LaBianca, a house Manson randomly selected in the Silver Lake area. The LaBianca home was large and spacious. Rosemary LaBianca, thirty-eight, ran a fashionable dress shop and her husband, 44-year-old Leno LaBianca, owned a grocery-store chain.

Manson alone invaded the home by crawling through an open window. He awoke the couple, waving a gun in their faces and tying them up with leather thongs he habitually wore about his neck. He told them that he would not harm them, only rob their house. He took LaBianca's wallet and returned to the car, where his cultists sat joking, excited at the prospect of committing more senseless murders. Manson ordered Watson, Van Houten, and Krenwinkel to go into the LaBianca house and murder the man and woman he had tied up and told them he and the others were going into the house next door to murder its occupants.

When Watson, Krenwinkel, and Van Houten went into the LaBianca home, Manson and the others drove back to the Spahn ranch. En route, Manson stopped at a gas station. He handed LaBianca's wallet to Linda Kasabian and ordered her to place it in the women's washroom. He explained that some "greedy bitch" would find the wallet, use the credit cards inside, and then be blamed for the murders. He laughed at the cleverness of his plan.

Watson, meanwhile, was dutifully murdering Leno LaBianca. He dragged the man into the living room of his house and repeatedly stabbed him until he was dead, leaving the knife sticking in his victim's neck. He then covered LaBianca's head with a pillow case. Meanwhile, Van Houten and Krenwinkel had been in the bedroom, repeatedly stabbing the helpless Rosemary LaBianca. They stabbed and chanted at the same time, making forty-one wounds in the woman, a dozen after she was long dead. They tied a cord around her neck and covered her face with a pillowcase.

On the living room wall of the LaBianca home, the slayers wrote slogans with their victim's blood, spelling out in large letters the words "Death to all pigs" and "Rise." In the kitchen they wrote, also in blood, the words "Healter [sic] Skelter" on the door of the refrigerator. The killers did not flee, but enjoyed the home as if it was their own. They took a communal shower to wash away the blood and then helped themselves to a midnight snack by looting the refrigerator. Before the cult killers left the house, Watson took a carving knife and sliced the word "war" on Leno LaBianca's stomach. He then thrust the knife into the man's stomach and left laughing.

Self-styled guru and mass murderer Charles Manson, manacled at hands and feet, trudges his way to prison to serve life behind bars.

Many of Manson's followers left the Spahn Ranch after these incomprehensible slayings, including Atkins, who was later arrested and jailed for prostitution. She bragged to a prisoner about the killings and another inmate overheard the boastful confession. She informed police that Charles Manson had been behind the killings. On August 16, 1969, Manson and several of his demented followers were arrested at the Spahn Ranch, but then released for lack of evidence.

Manson was rearrested in a sleazy camp with some followers near Death Valley on October 15, 1969. Also in custody by that time were Atkins, Van Houten, Beausoleil, Grogan, and Kasabian. Police tracked down Krenwinkel in Mobile, Alabama, where she was hiding with an aunt. Watson had gone home to Collin County, Texas, where his influential relatives managed to fight off extradition for some time. He was finally returned to California and he, along with Manson, Krenwinkel, Atkins, Van Houten, Grogan, and Beausoleil, were placed on trial for murder.

The trial was often interrupted by the defendants who treated it as a lark. They laughed at the descriptions of their mutilations and murders and posed for newspaper photographers, especially Manson, who delighted in the limelight. He had finally found the attention he had sought all his life. Manson attempted to portray himself as the worst man on earth. He bragged to fellow prisoners that he had murdered at least thirty-five others, in addition to the Tate-LaBianca slayings, another lie from an inveterate liar.

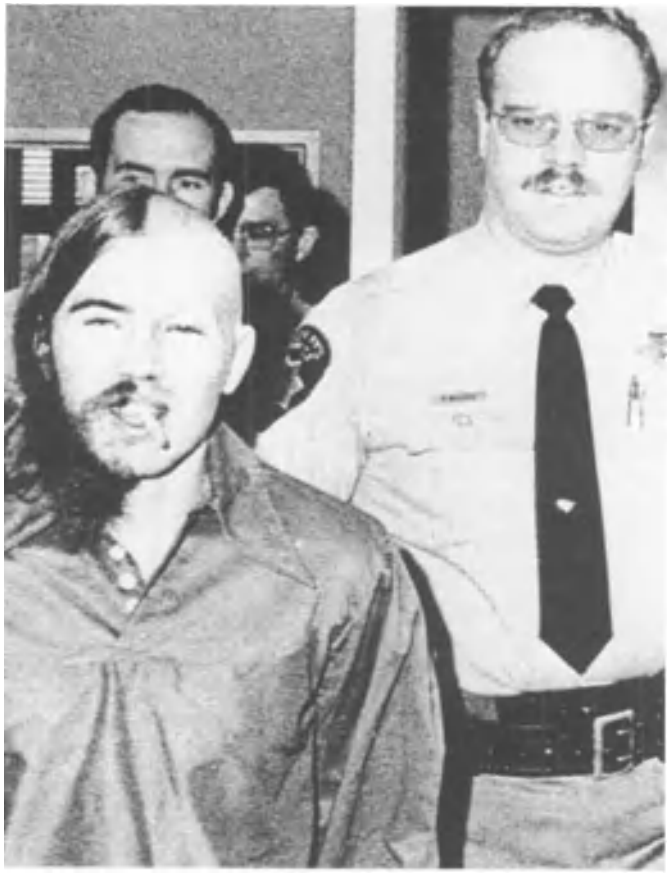
All of the repulsive defendants were found guilty and sentenced to die in the gas chamber. When the death penalty was abolished in California in 1971, the sentences were commuted to life imprisonment, which, by California law, allows prisoners to apply for parole every seven years. Thus far, all appeals for parole by the Manson killer-cultists have been denied. At this writing, the ever-inventive Charles Manson makes extra money to buy cigarettes and candy in the prison commissary at San Quentin by selling to fans his rolled up socks upon which he draws smiling faces and autographs with the flourish of a poor man's Pablo Picasso.

FIVE SLAYINGS IN SANTA CRUZ/October 19, 1970

The coastal village of Santa Cruz, about forty miles south of San Francisco, California, was the setting for a reenactment of the 1969 Manson killings. On October 19, 1970, the home of wealthy eye surgeon, Dr. Victor Ohta went up in flames. After firemen brought the blaze under control, they found the bodies of Ohta, his wife, Virginia, their two children, Taggart, eleven, and Derrick, twelve, and the doctor's secretary, Dorothy Cadwallader. All had been shot dead, their bodies dumped into the family pool.

A note attached to the family's Rolls Royce read: "Halloween 1970. Today WWIII will begin, as brought to you by the people of the Free Universe. From this day forward, anyone and/or company of persons who misuses the natural environment or destroys same will suffer the penalty of death by the people of the Free Universe. I and my comrades from this day forth will fight until death or freedom against anyone who does not support natural life on this planet. Materialism must die or mankind will stop." The note was signed "Knight of Wands, Knight of Pentacles, Knight of Cups, Knight of Swords."

The ritualistic nature of the murders indicated that a cultist familiar with tarot cards was responsible. The groups of hippies camped in the adjacent woods suggested another Manson cult. Police came to suspect 24-year-old John Linley Frazier (b. 1946), a local car mechanic, who experimented with hallucinogenic drugs. Frazier was separated from his wife and lived near a hippie commune in Felton. He was known to be a militant ecologist and tarot card practitioner.



John Linley Frazier, half his head shaved (in a blatant attempt to project schizophrenia), murdered the Ohta family in Santa Cruz in 1970 and went to prison for life.

Frazier had a criminal record at the time of his arrest, and had been seen driving Virginia Ohta's station wagon the day after the murders. He refused to confirm or deny his guilt, but his fingerprints were found on the Rolls Royce. Police and prosecutors pieced together the method of Frazier's premeditated mass murders.

The killer had planned to "execute" all the members of this well-to-do family days in advance. First, he waited for Mrs. Virginia Ohta to return home and shot her as she entered her house. Next, he waited for Victor Ohta, his children and his secretary to arrive and Frazier shot them as they appeared, dragging their bodies to the pool, where he threw them into the water.

Frazier was ruled legally sane, tried, and convicted on five counts of murder. Frazier was sentenced to die in San Quentin's gas chamber, but California abolished the death penalty in 1971, automatically commuting his sentence to life imprisonment.

THE CANARY ISLAND RITUAL SLAYINGS/December 22, 1970

The Alexanders, a reclusive German family, were religious fanatics, who believed that only a select few of their religious cult were free of Satan's control and that all others were instruments of the Devil to be purged by violence if the "chosen one" of their cult so decreed. This is exactly what happened to the Alexanders in 1970, when 16-year-old Frank Alexander (b. 1954) decided that his mother and sisters were possessed of the Devil and had to be murdered. A horrific slaughter followed in which Frank and his equally zealous father Harald Alexander (b. 1931) destroyed their loved ones in the name of God. They later excused their grisly acts as part of their religious beliefs.

The Alexanders had originated in Dresden and later moved to Hamburg, where Harald Alexander became the ardent disciple of George Riehle, a religious zealot, who was, in turn, the self-designated leader of the Lorber Society. Jacob Lorber (1800-1864) had founded this religious group in the early part of the nineteenth century, a severe spiritual organization that taught unflinching self-denial and upheld the beliefs that all non-members were basically evil. Riehle became a member of this small sect, which never numbered more than a few hundred members through the decades.

Some time in the 1930s, Riehle came to believe that he was the Prophet of God (the same kind of delusional perspective that gripped the distorted minds of religious zealots Jim Jones and David Koresh, whose paranoid actions led to mass murders—see following entries). Alexander met Riehle in Hamburg when the old man was dying and nursed him through his last days. When Riehle died, Alexander announced to his wife that he had inherited the mantle of the Lorber Society leadership. Dagmar Alexander, equally possessed of her husband's single-minded beliefs, accepted him in his self-appointed role.

When their son Frank was born, Harald Alexander told his wife that their son was now the Prophet of God and that his every whim had to be observed and obeyed. As the boy grew up, he was served by his family members—his older sister Marina, his younger twin sisters Sabine and Petra, and his parents—as if he were a potentate. They responded to his every whim, until Frank Alexander dictated their every movement.

The boy, when reaching his teens, decided that he could never "pollute" himself with the bodies of women outside of their small sect. He informed his father that he would have sex with his mother and older sister and such incestuous relations became commonplace within the Alexander household, the father not only agreeing to such practices, but encouraging his son to have sex with his wife and daughters at any time, often joining with Frank as they both assaulted Dagmar Alexander or the older sister, Marina. The women accepted their roles as sex objects in the belief that they were serving the Prophet of God, Frank Alexander.

Such bizarre practices soon brought them to the attention of the Hamburg police, especially when the younger sisters began to talk about them to the few friends they had made. To avoid police investigation into their activities, the Alexanders moved to a reclusive society, one far apart from the rest of the world, relocating to a small apartment at 37 Calle Jesus Nazareno in Santa Cruz, the capital of Tenerife in the Canary Islands.

Neighbors soon noted that the family remained aloof and its members seldom ventured from their apartment. Harald Alexander was forever playing a small organ that had been left to him by George Riehle. For ten months the family occupied the small flat without incident, the girls and Frank supporting the family with low-paying jobs. The girls worked as domestics and Frank was a shipping clerk, though he kept irregular hours.

Then, on December 22, 1970, Harald and Frank Alexander appeared in the villa occupied by Dr. Walter Trenkler, asking to see 15-year-old Sabine Alexander. Trenkler found the girl in the kitchen preparing a meal for the family and told her that her father and brother were on the patio waiting to see her. She went to them and Trenkler, to his amazement and shock, heard Harald Alexander say to his daughter: "Sabine, dear, we wanted you to know at once that Frank and I have just finished killing your mother and your sisters."

The girl took her father's hand and put it to her cheek and replied, "I'm sure you've done what you thought necessary."

Dr. Trenkler stood in shock for a moment, staring at the Alexanders. Harald Alexander caught Trenkler's stare and said matter-of-factly: "Ah, you've overheard. We've killed my wife and other daughters. It was the hour of killing." The horrified physician then looked over the father and son carefully. What he originally thought was mud and dirt on their clothes, the result of laboring he imagined, was not what covered them from head to foot. It was human gore that smeared their clothes and faces and hands, dried and caking in the hot sun of the courtyard where they stood.

Even more frightening was the conduct of the Alexanders. There was nothing secretive or sinister about them. They were calm and reported their gruesome acts as if nothing was amiss, that the killings they had just announced were perfectly acceptable. Trenkler asked the Alexanders to wait. He raced into the villa and called the police.

Officers quickly arrived and took the Alexanders into custody, while Detective Inspector Juan Hernandez and Detective Sergeant Manuel Perera went to the Alexander flat, accompanied by a police physician, and forced open the door. They stepped into a place of carnage. All of the dishes, clothing, papers, including passports and family documents, had been torn to pieces. Everything was in shreds. The apartment was coated with blood—ceilings, walls, floors. In the middle of the living room floor were the mutilated bodies of the two daughters, 18-year-old Marina, and 15-year-old Petra. Their breasts and private parts had been hacked away and nailed to one of the walls.

The older girl had been disemboweled. In the bedroom was found the remains of 39-year-old Dagmar Alexander, also horribly mutilated, her breasts and privates also hacked away. Her heart had been cut out, bound on a cord and this was nailed to the wall. The place was a grisly slaughterhouse running blood, a sight so overwhelming that even the hardened officers grew sick to their stomachs.

The Alexanders, at the local police station, freely admitted the gruesome murders. Frank Alexander, called "The Prophet" by his father, related how he was in the bedroom when Dagmar entered it. "I saw that Mother was looking at me and I had the feeling that it was not permitted for her to look at me in this manner. I therefore took the clothes hanger and struck her over the head. After I struck her several times she fell over and lost consciousness. Father had gone to the living room to play the organ and I also went there. First I struck Marina on the head with the hanger, and after she lost consciousness, I struck Petra. Father continued to play the organ and praise Jesus, but when I began to remove the offending parts, he came to help me."

Religious zealots Frank (who is staring defiantly at the judge) and Harald Alexander, are shown at their mental hearings; they had slaughtered female family members for being "unclean."

Harald Alexander supported every heinous detail of his son's statements, saying that the sex organs of his wife and daughters were "offending parts," and had to be removed, adding that the women in the household had expected the "hour of killing" at any time, that the family had discussed this "holy time" and its eventuality and that the women accepted their role as human sacrifices at the hands of The Prophet, Frank Alexander.

Both Frank and Harald Alexander then stated that they felt no guilt, that this was all part of their religious beliefs, that women were unclean and had to be purified by killing. They claimed that their victims had been released into heaven through their murders and they even celebrated their grisly acts by playing the organ, both taking turns, and singing hymns after slaughtering the females of their household.

Psychiatrists examined the father and son and concluded that they were both unfit to stand trial. Both were committed to an asylum for the criminally insane, where they presently reside, neither, at last report, responding to any kind of treatment and both convinced, still, that the slaughter of their family members was a purification act in keeping with their religious beliefs. Both men still believe that they are being persecuted for their beliefs and neither has expressed one thought of guilt.

Harald Alexander continues to address his son Frank as "The Prophet." Sabine Alexander, the surviving female member of the family, begged authorities to send her to the asylum with her brother and father, but this was rejected. She was sent to a convent, where she still resides, refusing to live in the outside world.

A WHITE RACIST KILLER/ February 14, 1977

His massive arms pockmarked by racist tattoos, Frederick W. Cowan is shown shortly before he embarked upon a mass murder spree on February 14, 1977.

Frederick W. Cowan (AKA: Second Hitler; 1944-1977) had three great pleasures in life: his collection of Nazi memorabilia, his weapons collection, and weightlifting. He bore tattoos of Nazi symbols on his arms, and expressed his hatred of Jews and blacks to anyone who would listen. He attributed his hatred of blacks to a time during the Vietnam War when a black man refused to help him. But Cowan was never in Vietnam. Then his neighbor in New Rochelle, New York, Theresa Schmidt, started dating a black man.

On August 2, 1975, when Schmidt walked by Cowan's house, he pointed her out to a nearby kid as a "nigger lover." Schmidt, overhearing, turned on him and demanded to know what he had said. Cowan went to the trunk of his car, grabbed a rifle, and said: "Get out of there before I blow your brains out!" Schmidt ran to call the police, but the officer, who answered the call expressed no interest in pursuing the matter when Cowan was not in sight on his arrival. Months later, when Schmidt passed Cowan's house again, he pointed a rifle at her and pulled the trigger, but the weapon was not loaded.

In January 1977, 33-year-old Cowan's opinions got him in trouble at his job. He was suspended after refusing to work for a man he thought was Jewish. The superior, who suspended him, Norman Bing, was himself Jewish, and later stated that "the guys figured he was a lot of talk. He had no history of violence. Everybody said he was a pussycat." But on Valentine's Day 1977, his first day back at work, Cowan drove to work at the Neptune Moving Company, stood in the parking lot, and armed himself as if for battle with pistols, hand grenades, bandoliers of ammunition, and a semi-automatic rifle.

Cowan then walked into the main entrance searching for Bing, and immediately shot and killed two black men passing through the office. Cowan told another employee, "Go home and tell my mother not to come down to Neptune." He continued into the company cafeteria, up the stairs, killing two more

The headquarters of the Neptune Moving Company in New Rochelle, New York, which a heavily-armed Cowan invaded for the purpose of shooting blacks and Jews.

A police armored vehicle is shown arriving at the Neptune Company, where Cowan had shot five persons dead and wounded others; hundreds of spectators can be seen behind a police barricade in the distance.

Wearing flak jackets and carrying high-powered rifles, New Rochelle police are shown entering the Neptune building, where Cowan was found dead, a suicide.

A Nazi flag and a picture of Adolf Hitler, Cowan's idol, was found with Cowan's arsenal in his home.

people on the way. When a squad car arrived, Cowan saw it from a window and shot and killed one policeman as he emerged from the car. Within minutes, the Neptune building was under siege, a New York City Police Department armored personnel carrier on hand to help.

The killer, moving back and forth from the offices to the roof, would not answer loudspeaker calls for several hours, even when his mother arrived and spoke to him. Once Cowan shouted that he had "plenty of grenades and other guns to last me all day." Another time he answered a phone and said, "I'm sorry for your trouble. Tell the mayor that I'm sorry to be causing the city so much trouble." At 2:40 p.m., a single shot sounded. As the police cleared the building, they found that Fred Cowan, killer of five, had killed himself with a gunshot to the head.

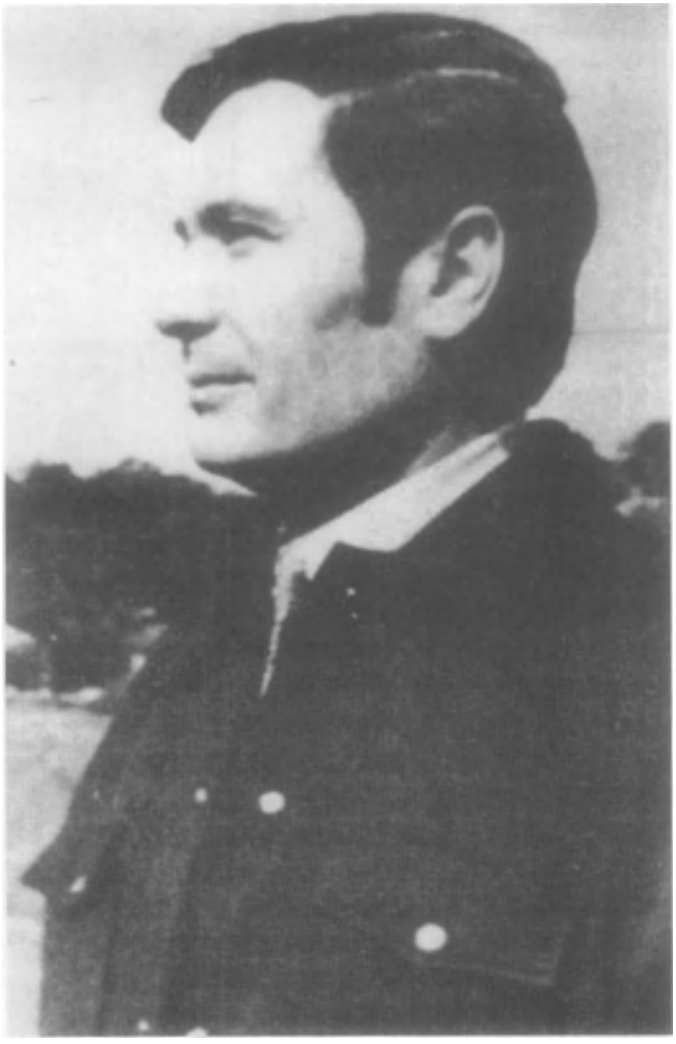
MASS MURDER IN GUYANA/November 15, 1978

Boyhood friends of the Reverend James Warren "Jim" Jones (1931-1978) would recall the times when he held mock funeral services for dead animals in his home town of Lynn, Indiana, where the cottage industry was casket making. "Some of the neighbors would have cats missing and we always thought he was using them for sacrifices," recalled Tootie Morton. Jones, whose father was a drunken Klansman unable to hold a job, became obsessed with religion. At fourteen, the Bible-toting boy delivered his first sermon. In 1949, Jones married Marceline Baldwin, his high school sweetheart.

After Jones dropped out of Indiana University, the couple moved to Indianapolis, where he started a Methodist Mission, but the church fathers found his religious pretensions objectionable. He was expelled in 1954 and then raised money by importing monkeys and selling them for $29 each. Jones accumulated $50,000, which was used to purchase a rundown synagogue in a black neighborhood of Indianapolis. During this time he and his wife adopted eight Korean and black children.

The mayor of Indianapolis, impressed with Jones' community work in the impoverished neighborhoods of the city, appointed him director of the Human Rights Commission. But when Jones found Indianapolis too provincial in its racial attitudes, he moved to Belo Horizonte, Brazil, after reading that this was the safest spot in the world to survive a nuclear holocaust. The family later relocated to Rio de Janeiro, where Jones taught in an American school. Hearing that the People's Temple in Indianapolis, which he had founded in 1957, was in the midst of a leadership crisis, Jones returned home. In 1964, he affiliated his group with the Disciples of Christ and was ordained a minister.

Influenced by the Reverend Ross Case, and half-believing that the world was about to end, Jones led a migration of 100



Rev. Jim Jones, when he was beginning his ministry in San Francisco, seemingly a forthright religious leader.

followers from Indiana to Redwood Valley, in Mendocino County, California. The minister purchased a synagogue in the deteriorating Fillmore district of San Francisco. He provided a day-care center and food kitchens for the black inner-city residents, who accounted for 80 percent of the congregation of the People's Temple and won the enthusiastic support of politicians.

Governor Jerry Brown was a visitor to the People's Temple. Mayor George Moscone (later murdered, see chapter on Assassination) appointed Jones to serve on the city's housing authority as a reward for his political support in the 1975 election. After hearing of the Jonestown horror, Moscone would say, "I proceeded to vomit and cry."

Money began to roll in. Jim Jones purchased Greyhound buses and began traveling around the country accompanied by bodyguards and press aides. At the same time, he urged sexual abstinence to his parishioners, he surrounded himself with female followers. In 1974, he purchased 27,000 acres of rain forest in Guyana on the northern coast of South America, which he hoped to turn into a socialist utopia for himself and his followers.

Despite warm endorsements from top Democratic leaders like Henry "Scoop" Jackson, Walter Mondale, and Jimmy Carter, whom Jones supported for president in 1976, he became obsessed with the notion of mass suicide as a way of escaping governmental persecution, his fascination with suicide dating back to 1953 when Ethel and Julius Rosenberg were executed in the U.S. as spies. By 1976, Jones was indoctrinating his followers in the concept of a "White Night," a mass suicide ritual that was being "rehearsed" at his People's Temple.

The first clue the public had about Jones' hidden agenda and the secret cult activities occurred at an anti-suicide rally held at the Golden Gate Bridge on Memorial Day 1977. Speaking before hundreds of spectators, Jones called for the construction of an anti-suicide barrier to be constructed on the bridge. Dr. Richard Seiden, professor of behavioral science at the University of California, later recalled how the direction of Jones' speech changed. His condemnation of suicide became almost a blanket endorsement for it. "He saw himself as the victim, persecuted and attacked, and from there proceeded to the concept of suicide as an appropriate response. We were not aware of the nuances and implications," Dr. Seiden said.

Membership in the People's Temple swelled to nearly 20,000, and as his congregation enlarged, Jones' services became increasingly bizarre. He claimed in his sermons to have the power of faith healing, and would demonstrate his powers by drawing out the "cancer" from the sufferer during ceremonies. This was a sham, the cancer actually being a bloody chicken gizzard. No longer content to be the reincarnation of Jesus, Jones began calling himself God.

Meanwhile, with the help of local authorities in Guyana and private contributions from his followers, he began clearing large sections of jungle in 1977. That year, the religious colony of Jonestown was founded and about 1,000 members made their exodus from San Francisco to the jungle retreat.

When located at the new settlement, Jones enforced his will through physical and mental coercion. The San Francisco Examiner reported in August 1977 that members were publicly flogged for minor infractions like smoking and falling asleep during religious sermons. Electrodes were attached to children, who were ordered to smile at the mention of the leader's name. These reports began filtering back to California congressman Leo Ryan, fifty-three, who pressured the U.S. State Department to investigate.

A delegation from the U.S. embassy in Georgetown interviewed seventy-five members of the cult, but none indicated a desire to leave. Ryan was not convinced. His friend, Robert Houston of the Associated Press, had lost a son to the cult. The young man had been murdered in San Francisco after attempting to quit the People's Temple. Ryan embarked on a fact-finding mission on November 14, 1978, accompanied by eight journalists and several relatives of Jonestown cultists.

The delegation was greeted by a congenial Jones, who led a guided tour through the compound, proudly showing off the spacious library, hospital, and living quarters. That night Congressman Ryan and his party were entertained at the pavilion. Even Ryan was impressed. He arose from his chair and announced: "From what I have seen, there are a lot of people here who think this is the best thing that has happened in their whole lives." Jones led the thunderous applause.

The People's Temple in San Francisco, where Jones had an enormous following; it was from this congregation that Jones gulled hapless parishioners into following him to Guyana.

Jim Jones in Guyana, where he oppressed his followers, holding them in virtual captivity.

After ordering Congressman Ryan and his companions killed, Jones ordered his slavish followers to commit mass suicide, although many reluctant to do so were murdered.

The next day, NBC reporter Don Harris asked Jones about his military arsenal and if it were true that the compound was under heavy guard. Jones exploded in rage. "A bold-faced lie!" he screamed. One of the cultists slipped a note to Ryan which read "Four of us want to leave." There were other similar requests. While Ryan spoke with Jones about moving these people out, a cultist named Don Sly attacked him with a knife, but was subdued by attorney Charles Garry. Ryan and his entourage departed for the airfield at Port Kaituma and an awaiting Cessna.

As Ryan and his companions deliberated about the best way to squeeze the extra passengers into the tiny craft, a flatbed truck rumbled onto the landing field. Three armed men standing in the trailer suddenly opened fire. From inside the plane, Larry Layton produced a gun and began shooting. The crossfire left five persons dead, including Congressman Ryan, photographer Greg Robinson, NBC cameraman Bob Brown, Don Harris, and one of the departing cultists, Patricia Park.

While Ryan and his entourage were being fired upon, Jones was preparing his followers to carry out "revolutionary suicide" at the compound. His brainwashed parishioners, who had rehearsed this scenario dozens of times, were herded into the main pavilion, where they received purple Kool-Aid laced with cyanide. Mothers gave cyanide voluntarily to their children. Infants received the substance with a syringe squirting it into their mouths.

Next came the older children, who received the lethal doses in paper cups, and finally the adults, who accepted the poison as Jones intoned through a loudspeaker: "We're going to meet again in another place!" Those who refused to accept this fate were prodded by heavily armed guards. Within five minutes, most of the 913 victims were dead. Not since the Japanese citizens of Saipan hurled themselves from the rocky cliffs of the island in World War II had the world witnessed such a mass suicide (or murder, as the wholesale slaughter was later termed, since most of the victims were forced to take the cyanide at gunpoint).

An aerial photo shows hundreds of bodies in the compound of Jonestown on November 15, 1978; most swallowed poison, but many were found shot to death by Jones' enforcers.

Jones, like Adolf Hitler years earlier, killed himself with a bullet to the head. No eyewitnesses survived. Investigators later found rows of bodies, most of them lying face down. The U.S. Air Force sent planes to retrieve the remains of the victims while experts in human behavior and sociology grappled with larger issues. "Most members have little or no sense of inner value," theorized Stefan Pasternack, associate clinical professor of psychiatry at Georgetown University. "In joining [Jones] they regress and relax their personal judgments to the point that they are supplanted by the group's often primitive feelings. With a sick leader these primitive feelings are intensified and get worse."

One person went to trial for complicity in the Jonestown Massacre. Thirty-five-year old ex-Quaker Layton, a member of Jones' death squad, was charged with injuring U.S. diplomat Richard Dwyer and conspiracy to kill Congressman Ryan. The jury in the San Francisco courtroom was unable to agree on a verdict. The courtroom was packed with relatives of the victims when, on September 23, 1981, a mistrial was declared by Judge Robert Peckham.

MASS MURDER IN WACO/ February 28, April 19, 1993

An unorthodox religious cult calling itself the Branch Davidians occupied a sprawling compound on seventy-seven acres ten miles east of Waco, Texas. Its leader called himself David Koresh (Vernon Howell, 1960-1993) and he preached an oddball dogma, which he made up more or less from biblical teachings.

Like Jim Jones before him, Koresh was paranoid and egomaniacal. Also, like Jones, he thought of himself as the Messiah. He brainwashed his followers so that they came to believe, as did the doomed apostles of Jim Jones in Guyana, that his word was law. The uneducated Koresh ordered his cult to collect a huge cache of arms, including automatic weapons of all kinds, in preparation to fight apocalyptic battles against the powers of darkness at the end of the world.

Those powers, according to the mentally unstable Koresh, were represented by the federal government. "We were thought of as God's marines," one of the cult members later said. "If you can't die for God, you can't live for God." This addlebrained philosophy summed up Koresh's warped message.

Learning that the cult had hoarded illegal weapons in violation of federal law, agents of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms conducted a raid against the Davidian compound on February 28, 1993. It proved to be a disaster. More than 100 law enforcement officers took part in the raid. When officers rushed the building, Koresh's heavily-armed cultists fired upon them. Four ATF officers were killed and at least fifteen were wounded in the resulting firefight. Several cult members were killed and wounded as well.

David Koresh (Vernon Wayne Howell), shown at the time he embarked upon his career as a religious zealot and leader.

An early photo of David Koresh, left, with friend Clive Doyle; Koresh was paranoid, egocentric and came to believe he was the reincarnation of Jesus Christ.

One of the wounded cultists was the 33-year-old Koresh, a failed rock guitarist turned religious fanatic who used the Bible for his own dictatorial ends. Born Vernon Howell in Houston, Texas, in 1960, the cult leader changed his name in 1991 to Koresh, reportedly to help his musical career, but there was a religious scheme in taking the name. Koresh is the Hebrew equivalent of Cyrus, which, along with David, is a name of historical and symbolic significance. Cyrus was the Persian king, who delivered the Jews from captivity and David became the first great king of the Jews.

The Waco Tribune, at the time of the ATF raid in 1993, had been running a series of articles on Koresh and the Davidians, giving the attention-seeking cult leader exactly what he incessantly craved—publicity. The paper quoted Koresh as saying "If the Bible is true, then I am Christ. But so what? Look at two thousand years ago. What's so great about being Christ? A man nailed to the cross. A man of sorrow acquainted with grief. You know, being Christ ain't nothin'."

After he was wounded in the raid, Koresh left a message on his mother's answering machine, "Hello, mama. It's your boy. They shot me and I'm dying, all right? But I'll be back real soon, okay? I'll see y'all in the skies. Bye." The message was typical of Koresh, pouty and petulant as a boy, always seeking sympathy and attention. He was not dying, as he told his mother, carelessly inflicting pain and fear upon her as was his habit with all he knew.

The seriousness of Koresh's wound was never learned, but it was reportedly superficial and he exaggerated its threat to his life to appear heroic and invincible to his followers. While agents surrounded and besieged the rural compound, Koresh continued to dominate cult members barricaded inside the large adjoining buildings. The living quarters featured a watch tower with windows facing in every direction, along with tunnels connecting smaller buildings to the main quarters.

Koresh urged his followers to fight to the death, saying that the agents would do anything to suppress the cult and kill its leader, himself. He ordered everyone to learn how to fire the many weapons available inside the compound. This arsenal was vast, according to one agent who, during the raid, was able to see into one room where weapons were stored. He said that he had never seen so many firearms in one room before.

The Branch Davidian compound outside of Waco, where Koresh and his gun-carrying followers amassed a large arsenal.

During the 45-minute gun battle in February, cult members fired at agents with a .50-caliber machine gun, the ammunition for which one agent described as being "the size of your average banana ... It's the kind on the ground with a tripod that they also use on planes to shoot down other planes." Another agent who survived the withering crossfire from the compound stated that "I don't believe we were outmaneuvered or out-planned. The problem we had is that we were outgunned."

The raid itself was questioned by several persons, including newsmen and, later, politicians, who condemned it as being rash. The ATF stated that it intended to serve Koresh and his followers with arrest and search warrants, when they were ruthlessly attacked by the cultists. Koresh follower Paul Fatta, who was outside the compound running errands when the raid took place, later insisted that the ATF could have easily served their warrants on him and Koresh without bloodshed, that Koresh in early 1993, at the time he defied federal officers, challenging them to attack the Branch Davidian compound.

ATF officers holding one of their wounded men during their abortive raid on the Branch Davidian compound on February 28, 1993, which resulted in ten deaths (four ATF officers and six cult members).

Tanks are shown attacking the Branch Davidian compound on April 19, 1993; the buildings were already burning and cult members died by the score inside the blaze, some by the fire, others by Koresh's execution squads.

both he and the cult leader went out jogging every day for three weeks prior to the raid and could have been approached without violence by agents at that time.

Following the raid, TV cameras representing all the networks and local press were stationed around the compound, which the cultists called Mount Carmel. They gave minute-by-minute coverage to the siege. The first day after the raid, Koresh allowed ten children to leave the compound. More than seventy-five cult members remained with him inside, most manning heavy weapons. Of the remaining members, one third were children. Koresh, who claimed to have at least fifteen wives, had sired many of these children—no one ever knew how many.

Lawmen prepared for a lengthy siege by trucking two mobile homes to the rural site. They also ordered up a national guard fuel tanker, a milk truck, two fried chicken delivery trucks that made regular food runs for them. Inside, the Davidians continued to eat well as they had stocked great quantities of food for months, some said years, in preparation for the apocalyptic vision seen by their demented leader. Hordes of media representatives who swarmed into the area received coffee, donuts, and sandwiches from the Salvation Army.

The siege became one of the year's most spectacular media events. Whenever contact was made with the Davidians, the messages—those that were released to the press—were treated as something close to Holy Scripture. Whenever a cult member could be coaxed away from the possessive Koresh, the event was treated as a major victory for law enforcement.

The reason two elderly women came out of the compound a few days after the siege began was simply that they were carrying a tape recording from Koresh, which he wanted played on local radio stations, his side of the story, he claimed. The tape contained nothing more than a ranting diatribe in which Koresh portrayed himself and his followers as persecuted victims of the ATF.

Catherine Mattson, 75, and Margaret Lawson, 77, handed the tape to ATF officers, saying that they preferred to go back to the compound and meet the fate of the others. Instead, they were charged with conspiracy, attempted murder, and murder. These charges were later dropped.

Four days after the raid, on March 3, 1993, a report flashed across the news channels that an undercover ATF agent was inside the compound and that he had been aware that Koresh received a phone call an hour before the February 28, raid that the ATF agents were moving in, a call that allowed the Davidians to arm themselves and prepare to kill federal officers.

The FBI then took over the siege and attempted to establish a dialog with the cult leader. Bureau agents sent a video to Koresh to show to parents inside the compound, one which portrayed how well their children were being treated in the custody of welfare authorities. In return for this gesture, Koresh released another child, the twenty-first permitted to leave the compound.

Meanwhile, Koresh's reputation was going to ruin. The husband of a cult member revealed that he had gotten custody of his young daughter after it was proven that Koresh had threatened the child with obligatory sex. The father stated that Koresh had had sex with compound children, who were no older than twelve and that he claimed the Bible entitled him to at least 140 wives.

Koresh and the FBI went on bantering in lengthy phone conversations that led nowhere. Koresh had no intentions of leaving the compound alive, or allowing any more members to go. His ego was such that he demanded and got national media coverage almost around the clock. He thrived on it, lived for it day to day. The FBI foolishly gave it to him. The

The entire Branch Davidian compound is shown engulfed by roaring flames, following the FBI attack on April 19, 1993; agents were fired upon by Koresh's gunmen as they attempted to enter the buildings.

The arms bunker found by FBI agents inside the gutted ruins of the Branch Davidian compound, proving the ATF claim that Koresh and his followers had hoarded a great quantity of illegal weapons.

U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno, who, most critics concluded, had thoroughly misread the character and intentions of Koresh and his deluded followers and botched an otherwise peaceful settlement by ordering a foolhardy and bloody attack on the Branch Davidians.

agents merely heard Koresh out, listening to him drone on and on about his religious beliefs. Then the Bureau ordered heavy armaments of their own.

When Koresh heard that the FBI had brought Bradley armored personnel carriers to the scene, he told agents that he had enough explosives to blow these vehicles fifty feet into the air. The FBI escalated its armaments by ordering to the scene 67-ton Abrams battle tanks. After seven frustrating weeks, on April 19, 1993, the FBI took action, under the direct orders of U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno. Agents ordered Steve Schneider, Koresh's fanatical chief lieutenant to lead the cult members out into the open and surrender. When Schneider refused, the tanks moved toward the compound, blowing holes in the sides of the buildings.

Tear gas was fired into the building. Agents later insisted that though they were fired upon by the cult members, they did not return fire. A few hours later, shortly before noon, the main buildings of the compound caught fire and a towering blaze engulfed the compound. Rather than be taken alive, the Davidians, ever loyal to their mad messiah, doused the walls and floors of the buildings with kerosene and burned themselves and their helpless children alive.

Of the seventy-two bodies recovered after the blaze, seventeen were children. Twenty adults and two children were found to have died of gunshot wounds. It took thirteen days to identify Koresh's crisply charred corpse. It was determined that he had not burned to death, but that he had been shot to death by one of his own obliging followers.

In the wake of the Waco disaster, Attorney General Janet Reno was heaped with criticism for mishandling the entire affair. She boldly confronted the press, saying that she took full responsibility for events, but this in no way ameliorated the botched siege and the resulting deaths. Reno had given the order to storm the compound, she said, in order to save children from being abused, but all of the children involved met death.

Reno's inexperience with fanatical cultists and the poor evaluations of the situation and Koresh's actual personality profile she received from erring advisers undoubtedly caused her to mishandle the entire affair. At best, Reno proved herself wholly inept and why she was not removed from office by President William Clinton remains a mystery to this day. The bombing of the ATF headquarters in Oklahoma City two years later by Timothy McVeigh was reportedly in retaliation for the Waco fiasco. (See chapter on Terrorism.)

In the end, David Koresh got from the FBI exactly what he wanted. Reno and her agents were either too ignorant or too indifferent to understand that his capture could have been facilitated by means other than a direct confrontation. Had the Bureau ordered media coverage banned and all phone and TV lines cut to the compound, isolated the place entirely and withdrew its forces to hidden positions, Koresh and his followers would certainly have come out peacefully, looking for what they needed to sustain their existence—attention.

Instead, Koresh was given what he craved most, public martyrdom. Any cursory psychological evaluation of his personality would have pinpointed for the Bureau the fact that this man was a limelight-seeker who, if ignored, would have abandoned his failed scheme for an apocalyptic end. He was an egomaniacal leader who had duped his naive, uneducated followers into believing that he was a religious icon and that their collective bloody end would have some sort of religious significance. In truth, he was only another babbling faker greedily grasping for publicity, insatiable for fame, notorious or not. He was willing to sacrifice his life and those of his followers to obtain that fame. Janet Reno and the FBI, unsophisticated and uneducated themselves when it came to really knowing people like David Koresh, gave it to him on a gory platter.

SLAUGHTERING CHILDREN IN BRAZIL/ July 23, 1993

Homeless children abound in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. These half-starved youngsters swarmed around tourists and committed petty thievery merely to survive, and the government does little or nothing to relieve their suffering. Worse, in the early 1990s, shopkeepers and perhaps even government officials, secretly paid death squads made up of off-duty military police to get rid of these children by simply killing them.

To that end, several military policemen, including Marcus Vinicius Emmanuel (b. 1967), drove up to Rio's Candelaria Cathedral on the night of July 23, 1993. There, as they came every night to sleep, were seventy-two homeless children. They had been warned to get off the streets or else, but they had no where else to go. Huddled next to the church, the children suddenly came under automatic fire from Emmanuel and others. Eight children were killed and scores more wounded.

Leader of a Rio murder squad, Marcus Vinicius Emmanuel (center), is shown leaving a courtroom after receiving a sentence of 309 years for murdering six or more children.

Emmanuel was later identified by one of the survivors, Wagner dos Santos, who testified against him in court. Nelson Cunha, another accused officer, confessed to helping commit the massacre and testified against Emmanuel. To the shock of everyone, Emmanuel was convicted and sentenced to 309 years in prison, a sentence later reduced to 89 years at his retrial.

These seemingly long prison terms mean little in Brazil. Emmanuel would be eligible for parole in about five years and he was sent to a military prison, where he continued to hold his rank and receive his salary.

Cunha was tried later and found guilty, sentenced to thirty years, but this prison term was also reduced when he was retried. The abuse and murder of helpless, homeless children in Rio has gone on unabated since the trials of Emmanuel and Cunha and remain the shame of Brazil.

A BLACK RACIST KILLER/ December 7, 1993

A deep hatred for whites coursed through the mind of Colin Ferguson. A native of Jamaica, Ferguson had spent some time on the West Coast, a lonely black man, who was remembered for only one thing, hating whites and Asians. He obtained an automatic pistol and went to New York. In the evening of December 7, 1993, Ferguson was riding the 5:33 local train from Penn Station in Manhattan. As it rolled into the Long Island town of Garden City, he suddenly produced the pistol and began running down aisles of the train, selecting whites to kill.

Ferguson shot and killed six persons and wounded nineteen others until three courageous passengers tackled him and held him for the police. Not until January 26, 1995, was Ferguson brought to trial. He was dissatisfied with his defense attorneys early on, including the flamboyant William Kunstler, who had planned to conduct a defense of "black rage." Such a defense seemed to be racist at best, one which Ferguson himself apparently disliked.

After his attorneys described their client as paranoid and delusional, Ferguson fired them and became his own defense lawyer. Judge Donald Belfi, presiding over the case in a Mineola, New York, courtroom, indulged the arrogant Ferguson by allowing him to defend himself. He chose fellow Jamaican Alton Rose to be his "legal adviser."

Rose described Ferguson's attempt to defend himself as similar to "a patient in a doctor's office trying to perform his own spinal cord operation." Dressed in a suit, white shirt and tie, Ferguson impersonated a lawyer (while wearing a bullet-proof vest under his shirt, a protective measure he insisted upon, stating that he believed the trial was nothing more than a conspiracy to murder him).

Ferguson's defense of himself constituted a ridiculous shambles of legal mumbo-jumbo. He spoke as if he knew the law, saying things like "Is it your testimony that," and "Would it be fair to say that," and "Was it also your finding that," all in bad imitation of a real lawyer. He picked up legal phrases and applied them where they did not fit. He referred to himself in the third person, as "Mr. Ferguson," and "the defendant."

Black racist Colin Ferguson, center, holding documents, is shown entering court, where he awkwardly acted as his own defense counsel; he was convicted of murdering six white persons and wounding nineteen others.

Taking weeks to prepare his case, Ferguson asked Judge Belfi for more time. He wanted to summon President Clinton and New York Governor Mario Cuomo to testify, because it was reported that both had talked to witnesses in the trial. He got angry when the court ruled against these demands.

Ferguson then offered several theories as to how the mass shooting took place. First, he insisted that he was asleep when a white man stole his gun out of his bag and commenced shooting everyone in sight and that he had been arrested simply because he was black. When this argument was dismissed as ridiculous, Ferguson stated that another black man with the same name as his and looking identical to him committed the shootings.

The high point of this legal theater of the absurd was when Ferguson began raving that the killing of Jeffrey Dahmer (a notorious killer and cannibal—see chapter on Cannibalism) in a Wisconsin prison, which had recently occurred, was linked to a vast conspiracy against him, Colin Ferguson. Then one after another, the survivors of Ferguson's shooting spree confronted him in court. For the first time in any American trial, the victim confronted the criminal face to face, answering the bizarre Ferguson when he asked that the attacker be identified. Maryanne Phillips faced the killer coolly and said, "I saw you shoot me."

This was repeated time and again, twelve out of the seventeen surviving victims saying "It was you who shot me," and "You are the man who shot me." He asked one witness, "Did the gunman shoot you?" The victim replied while looking straight at Ferguson, "As soon as you had time to point the gun at me and pull the trigger." When Robert Giugliano, a burly contractor Ferguson had shot in the chest, took the witness stand, his icy stare so unnerved Ferguson that he asked for a fifteen-minute recess.

It was apparent that the strutting, posturing Ferguson was inflicting more pain upon his victims, first having shot them, then compelling them to recount in detail the horror he had inflicted upon them and then identify him as their assailant. On February 15, 1994, Ferguson had run out witnesses to identify him as a ruthless killer and he also refused to take the stand on his own behalf. It was, as Judge Belfi stated, "the moment of truth." Ferguson rested his case, which was no case at all.

On February 17, 1994, a jury deliberated ten hours and then returned six guilty verdicts in the murders of six of the train passengers. Ferguson was also convicted of twenty-two counts of attempted murder. Carolyn McCarthy, whose husband had been shot to death by Ferguson and whose son Kevin had been crippled for life by a gunshot from the killer, had sat quietly behind the defendant throughout the trial. At its conclusion she stated, "It's been a long fourteen months, but justice has been done."

Judge Belfi later sentenced Ferguson to six life terms in prison, a total of 200 years with no hope for parole. He would die behind bars. Robert Giugliano was still enraged at the mass killer, shaking his fist at an unperturbed Ferguson and shouting, "I feel this animal should suffer till the day he dies! ... Given five minutes with Colin Ferguson, this coward would know the meaning of suffering!"

SLAUGHTER BY A FAMILY FRIEND/ August 29, 1994

Residents of East Virginia Avenue in Vinton, Virginia, awoke on the morning of August 29, 1994, with the sounds of sirens in their ears. The two-story home down the block occupied by Blaine and Teresa Hodges and their two daughters, Winter and Anah, was on fire, flames shooting out of the windows. By 9 a.m., the firemen had contained the blaze, but the house was a smoldering ruin. Detectives arrived to investigate the report that four bodies had been found inside the cinders, those of 41-year-old Blaine Hodges, his 37-year-old wife Teresa, and their daughters, 11-year-old Winter and 3-year-old Anah.

In what remained of the living room, detectives discovered that Teresa Hodges had been strangled and that her corpse had been saturated with diesel oil and another accelerant thought to be gasoline. Blaine Hodges was found sprawled on the remains of a bed in the master bedroom. There was a bullet in his right temple. The two girls were found hugging each other in death. Both had been shot point blank between the eyes.

Earl Conrad Bramblett, at the time he befriended the Hodges family in Vinton, Virginia.

Police at first concluded that the family had been wiped out by a murder-suicide committed by Blaine Hodges. A recently fired .22-caliber handgun was found beside him. He had killed his wife, then shot his two daughters and finally himself, detectives believed. Blaine Hodges, they quickly learned, had been fired from his postal job after being convicted of embezzling $5,000, and was to begin a six-month prison term, all reasons, though not good ones, for prompting the destruction of his family and himself.

Disrupting police theories was a report that came from Dr. David Oxly, deputy chief medical examiner for Western Virginia. After examining the body of Blaine Hodges, he determined that he had been dead more than twenty hours before his wife and daughters died. Oxly also reported that Teresa Hodges had died a horribly painful death, that it took fifteen minutes before she died of strangulation.

Detectives then realized that someone had murdered the family and staged the murder-suicide, placing the handgun next to Hodges and a hammer next to the body of his wife. Though Blaine Hodges had problems, he and his wife had been struggling to work things out. They had been selling Amway products out of their home and had told friends the night before their murders that they were planning to hold an Amway sale at their home within a few days.

Though many leads came to the police, none proved to turn up the mass murderer. More than three years later, however, Earl Conrad Bramblett (1942-2003), a handyman who had been Blaine Hodges' friend for twenty years, was indicted for the family slayings. His background had caused prosecutors to charge him with capital murder, three counts of first-degree murder, three counts of using a firearm and arson, despite the fact that they had no murder weapon, no eyewitnesses, no informant, and no confession. Their case was wholly circumstantial, but prosecutors felt confident of a conviction.

Earl Bramblett, right, at the time of his trial for the mass murder of the Hodges family in 1994. He was found guilty and sentenced to death.

Bramblett was born on March 20, 1942, and raised in poverty. He had been an excellent high school track star, winning a scholarship, but though he attended three colleges he never earned a degree. He married and fathered two sons, but his wife divorced him, citing his alcoholism and his abnormal fondness for little girls. It was this latter penchant of Bramblett's that caused detectives to pursue him as the primary suspect in the Hodges slayings.

Two women had accused Bramblett of sexually molesting them in 1970, and another woman claimed that he had threatened her with a gun. In 1977, he was a prime suspect in the disappearance of a 14-year-old girl, but evidence against his involvement could not be developed. A 10-year-old girl came forward in 1984 and accused Bramblett of molesting her, but she later refused to testify against him.

After Blaine Hodges was accused of embezzling $5,000 from the post office, Bramblett appeared to come to the aid of his old friend, loaning him a few dollars here and there. He began sleeping in the Hodges home for days on end. Bramblett then began making advances to 11-year-old Winter Hodges, calling her on the phone when she was in bed, asking what she was wearing, calling her when he was in the bathtub. He tape-recorded his phone conversations with the girl in what he called his "diary tapes." He recorded his innermost thoughts while he walked his dog or drove his pickup, which was white and had a black tailgate—a neighbor had described just such a pickup leaving the Hodges driveway shortly before the fire broke out in the early morning hours of August 29, 1994.

On one of the tapes, Bramblett was heard to say: "I'm trying to get her [Winter Hodges] to do things that aren't proper." He then began to imagine that Hodges wanted him to spend time at his house "so that they can manufacture some charges against me," in order to escape the pending prison term Hodges was facing. On the day before he was to leave for prison, Hodges had warned his wife not to let Bramblett in the house. By then Teresa and Winter had complained about the actions of the handyman, but on that day, Bramblett had taken the front and rear doors of their house off their hinges, claiming that they should be painted.

Earl Bramblett, a prison photo taken a short time before his execution on April 9, 2003.

The day before the murders, a boy from the neighborhood spotted Bramblett's pickup truck in the alley in the back of the Hodges house, and Teresa, Anah and Winter were sitting inside. That afternoon a ranger at the Jefferson National Forest saw a white pickup with a black tailgate parked near Jennings Creek in Botetourt County. He saw Teresa playing with Anah on the grass and spoke to her. Winter Hodges was fishing with Bramblett at the time. With Hodges being sent to prison, it was apparent that Bramblett planned to become the head of the Hodges household, his aim being to sexually seduce 11-year-old Winter Hodges.

All of this and more was used by prosecutors to build a case against Earl Bramblett, who was put on trial in October 1997. Several persons came forward to state that they had seen Bramblett close to the Hodges home before and after the fire. Bramblett's ex-wife testified that he had called her in the afternoon following the fire to shout, "There's a fire at the Hodges house and they're going to blame me!"

Bramblett had showed up at the Vinton police station a short time later, asking to talk to the leading investigator on the Hodges case. He said that he was a friend of the family and wanted to know if anyone had been injured in the blaze. When told that all the family members were dead, Bramblett yelled, "The sorry son of a bitch! He had a beautiful family. He did them and did himself!"

The 72 tapes Bramblett had recorded which detailed his mundane movements and his attempts to seduce Winter Hodges were played before the jury. (They were retrieved from the Indiana home of Bramblett's sister after Bramblett was arrested there.) A detective report disclosed how a .22-caliber handgun had been retrieved from Bramblett's room. Also found at that time was a drawing the defendant had made of four stick figures with lines going through the heads of three of them, lines that correctly described the angle of the bullets the killer had fired into Hodges and his daughters, information known only to the police and the killer. Moreover, Bramblett had directly implicated himself when talking to police about the case, mentioning that gasoline had been sprinkled about the body of Teresa Hodges, another fact known only to the killer and investigators.

Moreover, detectives testified that Bramblett had shown up at the Vinton police station after the fire freshly bathed, shaved, even his tennis shoes washed (the tongues were sticking up and they had no shoelaces). From examining the Hodges bathroom, they later determined that he had, after killing all the family members, taken a shower, washed his clothes of any traces of blood, and shaved. He then went to the kitchen and made himself lunch, eating casually while Teresa Hodges' body lay only a few feet away from him. After eating, he set the house on fire.

Defense attorneys had a weak case. They claimed that their client was delusional. They then stated that the Hodges family had been wiped out by vicious drug dealers (the same kind of claim made by defense attorneys in the infamous O.J. Simpson case—see Celebrity Slayings). They stated that Teresa's half-brother had been an informant for the Drug Enforcement Administration and that the family had been killed in retaliation by drug-running murderers.

The jury was unimpressed. On October 31, 1997, after deliberating for only two hours, the jury returned a verdict of guilty on all counts. On November 5, 1997, Roanoke County Circuit Judge Roy Willett sentenced Earl Bramblett to death. Bramblett was executed in Virginia's electric chair on April 9, 2003. Shortly before his death, he was visited by his ex-wife and his two sons. When strapped into the oak chair (built by prison inmates), Bramblett insisted that he was innocent. "I didn't murder the Hodges family," he said. "I've never murdered anybody. I'm going to my death with a clear conscience."

"WHAT KIND OF EVIL PERSON ARE YOU?"/August 15, 1996

A native of Sacramento, California, Frederick Martin Davidson (b. 1960) was the product of a broken home, his parents divorcing when he was a child. He nevertheless proved to be a good student and his service with the army was unblemished. He moved to San Diego and studied at San Diego State University, earning a bachelor's degree in mechanical engineering in 1991. He decided to continue his studies and earn a master's degree and toward that end did research with 32-year-old Professor Chen Liang.

At times, his roommate later stated, Davidson expressed gratitude and friendship for Liang, but other times he said he considered Liang his enemy, that he was just stringing him along, using him to work long hours in research so that he, Liang, could take credit for that work. This was the classic complaint of all post-graduate students, that they performed the dirty work for researchers who later took the data, wrote papers on it, and furthered their careers through the labors of their students, even publishing books researched and written by those students.

A utilitarian and compulsive cleaner, Davidson's Spartan room was always spotless. The only thing adorning its walls were his bachelor's degree and a calendar. He was forever tidying up after himself and others.

Davidson apparently harbored a deep resentment for Liang and two other engineering professors, who were to meet him on August 15, 1996, in a room on the SDSU campus and pass review on his thesis. He had already been rejected by this panel and he believed that his master's degree was even further beyond his reach in that Liang had been critical of his research and that 44-year-old Professor D. Preston Lowrey III had caught him using stolen notes in a recent test.

Frederick Martin Davidson wipes away tears after receiving three life terms for the mass murder of his teachers at San Diego State University on August 15, 1996.

Following a careful, premeditated plan, Davidson slipped into the SDSU examination room on the third floor of the Engineering Building at about 10 a.m. on August 15. He hid a 9mm Taurus handgun with an extra clip of ammunition in the metal first-aid kit box on the wall. Returning at about 2 p.m., Davidson was greeted by three professors—Liang, Lowrey, and 36-year-old Constantinos Lyrintzis. Three student monitors stood behind the three-man thesis review panel.

Liang stood up, walked around a long table where the panel sat and went up to Davidson to state the purpose of the review. Davidson said nothing. He immediately went to the metal first-aid kit box, opened it, and withdrew the 9mm gun. He aimed this at Liang and shot him down, killing him. Lowrey and Lyrintzis, along with two students, fled. Lowrey ran toward the hall and Davidson shot him down. Lyrintzis and two students fled into a nearby computer room, but Davidson found them. He pushed away the students and fired several times into Lyrintzis' crouched body, killing him.

Campus police were by then summoned and they found Davidson standing in a hallway holding the gun at his side. He was weeping and asking the officers to shoot him. A few minutes later he dropped the gun and was arrested and taken into custody. The mass murderer never offered any excuses or reasons for the killings. He was found guilty and, on July 18, 1997, appeared in San Diego Superior Court for sentencing.

Before hearing his fate, Davidson had to face the families of the three professors he had murdered in cold blood. At that moment, 9-year-old Kendall Lowrey stood up, tears in his eyes, his words coming in gasps, saying, "In the afternoon of August 15, 1996, I lost my daddy. He used to call me 'Buddy.' No one calls me that anymore."

Baihong Liang, the wife of slain Chen Liang, looked at Davidson, whose head was bowed, eyes downcast, and said, "You have been in my home for parties and you have played with my children. How could you kill their father? What kind of evil person are you?"

Deana Lyrintzis, the widow of Professor Lyrintzis, stated, "My poor little angel will never know her daddy." She pointed at the convicted Davidson, almost yelling, "He deserves no pity, no mercy, no compassion, because he had none for my husband when he begged him not to kill him."

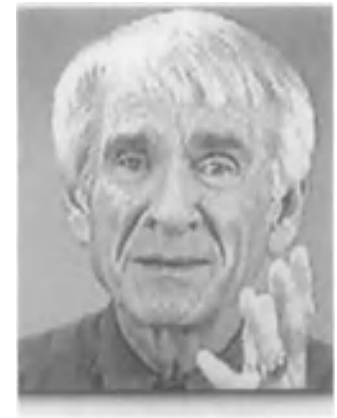
The widows of the slain professors, however, had endorsed a plea-bargain deal that would not result in a death penalty. When they learned that the automatic appeals process in California death penalty cases could drag on for a decade or even two, they pushed for life imprisonment. That is what they got.

Following the statements of the victims' families—this being now a ritual in most states, one that allows aggrieved family members to exorcise and exhaust their anger and hatred in the very faces of killers—Judge William Mudd sentenced Davidson to three life terms, plus ten years, in prison. There was no possibility of parole or appeal.

Mudd then asked Davidson if he had anything to say. Davidson, his back to the families of those he had slain, replied in a near whisper, "I am very sorry for what I did. I was very wrong. It should never have happened. I'm sorry."

SLAUGHTER AT HEAVEN'S GATE/March 22-23, 1997

America's junk culture has produced numerous doomsday or "escape" cults, invariably created by self-styled gurus, ministers, or glib madmen just sane enough to convince the gullible and the hopeful to throw away their lives for the sake of a leader's dream (or nightmare). Just as Jim Jones was able to con more than 900 followers into committing mass suicide with him in 1978, in Jonestown, Guyana, and David Koresh slyly convinced his naïve followers to die en masse in Waco, Texas in 1993, a smooth-talking crackbrained self-appointed space evangelist, Marshall Herff Applewhite, persuaded thirty-eight followers to kill themselves in order to spiritually board his imaginary spacecraft trailing the so-called Hale-Bopp comet on March 22-23, 1997.



Texas crackpot religious leader Marshall Applewhite, who took every dime his followers could scrape up and rewarded them with mass murder.

Son of a Texas preacher, Applewhite was a failed entertainer, who aspired to sing the lead roles in such musicals as Oklahoma! and South Pacific, but his voice was too thin and, after years of pursuing this career, he gave up on singing in the early 1970s. He had tried teaching music, but was fired from two jobs after male students complained about his homosexual advances. A report had it that he checked into a psychiatric hospital in hopes of curing his homosexuality. To a gay lover he confided that he longed for sexless passion, a "higher level" of spiritual gratification.

About this time, Applewhite began referring to himself as "Do," after the first note on the musical scale, and, as he added followers to his religious-space cult, he dubbed them with names of subsequent notes. The naive, the gullible, those tired of trying to cope with the problems of everyday life, trudged beneath Applewhite's banner for two decades. He milked them of their savings and real estate, "donations" that went to support the cult, especially after it established its headquarters in Rancho Santa Fe, a sprawling mansion (estimated to be worth $1.3 million), replete with pool, patio, and tennis court, in an upscale suburb north of San Diego, California.

Like all semi-religious cults that bilk their easily duped followers, Applewhite successfully persuaded several dozen "marks" to divorce themselves from their families, renounce all worldly goods, sex, and drugs, and to pool their resources with the cult, offering them in return the "guaranteed" promise of salvation on a spaceship.

Applewhite and his first fanatical follower, Bonnie Lu Nettles, had for years insisted that they were the Two Witnesses described in Revelations, the biblical prophets who would herald the end of the world and eternal salvation. In their early days they referred to themselves as Bo (Applewhite) and Peep (Nettles) to suggest that they were the shepherds

The sprawling Rancho Santa Fe, where Applewhite and his henchmen led their deluded followers to ignominious death.

Bodies of the mass suicide-murder (some were asphyxiated by plastic bags placed over their heads) at Rancho Santa Fe, which took place on the night of March 22-23, 1997; the crackbrained Applewhite—his corpse was found among the dead—had promised his followers that they would be riding a wonderful spaceship in the wake of a comet after their deaths.

who would guide the faithful to their higher level of destiny. Later, these two would change their cult names to Do and Ti, striking a more musical posture to their lofty calling.

Those who took up residence at cult headquarters in Rancho Santa Fe were mostly semi-literate lower class whites, but a sprinkling of minorities were present. All of them were taught by Applewhite that they were "special," that they were to be grateful for having been "chosen" to make the trip from physical misery to spiritual happiness. This is the typical spiel spewed upon the lonely, the disenfranchised, or those with low self-esteem.

Applewhite knew that such persons were easily persuaded to embrace any irrational belief, as long as it gave them a sense of belonging, and, especially, importance. Actually, they were more important than anyone else in the world, he told them, for only they would be privileged to board the unseen spacecraft he said was in the milky tail of the approaching comet, Hale-Bopp. All they had to do to board this craft was to commit suicide with him, to leave their corporal bodies (shells) and he would guide them to the craft that would speed them to paradise on the eve of a century doomed to crashing oblivion. Applewhite (who had been arrested for such lowly crimes as auto theft in the early 1970s) would be their gateway to Heaven.

There was nothing new about Applewhite's millennial swindle, with one notable exception—he was selling death, presumptuously, arrogantly promising that such death was merely the first step to a finer life. At the turn of the 20th century, thousands of sharpers preyed upon the suspicious and fearful, but no one of that down-to-earth generation thought to take their own lives. They did, however, spend hundreds of thousands of dollars with confidence men who sold them tickets in crude stadiums and arenas to "watch the end of the world," as Halley's Comet approached the planet.

On the evening of March 22-23, 1997, Applewhite and thirty-eight other followers began killing themselves. The twenty-one women and eighteen men, ranging in age from 26 to 72, killed themselves, according to pathologists, in stages and in groups, all following the same procedure. The mansion was first cleaned from top to bottom and, in this spotless atmosphere, Applewhite's victims lay down on double-tiered bunks. All wore black pants, flowing black shirt, and brand new black Nikes. The first stage of suicides involved fifteen persons, the second stage another fifteen, then seven persons, then finally Applewhite and his closest male follower.

Members swallowed Phenobarbital mixed with apple-sauce or pudding, followed by a shot of vodka. An asphyxiating plastic bag was then tied over each head to assure death and complete what was in reality, mass murder. All were covered with purple shrouds, except for the 65-year-old Applewhite and his last male follower, who were found with only plastic bags tied about their heads. It was several days before this house of death was entered. When no one answered the front doorbell or the phones at the mansion, police were called. Many officers who entered the building were overcome with the putrid stench of bloated bodies.

Marshall Applewhite had another reason to end his life. One report stated he was then dying of cancer, and he urged the mass suicide before his followers learned of his terminal disease. The most insecure of all of the Heaven's Gate group, Applewhite needed to take his followers with him before cancer claimed his life. Also, he had promised this death journey for so long that, in the end, like motorcyclist Robbie Knievel who had long promised to jump the Grand Canyon (he did, in a May 1999 lunatic jump, setting a record of 228 feet), Applewhite could no longer put off his own demise. In truth, this conniving con artist proved to be a mass murderer, who, by his own cowardly suicide, put himself beyond the reach of the law.

CHAPTER ELEVEN:
MURDER/SERIAL KILLERS

The serial killer, the most bizarre of murderers has, until recent decades, made infrequent appearances in ancient and more modern eras. With the population explosions of many continents during the 20th century, however, such killers have commensurately come into existence by dint of larger numbers. These killers in all ages invariably begin with assault and rape, then kill over extensive periods of time and often their victims are selected randomly and in many locations. Though some historic serial killers like Gilles de Rais were deranged cultists, these slayers have been invariably judged sane in modern times, but having psychopathic or sociopathic personalities.

Such murderers often practice sexual perversions, translating into violent death. Consumed by inherent rage, often from childhood, and spurred by lust, the serial killer is usually without conscience or remorse. Although aware of the nature of their actions, the serial killer rarely if ever feels guilt and he is the most elusive of slayers, having no apparent motives for his murders and seldom an accomplice in his or her crimes, who might later become an informant.

The serial killer is most often apprehended through his own disclosures. German serial killer Peter Kurten, known as the Monster of Dusseldorf, might never have been detected had he not identified his myriad murders to his horrified wife over breakfast one morning. Further complicating detection of serial killers is the fact that many move from one jurisdiction to another without apparent purpose.

Most often, the serial killer is the product of a broken home, where he is set emotionally and economically adrift at an early age. Drug-addicted or alcoholic parents of such killers are commonplace. Arson and the torturing of animals in childhood mark the path of many a serial killer. Often the serial killer avenges himself or herself on hapless, random victims in an effort to punish uncaring parents or cruelty endured in childhood. In the darkest and impenetrable cases, some serial killers have sexually violated the corpses of their victims, as was the case of the coast-to-coast serial killer, Earle Leonard Nelson.

Nelson's victims, like most of those claimed by serial killers, were women and children, the most helpless of any human prey, although adult males can some time be found in the lists of such bloodletting. And like most serial killers, Nelson appeared outwardly to be friendly, retiring, gentle and harmless, beguiling and gulling the victim into trust and confidence before his lethal nature burst to the surface.

Nelson was, however, a periodic nightmare that had few peers in his age. That has changed since the traumatic 1960s, and from that point, serial killers have become horrifyingly common, scores of them, from Kenneth Bianchi and Angelo Buono (The Hillside Strangler) to Theodore "Ted" Bundy, from Henry Lee Lucas and Ottis Elwood Toole to Christopher Bernard Wilder, John Wayne Gacy and Andrew Philip Cunanan to John Allen Muhammad and Lee Boyd Malvo (who killed ten people and wounded three in senseless sniper shootings in October 2002, Muhammad sentenced to death, Malvo to life) claiming dozens if not hundreds of victims. Such serial killings are no longer phenomenal occurrences, but almost routine events.

Police are, as in the past, at a considerable disadvantage in tracking down such killers, although forensic science, ballistics and DNA has improved their abilities in identifying and subsequently apprehending a number of these elusive slayers. The police are nevertheless almost as much at the mercy of these killers as are the endless victims claimed in what has become an ongoing senseless slaughter.

FRANCE'S FIRST SERIAL KILLER/1430s

The inexplicable transformation of Gilles de Rais (Ray, Raiz, or Retz; AKA: Bluebeard; 1404-1440), from idealist and most able supporter of Joan of Arc to the slaughterhouse killer of scores of children, is one of the most chilling stories in the annals of crime. Baron Rais was born into wealth and became the richest man in France when he married Catherine de Thouars in 1620. He had been raised a devout Christian, so

A statue of France's great warrior saint, Joan of Arc in Reims Cathedral; she was the idol of Gilles de Rais, who was himself a champion of freedom, until becoming a serial killer.

Gilles de Rais when he fought alongside Joan of Arc in her crusade to rid France of English armies.

Gilles de Rais shown on his warhorse, while serving in the army of Joan of Arc.

when he heard that Joan of Arc was in search of an army to repel the British invaders, Rais met with her.

The young woman captivated and mystified Rais, and he soon pledged his sword and fortune to her cause. Rais paid for the powerful army that followed Joan to Orleans and her greatest victory. He was by her side when she captured the city and drove the British from the battlements. The young baron was ecstatic with triumph, but this euphoric attitude was short-lived. Joan was betrayed and turned over to the British, who tortured and then condemned her to death in a mock trial and executed her at the stake on May 31, 1431. Her death was devastating to Rais, who became a recluse.

Rais had already been made a marshal of France and his incredible wealth allowed him to live lavishly. He began to spend recklessly on paintings, tapestries, and sculptures, becoming the most generous patron of the arts in France. To support his sumptuous lifestyle, Rais began to sell some of his vast estates. This brought him into conflict with other family members, who claimed birthrights to these lands. Relatives went to King Charles who signed an injunction forbidding Rais from selling more estates, but he defied the powerless king and sold lands in Brittany to cover his colossal expenditures.

By 1439, Rais had become dissolute, drinking heavily and dallying with whores. His once bright and noble character had changed completely. He now sought out vice with a vengeance and was notorious for his lecheries and his obsession with alchemy, magic, and all manner of the black arts. Rais' transformation has been attributed to the painful death of the woman he most admired, St. Joan. With her death, he reportedly lost all faith in God and religion.

Rais turned to the darker side of his soul, plunging into its abyss. According to one account, "his ego had a Jekyll and Hyde variability, now urging him to depravity, now propelling him on to self fulfillment through the use of his undoubted gifts."

Suffering great financial losses because of his profligate ways, Rais turned desperately to wild schemes to create riches. He consulted Gilles de Sill, a cleric who claimed that he could change common metal into gold through alchemy. Rais financed de Sill's half-baked experiments, and when these failed to produce the expected heaps of gold, Rais consulted Francesco Prelati, a defrocked, demented priest. Prelati promised the baron that he could obtain riches for Rais through the black arts by raising Satan, and he and Rais forthwith experimented with satanic rituals.

In the baron's many castles were theaters that had been constructed years earlier for his love of drama. According to one report, Prelati used these theaters as part of his black masses dedicated to Satan, rites in which young urchin boys were brought by the dozens and viciously slain while Rais watched, fascinated, sadistically enjoying the suffering and agonizing deaths of these children.

Rais conducted the most depraved and horrid acts himself, helping the mad ex-priest to sexually abuse, torture, and mutilate to death these helpless boys. The numbers involved were staggering, reported to have been between 140 and 800. If the latter number is anywhere near correct, it would make Rais the worst serial killer in history. His defenders later claimed there were few deaths, that the whole trial which Rais faced on October 15, 1440, was a trumped-up affair to wrest his vast estates from him, but much of this land had already been sold and so this claim was largely invalid.

The court in the trial of Gilles de Rais in 1440; the presiding judge, Bishop Jean de Malestroit, is shown top left. De Rais was accused of murdering between 140 to 800 young boys in Satanic rituals.

A contemporary sketch shows the execution of Gilles de Rais, October 26, 1440; he was strangled and burned to death before a large crowd at the Ile de Biesse, outside Nantes.

Rais was an imposing figure in court. He had a long blue-black beard, which later caused him to be named Bluebeard, a name that came to signify the serial killer in France and would later be applied to the infamous Henri Desire Landru (see The French Bluebeard, Serial Killers). Among the allegations made against him, Rais was charged with abducting a priest and killing him for his own amusement. He was also charged with sodomizing countless young boys, while they were being murdered. Rais listened as witness after witness accused him of these monstrous crimes. He then laughed loudly at the court, claiming it was all nonsense, that his enemies had fabricated these terrible stories to have him imprisoned or executed, so that they could seize his fortune.

On October 19, 1440, Rais and his closest servants were tortured and the servants confessed that all of the charges against Rais were true. They added details of Rais' unspeakable tortures and murders, some committed, they said, in front of Rais' brother. Rais himself did not break under torture, but he finally did break when threatened with excommunication from the Catholic Church.

Rais' spiritual tie was so strong that the mere threat of being set spiritually adrift from the Church compelled him to "confess everything." Rais was condemned to death and, on October 26, 1440, was publicly strangled to death, burned at the same time, while he choked out a plea for forgiveness to the parents of the murdered children witnessing his bizarre death. Two of Rais' associates were also executed at the same time, both burned alive.

HUNGARY'S MURDERING COUNTESS/1600s

Married at fifteen to Count Ferencz Ndasdy, Countess Elizabeth Bathory (or Batory; 1560-1614) lived in regal splendor inside the Castle Csejthe. Waited on hand and foot, Bathory occupied her teenage years with pleasures of the flesh and toward her twentieth year she began to display a decided taste for sadistic punishment. Her husband, while fighting the Turks, the story goes, found a rare manuscript on ancient tortures and the countess read this crusty document with avid interest which later turned to lethal fascination. She was also obsessed with flagellation, a trait learned from an unbalanced aunt, and ordered her servants to whip her for long, painful periods as would a flagellant.

The countess was an attractive woman, dark and sensuous, and she took many lovers while her husband was still alive. Upon his death in 1604, Bathory's mind seemed to snap. She slept erratically, ordered her servants to walk about naked, and developed an unpredictable appetite, demanding that she be served only exotic fruits from the Middle East.

When a servant girl dared to bring her some commonplace apples, the countess flew into a rage and struck the girl, cutting the flesh with a large ring. Some blood splashed on her face and when she wiped it off she became convinced that her aging complexion in that spot had suddenly been revitalized, made youthful again.

Hungary's Countess Elizabeth Bathory ordered the deaths of between 600 and 750 young girls, bathing in their blood to improve her complexion; she was walled up in a room of her castle, dying in 1614.

With this imagined discovery, the countess believed that eternal youth could be obtained if she bathed in the fresh virgin's blood. To this gruesome end, Bathory ordered her palace guardsmen to scour the countryside and bring her peasant girls who, upon being proved virgins, were slain, their blood drained into a hot bath in which the countess submerged herself every morning.

It was reported that, like the legendary Dracula (Vlad Tepes, see Mass Murder), Bathory turned vampire and actually sucked the blood out of her victims, but this was never supported even by her most lunatic aides, especially the cruel Dorotta Szentes, who was known as Dorka. For years the countess bathed in her human blood, but the rejuvenation process was evident only in her demented mind. Her followers, fearing for their own lives, did her bidding, murdering girls by the scores to satisfy her maniacal whim, and buried the bodies throughout the old underground passages of the castle.

Bathory, in one grim moment of reality, saw herself as the aging crone she had become and screamed to Dorka that it was the quality of blood that was missing. She was bathing in the gore of inferior humans and suddenly seized upon the idea that only the blood of aristocrats could return her youth. She devised a scheme to snare the young daughters of her peers, telling bluebloods throughout Hungary that she would take under her tutorship twenty-five of the prettiest daughters of aristocrats and teach them in the ways of social graces. Since Bathory was one of the richest and most powerful persons in the country and her horrific deeds had been kept secret, many members of the lower nobility seized upon this opportunity as a way of advancing their own positions, and sent their daughters to this monster in 1609.

At first Bathory pretended to conduct classes in manners and etiquette, but she would have the girls murdered one by one in their beds as they slept and then butchered for her gory bath. Her most trusted servants, however, grew careless and, instead of burying the bodies in the castle caverns, simply tossed the corpses over the castle wall, where peasants soon discovered and identified them. (It was conjectured that the servants intentionally made the murders apparent in order to bring Bathory's sins to public view.)

Once the murders became known a great outcry against the countess caused the arrest of her most trusted aides, Dorka, a male servant, and a captain of the palace guard. Bathory herself, under Hungarian law, could not be arrested or tried for common murder since she was a member of ranking royalty and therefore immune from criminal prosecution. Her servants were nevertheless found guilty and burned alive at the stake for their awful slayings, but this did not appease an increasingly hostile populace which demanded the punishment of Countess Bathory so vociferously that the government feared open rebellion. To sidestep laws that protected the lunatic Bathory, the Hungarian Parliament convened and passed a special law which permitted authorities to bring her to trial.

Countess Bathory was convicted of murdering scores of young girls (the count was staggering, between 600 and 750), but since she could not, under any legal circumstances, be executed in any prescribed manner, she was sent to her suite in the castle and walled up in these rooms. She was fed through an opening in the brick wall and managed to survive in her isolated castle tower for more than three years until she died screaming to be released. When the wall was broken down and officials stepped inside the suite, they beheld, as one described "a creature so hideous as to make Evil itself cringe."

MARIE DE BRINVILLIERS/1660s-1670s

Marie Marguerite de Brinvilliers (1630-1676) was responsible for at least fifty poison murders. Her fixation with poison was born out of personal greed. She was the eldest of five children and was born into nobility through the d'Aubray family. Attractive and sensuous, she reportedly had sex at an early age with several of her own brothers. After marrying the Marquis Antoine de Brinvilliers at the age of twenty-one, Marie took a lover, Gaudin de Saint-Croix, who helped her secure poison.

When Brinvilliers' father learned of the affair, he had Saint-Croix thrown into the Bastille, where the abused swain learned the dark arts of poisonings from a fellow convict named Elixi. He then plotted with Brinvilliers to murder her stern father. With the help of the conniving de Saint-Croix, Marie planned to murder her wealthy father, Dreux d'Aubray, to inherit his vast estate and live a life of ease with her lover. She was by then much in need of money, having squandered most of her husband's fortune.

Before she carried out this scheme, she "experimented"

Marie de Brinvilliers, a sketch drawn at the time she was about to be taken to her execution in 1676; she was responsible for an estimated fifty poison murders.

The executioner stands before a crowd at Notre Dame Cathedral, holding the severed head of poisoner Marie de Brinvilliers.

with Saint-Croix's poisons. The patients of the Hotel Dieu, a hospital in Paris, became her first victims. Pretending to nurse the sick and feeble, Marie de Brinvilliers murdered at least fifty patients. She disposed of her father in 1666, and later murdered two of her brothers to gain their property as well.

However, the money left behind did not satisfy her. She then turned on her peers in the French court, killing anyone that stood in her way or displeased her. Meanwhile de Saint-Croix mixed the potions as fast as he could. In a moment of carelessness, he inhaled the noxious fumes and fell over dead. Authorities then inspected Saint Croix's apartment in Paris, where they found his many poisons and extensive notes on those lethal concoctions he had prepared for the many victims selected by Marie de Brinvilliers.

Further, a servant confessed to her mistress' sinister activities under the threat of torture. In 1676, the beautiful but deadly Marie was ordered to issue a confession before the assembled multitudes at Notre Dame Cathedral, after which she was beheaded and burned.

SCOTLAND'S BURKE AND HARE/1820s

The notorious William Burke (1792-1829) and William Hare were not only early-day serial killers, but the first body snatchers of important record who, when corpses were not available for sale to anatomists for dissection, turned to murder to replenish their dwindling supply of cadavers. These killers later argued that they were only providing important research material for the advancement of medical science, a point stretched to the unbelievable. Yet in this dark age of medicine, the need to examine bodies to determine anatomical makeup was crucial.

European anatomists, or those who studied the internal structure of the human body, found that established medical schools were neither equipped nor authorized to conduct such studies. These anatomists opened schools of their own and medical students flocked to their classes. The schools, however, were limited in bodies available for study. During this time, before the Anatomy Act of 1832, British law curtailed autopsies by stipulating that all corpses must receive Christian burial.

Occasionally, the corpses of condemned felons were turned over to physicians for internal study, but these were limited in number. Doctors, particularly the successful anatomist, Dr.

Body-snatcher and serial killer William Burke, who stole bodies from graveyards for anatomical study, then resorted to murder to increase his pay for "fresh" cadavers.

William Hare, Burke's murder accomplice, eager for the shares that new bodies would bring, but reluctant to hang, saving his life by informing on Burke.

Helen McDougal, Burke's common-law wife, aided and abetted her murderous spouse in his serial-killing enterprises, encouraging him to "develop" his business.

Maggie Laird, Hare's common-law wife, who managed the boarding house where the killers plotted their murders and to which they brought some of their victims.

The Edinburgh boarding house, where Burke and Hare lived with their wives; Burke's apartment was at the bottom-right and he murdered many of his victims there before carting their bodies off to Dr. Knox's medical school for sale.

Daft Jamie, a half-witted begger boy murdered by Burke and Hare; it was this killing that eventually brought about the exposure of the serial killers.

Robert Knox of Edinburgh, had to rely upon body snatchers who ghoulishly roamed through unguarded graveyards in the murk of night, exhuming corpses and carting these gruesome burdens to medical schools where these nocturnal deliveries were received in secret. The most celebrated body snatchers of this era were Burke and Hare.

William Burke was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, a farmer's son, who received little or no education, going to work as a baker's apprentice while in his teens. He later worked as a weaver, then a cobbler, then briefly joined the British army, but was released as unfit. A surly, broad-shouldered man, Burke left Ireland after repeated quarrels with his family. He went to Scotland and worked on the Union Canal, then took a room in the Beggar's Hotel in Edinburgh, a lowly, rambling boarding house for indigent Irish laborers. By that time, he had picked up a prostitute named Helen McDougal (or Nell William Burke in custody, shown in his prison cell wearing leg irons, while awaiting trial.

Macdougal), and both began a clothing business of sorts, collecting discarded clothes and shoes, repairing and then reselling these shabby items.

In 1826, Burke and McDougal moved to Log's boarding house in Tanner's Close, renting the basement apartment. It was here that Burke met William Hare, a lean, conniving fellow-boarder. Little of Hare's background is known. He had lived at Log's and when the owner died, he made the owner's widow, Maggie Laird, his common-law wife, and she assumed the role of boarding house proprietor.

Burke and Hare became drinking companions and would guzzle themselves into stupors while discussing get-rich-quick schemes that never materialized. Then, on November 29, 1827, Hare entered Burke's quarters while Burke was repairing a shoe and told him that one of his boarders, an army pensioner named Old Donald, had died in his room, still owing £4 in rent. Hare whispered an idea to his friend Burke: Why not sell Old Donald's corpse to Dr. Knox's medical school and make a little money on a body now useless to the world? Such an act was, of course, against the law, which required that all deaths be reported to the authorities and bodies removed for Christian burial.

Burke warmed quickly to the idea, and that night he and Hare carried the remains of Old Donald to Dr. Knox who purchased the cadaver, no questions asked, for £7. To explain the absence of Old Donald, Burke and Hare built a coffin, weighted it with bags of bark, sealed it, and turned it over to officials, who accepted this as the corpse of Old Donald and quickly buried the coffin. The porter at Dr. Knox's medical school informed Burke and Hare that good specimens for dissection might bring as much as £10 each and that these were in constant demand. They were invited to return often with such deliveries.

This transaction worked so smoothly that Burke and Hare resolved to continue selling bodies to Dr. Knox, except that some of the Log's boarders were reluctant to die. The body snatchers helped them along into eternity. The first of these was a boarder named Joe the Mumper who was dying of fever. Hare complained that such illnesses kept others from renting his rooms and the sick man was an inconvenience. Burke and Hare then smothered the man to death with a pillow, and his body was delivered to Knox's college in Surgeon's Square, bringing them £10.

Burke and Hare, along with their common-law wives, then went full tilt into the murder and body-selling business. Beginning in February 1828, they waylaid street peddlers and prostitutes or got them drunk, then smothered them and sold the bodies. Such was the fate of Abigail Simpson, a hawker of salt and hearthstone, Mary Paterson, a young prostitute, Mary Haldane, an aging harlot, Haldane's half-witted daughter, and an English traveler who was suffering from jaundice. There would be between fifteen and thirty victims in all, some later claimed as many as fifty or more. In most instances, Burke and Hare took turns suffocating the victims, one holding down the feet while the other smothered the victim with a pillow in the William Burke, shown as a wax dummy modeled from life in Edinburgh Prison by Madame Tussaud shortly before the serial killer was executed, the dummy wearing the actual clothes worn by the murderer; Burke had grown a beard before going to the hangman, "as if to disguise himself from death," said an observer of the day.

Log's boarding house. On some occasions, Hare and Maggie Laird murdered the victims without Burke's help.

The murders were not confined to the rooms of the boarding house. Killings to obtain bodies were boldly committed in the streets of Edinburgh, especially by the cretinous and bestial Burke. He was returning to the boarding house one night with the body of an old derelict he had murdered, the body stuffed into a box carried on a cart and pulled by an ancient horse. An old Irish beggar woman made the mistake of stopping Burke to beg some money from him. He strangled her on the spot and then grabbed her grandson, a mute, and broke his back over his knee, stuffing these bodies into the box with the other corpse.

The killers became obsessed with bodies and could not find victims fast enough to fill their blood-soaked trunk. One night, their broken-down cart horse refused to budge while they were en route to the medical school with a delivery. Burke and Hare had to hire a porter who used a large wheelbarrow to cart their trunk to the school where the murderers were paid £16 for two bodies. So incensed were they at their horse's refusal to move their cart that they returned to the spot where the beast still stood and cut its throat.

A mob, enraged at the court's "not proven" verdict that freed Burke's wife, chases the terrified Helen McDougal (bottom left) through the streets of Edinburgh.

The murder schemes of Burke and Hare began to unravel when Dr. Knox's students began to identify the corpses brought to them for dissection. One student recognized a prostitute he had patronized, but he remained silent. Knox evidently had his suspicions about Burke and Hare, but he said nothing, as long as the steady stream of bodies arrived at the door of his school. He became the most celebrated anatomist in the country and his school flourished.

Meanwhile, Burke and Hare fell out, or, at least, their women took to such arguing that Maggie Laird proposed that they kill Helen McDougal and sell her corpse to Dr. Knox. Burke drew the line at this and moved out with his wife, going to live with one of McDougal's relatives at Gibbs Close. Here the Burkes actually competed with the Hares, both operating separate murder businesses and continuing to sell the bodies to Dr. Knox. Then Burke killed an idiot beggar boy known throughout Edinburgh as Daft Jamie, who was recognized by some of Dr. Knox's students. The boy's identity was pointed out to Dr. Knox, but he denied that the body was that of the beggar boy. Again, he preferred to close his eyes and stifle his suspicions as to the real activities of his suppliers, Burke and Hare.

Burke and Hare's lucrative body racket came to an end on October 31, 1828. On the afternoon of that day, Burke was drinking in Rymer's pub when an old crone named Mary Docherty entered the pub and walked from table to table, begging. Burke sized her up and quickly concluded that her body would bring a considerable payment from Dr. Knox. He invited the woman to share some ale with him and the two got tipsy together. Then Burke invited Docherty to accompany him home to Gibbs Close where she would attend a "Halloween party." The woman accepted with alacrity and the pair went to Burke's boarding house, where Burke ordered a young couple boarding there, James and Ann Gray, to leave the premises, saying a private party was to commence. Then Hare and his wife were invited, Burke and his wife having made up with their murderous friends.

A drunken revel ensued with Burke dancing wildly with Docherty while she was periodically plied with heavy drink. (Because of this macabre revel, Burke was often called by writers a "dancing master.") In the middle of this raucous party, Burke suddenly pounced upon Docherty's bare feet with his hobnailed boots, grinning like a madman, and cut off her piercing screams of "murder!" (heard by the neighbors) by placing his paw-like hands about her throat and strangling her to death.

Docherty's naked body was then stuffed into the tea chest Burke used for his deliveries to Dr. Knox, and this was picked up by David Patterson, Dr. Knox's porter who gave Burke a disappointing £5 for the corpse. Having received so many bodies from Burke, Dr. Knox no longer waited for cadavers to be delivered to his school, but had his porter go to Burke for the corpses. Before this happened, however, James and Ann Gray, the momentarily evicted boarders at Burke's house, glimpsed Mrs. Docherty's legs protruding from the chest before it was quickly closed. Hare, realizing that the Grays had spotted the body, offered a great deal of money for their silence.

James Gray, however, went to the police and reported the murder, along with the fact that Gray had seen Patterson collect the tea chest, hearing him state that he would be taking this grim cargo to Dr. Knox's school. Police raced to the school, barged through the back door and found the tea chest with Docherty's body in it. Burke was quickly arrested and taken to jail. Then Mrs. McDougal was captured, along with the Hares.

To save himself, William Hare turned state's evidence, detailing his many murders with William Burke, or as many as he could remember. Mrs. McDougal was charged with murder, as were the Hares. Burke's trial began on December 24, 1828, but there was little to debate. He had already confessed his murders. Hare's vivid chronicle of the murders brought about a conviction for Burke, but the jury felt there was insufficient evidence to convict Helen McDougal and returned the verdict of "Not Proven" against her, a unique Scottish verdict which signified that the accused was probably guilty but not enough proof was present to allow conviction.

The execution of William Burke on January 28, 1829; more than 25,000 spectators watched the serial killer hang.

Burke phlegmatically stood in the dock throughout his trial and said very little, except to grunt derision at his one-time partner Hare. When he heard Helen McDougal's verdict he snorted: "Nelly, you're out of the scape." The court then released William Hare and his wife. The long-nosed, tall Hare, who had not been tried, but retained until Burke's trial ended, leaped from his seat in court, unable to restrain his joy at being set free; he danced a weird little jig as Burke was dragged away cursing in chains to await his execution.

While waiting for the hangman, Burke allowed artists to sketch him in his condemned cell but, ever the businessman, he charged them fees. He also complained bitterly about being cheated by Dr. Knox's porter, that many of the bodies he had turned over had been worth much more than what he had been paid. On the morning of January 28, 1829, William Burke was led to a public scaffold in Edinburgh and, in a driving rain that did not thwart 25,000 people from attending, was sent through the trapdoor. The huge crowd cheered his death and demanded that Hare, too, be hanged, but Hare had vanished from Edinburgh, as had Maggie Laird and Helen McDougal.

Grim irony: Burke's skeleton was later displayed at the very medical school to which he had earlier carted the bodies of his victims.

Crowds hunted them for weeks, but Helen McDougal was smuggled onto a ship and sailed for Australia, where she reportedly died many years later. Maggie Laird was given police protection and she was escorted to a ship sailing for Ireland and there she lived out her life under an assumed name. Hare fled to the Midlands where, under an assumed name, he labored in the lime pits. When his fellow workers learned who he was, one account has it, they blinded him with quicklime. He then went to London, a blind beggar last seen shaking a tin cup and begging outside the British Museum.

Dr. Robert Knox, who had paid for all the bodies and encouraged, willingly or not, the hard-working Burke and Hare to continue their murder business, was in disgrace following Burke's conviction and execution. Dr. Knox's school closed and he left Edinburgh. One report held that he became a showman with a traveling group of American Indians, but it is known that he first went to London and worked as an obstetrician and later as a general practitioner in Hackney, dying in 1862 with whatever dark memories that may have haunted him.

The gloomy deeds of his servants, however, did serve one useful purpose. The acts of Burke and Hare, dubbed Resurrectionists or Resurrection Men, so appalled the country that widespread body snatching was condemned in Parliament, where liberal politicians successfully argued that the lack of legal bodies hindered the advancement of medicine and allowed beasts like Burke and Hare to flourish. Parliament passed the Anatomy Act in 1832 which permitted relatives and officials to turn over dead bodies to medical schools for dissection and study before burial. This legislation caused the gruesome business of body snatching to go into decline and eventually cease.

It was grim irony that the day following his execution, William Burke's body would follow the same route he had in life sent so many others. His corpse was taken to the medical school operated by Dr. Knox's brilliant rival, Dr. Alexander Monro. Here, before a large audience, Burke's short, thick corpse was dissected and studied, the pieces later preserved in jars and held up during anatomical lectures. His skeleton was later reassembled and placed in a glass case that can be seen to this day as a prized exhibit at the Anatomical Museum of the University of Edinburgh. Beyond these skeletal remains, however, Burke and Hare, along with their medical mentor, Knox, would be remembered down through the annals of crime with a little ditty chanted by children for decades in the streets of Edinburgh:

Burke's the murderer,
And Hare's the thief,
And Knox's the boy
Who buys the beef.

THE POISONOUS COOK/1833-1851

Helene Jegado (d. 1851) was an illiterate French peasant with a great skill. She was, by the time she entered her thirties, known as a wonderful cook who could prepare delicious stews, roasts, salads, cakes, cuisine so savory as to make her employers drool and salivate. Orphaned at the age of seven, Jegado was taken into the home of a pastor in a small Breton village, where her two aunts worked as servants. She remained there for seventeen years, learning the arts of cooking from her aunts, then leaving with one of them to relocate in Seglien, where she was employed as a cook for the local pastor. It was here that she apparently began to experiment with poisons.

Moving to Guern, Jegado began dosing the meals she prepared for her employers with arsenic, which she had obtained to rid the place of rats. Seven persons died of mysterious causes before Jegado moved on to Bubery, where three more people succumbed to her marvelous meals. Again she moved, going to Locmine, where two persons died. Remaining in the same village, the cook moved to another home, where a person quickly died. She moved to another home still, and four more people died violent deaths, until Jegado came under suspicion.

Shown preparing one of her lethal stews, cook Helene Jegado claimed twenty-six lives, perhaps three dozen more, a serial killer who enjoyed poisoning her victims.

The motives for Jegado's serial poisonings were obscure, but apparently she was easily offended and took quick retaliation by murdering her employers and members of each household. In Guern, where seven died, including her own sister, the industrious cook simply remarked: "Wherever I go, people die." She murdered without remorse and it was obvious to officials looking into her horrendous career later that Jegado enjoyed killing people, and that she was a thrill-killer, one who took great pleasure in bringing life to an end, appropriating a life-and-death power that was legally possessed by her superiors, whom she resented and perhaps, even hated.

Moving to a convent, Jegado remained behind these cloistered walls for some years, but she was dismissed for theft and wanton destruction of property. Further, many of the nuns had become ill after she had been repeatedly rebuked for her shameful conduct. Jegado resumed her duties as a cook in one small village after another, always moving. Painful death followed her at the towns of Plumeret, Auray, Pontivy, Hennebon, Lorient. Physicians, as had been their practice in the past with all of those who died at Jegado's poisonous hands, diagnosed the deaths as the result of drinking too much vinegar. These were country doctors with little or no skill in understanding the symptoms of poison, even the most blatant killer, arsenic.

Then, in 1841, Jegado inexplicably ceased her serial murders. It was later surmised that she had simply run out of arsenic and thought it too dangerous to secure more of the poison. Yet, it was evident from her careless conduct that she was all but indifferent to being detected, having a cynical disregard at being discovered.

Following a seven-year lull in her murderous activities, Jegado arrived in Rennes in 1848, where she became the cook for a university professor, Theophile Bidard, who was also a surgeon. When Rosalie Sarrazin, another servant in the household, was poisoned in July 1851, Bidard suspected murder—Jegado and Sarrazin had quarreled incessantly—and he called police to investigate. Upon the arrival of the officers, Jegado, who had not been accused, suddenly shouted: "I am innocent!"

Arousing suspicion, she was taken into custody and then laborious investigations ensued, trailing back two decades. Bodies were exhumed and examined and in all cases arsenic was found. Jegado was brought to trial in December 1851 in Rennes, where she was found guilty of having murdered twenty-six persons and having attempted the murder of dozens of others. Prosecutors speculated that she may have killed as many as sixty people. Jegado, showing no remorse, went to the guillotine, where she was beheaded that month.

Staggering as the number of victims were in Jegado's long career as a serial killer, other female poisoners vied for her lethal record. A woman in Holland named Van der Linden, who lived in Leyden, was reportedly responsible for poisoning 102 persons between 1869 and 1885. Like Van der Linden, who was both a nurse and cook, Anna Maria Zwangziger of Germany (1760-1811), poisoned a dozen people with arsenic in several towns, but her motive was unlike that of Jegado and Van der Linden in that she attempted to eliminate female spouses in order to marry surviving husbands. These crude murders, however, did not see her intended results. She was tried and convicted of several killings, then admitted her guilt in court: "Yes, I killed them all and I would have killed more if I had had the chance." She was beheaded by the sword in July 1811.

ENGLAND'S ARCH POISONER/1840s-1850s

William Palmer (AKA: Rugeley Poisoner; 1824-1856) of Rugeley, Staffordshire, England, was the second son of Joseph Palmer, a sawmill owner. His father died when he was thirteen, leaving a considerable fortune to his seven children. After leaving school at seventeen, William Palmer began an apprenticeship with a pharmacy in Liverpool. He met Jane Widnall, who later became pregnant. Palmer stole money from the druggists to pay for her abortion. He confessed to the theft and was fired.

Palmer then became apprenticed to Dr. Edward Tylecote in Hayward, Cheshire, where he performed abortions and reportedly had fourteen children out of wedlock. He next studied at Stafford Infirmary, and in 1842 pursued his medical work in London at St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He also acquired a reputation as a gambler and womanizer. A man named Abley, with whose wife Palmer had been having an affair, died after drinking poisoned brandy thought to have been administered by Palmer. Palmer may also have poisoned one of his illegitimate children, whose mother was Jane Mumford.

These early killings, however, went undetected, and Palmer was accepted into the Royal College of Surgeons on August 10, 1846 and on September 8 of that year, joined the staff of St. Bartholomew's Hospital as a surgeon. He resigned a month

Dr. William Palmer of Rugeley, who poisoned fourteen or more persons in murder-for-profit schemes in order to feed his gambling addiction.

The trial of William Palmer; prosecutors won a conviction on circumstantial evidence.

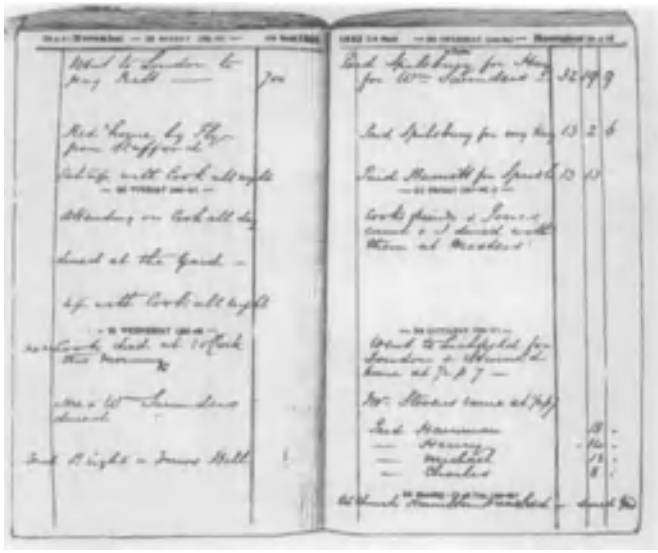
Dr. Palmer shown at the racetrack, where he lost in bets most of the money he received from his murderous insurance swindles.

later and returned to Rugeley, where he opened a general practice.

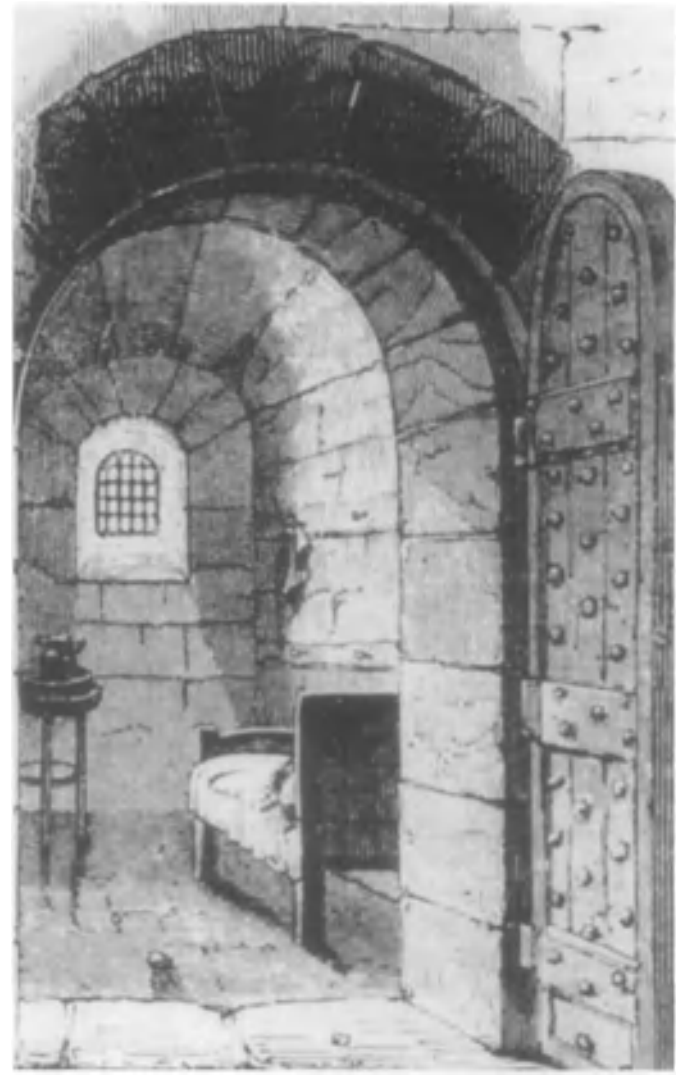
Palmer, possibly planning to marry for money, courted Annie Brooks, an illegitimate child of wealthy Colonel Brooks whom the Colonel had adopted. Upon the colonel's suicide, she was left with a large inheritance. Brooks had to obtain permission to marry from the Court of Chancery, whose ward she became when her mother was declared unfit. Early in the marriage, Palmer was earning an ample income and quit gambling, but eventually fell back upon his passion for gambling; he bought racing horses and stables. He suffered heavy losses at the track and had several affairs.

In 1850, he poisoned a man named Bladen, who had come to visit Palmer and collect a debt. After borrowing money from another man, named Bly, Palmer killed him too, and then lied to Bly's widow by asserting that Bly had owed him money. Palmer apparently next poisoned his uncle, "Beau Bently," and then tried to poison Bently's wife, who was staying with Palmer. When she complained of feeling unwell, Palmer gave her some pills, but she began to feel better, decided not to take the medicine, and tossed the pills out the window. Some chickens were discovered dead the following day, apparently killed by Palmer's poison, but the notion that the physician had attempted to murder Bently's wife was dismissed as "nonsense."

In 1853, Palmer bet heavily on a horse called Nettle, which lost, so he purchased life insurance policies totaling £26,000 on his wife, Annie, and his brother Walter. Next year, Annie caught a chill on a trip to Liverpool to see a concert. One of Palmer's friends, Dr. Bamford, diagnosed the sickness as "bilious cholera," and gave her some medicine. A week later, on September 29, 1854, Annie Palmer was dead. Palmer used the £13,000 insurance settlement to pay his bookmaker.



Two pages from Palmer's diary, which incriminated him at his trial; his notations show payments made to bookies and others that matched insurance monies.



Palmer's cell at Stafford Jail, where he calmly awaited execution and chatted with guards.

The hanging execution of Dr. Palmer on June 14, 1856, where an angry crowd hooted and jeered at the condemned man before he went through the trap.

Nine months after his wife's death, his maid had a child that died within a few weeks of birth. William Palmer next focused on his alcoholic brother, Walter Palmer, attempting to kill him by giving him too much to drink. William promised to loan Walter as much money and buy him as much alcohol as he wanted, calculating that the life insurance policy would reimburse him for expenses after Walter's death. Walter Palmer died on August 16, 1855. The cause of death was listed as "apoplexy." The insurance company refused to pay the £13,000 policy.

Palmer also tried to purchase a policy on George Bates, a gambling crony, but the insurance company was already suspicious about Walter's death and refused to issue the policy. When Palmer heard that the company had spoken to a youth named Myatt, who claimed to have witnessed Palmer putting something into his brother's drink, Palmer invited Myatt for a drink too, after which Myatt suffered from gastric pain for the next few days.

The scheming doctor had already secured a large insurance policy on the life of his alcoholic mother-in-law, who also lived with him. Palmer poisoned her and was also thought to have poisoned four of the five children he had had with Annie Brooks. At the time of these mysterious deaths, Palmer was deeply indebted to a money-lender named Pratt, who threatened to seek out Palmer's mother whose name Palmer had forged on loan documents for settlement.

Forced to try his luck at the racetrack to settle his debt with Pratt, Palmer met up with John Parsons Cook, an old friend and fellow gambler. Cook won a considerable amount betting on Polestar, a mare he owned, that won a race at Shrewsbury on November 13, 1855. Cook and Palmer both had rooms at the Raven Hotel in Shrewsbury, where Palmer gave Cook brandy and water that burned his throat and made him sick. The men returned to Rugeley, where Cook stayed at the Talbot Arms near Palmer's home. Palmer nursed Cook with some coffee and soup, and in four days Cook was feeling better. Palmer was called back when Cook became sick that night. The next day, November 20, Cook died. Palmer meanwhile, had obtained Cook's track winnings by forging Cook's signature.

Palmer was linked to Cook's death when Cook's stepfather, Stevens, became suspicious. Stevens asked to see Cook's betting records, but Palmer said his book was lost. A hotel maid told Stevens she had seen Palmer rifling Cook's pockets. The insurance company, already suspicious about the death of Palmer's brother, began to investigate Cook's death. Palmer again requested help from Dr. Bamford, who noted the cause of death on Cook's death certificate as "apoplectic seizure." He also permitted Palmer to help with Cook's autopsy, during which Palmer first tried to remove Cook's stomach and then tried to bribe the courier taking the stomach to London to drop the jar.

In London, Dr. Alfred Swayne Taylor, a poison expert, further examined Cook's organs, and determined the cause of death to be tetanus. Officials found no traces of the strychnine that might have caused this, but they did find antimony. They also learned that Palmer had bought large amounts of strychnine. A coroner's inquest returned a verdict of willful murder.

Meanwhile, the bodies of Palmer's wife and brother were exhumed. Although no poison was found in Annie's body, Palmer was indicted for murder at the inquest. Because public opinion in Stafford was so strong against Palmer, a law was introduced in the House of Lords on February 5, 1856, to allow a change of venue. The law passed and moved Palmer's trial to the Central Criminal Court.

On May 14, 1856, Palmer was brought to trial before Lord Chief Justice Campbell and two other judges at the Old Bailey in London. Palmer was defended by Sir William Shee and prosecuted by Attorney General Sir Alexander Cockburn. Dr. Taylor testified that strychnine could cause death without leaving traces in the stomach because it would be absorbed into the victim's nervous system. Palmer, who claimed he was innocent, was found guilty of murder on May 27, 1856, on strictly circumstantial evidence. He was publicly hanged on June 14, 1856, by the Stafford jail.

Rugeley citizens sought to change the town's name after Palmer's execution, so it would not be associated with the notorious serial killer. The mayor of Rugeley asked the prime minister, William Palmerston, who ironically enough, granted permission on condition that the town be named after him.

THE MARRIED MURDERERS OF FRANCE/ 1850s

For more than a decade, Martin Dumollard, a farmer living outside the French village of Montluel, attacked and murdered several young women, ravaging the bodies and taking what belongings these poor peasant girls carried. Following such barbaric attacks, Dumollard dutifully returned to his home and wife. Marie Dumollard not only knew of these myriad killings, but encouraged her husband's perverted slayings and, in return for her lethal support, was given some of the victim's clothes to wear as payment for her complicity.

Marie Dumollard, who encouraged her serial killer husband, Martin Dumollard, to commit murders; she is shown in a wax image by Madame Tussaud, and is wearing the actual clothes taken from some of her husband's victims.

Martin Dumollard often went to an employment agency in Lyons to hire new help, and sometimes he merely approached young girls himself, asking if they would like to work at his farm. Although the body of one of the maids was found in the woods in 1855, the case was left open and nothing more was said.

Six years later, however, young Marie Pichon of Lyons was approached by Dumollard, who offered her a serving position at a nearby chateau where he worked. When they did not go directly to the palatial estate Dumollard said he represented, Pichon became cautious and was ready to run when he pulled out a rope and tried to put it around her throat.

Dashing away, the girl ran frantically through the woods and down a dark lane, with Dumollard chasing her. She managed to outdistance the older man and arrived at a village, where an innkeeper offered her safety. Police were summoned and Pichon told the story of the attack. Dumollard was arrested, but he refused to admit having committed any crimes, denying that he had attacked the girl and claiming that she was a witless waif making up tales to discredit her elders.

The authorities disbelieved him, however, and investigated the Dumollard farm, where they discovered at least ten fairly new corpses of young women, along with piles of clothing. Marie Dumollard, unable to keep silent, confessed that her husband killed the girls, and she kept or sold the clothing as she chose. Some bodies were tossed into the nearby Rhone River, others were buried.

In January 1862, the Dumollards were tried at Bourg while mobs of angry townspeople tried to lynch them. Martin Dumollard was described at the time as "a strong and brutal peasant, with a large nose, thick lips, hollow eyes and brushy eyebrows. A beard fringed his hard features. His wife, thin and slight, with shifty eyes and cunning face, was placed at his side." Both were found guilty. Martin Dumollard was sentenced to be guillotined. He was executed on March 8, 1862. Marie, his accomplice, was sent to hard labor in prison for twenty years.

A FRENCH SERIAL KILLER/1860s

Like Dr. William Palmer, a French physician adopted the Rugeley Poisoner's same modus operandi, poisoning for profit. Dr. Edmond de la Pommerais (1835-1864) left Orleans, France, in 1859 at the age of twenty-four to set up a private practice in Paris. He advertised himself as the "Count de la Pommerais" at the Paris gambling tables. In 1861, he married Mademoiselle Dabizy, the daughter of one of his patients and heiress to a fortune.

The girl's mother had stipulated, however, that the Dabizy inheritance could not revert to the de la Pommerais family until her own death, a proviso that marked her for murder. She died just months later. As Madame Dabizy's physician, de la Pommerais certified the cause of death to be Asiatic cholera.

At the time, the young doctor was also conducting a secret affair with Seraphine de Pauw, the widow of one of his former patients. She had three small children, and faced financial problems. De la Pommerais proposed a scheme whereby he would insure de Pauw's life for 500,000 francs (£20,000). After several payments had been made, Madame de Pauw was to feign an illness. Fearing greater loss, the insurance company would offer to settle for 5,000 francs. When she signed the policy, the doctor persuaded her to name him as her beneficiary.

Supposedly to simulate illness de la Pommerais gave de Pauw a strong dose of digitalis, a vegetable poison. She became quite ill and soon died. The cause of death was listed as cholera, common in Paris during the summertime. The insurance company first seemed willing to pay the doctor the full 500,000 francs, but an anonymous letter to the Paris police warned them about the possibility of murder. The body was exhumed, an autopsy performed, and poison detected.

The doctor was tried for the murders of both his mistress and mother-in-law, but was acquitted for the death of Madame Dabizy. De la Pommerais was found guilty of poisoning Seraphine de Pauw, convicted mainly on the testimony of de Pauw's sister, Madame Ritter, who knew about the insurance fraud, her sister having confided the scheme to her during her illness. De la Pommerais was sentenced to die on the guillotine. To the very last moment, he expected to be reprieved, but he went to his death in 1864. Though officials were certain that de la Pommerais had poisoned at least two hapless women, they suspected that he had administered lethal doses to a half dozen other victims.

Dr. Edmond de la Pommerais, who poisoned victims in order to collect on their insurance policies; he went to the guillotine in 1864.

AMERICA'S "QUEEN POISONER"/1860s

Perhaps the most infamous female poisoner in 19th Century America, Lydia Struck Sherman (1830-1878) was an attractive housewife with a disarming manner. She killed every person she met with only one thought in mind—profit. Sherman collected insurance monies on various families and lived in high style in New York's tenderloin district.

Sherman married Edward Struck, a New York policeman, the union producing six children. Struck became a drunkard after being dismissed from the police department, and, tired of working to feed her large family, Sherman purchased ten cents worth of arsenic in the spring of 1864. When the druggist asked if she intended to use the poison to kill rats, the woman replied: "Rats? My goodness, yes, we're alive with rats!"

Sherman then poisoned her husband of seventeen years and, and later murdered her six children. Although the weapon was arsenic, New York City doctors attributed the seven deaths to various illnesses. The killer collected insurance on each of her victims. The killing of seven persons took time, but Lydia Sherman was in no hurry. She murdered her six children, ranging in ages from nine months to fourteen years, over a two-year period, from 1864 to 1866.

Lydia Sherman is shown encouraging the elderly Dennis Hurlbut to drink the wine she doctored with arsenic; he did, becoming one more of her many victims.

Lydia Sherman, shown haunted by the visions of her murders in her prison cell; she died behind bars on May 16, 1878.

Moving to New Haven, Connecticut, Sherman married elderly Dennis Hurlbut, a wealthy farmer, on November 22, 1868. After slowly poisoning the old man, she collected his estate. By April 1870, Sherman was low on funds and she went to work as a housekeeper for Horatio Nelson Sherman of Derby, Connecticut. She soon persuaded the elderly Sherman to marry her. A short time later she poisoned his two children, Frank and Addie (because they "would be better off," she said later) and then, when he became an alcoholic after their deaths, she systematically poisoned Sherman until he died on May 12, 1871.

The Shermans' physician, Dr. Beardsley, was not as indifferent to the Sherman deaths as the New York physicians who had haphazardly examined Lydia Sherman's previous victims. Beardsley became suspicious and called in other doctors to perform autopsies on the family. Finding poison, they called police, but Lydia Sherman had fled to New York. She was tracked down by detectives and returned to Connecticut, where she stood trial.

Sherman confessed to at least eleven murders, though she may have killed as many as fifteen others. Sherman, called "America's Queen Poisoner", was found guilty of second-degree murder (because all the evidence was circumstantial) and was sentenced to life in Wethersfield Prison, where she died on May 16, 1878. In her confession, Lydia Sherman took an almost lackadaisical attitude toward her many killings. In the instance of Edward Struck, she said: "I gave him the arsenic because I was discouraged. I know that that is not much of an excuse, but I felt so much trouble that I did not think about it."

Dr. Edward William Pritchard, who used aconite poisoning to rid himself of several women; he was executed on July 28, 1865, at Scotland's last public hanging.

A MEDICAL MURDERER IN SCOTLAND/ 1860s

The last public hanging in Scotland occurred on July 28, 1865, when the execution of Dr. Edward William Pritchard (1825-1865) was witnessed by 100,000 spectators at Jail Square, near Hutcheson Bridge in Edinburgh. Few among the crowd had any sympathy for this cold-blooded serial killer.

Pritchard was the son of a naval captain. At the age of twenty-one, he was commissioned an assistant surgeon in the Royal Navy. While stationed in Portsmouth he married a Scottish woman, Mary Jane Taylor. The couple settled in the village of Hunmanby, Yorkshire, where Mary Jane bore her husband five children. Pritchard opened a private practice, but soon acquired a reputation as a surly, habitual liar and a braggart. In 1858, he was forced to sell his practice.

The truculent doctor traveled abroad for a short time before moving to Glasgow, where he began a second medical practice. On the side, he delivered travel lectures and claimed to be an intimate of Garibaldi, a claim the Italian statesman denied.

Dr. Pritchard's reputation suffered further embarrassment in 1863 when one of his servant girls perished in a fire at his residence. The body was found lying in bed, which showed that she had made no effort to flee and suggested that she was unconscious at the time of the fire. The coroner's verdict exonerated Dr. Pritchard. A year later the doctor moved into more spacious quarters on Sauchiehall Street with money provided by Pritchard's mother-in-law, Mrs. Taylor of Edinburgh.

In 1864, Pritchard began an affair with 15-year-old Mary M'Cleod. She became pregnant and allowed the doctor to perform a crude abortion with the promise that he later would marry her. In November Mary Jane Pritchard became ill. She traveled to Edinburgh, where she recovered. But after rejoining her husband in Glasgow she again became sick.

Dr. Pritchard, who was attending her during this time, purchased an ounce of Fleming's Tincture of Aconite on December 8, 1864. He made three similar purchases in the next three months. Mrs. Taylor rushed to her daughter's bedside but after a few weeks in the house, the 70-year-old matron became afflicted with the same ailment after eating tapioca. She died on February 24, 1865.

Pritchard's wife died on March 17, 1865 amid growing suspicion in the community that her husband was a poisoner. The family cook and a maid who had sampled some of the food consumed by Mrs. Pritchard also suffered from the same malady, which was diagnosed as gastric fever by the ever-attentive Pritchard.

An anonymous letter, believed to have been written by Dr. Patterson, who had first thought that Mrs. Taylor was under the influence of a powerful narcotic, was sent to the police. The bodies of the two deceased women were exhumed and a quantity of antimony and aconite were found in the remains.

Dr. Pritchard was indicted for murder. His trial began at the High Court of the Judiciary in Edinburgh in July 1865, with Lord Justice Clerk John Inglis presiding. Defense attorneys attempted to shift the blame to Mary M'Cleod, but the judge rejected this argument during his summation. Pritchard was found guilty and was ordered to hang. While awaiting his execution the doctor confessed to the murders. At first, he had implicated M'Cleod, but later said she had nothing to do with killings he had so carefully planned.

THE TERRIBLE BENDERS/1872-1873

The first, most notorious of America's serial killers, who now oddly enjoy historical significance, at least in the sovereign state of Kansas, were the fierce and enigmatic Benders. Outwardly, this was a typical family of the American frontier, father, mother, daughter, son, all hardworking souls dedicated to the land, innkeepers who sought the common goals of commercial success, enough wealth to provide old age comforts, enough security to weather the storms howling down from the future.

Untypical were the methods the Bender Family employed in its mercantile practices, for the real business of the Benders was murder, and their victims, like the wayward wanderers who stumbled upon their own doom at Castle Dracula in far away Transylvania, were travelers seeking food and a bed for the night. This they received cheerfully from their sly hosts, along with an early unmarked grave.

The four Benders appeared for the first time in Labette County, Kansas, in fall 1870. The father, John Bender (some claim his name was William), was a man of about sixty, a primitive immigrant wearing a shaggy beard and possessing large, angry-looking eyes. He was accompanied by an equally robust wife whose first name is not recorded, a woman of fifty, with blue eyes and brown hair, his son John, about twenty-seven, and daughter Kate, age twenty-four.

Much was later said of the backgrounds of these four, most reports differing widely. It was later reported that John Bender, Jr., was not a Bender at all, his real name being John Gebhardt, or Liefens, and that he was Mrs. Bender's son from a previous marriage. Whether John Bender was his father or not, the younger man possessed all the traits of the old man. He was surly, sullen, and mean of spirit. His face was later described as having "had the fierce malice of a hyena." His build was slight and across thin, turned-down lips rode a light brown mustache.

John Bender spoke broken English, preferring to converse in German, the native tongue of his father. The old man never spoke anything but German, although he would make some guttural-sounding English words when angry, which was most of the time. Kate Bender, who was later described as a vicious-looking harridan or ravishing beauty, depending upon the sympathies of her ex-lovers and the editorial whims of newsmen in that day, spoke good English but with a slight German accent.

Mrs. Bender seldom spoke, and merely followed the grunted orders from the old man, working like a horse from dawn to dusk. Kate, of course, was of chief interest of this band of murderers and by most accounts she was far from ugly, although one report describes her rather brutally as "a large, masculine, red-faced woman." Others profile Kate as a very good looking red-haired girl, statuesque, buxom, with a small waist, slender hips and mesmerizing eyes, full lips and a charming manner, a cross between the subtle sirens of the Nile and the plump Broadway stars of that day.

Kate herself might not have been a Bender either, but, as was claimed by some, the mistress of John, Jr. Of this strange family, only Kate possessed a personality remembered long

The infamous Bender inn outside Cherryvale in southeastern Kansas, where dozens of travelers were slain by their hosts in 1871-1873.

John Bender, Sr., the 60-year-old patriarch of the family, who, with his son, crushed the heads of guests, while his wife and daughter prepared dinner for them.

Kate Bender, twenty-four, who claimed to be a spiritualist with powers to heal all maladies and who actively participated in her family's murder-for-profit killings.

by those who encountered the Benders. Governor Thomas Osborn of Kansas, who issued wanted posters for the family shortly after their horrendous crimes were unearthed, described Kate with some first-hand facts: "Dark hair and eyes, good looking, well-formed, rather bold in appearance, fluent talker." But when she and the other three members of her cold-hearted clan rolled across the gentle hills of southern Kansas in late 1869, she had no identity to speak of; she was just another homeless pioneer looking for a place to settle.

The first resident of Labette County to greet the Benders was a fellow German immigrant, Rudolph Brockmann, who ran a small country grocery store. How he came to know the Benders before they called on him for aid has never been learned. Brockmann had a large land claim and allowed the four strangers riding in a large wagon, all their earthly possessions piled behind, to build a shanty house on his property. They managed to endure a severe winter and moved in the spring to another hastily constructed building. In the following spring of 1871, the Benders selected a site on the main road stretching between the Kansas towns of Cherryvale and Parsons, closer to the former, their single structure squatting seven miles northeast of Cherryvale.

The Benders had studied traffic on the road, which was considerable, for along this well-beaten path hundreds of travelers made their way from Fort Scott and the Osage Mission to Independence. Beyond, to the southwest, was the Indian Territory that would later become the state of Oklahoma. The Bender Inn was only eighteen miles from what is now the Kansas-Oklahoma border.

The house was a simple affair, one which functioned as living quarters for the four Benders and was designed, with exceeding malice aforethought as later discoveries showed, to offer travelers the comforts of the crude inns of the day. The house was in a hollow, surrounded by plum and cottonwood trees, at the end of a long vale in the prairie, but it could not be seen at any great distance by those riding along the main road. Near the building was Drum Creek, a small stream seldom more than waist-high deep with water.

Behind the house, the Benders kept hogs and a few cattle in some pens. The house, or inn as it was called, had but one room that passed for two, divided as it was by a large piece of canvas. The first section of the house at the entrance was for travelers, who could sit at a large table and eat the meals prepared by Mrs. Bender and Kate. Behind the canvas was the area that functioned as sleeping quarters for the family and guests. In the back of the house was also a stable where patrons could keep their horses overnight.

In back of the inn stretched a garden, rather haphazardly kept by the Benders, and an orchard. To their meager ensemble, the Benders added a limited grocery which was nothing more than some shelves against the wall of the first room. They were lined with tinned goods and other supplies, which were purchased by overnight guests and some of the Bender neighbors, who lived quite a distance from nearby towns and found it convenient to occasionally buy some items from the Benders.

For about a year and a half the Bender Inn was no more than a waystop and its inhabitants aroused no special notice, except that Kate Bender began making a name for herself in many small towns in southern Kansas. She had moved into rural society quickly. By fall 1871 she became the desired partner of young men attending county dances and she proved an excellent dancer. Several young swains later claimed that she was also free and easy with her favors, although so aggressive a sex partner that after one night her lovers gave her up from exhaustion.

This was undoubtedly hindsight embellishment, given the monster image of Kate later favored by most portraits. For about a month Kate worked as a waitress in a Cherryvale hotel, but she resigned when male patrons began to make advances, or so she said when quitting. Only Kate of the entire Bender clan could be seen attending church on Sunday and, for a short time, she attended regular Sunday evening meetings.

Prof. Miss KATIE BENDER

Can heal all sorts of Diseases; can cure Blindness, Fits, Deafness and all such diseases, also Deaf and Dumbness.

Residence, 14 miles East of Independence, on the road from Independence to Osage Mission one and one half miles South East of Norahead Station.

KATIE BENDER.

June 18, 1872.

The handbill Kate Bender distributed in 1872, advertising herself as a "professor," who could heal all manner of diseases and afflictions.

It was at one of these meetings that Kate Bender announced that she was a genuine medium and that she had the power to call the spirits of the dead to the presence of the living. In fact, she said, her entire family possessed these powers. All of them were spiritualists, she insisted, who had direct contact with the Great Beyond. To prove it, Kate began to give lectures on the subject and hold crude séances, where she spoke for those at her table to the "Dear Departed," for a price, of course, and the spirits replied through her to the loved ones still chained to earthly life.

So popular did Kate become that she took her act on tour through the local Kansas towns, appearing in theaters, which were mostly packed with men eager to hear the secrets of the Beyond. Her success increased her capacities to make one miracle after another, until she began to place advertisements in local newspapers, which described her abilities to cure almost every human malady.

One advertisement stated: "Professor Miss Kate Bender can heal disease, cure blindness, fits and deafness. Residence: 14 miles east of Independence on the road to Osage Mission. June 18, 1872." In light of what was found at that address later one can only shudder at the thought of the sick and infirm traveling the lonely roads to Kate Bender, seeking relief from physical agonies only to be met by excruciating pain and bloody death.

During the period such advertisements were running, Kate Bender appeared to appreciative audiences in the towns of Parsons, Labette, Oswego, and Chetopa. Men flocked to see her for female lecturers were rare in that day and most men found such appearances shocking. There were occasions when men would shout to Kate across the footlights that she had no business as a woman appearing in public to lecture on any subject, that she was merely using her curing and spiritual talks as guises to stump for obtaining equal rights for women, that she was secretly lobbying for the female vote.

If this were the case, of course, Kate Bender should be entered in the female hall of fame honoring the pioneers who struggled for equal rights for women. It was not. Kate fended off such accusations with a winning smile and went on to suggest that those with real interest in employing her powers should visit her at the Bender Inn. There she would put them in touch with the Great Beyond. This claim was more than ironic as events would prove.

In the summer and fall of 1872 the conduct of the Benders began to noticeably change. Kate was off lecturing most of this time, but her brother John was absent from the wayside inn for extended periods of time, these being business trips, according to the senior Benders, who never explained what business their son was conducting. By the fall of that year both Kate and John had returned to the inn and their demeanor from that time on was later reported as decidedly strange.

It was guessed with some degree of accuracy that the murder spree in which the family indulged was confined to the six month period between October 1872 and March 1873. What caused the Benders to decide that murder for profit was the best or only course open to them remains a mystery. The decision was made. The murders began.

A man named Wetzell of Independence, Kansas, read Kate's running advertisements in a local newspaper and, because he suffered from a nagging and seemingly incurable neuralgia, decided to visit this lady of miracles. Wetzell and a friend named Gordan rode to the Bender Inn in the fall of 1872, where Kate greeted the pair warmly. She examined Wetzell's face closely and told him that she could positively cure him, but since it was near dinner time, it would be best that the visitors sit down to a good home cooked meal first. She and Mrs. Bender prepared the meal.

While they waited, Wetzell and Gordan were surprised to see old man Bender and his son John enter the inn and stare at them, saying nothing. They seemed to be scrutinizing the height and weight of the travelers. Kate Bender motioned the visitors to sit at the table and this they did, in the only chairs available, which had been placed tightly against the canvas partition so that when the two men sat down their heads rested against the canvas partition. By then the male Benders had walked behind the partition and were making noises that sounded as if they were dragging some heavy weights toward the canvas.

Kate Bender is shown conducting a lecture on spiritualism before an enthralled audience, this at the same time she and her family members were murdering travelers at the Bender inn.

Just as the meal was being served, Wetzell and Gordan, responding to nervous impulse, stood up and grabbed their plates, telling Kate that they preferred to eat standing up. They stood away from the table, nervously munching their food at a small counter. At that moment all the charm went out of Kate Bender. Where she had earlier been pleasant and charming, she now sneered viciously at the two travelers; she was now caustic and abusive toward them.

"You two have no manners," she told them, "only farm animals eat standing up! Are you gentlemen or beasts of the field?" Neither man made a response. Her eyes widened, her prominent jaw jutted forth and her teeth showed as she spat out her words: "Disgusting! Vile!" She pointed a long finger at Wetzell and, with eyes blazing, shouted: "Cure you? You are not worth a cure!" She turned to Mrs. Bender, who stood in front of the pair, her hands on wide hips, glaring at them. "Look at these beasts," hissed Kate Bender to her mother, "two horses with their snoots in the trough!"

Suddenly, Bender and his son reappeared, coming from behind the canvas, once more staring at the visitors in stony silence. Then they shuffled outside, and Wetzell saw them go into a nearby shanty that passed for a barn, where they stood talking, looking back to the inn, as if debating what next to do. Wetzell and Gordan put down their plates, mumbled their thanks for Kate's dubious hospitality and went outside to the road, where their carriage was tied. As Gordan got into the carriage, Wetzell drew forth his pistol and kept it by his side, not knowing what to expect from his strange hosts. He later claimed that, at any moment, he thought he would see the father and son come charging out of the barn with weapons aimed at killing him and his friend.

At that moment two freight wagons en route to Independence came rumbling down the road and Wetzell waved a nervous hello to the drivers, then jumped into the carriage. Gordan whipped the horses to a full gallop so that the travelers were ahead of the wagons. Wetzell turned to look back at the inn. It was now dark, but he could see in the doorway, holding a lantern aloft, the Junoesque form of Kate Bender, peering after them; he later swore that he saw her arm go up as she shook a menacing fist in his direction.

Both Wetzell and Gordan stopped some miles down the road to discuss what had just happened and concluded that they had been unnecessarily alarmed over the mercurial temperament of a rather tempestuous female and the phlegmatic actions of the Bender males, who were, at best, cretinous types with mordant personalities. They marked their experience at the inn as misadventure and decided to forget the matter. It never occurred to them to notify authorities about the peculiar behavior of the Benders.

A contemporary sketch shows the interior of the one-room Bender inn, with old man Bender behind a canvas wall and about to crush the head of an unsuspecting guest with a sledgehammer, while Mrs. Bender serves the victim dinner and daughter Kate Bender sits outside, on watch for intruders.

Wetzell's escape, one certainly of intuitive compulsion, was not shared by others whose sense of danger was less acute. Most prominent of these was Dr. William H. York, one of the leading citizens of Independence, Kansas. Dr. York had been visiting his brother, Colonel A. M. York, who lived in Fort Scott, Kansas, and was one of the richest men in the territory. Moreover, a third brother was a state senator, who was considered the most powerful man in southern Kansas. Dr. York left Fort Scott on March 9, 1873, returning to his Independence home. He stopped at Osage Mission and left there on March 10. Outside of Cherryvale, the doctor met some friends on the road and told them he intended to stop at the Bender Inn for his midday meal.

York was in a fine humor as he rode off on his expensive horse. He sat on a saddle of the finest leather. His clothes and boots were new and expensive. He also carried with him a considerable amount of money, as much as $1,500 some later estimated, and in his vest nestled a gold watch of great value. Dr. York was only two miles from the Bender place when more friends passed him on the road. Again he stated that he would stop at the inn to have some of Kate Bender's "fine stew." It was the last time anyone ever saw Dr. William York alive.

Days passed, and Dr. York did not arrive home. His family notified the other York brothers and soon both men organized search parties. A dozen detectives were also hired by the Yorks and these men combed the countryside between Fort Scott and Independence. In Independence, Colonel York, who announced that he would spare no expense to find his brother, encountered Wetzell, who related his nervous experience at the Bender Inn. He made no claims against the Benders, he said, but their actions had been more than suspicious.

On April 3, 1873, a large search party rode to the Bender inn to inquire as to the whereabouts of Dr. York. When they arrived, the Bender family claimed no knowledge of Dr. York. They had never set eyes on him. No amount of questioning by the searchers caused the family members to change their story. The detectives rode off, planning to search beyond Cherryvale and the Osage Mission. But all their inquiries led the search back to the Bender Inn, where Dr. York's trail vanished. When this was reported in detail to Colonel York, he decided to personally conduct the search.

On April 24, 1873, York himself visited the Benders. Accompanying him were twelve heavily armed men from Cherryvale. Before this group reached the Bender inn, they came across John Bender the younger. He was sitting alongside the road with a Bible in his hands. York questioned him while still sitting in the saddle, asking once more if he had seen his brother, Dr. York. The reply was startling. Yes, John Bender had seen him. He certainly had stopped at the inn. Bender reported that his sister Kate had prepared a good dinner for the doctor, who ate it and then left the inn.

Lawmen and townspeople from Cherryvale are shown unearthing bodies outside the Bender Inn; they found twenty victims, but many more murders were attributed to the serial-killing Benders. So terrified of the Benders were travelers that for several years these pioneers refused to sleep in wayside inns.

Before any more questions could be put to Bender, the young man volunteered some harrowing information. "There are outlaws hereabouts," he told York. "I have been shot at by these people, dangerous men, border ruffians they are, the worst scum of the war." (He referred to those Civil War soldiers who, after the end of the war in 1865, had taken up outlawry along the Kansas border, raiding small villages and robbing unsuspecting travelers.) Colonel York pressed Bender for an explanation: "Why tell us this?"

Replied Bender: "You see, sir, your brother, Dr. York, was most likely robbed and killed by the same bandits who sometimes lurk around these places. Find those bandits and you will find the body of your brother most likely."

York and his men then rode on to the inn and there Kate Bender greeted them warmly, telling them that she did remember seeing Dr. York and serving him some stew. Why had she not told the first search party this, she was asked. She had simply forgotten, Kate replied. With that she and her mother served the search party a large meal.

One man with York, who had been with the first search party, walked up to Kate Bender and held her hand firmly, saying: "You claim to be able to reach the spirit world, do you not?"

"That is well known," she replied.

"Then contact the spirits now and ask them in which world Dr. York can be found, among the living or the dead."

Kate Bender pulled her hand away and shook her head. Colonel York asked her to hold a séance then and there and search the Beyond for his brother. "This I cannot do," replied Kate. "There are too many unbelievers here and the spirits resist giving aid to those who scoff at their powers." She then turned to the detective who had cynically asked her to contact the Other World and said: "If you wish to make such contact with the Beyond, then come back here in five days and come alone. I will take you and your questions into that world and you will have all the answers you require."

Both Bender males then arrived at the inn, and father and son appeared eager to aid York and his men any way they could in finding the lost doctor. It was John Bender the younger who suggested that the entire party drag Drum Creek, pointing out that "this was the place, the Creek, where the bandits shot at me in the past and that is where you will find the body of your brother if he is to be found at all." The men stepped outside and the Benders led them down to the Creek, which they dragged for hours with no success. Exhausted, the search party left that evening, convinced that the Benders knew nothing of Dr. York's disappearance. They were a cooperative and compassionate family, even if Mrs. Bender had complained during their stay that "a crowd of men like this should not disturb peaceable people like us."

As the York party rode off, only the detective who had toyed with Kate about her spiritualistic powers remained skeptical and suspicious of the Benders. Colonel York asked this young man if he actually planned to return in five days to contact the spirit world through Kate Bender. "Should I undertake that journey," he told the colonel, "I would never return to this world."

The search for the mythical bandits proved fruitless, and by May 5, 1873, York and his detectives were once again back at the Bender Inn, but this time there was no trace of the family. Neighbors had already heard the livestock moaning in pain and had investigated the area a day earlier. They found the Bender livestock mostly dead, hogs and calves having perished from thirst. The family had deserted the place, leaving in a great haste. They had not even bothered to take their cattle and hogs with them, precious property in that hardscrabble era.

Colonel York ordered his men to break a padlock that had been placed on the front door of the inn, and this was smashed open. The searchers entered the inn and then stepped back, momentarily overwhelmed by a terrific stench. A short time later they found the inside a shambles, as if the family had packed pell-mell and cleared out in manic desperation. Everywhere they stepped litter and debris greeted them. Even some of Kate's "lecture papers" were found scattered over the floor. (These papers were later carefully examined and in them were found startling statements about "the foulness of man" and how "the murder of the heart" should be explored to "expose the natural instincts of a killer race." Much of this was later attributed to inventive newspapermen enhancing the already colorful character of Kate Bender.)

Searchers soon discovered the source of the powerful stench, which had been created by the shuttered windows having been sealed by the departing Benders. A trap door toward the rear of the building was found and opened and a pit six feet deep lay beneath this. At the bottom of the pit was a thick layer of congealed human blood which, in the airless inn, had caused the stench. York and his men began to tear the place apart in their desperate search.

The colonel went to the back door of the inn and peered out at a stretch of land near the orchard. This had been plowed and harrowed meticulously by the Benders, but such industry puzzled the young detective who had originally suspected Kate Bender of foul play. He pointed to this much plowed land and said to York, who was looking at the same spot: "The Benders did not farm. They grew nothing on their land. Why then plow up the land?" It had rained the night before, and much of the furrows had been washed over, leaving peculiar looking mounds of earth in this plowed patch. Colonel York gasped and then shouted: "Boys, I see graves yonder in the orchard!"

The men raced to the plowed area and began to dig furiously. The first of these graves yielded the much sought-after Dr. William York. His body was badly decomposed but recognizable. The skull had been crushed and the throat slit. Of course, all of York's valuables, including his boots, had been taken by the killers. One after another, seven more graves were opened and bodies removed. These included W. F. McCrotty, a Cedarville resident, who had been traveling to Independence to contest a land office case six months earlier. He had undoubtedly stopped at the Bender place for food and sleep and was murdered for his money and belongings. McCrotty was, perhaps the first of the known victims to be killed by the Benders.

The next corpse was identified by a small ring the killers overlooked; his body was too badly decomposed to identify. The victim was D. Brown, a horse trader from Cedarville. Henry F. McKenzie, who had disappeared on December 5, 1872, a native of Hamilton County, Indiana, who had been traveling to Independence to relocate there with his sister, was next found and identified later by the sister, Mrs. J. Thompson who recognized the dead man's clothing. Then came the body of a man named Longoer and, found beneath his body in the shallow grave, the body of his baby girl. Longoer had lost his wife in late fall 1872, had buried her body in Cherryvale, and had then headed for Iowa with his small child, only to stop at the Benders for refreshment and untimely death. Two more bodies were then discovered, both males, but they were so badly decomposed that their identities were never established.

So far there had been eight victims in all, but several more were later added to the Bender tally. Colonel York and his men quickly pieced together the murder method employed by the sinister Benders. Guests were seated at the table in the inn and served a hearty meal. Their chairs were purposely placed so that their heads pressed against the canvas partition separating the one-room inn into two rooms. Behind the canvas curtain stood old man Bender and his son John. As soon as the victims' heads made an impression on the other side of the canvas, the two men would strike the impression with a stonemason's hammer, crushing the skulls.

There had been some occasions where, as the investigators reconstructed the Bender modus operandi, the two Bender males had struck two men at the same time with their hammers. With the victim unconscious, Kate and her mother stripped the corpses of their valuables and the men dragged the bodies to the trap door, throwing them into the pit where, to make sure of death, the throats were slit much in the manner of slitting a hog's throat, allowing the pool of blood to build up in the bottom of the pit. This was done often enough in broad daylight, the bodies kept in the pit until the cover of darkness allowed the Benders to drag the bodies outside and bury them in graves where they had furrowed the land.

The plowing was meant to hide the outlines of the graves. In the instance of the small Longoer child, a girl of about eighteen months, no marks of violence covered her body. She had merely been thrown down into the shallow grave, her father's corpse placed on top of her and she had been buried alive. This was supported by a local physician, who stated that the child had died of suffocation, smothered by the weight of her own dead father. This child killing, more than any of the others, filled the searchers with rage, causing them to vow vengeance on the serial killers. (If certain reports are to be believed, their consuming vengeance was achieved in a spectacular manner.)

The awful discoveries did not end that terrible day. The next day, May 6, 1873, searchers found another grave near the orchard. This yielded the body of a child, which was so decomposed that its sex was difficult to determine, but later doctors concluded it was the body of an 8-year-old girl whose bones had been literally pulled from their sockets and crushed by some demented fiend who took a long time to mutilate the flesh. Later, near Drum Creek, the body of a man identified as Jones was found. Again, the head had been crushed, the throat slit.

In months to come other bodies in the area were found, twenty in all, but eleven murders were definitely attributed to the Benders, who had made their inn a foul slaughterhouse. The discovery of the bodies caused hundreds of citizens from nearby communities to descend upon the inn, and so incensed were these shocked spectators that armed posses were immediately formed. Colonel York offered rewards for the Benders, as did local and state officials. As the armed bands set off in several directions to hunt down the fiends, Colonel York reportedly shouted in anger and pain: "Boys, find these monsters, if it takes you through the Indian Nation, and finish them!"

Long before the posses rode that far they stopped about a mile from the Bender Inn, at the grocery of Rudolph Brockmann, the first man to help the Benders in Kansas. By then the searchers had discovered that Brockmann had not only helped the Benders settle in the area, but that he and old man Bender had actually been partners in the grocery from 1869 to 1871. He alone would know where these butchering maniacs were, the mob concluded. Brockmann was dragged from his home and mercilessly questioned. He insisted time and again that he knew nothing of the whereabouts of the Benders. Taking Brockmann into the woods about eight miles from his home, the mob pummeled and pushed him about, attempting to get him to provide information about the fleeing fiends, information they believed he possessed.

Brockmann shook his head and said he had no idea where the Bender family had gone. Someone brought a rope and placed it about Brockmann's neck. He denied having any knowledge about the wanted killers. He was yanked upward and hanged high until his feet stopped kicking and he was about to die. Then he was lowered and revived; he was given cold coffee to drink so that he could regain his speech. Again the possemen grilled him, but they received the same answer. Brockmann knew nothing. Again Brockmann was yanked skyward, then brought down when close to death. The half-conscious grocer pleaded with the possemen: "I beg your mercy, please, I knew nothing of these people for months now. I have not seen them."

Again he was hanged, brought down, and choked out his ignorance. Once more the rope stretched his neck. He was lowered. He made his denials. A fourth time the grocer was pulled upward by the rope, lowered at the last minute, and he still gasped he knew nothing. This time, with the passion of the mob cooled, he was believed. Some of the searchers insisted that Brockmann did know, but feared the Benders more than the rope, that if he did tell what he knew, he felt the Benders would seek him out and torture him before killing him. But most of the possemen were weary of their gruesome chore, and they decided to give Brockmann his life. They rode off, to search the bottoms of Drum Creek.

It was here that the body of the man named Jones had been found, his head almost severed from his torso. More than that grisly grave offered evidence of the Benders. Nearby in the snow on the ground, still frozen in spots, were strange marks made by a wagon wheel, one that was obviously out of plumb so that, as it revolved, it made a zig-zag track through the snow. The possemen reasoned that Jones had been killed when the ground in the orchard had been so deeply frozen that a grave could not be dug. The Benders had put the body in their wagon and driven to the Creek, cut a hole in the ice and shoved the body into it. Using the peculiar wagon marks to follow, the possemen followed these tracks southwest toward the Indian Territory.

A contemporary sketch shows the trackless landscape that surrounded the Bender Inn and the scores of curious who flocked to the place to view the bodies found there (shown at right).

Some hazy reports have it that the Vigilance Committee members did find their quarry and wreaked a horrible vengeance upon them, that old man Bender and his son John put up a fight and were riddled with bullets, that Mrs. Bender grabbed an ax and attacked several possemen and she too had to be shot repeatedly like a hard-to-kill viper before dropping dead of wounds and belching curses at her attackers. Kate Bender was saved for the last. She was tied to a small tree and branches were placed around her, as was the custom of putting witches to the torch in earlier centuries. The kindling was torched and the woman was burned alive as she shouted profanities at the possemen in a loud, long shriek that supposedly lingered in their ears for the remainder of their lives.

This tale of vengeance seemed to find support in letters received in 1910 by criminal historian Captain Thomas S. Duke. He had written the chiefs of police in Cherryvale and Independence. J. N. Kramer, Cherryvale's chief of police, informed Duke that "It so happened that my father-in-law's farm joins the Bender farm and that he helped to locate the bodies of the victims. I have often tried to find out from him what became of the Benders, but he only gave me a knowing look and said he guessed they would not bother anyone else. There was a Vigilance Committee formed to locate the Benders, and shortly afterward old man Bender's wagon was found by the roadside riddled with bullets. You will have to guess the rest."

D.M. Van Cleve, police chief of Independence, wrote: "In regard to the Bender family I will say that I have lived here forty years, and it is my opinion that they never got away. A Vigilance Committee was formed and some of them are still here, but they will not talk except to say that it would be useless to look for them, and they smile at reports of some of the family having been recently located. The family nearly got my father. He intended to stay there one night, but he became suspicious, and, although they tried to coax him to stay, he hitched up his team and left."

As late as 1910 there were those still alive who had hunted the Benders and who may have been part of the posse that reportedly caught up with the fiends. If they had participated in the summary executions of the four killers, they would have been indictable for murder, even forty years later, there being no statute of limitations on homicide. Under such legal circumstances, no one then or later could be expected to admit having taken a life, even the most despicable lives of the hated Benders.

Yet, with the absence of bodies in graves where the world could point with some relief and knowledge that the bloody Benders had finally been tracked down, there remained the many legends that blossomed in the wake of the Bender flight. The story that the family escaped completely remains persistent to this day. One tale has it that the family raced their wagon to Chanute, which was then called New Chicago, and there tied their exhausted horses to a rail and left them, buying train tickets to some unspecified destination in Texas, but that the family got off the train at Chetopa to further confuse pursuers and made their way on foot through the Indian Nation to Texas. A wagon matching the Bender vehicle was found in Chanute some days after the bodies were found at the Bender inn. The wagon, some speculated, might have been a ruse, planted by Bender associates to mislead the possemen.

There was a story that the Bender clan had been members of a very large criminal organization that stretched its evil talons through the states of Kansas and Missouri, even into the Indian Nation. This organization specialized in murdering travelers and stealing horses. The Benders were one of many murderous families, who settled in lonely places for a few years, killed until discovered and then moved off to resume their dark work elsewhere.

One book, The Five Fiends, published a year after the Benders fled into oblivion, claimed that Kate Bender was not one but three women, all using the same name, all appearing throughout the southwest in spiritualist lectures and all married to the same man, a satyr and murder maniac who was none other than the cunning John Bender, Jr. Bender the younger, it will be remembered, had taken long and unexplained business trips in fall 1872, and it was theorized that Bender was really acting as a booking agent for all these women known as Kate, booking their lectures and selecting victims to visit his "sisters" at several murder inns he was then operating.

This wild speculation was never proved in fact in that only one Bender murder inn was ever discovered and that was enough for anyone. The author of The Five Fiends obviously indulged in colorful fiction, taking pains to protect his identity against criticism by authoring this work anonymously. Such impossible fictional treatments of the Benders have continued through the decades, the most recent being The Bloody Benders, which adroitly mixes fact and fiction but comes to a less spectacular conclusion than what is found in The Five Fiends, a title which of itself is misleading in that only four Benders were ever known to have existed.

Another, final speculation was rendered by John Towers James in The Benders of Kansas, one that through a process of elimination, outlined the logical route the Benders used to make their permanent escape. James had them fleeing by train from Thayer, to Humboldt, Kansas, switching to another train line that ran to Venita in the Indian Territory and getting onto another railroad line there to take a train to Denison, Texas, where they may have finally vanished forever. There was much to believe in this, the best of the theories regarding the Bender escape route, in that this was the only route that was not covered by the many posses hunting the killers.

Four main posses fanned out from Cherryvale after the discovery of the bodies. One posse headed for Thayer, another toward Independence, still another toward Oswego, and a fourth, a party of seven men led by an ex-captain of the Union Army, rode straight into the Indian Territory. The first three parties returned within a week, admitting that the trails they followed led nowhere. The eight men that had crossed into the Indian Territory did not return for quite some time, about two weeks, and when they did return they refused to discuss the Benders. None of them even mentioned the name of the killers, and it was assumed that this was the posse that had caught up with the killers and destroyed them.

The silence of these men had been assured, it was claimed, when they discovered more than $7,000 on the Benders when they were caught (some later claimed the amount was as high as $10,000), all blood money taken from their victims. After killing the Benders, it was speculated, the posse members divided the money equally as a sort of bounty payment for their labors, and the possession of this loot further insured their silence once they had returned to Cherryvale.

Still, no amount of dire reports that had the Benders dead could cease the belief that the fiends were alive and well, a belief that became traditionally strong. One of the believers was a self-styled soothsayer and practitioner of spiritualistic rites, much like Kate Bender. She was Mrs. Frances McCann, of McPherson, Kansas, a small, spare woman with indefatigable energy and a suspicious eye for much wanted felons living under aliases. McCann had dreams each night that revealed marvelous and frightening truths to her about her neighbors, her relatives, and even her employees.

One night in 1888 her clairvoyance focused upon Sarah Eliza Davis, the woman who did McCann's washing. McCann's spirits clearly informed her that Sarah Davis was none other than the legendary murderess, Kate Bender, operating under a disguise. For months the dogged spiritualist investigated Sarah Davis and her elderly mother. She traveled through several states looking into the background of the family and haunted their every footstep, watching the Davis family from the distance of their outhouse, where she made night-ly notes of their suspicious activities. Then, equipped with what she thought was enough evidence to convict the Davis women, McCann went to authorities. She insisted that the Davis women be arrested and tried as the missing murderesses, Mrs. Bender and her daughter Kate.

Although local authorities were inclined to dismiss these accusations, McCann raised such a fuss and Sarah Davis acted in such a manner as to bring suspicion against her that the women were finally arraigned in November 1889 for the murder of Dr. York, sixteen long years after the Benders had vanished. This took place in the Oswego courthouse. Certain officials were convinced that finally the Bender monsters, or, at least two of them, were now in custody, but many of the chief state's witnesses were not so sure, particularly the almost hanged Rudolph Brockmann. He took one look at the Davis women and said no, these were not Mrs. Bender and Kate.

GOVERNOR'S PROCLAMATION.

$2,000 REWARD

State of Kansas, Executive Department.

